Attorney Claims FBI Knew Men Convicted Of Murder Were Innocent. The AP (2/28, Lavoie) reports, "The FBI considered the lives of four men who spent decades in prison for a murder they didn't commit 'acceptable collateral damage' in the fight against organized crime, a lawyer for the families of the men said Tuesday." The AP continues, "Peter Limone, Joseph Salvati and the families of two other men who died in prison after being convicted in the 1965 gangland killing of Edward "Teddy" Deegan are suing the federal government for malicious prosecution. … Lawyers have not specified the amount they are seeking, but have cited court decisions that show other plaintiffs were awarded $1 million for each year in prison." The AP adds, "In closing arguments Tuesday, attorney Michael Avery said Boston agents knew that FBI informant Joseph 'The Animal' Barboza lied when he named the four men as Deegan's killers. Barboza wanted to protect a fellow FBI informant, Vincent 'Jimmy' Flemmi, who was involved in Deegan's killing, Avery said. … The men were 'acceptable collateral damage' in the FBI's priority at the time — taking down the Mafia through the use of criminal informants, Avery said." The AP notes, "The government has argued federal authorities had no duty to share information with state officials who prosecuted Limone, Salvati, Henry Tameleo and Louis Greco. Justice Department lawyer Bridge Bailey Lipscomb said Tuesday that federal authorities cannot be held responsible for the results of a state prosecution. … Lipscomb said the state investigated the case for eight months and had 10 investigators working on it."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

FBI Launches Civil Rights Murder Probes, As Mississippi Closes Till Case. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and FBI Director Robert Mueller announced at a press conference yesterday that the FBI is opening new investigations into unsolved civil rights era murders. The story is widely reported in national media, and on local TV news in the south, and many stories include Mueller's comment, "Many individuals have quite literally gotten away with murder."

The CBS Evening News (2/27, story 6, 2:25, Couric, 7.66M) reported that "a Mississippi grand jury closed the book today on" the Emmett Till "case that helped ignite the civil rights movement," but "the search for justice goes on in other cold cases dating back that that era." CBS (Orr) added that the murder of "Oneal Moore, a black deputy sheriff in Louisiana…in June 1965," is "just one of about 100 cases…now getting a fresh look from the FBI. And agents say they're pursuing promising new leads in more than a dozen of the race-related crimes." FBI Director Robert Mueller: "Too many instances, the truth has been hidden for too long. Many individuals have, quite literally, gotten away with murder." Orr: "The Justice Department concedes many of the killings may never be solved. … But the government is feeling pressure from people who have waited decades for answers. … In recent years, the FBI has been able to solve a few high-profile civil rights killings. But many more cases remain unsolved, a festering reminder of an ugly time in America."

NBC Nightly News (2/27, story 8, 1:45, Williams, 9.87M) reported that in light of the grand jury decision, Till's "murder will soon be considered a closed case." NBC (P. Williams) added, "The men suspected of killing him…have since died. One was married to the woman who said she was whistled at. She still lives," but the grand jury "has declined to prosecute her for manslaughter. … But the Justice Department says it's not turning its back on civil rights era killings. The FBI is taking a new look at more than 100 cases like the 1946 lynching of four sharecroppers in this bridge an hour east of Atlanta. … FBI agents say a dozens of cases are now under active investigation. They're hoping for a different result than in the case of Emmett Till."

In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/28) reports, "The high-priority cases, which…Mueller described as numbering between 10 and 12, are among an estimated 100 that investigators nationwide are looking at as possible civil rights-related murders. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales acknowledged that many of the cases may be beyond the boundaries of what the federal government can legally prosecute. But they 'remain on our radar,' he said…. Addressing civil rights violators, Gonzales said: 'You have not gotten away with anything -- we are still on your trail.'" The AP adds, "Mueller said the FBI began re-examining its old case files over a year ago amid of spate of civil rights cases that investigators and prosecutors successfully solved."

DOJ_NMG_0137537

Under the headline "Justice Dept. Widens FBI Probe Of Deaths During Civil Rights Era," USA Today (2/28, 3A, Johnson, 2.27M) reports DOJ "is expanding significantly its review of scores of civil-rights-era homicides that the FBI says may have never been fully investigated by local authorities." Gonzales, "appearing with Mueller and national civil rights leaders, said the government's expanded review of suspicious deaths would include a nationwide plea for information on other 'cold cases' that never have been resolved, were misidentified as accidental deaths or were never previously reported. 'We can't right these wrongs, but we can try to bring some measure of justice,' Mueller said."

Also coupling the cold case and Till grand jury stories, the Washington Post (2/28, A10, Fears, 690K) notes that at yesterday's press conference, Gonzales and Mueller said "the task of closing the cases will be daunting as witnesses die and evidence disappears. … 'Many individuals have quite literally gotten away with murder,' Mueller said. But the government has a message to killers who remain alive, he said: 'You've not gotten away with anything. We're still on your trail.' The NAACP, the National Urban League and the Southern Poverty Law Center will share information with federal authorities as partners in a new Civil Rights Era Cold Case Initiative, Mueller said." Hearst Newspapers (2/28, Duray), Gannett News Service (2/28, Radelat, Mitchell), Bloomberg (2/28, Schmidt) and ABC News.com (2/27, Cook, Garber) also report on yesterday's press conference and the FBI initiative.

Meanwhile, in a widely-distributed story about the Till decision, the AP (2/28, Elliott, Breed) reports, "The district attorney…had sought a manslaughter charge against the white woman, Carolyn Bryant Donham," but the grand jury "found insufficient evidence, according to documents made public Tuesday. … 'You're looking at Mississippi. I guess it's about the same way it was 50 years ago,' said a disappointed Simeon Wright, 64, a black man who heard his cousin whistle. 'We had overwhelming evidence, and they came back with the same decision..'" The AP notes, "The FBI reopened the case in 2004 but decided in 2006 not to press charges. The case was turned over to local prosecutors, with the FBI suggesting they take a closer look at Donham. Some witnesses said a woman's voice could be heard at the scene of the abduction." The New York Times (2/28, Dewan, 1.16M) also reports on the Till decision, under the headline "After Inquiry, Grand Jury Refuses To Issue New Indictments In Till Case," noting yesterday's Gonzales-Mueller press conference in the story.

New FBI Investigations Widely-Reported On Southern Local TV. The announcement also received widespread local TV coverage across the south, generally highlighting their local unsolved cases. Some examples: WJTV-TV Jackson, MS (2/27, McCaffrey) reported on its Web site from its broadcast story, "The FBI says it hopes to solve dozens of cases that were racially based crimes. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales says the suspects have not gotten away with anything, and the government is still on their trail. With the passage of time, some worry witnesses and evidence may now be unavailable." Jerry Mitchell of the Jackson Clarion-Ledger said, "These were cases where guys got away with murder and everybody knew they were getting away with murder, so its kind of injustice at its height."

WDEF-TV Chattanooga, TN (2/27, Parker) reported, "The FBI today announced they plan to review around a hundred unsolved deaths from the Civil Rights era in the South. And that includes two cases here in the Tennessee Valley. … FBI Director Robert Mueller says, 'As you know all too well, many murders during the Civil Rights era were not fully investigated, were covered up or were mis-identified as an accidental death or disappearance.'" WMC-TV Memphis (2/27) noted, "Nearly 50 years ago, 16-year-old Larry Payne was shot to death at what used to be a housing project. Tonight, his death is one of dozens of unsolved civil rights cases the FBI will re-open."

WCNC-TV Charlotte, NC (2/27, Crowley) reported, "They are called 'the forgotten.' They are 76 people who died in from 1952 to 1968. … Tuesday the FBI was pulling those case files and taking a second look at the information in them. Two of the cases are local. … 'We are committed to reexamining these cases and doing all we can to bring justice to the criminals who may have avoided punishment for so long,' Gonzales said."

WIS-TV Columbia, SC (2/27) reported, "The FBI says the case involving the Orangeburg Massacre may be one of the many re-opened. … It's one of three South Carolina cases local FBI agents are looking into. The attention comes following a news conference Tuesday on a nationwide initiative to investigate unsolved murders committed in the 50s and 60s. FBI Director Robert Mueller says, 'In too many instances the truth has been hidden for too long. Many individuals have quite literally gotten away with murder.'

DOJ_NMG_0137538

KSLA-TV Shreveport, LA (2/27) reported, "The case of a black man killed at the hands of a white police officer in Ruston, back in 1965, may be re-opened by the FBI. Then, the shooting of John Wessley Wilder was ruled justifiable by the coroner of Lincoln parish," but the "Southern Poverty Law Center believes Wilder's death may have been racially motivated. They've brought his case, and nearly one hundred others, to the attention of the FBI."

Grand Jury Will Not Issue Indictment In 1955 Till Slaying. The AP (2/28, Elliott, Breed) reports, "All but closing the books on a crime that helped give rise to the civil rights movement, a grand jury has refused to bring any new charges in the 1955 slaying of Emmett Till, a black teenager who was beaten and shot after whistling at a white woman in the Mississippi Delta." The AP continues, "The district attorney in rural Leflore County had sought a manslaughter charge against the white woman, Carolyn Bryant Donham, who was suspected of pointing out Till to her husband to punish the boy for what was a grave offense in the segregated South. … But the grand jury last Friday issued a 'no bill,' meaning it found insufficient evidence, according to documents made public Tuesday." The AP adds, "Federal authorities decided last year not to prosecute anyone, saying the statute of limitations for federal charges had run out. Mississippi authorities represented the last, best hope of bringing someone to justice. No one has ever been convicted in the slaying."

The New York Times (2/28, Dewan) reports, "Two men, now dead, admitted to the killing in 1956 after they were acquitted by an all-white jury in Sumner, Miss. But the Justice Department reopened the case in 2004 in search of others who had participated in the beating and shooting of Emmett, a black 14-year-old. By then, so much time had passed that the country store where the victim was said to have whistled at a white woman, Carolyn Bryant, was in ruins." The Times continues, "The new inquiry was conducted by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, which turned over a report of more than 8,000 pages to the district attorney, Joyce L. Chiles. Ms. Chiles sought a manslaughter charge against Ms. Bryant, 73, the last known living suspect in the case, but the grand jury decided last week not to issue an indictment, a court clerk said. The action was reported Tuesday in The Jackson Clarion-Ledger. … 'If Carolyn Bryant is truly not guilty in being involved in the killing of Emmett Till or there is insufficient evidence to indict her, then the grand jury did the right thing,' said Alvin Sykes, the president of the Emmett Till Justice Campaign. … The grand jury's decision illustrates the difficulty of prosecuting such old cases, even as the Justice Department has begun its first systematic effort to identify them. At a news conference on Tuesday in Washington, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and Robert S. Mueller III, the director of the F.B.I., said about a dozen such cases had been selected, from a list of about 100, for immediate action. … 'New information, sometimes an innocuous small bit of information, can be crucial to breaking these decades-old cases,' Mr. Gonzales said. 'A secret harbored for many years can be the piece of evidence we need to make our case.'"

The Los Angeles Times (2/28, Jarvie, Fausset) reports, "The murder case of Emmett Till — one of the most infamous slayings of the civil rights era — appears to be drawing to a fruitless close 52 years after the black teenager whistled at a white woman, then turned up dead in Mississippi's Tallahatchie River." The Times continues, "It was disclosed Tuesday that a grand jury in Leflore County, Miss., had declined to bring a manslaughter indictment against Carolyn Bryant Donham, the white shopkeeper who witnesses said Till had admired one August afternoon in the rural community of Money, Miss. … Donham, 73, was suspected of pointing out Till to her then-husband, Roy Bryant. He and his half brother, J.W. Milam, were charged in the killing of the 14-year-old but were acquitted by an all-white jury in 1955 after a little more than an hour of deliberations. A year later they admitted in a magazine interview that they had killed Till." The Times adds, "Till's family has watched with hope in recent years as a parade of old and often recalcitrant Southerners have been dragged into court and found guilty of heinous crimes against blacks. But Tuesday, it felt like a door briefly open to the past — and, potentially, to justice — had been shut for good. … 'This was our last hope — and it was dashed today,' said Simeon Wright, 64, Till's cousin, who was with him at the grocery store and heard him whistle at Donham. 'The Emmett Till case started with one person, and that person is still alive. She played a role in identifying Emmett, she participated in his kidnapping, and now she is getting away with murder.' … Donham, who is thought to be a resident of Greenwood, Miss., could not be reached for comment. She has long maintained her innocence to the FBI, and chances of new charges, although possible, appear slim."

DOJ_NMG_0137539

DOJ Drops Probe Of Virginia Church Zoning Dispute. The Lynchburg (VA) News & Advance (2/28, Faulconer) reports, "The U.S. Department of Justice has decided to step out of a zoning dispute between a Moneta 'cowboy' church and Bedford County officials." The N&A continues, "In letters this month to the Rev. Raymond Bell of the Cowboy Church of Virginia and Bedford's community development director George Nester, the federal department concluded no further action is warranted in deciding if Bedford zoning laws infringe upon a federal act that protects religious land use. … The Cowboy Church holds services in a large barn off Horseshoe Bend Road in Moneta." The N&A adds, "Six months ago, the department began investigating if the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act was violated. Bell has been against the county's requirement that a special use permit be obtained to hold religious services, claiming it violates the separation of church and state. … Nester said it's standard procedure that churches obtain a special use permit to hold religious services in newly constructed buildings or new additions to existing buildings. … He said Tuesday he is pleased and relieved that the investigation has been dropped, but some questions still remain. For instance, he doesn't know if the matter was dropped because the church asked it to be or because there is a violation. The letter doesn't state whether a violation took place." The N&A notes, "A spokesperson for the Department of Justice declined to comment Tuesday about the matter. Bell declined to comment also and said he would have more to say later this week. … The Cowboy Church started meeting about a year ago in the Moneta barn, on a farm owned by Garland Simmons. Since then, it has been involved in zoning red tape with the county. … The county originally said using the barn as a church violated building codes and was unsafe for large gatherings. That matter has since been resolved because it was determined the structure is not predominantly used as a church, Nester said."

Rep. Rohrabacher To Present New Evidence In Shooting Involving Former Border Patrol Agents. The El Paso (TX) Times (2/28) reports the "drug smuggler who was shot…by two El Paso Border Patrol agents who went to prison for it was involved in another drug smuggling attempt," according to U.S. Rep. Dana Rohrabacher. Rohrabacher "said he would talk today in a news conference in Washington, D.C., about new evidence he said proves that Osvaldo Aldrete Davila was again involved in drug smuggling after the Feb. 17, 2005, shooting." U.S. Attorney Johnny Sutton "had repeatedly denied knowledge of a second arrest, but Rohrabacher said Sutton's statements were misleading because Aldrete Davila was not arrested either time." Rohrabacher "said Sutton was briefed by the Drug Enforcement Administration about Aldrete Davila's 'direct involvement' in a second offense."

Supervisors In California Support Former Agents. The Inland Valley Daily Bulletin (2/28) reports that according to a unanimous resolution by San Bernardino County's Board of Supervisors, President Bush "should consider pardoning two former Border Patrol agents convicted of shooting an alleged drug smuggler. … The agents, Ignacio Ramos…and Jose Alonso Compean…were convicted last year of shooting Aldrete-Davila, who allegedly brought a van loaded with marijuana across the border from Mexico." He "was granted immunity for his testimony against the agents."

Fayetteville, NC, To Draw New Voting Maps. The Fayetteville (NC) Observer (2/28, Worthington) reports, "Residents will get their say March 29 on the boundaries for six Fayetteville City Council districts. … The City Council will hold a public hearing that evening at 7." The Observer continues, "The council is drawing new maps in response to the Feb. 6 election. Residents voted in favor of a council with six members representing districts and three members elected at-large. The current council has nine members, all elected from districts. … The change must be approved by the U.S. Department of Justice. The city is trying to have the plan and map approved by April. The city hopes to have federal approval in time for the July filing date for the municipal elections." The Observer adds, "City Council members met Tuesday with their redistricting lawyer, Michael Crowell, to discuss options for drawing the six districts. … The Department of Justice will look at the map to make sure it does not affect minority voting. Crowell has said he believes a map that has three districts where minorities constitute the majority of voters will pass federal review."

Meehan To Reintroduce Bill Lifting Ban On Gays In The Military. USA Today (2/28, Stone, 2.27M) reports Rep. Marty Meehan will reintroduce his Military Readiness Enhancement Act, which would repeal the "don't ask, don't tell" policy President Clinton "approved in 1993 as a compromise between ending a ban and gays serving openly. That would leave gays free to serve without limits. … The measure had 122 co-sponsors last year but died in the Republican-controlled Congress. Now that Democrats are in charge, Meehan plans to hold hearings as early as April. He says the bill has more than 100 original co-sponsors and seven freshmen. Three Republicans have signed on, including Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen of Florida. She says her husband, Dexter, was cared for by a lesbian nurse when he was injured during combat in Vietnam." USA Today notes that "since the policy began, nearly 11,000 troops, the equivalent of an Army division, have been discharged."

DOJ_NMG_0137540

Iraq War Vet Who Lost Leg Backs Meehan Bill. The Washington Post (2/28, C1, Vargas, 690K) interviews retired Sgt. Eric Alva, "lost his right leg when he stepped on a land mine on March 21, 2003, the first day of Operation Iraqi Freedom. As the war's first injured soldier, Alva was an instant celebrity. He was on 'Oprah.' President Bush awarded him the Purple Heart. Donald Rumsfeld visited. … Today he'll stand alongside" Meehan. Alva is quoted as saying, "I have to say something. I mean, you're asking men and women to lie about their orientation, to keep their personal lives private, so they can defend the rights and freedoms of others in this country. … That's one factor. The other factor is, we're losing probably thousands of men and women that are skilled at certain types of jobs, from air traffic controllers to linguists, because of this broken policy."

Sex Abuse Scandal At Texas Juvenile Schools Sparks Uproar. The New York Times (2/28, Blumenthal) reports from Austin, TX, "A long-simmering scandal over sexual abuse of juveniles at schools for youthful offenders broke into the open on Tuesday with an outraged state senator calling for a takeover of the troubled Texas Youth Commission." The Times continues, "At a school in West Texas, a youth commission official acknowledged at a hearing of the State Senate Criminal Justice Committee, the school's superintendent was aware that two supervisors routinely awakened boys for late-night encounters behind closed doors in deserted offices. … The two supervisors — one of whom had been transferred from another state school after pornography was found on his work computer — were allowed to resign in 2005 without charges. One became the principal of a charter school in Midland, Tex., state officials said. The superintendent was promoted to director of juvenile corrections, a post he still holds, the youth commission confirmed." The Times adds, "Gov. Rick Perry, a Republican, called the revelations 'absolutely reprehensible' and would not rule out a takeover, said a spokesman, Ted Royer. … Accusations that staff members at the West Texas State School in Pyote were sexually preying on youths there were made to the youth commission as early as December 2003, according to a timeline presented at the hearing. … The complaints did not reach the Texas Rangers until February 2005 and remained largely secret until accounts began appearing in recent weeks on the Web site of the Texas Observer and the pages of The Dallas Morning News. … The problems were widespread at the agency, which annually places some 3,000 juveniles ages 10 to 17 at the time of their felonies in 13 secure schools, senators and witnesses said."

ANTITRUST:

House To Hold Hearing On Proposed XM-Sirius Merger. The Washington Post (2/28, D1, Babington) reports, "Congress and federal regulators need to get with the times. … That's the message that Mel Karmazin, chief executive of Sirius Satellite Radio, plans to deliver today at the first public hearing on a proposal to merge the nation's two satellite radio companies, Sirius and XM Satellite Radio Holdings." The Post continues, "Karmazin, who will face skeptical members of the House Judiciary Committee's newly formed antitrust task force, says satellite radio is in stiff competition not only with free, over-the-air radio but also with such newer products as MP3 players, Internet radio and music-downloading cellphones. "What I need to do is lay out the realities of the marketplace as we see it," Karmazin said in a telephone interview yesterday. … He can expect resistance. 'What I'm concerned about now is whether we're creating a monopolistic situation,' Rep. John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.), who will chair the task force hearing, said in an interview yesterday. 'I don't think it will stimulate competition, and it could very well take away from the competition taking place now in the industry.'" The Post adds, "The Justice Department and Federal Communications Commission, not Congress, will decide whether to allow Washington-based XM and New York-based Sirius to merge. But today's hearing seems certain to introduce the chief arguments for and against the plan, whose outcome may not be decided for nearly a year. … Sharing a witness table with opponents from the broadcast industry and consumer groups, Karmazin said he will remind Congress that XM and Sirius charge customers about $13 a month and struggle to attract enough subscribers to make money."

DOJ_NMG_0137541

Sirius CEO Selling Merger. The New York Times (2/28, Siklos) reports, "The chief executive of Sirius Satellite Radio, Mel Karmazin, is taking the campaign to sell his company's proposed merger with XM Satellite Radio to Washington." The Times continues, "On Monday, Mr. Karmazin appeared on the often-bawdy Howard Stern show on Sirius. Today, he will speak at a hearing of the newly created House Antitrust Task Force in Washington. … 'I absolutely welcome the opportunity because I think there is a lot of misinformation out there about the merger,' Mr. Karmazin said of the hearing." The Times adds, "In particular the National Association of Broadcasters, which represents the commercial radio stations and has been an opponent of satellite radio, has warned that the merger announced last week would create a monopoly that would limit consumer choice and lead to higher prices. … Mr. Karmazin said yesterday that he would tell the task force that the opposite was true. Consumers will be more inclined to subscribe to a single service, he said, because XM and Sirius delivered exclusive programming — like Mr. Stern on Sirius and the Major League Baseball on XM — that the other service does not. … And he said he was willing to commit to the Federal Communications Commission that the merger would lower consumer prices below the $12.95 a month both charge, although he did not specify how much."

The Financial Times (2/28, Washington) reports, "Mel Karmazin, the chief executive of Sirius, is expected to receive a sceptical reception today when he appears before a congressional committee to defend the satellite radio company's proposed $11.4bn merger with rival XM." The Times continues, "John Conyers, the Democratic chairman of the House judiciary committee, like legislators on both sides of the aisle, is suspicious not only about the benefits to the public of yet another mega-media merger. Mr Conyers is also unconvinced - so far - of the merits of the legal argument on which, lawyers agree, the fate of the entire deal rests." The Times adds, "To prove that the merger of the only two satellite radio companies in the US will not lead to a monopoly, Mr Karmazin and a team of antitrust attorneys and lobbyists will have to prove that other devices and media outlets - from terrestrial radio to iPods to mobile phones - will constrain the merged entity enough to prevent it from raising prices. … Ultimately Congress will not have a formal say on whether or not the deal will be approved, but political pressure can influence the two government agencies that will investigate the deal: the Department of Justice, the chief antitrust authority, and the Federal Communications Commission, the media regulator. … Lawyers working on the deal said this week the combined company's prices would also be constrained by the fact it would seek to attract the 90 per cent of the US population that does not subscribe to either group."

Sirius Narrows Loss As Revenue Increases. The Wall Street Journal (2/28, C10, Sheng) reports, "Sirius Satellite Radio Inc., which recently agreed to merge with rival XM Satellite Holdings Inc., posted a narrower fourth-quarter net loss Tuesday as revenue more than doubled and subscriber growth continued." The Journal continues, "Sirius, New York, which boasts a programming lineup that includes shock jock Howard Stern and National Football League games, also said it expects to end the year with eight million subscribers, up from its current 6.02 million, and to post total revenue of about $1 billion. … The country's second-largest satellite radio company behind XM Satellite, Sirius said the results pointed to its continued strength. Since adding Howard Stern and others to its lineup, the operator has enjoyed stronger retail sales growth than its rival." The Journal adds, "Sirius added 905,247 net new subscribers during the quarter, down from 1.14 million a year ago. By contrast, XM Satellite said Monday it added 442,679 net new subscribers during the quarter, down from 898,315 the year earlier. Last year's fourth quarter was the first holiday season before the highly hyped Mr. Stern started airing exclusively on Sirius. The buzz around Mr. Stern last year helped boost subscriber additions at both satellite radio companies to record levels. … For the full year 2006, Sirius said it added 2.7 million, up from 2.17 million the year before. XM said Monday it added 1.7 million net new subscribers in 2006, compared with 2.2 million the year before. … Sirius posted a fourth-quarter loss of $245.6 million, or 17 cents a share, compared with a loss of $311.4 million, or 23 cents a share, in the year-earlier period."

More Commentary. The Wall Street Journal (2/28, A15), David R. Henderson, a research fellow at the Hoover Institution, writes, "In expressing its strong reservations about the proposed merger between Sirius and XM, the Federal Communications Commission seems to think that there are only two competitors and that a merger would reduce the number to one. But that's true only if the relevant market is the satellite broadcasting market. … In fact, the market is much larger, including at a minimum all existing radio stations. If you doubt that, ask yourself how you would decide whether or not to subscribe to Sirius or XM. Surely a big part of your decision is the quality and range of programming you can get on 'free' radio." Henderson continues, "That alone is strong enough evidence for allowing the merger. But there is even stronger evidence, and it has to do with how XM's and Sirius's 'free-radio' competitors view the merger. … Here we might draw upon the wisdom of MIT economist Morris Adelman, who wrote about 50 years ago: 'A useful if not very precise index of the strength of competition . . . is the resentment of unsuccessful competitors.' … In other words, if some competitors in an industry resent others and even end up going out of business, competition is alive and well. It's when the competitors get too cozy that we need to worry. It follows that if existing competitors oppose a merger, the merger is likely to be good for consumers." Henderson concludes, "If competitors began to anticipate that regulators would take into account their opposition to, or support of, a merger, they might try to game the system. If they actually wanted the merger blocked, they would publicly support it. If they thought prices would rise after the merger to their benefit, they might publicly oppose it. … But we can trust that the FCC is not thinking that way, as it is still hung up on a fallaciously narrow definition of the market. This is the bottom line: If the FCC cares about consumers and not about making things cozy for traditional broadcasters, it should allow the XM-Sirius merger."

DOJ_NMG_0137542

TXU Profit Up 33 Percent Last Quarter. The AP (2/28) reports, "The Dallas-based utility TXU Corporation reported a 33 percent increase in profit yesterday, despite weak revenue caused by mild winter weather, but another Texas utility, Dynegy, swung to a loss of $58 million as revenue fell and it took charges for a revamping." The AP continues, "TXU, which has accepted an offer to be bought for $45 billion in what would be the largest leveraged buyout ever, said it earned $475 million, or $1.03 a share, up from $356 million, or 74 cents a share, in the fourth quarter a year earlier. … Excluding what TXU termed one-time charges, the company said it would have earned $1.20 a share, which matched the forecast of analysts, who usually exclude those items from their estimates." The AP adds, "For all of 2006, TXU said it earned $2.55 billion, or $5.46 a share, up from $1.71 billion, or $2.50 a share, in 2005. … Dynegy, a power producer based in Houston that flirted with bankruptcy a few years ago, said yesterday that its loss for the fourth quarter was 12 cents a share, in contrast to a profit of $293 million, or 74 cents a share, in the quarter a year ago, when income from discontinued operations lifted results." The AP notes, "Sales fell 36 percent, to $397 million, from $622 million in the year-ago period. For all of 2006, Dynegy said it lost $342 million, or 75 cents a share, as it incurred $343 million in after-tax charges related to its financial revamping. … The company said that it was positioning itself for growth, starting with the $4.1 billion acquisition of the generating power of a rival, the privately held LS Power Group; that deal is to be completed by the end of March. … The two companies also plan to become joint-venture partners in nine power plants under development."

Future Of TXU Discussed At Private Equity Conference. The New York Times (2/28, Sorkin) reports, "Will anyone dare to mount a rival bid for TXU? … That was the question being whispered yesterday in Frankfurt where many of the world's private equity chiefs were gathered for Super Return, one of the industry's best-attended gatherings." The Times continues, "Speakers included David Bonderman of the Texas Pacific Group, which helped to lead Monday's $45 billion TXU takeover; Todd Fisher of Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Company, the other lead investor in the TXU deal; and Stephen A. Schwarzman of the Blackstone Group, considered one of the most likely candidates to try to crash the TXU sale. … A private equity firm's effort to break up the TXU deal could be a crucial test of the intertwined relationships that so far have limited all-out brawls. Critics contend that the firms, which frequently partner with one another, have a gentleman's agreement not to start bidding wars once a deal is struck." The Times adds, "As an illustration of the clubbiness of the private equity business, no private equity firm to date has publicly tried to top an offer from one its rivals. The Justice Department started an informal inquiry into the possibility of collusion at at least four of the big firms — Kohlberg Kravis Roberts; the Carlyle Group; Silver Lake Partners; and Clayton, Dubilier & Rice — last fall. … It is an issue, among many, that has the buyout kings worried. Mr. Bonderman said during his keynote speech that the industry's image was 'something that's probably on everybody's mind.' … The industry may have begun to change that with its 'green' deal for TXU — among other things, the buyers agreed to scuttle plans for several new coal-fired power plants. A bidding battle over a deal could further change its reputation for mutual back-scratching."

DOJ_NMG_0137543

6th Circuit Panel Sides With Cigarette Maker In Pricing Dispute. The AP (2/28, Mansfield) reports, "A federal appeals court on Tuesday rejected a lawsuit by 22 cigarette wholesalers claiming that R.J. Reynolds Co.'s discount pricing program was discriminatory." The AP continues, "The 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati affirmed a summary judgment in favor of the North Carolina-based tobacco company, a part of Reynolds American Inc., issued in 2005 by U.S. District Judge J. Ronnie Greer in Greeneville. … 'Defendant's program is designed to promote its financial welfare at the expense of the wholesalers,' the appeals court wrote. 'Perhaps it is unfair, but it is not illegal.'" The AP adds, "Smith Wholesale Co. Inc. of Johnson City and the other wholesalers claimed they experienced 'millions of dollars in lost profits' when Reynolds instituted a discount program in 2000 to boost sales of its so-called second-tier nonpremium 'savings' brands of cigarettes. … Reynolds, based in Winston-Salem, N.C., offered discounts and rebates to wholesalers selling the highest volume of Reynolds products. The plaintiffs, mostly smaller distributors in the Southeast, said that put them at a disadvantage because they had to cater to consumers demanding even cheaper cigarettes sold by other manufacturers. … 'Plaintiffs allege that the (program) disfavors them because, unlike RJR's other distributors, they operate largely in rural 'low-end' segments of the market where their retail customers demand fourth-tier brands, and RJR does not price any of its brands at the fourth-tier price level,' the court wrote. … The three-judge panel concluded that Reynolds' market-share discount program 'was offered to all wholesalers using a non-discriminatory formula. It was therefore functionally available to all wholesalers not only in theory, but in fact.' … The plaintiffs' ability to qualify for the discounts 'was a matter of marketing strategy and brand prioritization,' the court wrote. Since 'price discrimination has not been established,' the judges said, 'plaintiffs' claim therefore fails as a matter of law.'"

WMware Blasts Microsoft Over Customer Choice Restrictions. CNET News.com (2/28, Shankland) reports, "VMware, the incumbent power in the blossoming realm of virtualization, has accused Microsoft of using foul play to promote its own competing products." CNET continues, "In a white paper published Friday, the EMC subsidiary said Microsoft is using Windows licensing terms to prevent customers from taking full advantage of virtualization. … 'Microsoft is trying to restrict customers' flexibility and freedom to choose virtualization software by limiting who can run their software and how they can run it,' VMware said." CNET adds, "The software giant rejected VMware's assertions. … 'Microsoft believes the claims made in VMware's white paper contain several inaccuracies and misunderstandings of our current license and use policies, our support policy and our commitment to technology collaboration,' Mike Neil, Microsoft's general manager of virtualization strategy, said in a statement Tuesday. 'We believe that we are being progressive and fair with our existing licensing and use policies and creating a level playing field for partners and customers,' he said … Neil added that he believes Microsoft and VMware will be able to settle their differences." CNET notes, "The Microsoft-VMware debate spotlights the difficult adjustments necessary, as the industry moves into a world where a new software layer breaks the hard link between operating systems and the hardware they use. … There are technical challenges. Software can't be as tightly tied to hardware such as hard drives or network cards, and an operating system might be moved from an overtaxed dual-processor server at one moment to a more powerful eight-processor machine the next. … And there are business challenges too, as companies such as Microsoft and VMware jockey for technology leadership and customer account control."

One Defendant In Midwest Hospital Antitrust Suit Reaches Settlement. The Kansas City Star (2/28, Karash) reports, "The fight isn't over, but an olive branch has appeared in a local health-care antitrust controversy." The Star continues, "The case involves Heartland Spine & Specialty Hospital of Overland Park. In 2005 Heartland sued several area hospitals and health insurers, alleging a conspiracy to drive it out of business in violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act. … The lawsuit alleged a conspiracy that included insurers refusing managed-care contracts to Heartland. Heartland said being shut out of those networks caused it severe financial damage." The Star adds, "Mary Nan Holley, Heartland's chief executive officer, said last week that the hospital had worked out a settlement with one defendant, UnitedHealthcare, effective March 1. That means Heartland will become an in-network provider for about 350,000 UnitedHealthcare members in western Missouri and eastern Kansas. … Holley said UnitedHealthcare was the first defendant to settle and, as a result, will be the first major insurer in the area to allow Heartland in its network. The arrangement is expected to increase Heartland's patient volume 15 percent to 20 percent, she said. The hospital last year had 827 inpatient admissions and 8,142 outpatient encounters." The Star notes, "The settlement is confidential, but it is no secret that most of Heartland's 150 or so employees receive their health insurance through UnitedHealthcare. … The remaining defendants in the lawsuit are: HCA Midwest Division; St. Luke's Health System; Carondelet Health; Shawnee Mission Medical Center; North Kansas City Hospital; Blue Cross and Blue Shield of Kansas City; Coventry Health Care of Kansas; Humana Health Plan; Aetna; and Cigna HealthCare of Kansas/Missouri. … The case is scheduled to go to trial April 1, 2008, in federal court in Wichita."

DOJ_NMG_0137544

FTC Clears Onex Bid For Kodak's X-Ray Unit. Bloomberg (2/28, Rowley) reports, "Onex Corp., Canada's largest buyout firm, won U.S. antitrust clearance to purchase Eastman Kodak Co.'s health-care imaging unit, including an X-ray business the world's largest photography company started in 1896." Bloomberg continues, "The transaction was on a list of completed merger reviews published by the Federal Trade Commission in Washington." Bloomberg adds, "Kodak said in announcing the sale on Jan. 10 that it will be paid at least $2.35 billion in cash and up to $200 million more if certain milestones are met. The sale will allow Kodak, based in Rochester, New York, to pay down debt as it tries to build its digital photography business."

Judge Puts Qualcomm Patent Dispute With Nokia On Hold. The Wall Street Journal (2/28, B11) reports, "Nokia Corp. said a U.S. judge overseeing a patent dispute initiated by Qualcomm Inc. has put the proceedings on hold until further notice." The Journal continues, "Qualcomm, based in San Diego, has alleged the Finnish company violated several patents used to make U.S. cellphones running on the global system for mobile communications, or GSM, standard. … The patents were originally used for a rival technology called code division multiple access, or CDMA, which Qualcomm helped pioneer. Nokia maintains it hasn't infringed any of Qualcomm's patents. The administrative-law judge overseeing the International Trade Commission investigation has two options: dismiss the proceeding or resume the investigation." The Journal adds, "Richard Windsor, an analyst at Nomura, said the decision is likely 'about giving them more opportunity to reach an agreement.' Nokia said that since Qualcomm filed its complaint, it has voluntarily withdrawn three of the six patents from the suit."

ENVIRONMENT:

Los Alamos Operator Cited For Safety Violations. The AP (2/28) reports from Los Alamos, NM, "The National Nuclear Security Administration proposed a $1.1 million civil penalty against the former manager of a nuclear weapons lab for safety violations that included a researcher spreading radiological contamination to two other states and workers inhaling radioactive substances." The AP continues, "The agency announced the notice of violation Monday against the University of California for infractions that occurred in 2005, when UC was the sole manager of Los Alamos National Laboratory. … The notice spells out 15 separate incidents that violated the Department of Energy's nuclear safety rules." The AP adds, "The incidents include a Los Alamos researcher opening a package of slightly enriched uranium nitride pellets. The package was contaminated with americium 241, a radioactive decay product of plutonium. … The researcher unloaded the pellets without the help of a radiological control technician, and he spread the contamination to his home and places he visited in Colorado and Kansas. … Another incident involved workers who inhaled radioactive substances. … In both cases, the contamination was limited by 'good fortune' but had the potential to be significantly greater, acting NNSA director Thomas P. D'Agostino wrote in a Feb. 16 letter to lab director Michael Anastasio." The AP notes, "The notice also referred to a November 2005 inspection that exposed "long-standing" deficiencies in the lab's safety, health and environmental programs. … Since federal law exempted the non-profit university from financial liability at the time of the violations, the UC will not have to pay the fine. But the agency warned the lab's new management team - installed less than a year ago, in part to reverse years of security and safety problems - that those days are over. … 'Due both to the recent contract change and changes in the civil penalty provisions of the Atomic Energy Act, future monetary civil penalties imposed ... as part of a notice of violation will no longer be waived,' D'Agostino wrote."

DOJ_NMG_0137545

Scientists Call For Action To Avoid Climate "Tipping Point." USA Today (2/28, 10D, O'Driscoll, 2.27M) reports, "Declaring there is 'no more time for delay,' an international panel of scientists urged the world's nations Tuesday to stave off climate-change 'catastrophe' by boosting clean-energy research and sharply cutting industrial emissions that fuel global warming. Otherwise, Earth this century could cross a climate threshold or 'tipping point that could lead to intolerable impacts on human well-being,' says the 166-page report prepared for the United Nations." The "two-year study, issued by the U.N. Foundation, says the risk of tipping over that climate threshold rises sharply if Earth's temperature increases 3.6 to 4.5 degrees above what it was in 1750 (it is 1.2 degrees above that point now)." The "scientists say a climate turnaround will take a huge effort."

The Los Angeles Times (2/28, Hotz, 850K) says the panel "called for bold actions, including carbon taxes, a ban on conventional coal-fired power plants and an end to beachfront construction worldwide." The scientists "urged stricter fuel efficiency standards, as well as fuel taxes, registration fees and rebates that favor more efficient transportation." They "also recommended the expanded use of biofuels" and "endorsed broader use of nuclear power, if it can be made safer. Energy research budgets worldwide ought to triple, they said." The researchers also "called for improved designs of energy-efficient appliances, office equipment and 'greener' commercial and residential buildings."

Scholar Praises Asia Pacific Partnership As Way To Curb Greenhouse Gases. In an op-ed in The Hill (2/28), Dr. Margo Thorning of the International Center for Capital Formation, a European think tank, writes, "While President Bush outlined bold steps in his State of the Union address to slow the growth of U.S. greenhouse gas emissions, Democratic leaders on Capitol Hill appear aggressively set on their own track to tackle the issue." But "before the nation is led down the path of the Kyoto protocol or the dramatic carbon dioxide emission reductions adopted in California,...a close look should be given to the high price tag of such 'solutions.'" Unless "the new majority in Congress looks at GHG reductions on a global scale, mandatory emission reductions in the U.S. would be all pain and little or no gain for the environment. A good first step for Congress would be to approve the $52 million in seed money for the Asia Pacific Partnership on Clean Development and Climate (AP6) as prescribed by the 2005 energy bill. The goals of the AP6 agreement are to promote both global economic development and the use of cleaner, less-emitting energy technologies."

NYTimes Praises TXU Buyout Deal, Says Congress Must Put Price On Carbon. Says Congress Should Drive Business To For In an editorial, the New York Times (2/28, 1.16M) writes, "People who worry about global warming...received some very good news over the weekend from a very unlikely source. As part of an ambitious buyout deal, TXU, a Texas utility that has long been a target of environmentalists, will abandon plans to build eight old-style coal-burning power plants." In "a gesture of potentially broad political consequence," the buyers "pledged to join other forward-looking companies in backing federal legislation imposing mandatory limits on emissions of carbon dioxide." The deal is "further evidence that the capital markets are becoming increasingly sensitive to the climate change issue. But the country and the environment cannot depend on good sense or even good business sense to persuade other corporate leaders to follow Kohlberg Kravis Roberts and Texas Pacific. Congress needs to move briskly toward legislation that would put a price on carbon, either by taxing it or capping emissions."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Grassley Asks Whether FBI Whistleblower's Supervisors Face Punishment. The AP (2/28, Frommer) reports, "One of the Senate's most vocal defenders of government whistleblowers wants to know if the FBI plans to discipline agents who a court found had retaliated against a Minneapolis agent who filed a sexual-discrimination complaint." Sen. Charles Grassley "sent the letter to FBI Director Robert S. Mueller on Monday regarding the case of Minneapolis agent Jane Turner, who recently won a $565,000 judgment against the agency. 'Given that her allegations have now been substantiated, I am writing to you for information about how you intend to hold supervisors accountable for the acts of retaliation,' Grassley wrote in a letter to Mueller." The AP notes, "Records show Turner was rated superior or exceptional in her job reviews until she filed a sex discrimination complaint against her supervisor." Turner said yesterday, "Senior managers in the FBI, by feeling they are a law unto themselves, are losing the legal and moral authority for the FBI."

DOJ_NMG_0137546

Under the headline "Accounting Sought From FBI Director," the Minneapolis Star Tribune (2/28, Browning, 395K) reports, "The agent who directly supervised Turner when she filed her discrimination complaint, Craig Welken, has since retired. But the other two agents Grassley inquired about -- James (Chip) Burrus and James Casey -- still work for the FBI. … Mueller has said previously that he would not tolerate retaliation against FBI whistleblowers, a fact underscored by Grassley in his letter. 'Actions speak louder than words,' Grassley wrote." The Washington Times (2/28, Seper, 88K) notes, "Mr. Burrus is the assistant director of the FBI's criminal investigative division and Mr. Casey is chief of the bureau's counterterrorism section."

Pharmacists, Athletes, Celebrities Accused In Investigation Of Fraudulent Internet Drug Sales. There are more than 200 media references to an Orlando pharmacy raid Tuesday, which was reported to be part of a long-term investigation into illegal steroid and human growth hormone sales. Most news outlets used the AP story and many, including the AP, cited a story first posted on the Web site of New York's Albany Times-Union. The AP (2/28) reports athletes and celebrities "were involved as customers of an illicit steroid sales network that produced arrests of four company officials on Tuesday," according to a New York prosecutor. However, Albany County District Attorney P. David Soares "declined to name any consumers. He said his office was not investigating patients, but alleged producers and distributors, including doctors and pharmacists." Soares "was in Florida on Tuesday for two pharmacy raids conducted by federal and state agents at two Signature Pharmacy stores. Four company officials, including a married couple who are both pharmacists, were arrested. They were charged with criminal diversion of prescription medications and prescriptions, criminal sale of a controlled substance and insurance fraud." The AP notes that authorities said a search turned up a "raid card" at Signature Pharmacy employees' desks, and the top of the documents "identified it as a Food and Drug Administration/Drug Enforcement Agency telephone list, but only lawyers were on the card." CBS News, FOX News, MSNBC, Forbes, the San Francisco Chronicle, San Jose Mercury News, Houston Chronicle, and Baltimore Sun are among the news outlets that used the AP story.

In Orlando, the Albany (NY) Times Union (2/28) reports a downtown pharmacy "was raided by a law enforcement task force on Tuesday, the climax of a large New York state grand jury investigation into Internet drug sales that could expose widespread illicit steroid use by professional athletes and thousands of people across the nation. The unprecedented inquiry, led by Albany County's district attorney, has taken New York narcotics agents and an Orlando-based federal task force deep inside a maze of shadowy pharmacies and Web sites that have reaped millions of dollars in profit by allegedly exploiting federal and state prescription laws, according to court records." The Times Union "has learned that investigators in the year-old case…uncovered evidence that testosterone and other performance-enhancing drugs may have been fraudulently prescribed over the Internet to current and former Major League Baseball players, National Football League players, college athletes, high school coaches, a former Mr. Olympia champion and another leading contender in the bodybuilding competition."

The New York Times (2/28) reports the arrests "followed a two-year investigation by the Albany County district attorney into Internet drug sales in New York State. The investigation spanned at least three states, and included numerous people reported to be customers of the pharmacy, including current and former Major League Baseball players, National Football League players, college athletes, coaches and doctors. At least two dozen other individuals are expected to face indictment in New York, according…Soares…including several doctors and pharmacists. At a news conference in Orlando on Tuesday, he said that three people from Texas whom he described as distributors in the operation had been arrested earlier, and that five other doctors would face professional disciplinary charges."

In Miami, the Washington Post (2/28) reports several professional athletes "were clients of another pharmacy in Mobile, Ala., that might have provided illicit drugs to professional athletes. The owners of that pharmacy recently were indicted in Albany County, the Times-Union reported. An attorney for that pharmacy, Applied Pharmacy Services, did not respond to a request for comment. Both of the pharmacies offered prescriptions over the Internet, which federal investigators believe has become a primary source for illicit sales of performance-enhancing drugs in recent years as pharmacists skirt lenient laws governing the industry."

The Orlando Sentinel (2/27) reported federal and state narcotics agents "arrested the owners of an Orlando pharmacy Tuesday as part of a New York state investigation into the sale of steroids and other performance enhancers to professional and college athletes over the Internet. Stan and Naomi Loomis, both licensed pharmacists who own the Signature Pharmacy in downtown Orlando and another nearby, and Stan's brother, Mike Loomis, were arrested." Carl Metzger, narcotics commander for Orlando's metropolitan bureau of investigation, "said authorities found a phone list at numerous employees' desks with contact information for lawyers and representatives with the Drug Enforcement Administration and the Food and Drug Administration."

DOJ_NMG_0137547

Bloomberg (2/28, Matuszewski) reports, "As many as 24 people, including six doctors and three pharmacists, face felony charges for unlawfully distributing anabolic steroids and other controlled substances. The businesses shut by yesterday's arrests are believed to supply a large portion of the national market of the on-line sale of steroids, human-growth hormone and other illegal substances, Soares said. Statewide sales in New York totaled more than $10 million."

Sports Illustrated/CNN (2/27) reported, "As part of a broad operation to crack down on the sale of performance-enhancing drugs over the Internet, authorities raided an Orlando pharmacy and a Jupiter, Fla., 'anti-aging' clinic Tuesday morning. Sports Illustrated reporters Luis Fernando Llosa and L. Jon Wertheim accompanied investigators on the Jupiter raid, which authorities believe will reveal a trove of athletes as clients. … Authorities tell us that Signature Pharmacy in Orlando, which was also raided on Tuesday, did $17 million in business with Palm Beach Rejuvenation alone. When Diamondbacks pitcher, Jason Grimsley had his home raided last summer, he admitted to investigators that he was well aware of a conduit between steroids/HGH and wellness centers."

On its Web site, WESH-TV, Winter Park, Florida (2/27) reports the owners of Signature Compounding Pharmacy "were arrested and officials said they could be sent to New York state, where the whole case began." WESH reports the Loomises "are expected to face charges connected to the illegal distribution of steroids, human-growth hormones, and other drugs."

Pittsburgh Steelers Doctor Questioned. WTAE-TV, Pittsburgh (2/27) reports on its Web site that a report "said a doctor who works with the Pittsburgh Steelers was questioned in a steroids investigation. A reporter with the Albany Times Union said Dr. Richard Rydze was questioned about $150,000 in steroids purchases on his personal credit card." The report said "a New York state health department investigator, last month, flew to Pittsburgh as part of a wide-scale investigation into the online sale of steroids. … Rydze isn't breaking any laws or rules by buying HGH and testosterone online. However, the NFL has a clear policy banning the use of testosterone by players." KDKA-TV, Pittsburgh (2/27) has posted a similar report on its Web site.

The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (2/28) reports there "is no indication that Rydze has done anything wrong, and a spokeswoman for Albany County District Attorney P. David Soares would not say if he is a target of the investigation." The Tribune Review adds, "Pharmacy officials are accused of repeatedly filling prescriptions written by doctors, some of them not licensed, for patients they hadn't met, according to a statement released by Soares' office. At least $250,000 worth of illegal and controlled substances were sold and shipped to Albany with sales in New York alone totaling more than $10 million, according to the statement."

Texas Woman Pleads Guilty To Money Laundering. The Corpus Christi (TX) Caller Times (2/27) reported a Corpus Christi woman on Monday "pleaded guilty to federal charges in connection with a money laundering and drug distribution operation out of Country Meat Market, which she and her husband own." Rosalinda Perez "pleaded guilty to money laundering." The Caller Times says her husband Alfredo Garcia "pleaded guilty on Feb. 15. to conspiring to distribute cocaine out of the meat market. … Investigation into the couple began in September 2005, when authorities in New York notified Drug Enforcement Administration agents in Corpus Christi that a vehicle registered to …Garcia had been found in New York with a small quantity of cocaine inside."

SAMHSA Study Quantifies Rates Of Illegal Drug Use, Drinking. USA Today (2/28, 3A, Leinwand, 2.27M) reports, "Seven states in the South and Midwest are driving an increase in the percentage of people nationwide who drink alcohol regularly, a new study shows. Alaska for the third year in a row has the highest rate of illegal drug use in the nation, the study found. The study, being released today by the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration (SAMHSA), found rates of illicit drug use significantly higher than the national average in nine other states — Rhode Island, Vermont, Colorado, Montana, Oregon, Maine, Massachusetts, New York and Connecticut — plus Washington, D.C. … Nationally, 51.1% of Americans reported drinking alcohol in the past month, up from 50.2% in the previous study."

DOJ_NMG_0137548

Poppy Eradication In Afghanistan Said To Be Threatened By Corruption. The UK's Telegraph (2/28) reports the British-backed campaign to "eradicate opium poppy growing in Afghanistan has fallen behind schedule and is threatened by corruption. … A policeman provided a detailed account of systematic corruption within the force. 'The only people [whose crops are] being eradicated are those without money or connections,'" said the policeman. If the campaign "fails in Helmand, which produced 40 percent of the country's opium last year, then British officials admit that US-led pressure for a radical campaign of aerial spraying of poppy next year will become irresistible."

Minnesota Explosives Search Turns Up Munitions. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (2/28, Xiong) reports, "Military-grade ammunition was found Tuesday at a south Minneapolis building linked to a man jailed the day before on suspicion of having military explosives at his home, Minneapolis police said." The Tribune continues, "A federal investigation that remains closely guarded by authorities became public Monday during a search of the man's Bloomington house. The investigation continued Tuesday at a commercial retail building at 5200 47th Av. S., which is owned by the man's wife, said Minneapolis Police Deputy Chief Rob Allen. The findings in Minneapolis are not as worrisome as those in Bloomington, he said. … 'There's nothing that's raised our concern to the degree they were at in Bloomington,' Allen said. 'She's [the wife] being very cooperative.'" The Tribune adds, "Authorities would not speak in further detail about what was found in the Minneapolis building's garage. The building houses a convenience store, a massage center, a hair salon run by the suspect's wife and a second-floor apartment. No one was arrested Tuesday. … Allen said the man -- described by one acquaintance as a gun-show regular -- stored items on the property. Tenants said he was also the building's repairman. A Minneapolis police bomb squad was called to the scene, and a block was taped off. … The man, who hasn't been charged with a crime, was arrested Monday after authorities found 'small quantities' of explosive materials and 'quite a few' firearms at his home in the 1700 block of W. 84th Street, said Steve Bogdalek, assistant special agent in charge of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms. … Authorities from the ATF, the FBI and the state Bureau of Criminal Apprehension wouldn't say why or for how long the man was being investigated for possessing the materials. They refused to say whether his cache of detonation cords, blasting caps, guns and explosive materials was part of a larger operation. FBI special agent Paul McCabe said there is no public safety risk at this point."

ATF Joins Search For Florida Road-Rage Gun. The Orlando Sentinel (2/28) reports from Deland, FL, "Four specially-trained canines are being sent out today to help deputies look for the gun used in a road-rage incident that killed a race fan on Interstate 4." The Sentinel continues, "The canines and their handlers are from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives. They will team up with the Volusia County Sheriff's Office to search a large area along I-4 where Erik Houk, 36, was shot and killed while driving back to Land O'Lakes from the Daytona 500, ATF officials said. … Houk was transported to Florida Hospital DeLand after the Feb. 18 shooting, where he was pronounced dead." The Sentinel adds, "Three men -- David P. Edwards, 21, Ronlee Harvin, 21, and Charles Onasanya, 18 -- were arrested in Sanford after the shooting and told police they threw the gun somewhere along I-4 after they left the scene, officials said. Deputies have been looking for the weapon ever since. … The ATF bureau is the Department of Justice's lead agency for training dogs to detect explosives. Its canines are certified to detect 19,000 odors, including gunpowder and explosives, Davidson said. Officials will also use a portable Raytheon Thermal Imaging device to look for the gun."

ATF Agent Testifies To Discussing Buying Arms From Texas Man. The El Paso Times (2/28, Meritz) reports, "A federal agent testified Tuesday that he discussed purchasing firearms, in addition to explosive devices, from one of the two men accused of making and possessing pipe bombs that authorities discovered in a sting earlier this month." The Times continues, "Meanwhile, lawyers for the defendants argued Tuesday before U.S. District Court Magistrate Judge Michael McDonald that the government had not established that the suspected pipe bombs actually could have exploded and caused a danger to the public." The Times adds, "Alfredo Rubio, 23, of San Elizario, along with Juan Ortiz, 22, of Socorro, are accused of conspiring to make and possess 15 pipe bombs that Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives undercover agents discovered Feb. 21 during a meeting in Canutillo. … Frank Henderson, a special agent with ATF, said in court Tuesday that he was working to arrange a purchase of weapons as well, including a MAC-10 assault rifle, rocket launchers and a machine gun. … Henderson testified that the Feb. 21 meeting was the second between him and Rubio. The agent said that during the first meeting, on Jan. 20 at a parking lot in the Northeast, he paid Rubio $2,000 for seven pipe bombs, then transported them in the front seat of his truck. Henderson also testified that law enforcement had not tested the devices to determine whether they would explode as designed."

DOJ_NMG_0137549

IMMIGRATION:

Five Plead Guilty In Illegal Workers Probe. The AP (2/28, Virtanen) reports from Albany, NY, "Five former managers from a major crate and pallet manufacturer that employed illegal immigrants pleaded guilty Tuesday, 10 months after federal agents staged sweeping raids at company sites in 26 states." The AP continues, "James Rice, 37, of Houston, an executive regional general manager of IFCO Systems, pleaded guilty to conspiring to employ illegal workers. Robert Belvin, 43, of Stuart, Fla., a former general manager of the Albany IFCO plant, pleaded guilty to two felony conspiracy charges. … The two executives could face up to two years in prison and a $250,000 fine, Assistant U.S. Attorney Tina Sciocchetti said." The AP adds, "Netherlands-based IFCO Systems NV describes itself as the leading pallet services company in America. It reported $108 million in profits in 2006 on revenues of $647 million. …. In April, more than 1,100 people were arrested on administrative immigration charges at more than 40 IFCO sites. More than half of IFCO Systems' roughly 5,800 employees during 2005 had invalid or mismatched Social Security numbers, the government said at the time. … U.S. Department of Homeland Security officials said the raids were part of a stepped-up effort to target employers of illegal immigrants." The AP notes, "Defense lawyers said they reviewed prosecution material that included taped conversations involving their clients."

Chertoff Takes Push For Immigration Reform To Capitol Hill. The Los Angeles Times (2/28, Gaouette, 850K) reports, "For weeks, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff has waged a clandestine charm offensive on behalf of an immigration overhaul. He consulted with supportive lawmakers, listened to adversarial congressmen and slipped into the private offices of wary senators, the only sign of his presence the beefy security men waiting outside." Having taken a group of "skeptical members of Congress" on a tour of the southern border last week, Chertoff will today launch "a higher-profile effort to win enough votes to pass a comprehensive overhaul when he testifies at the first Capitol Hill hearing on immigration legislation since Democrats took over. Chertoff's campaign has impressed some lawmakers who may be crucial to the fate of his effort, but it's not clear whether they have been swayed enough to support it." The Times quotes Sen. Johnny Isakson, who said his border trip with Chertoff reaffirmed "that what we tried to do last year was right — that is, delineate the need for security and require its completion first." Chertoff told reporters Tuesday that the administration wants "to work with Congress. That's the whole point of being in government — to get stuff done."

Guest Workers Often Receive Lower Pay, Less Work Than Promised. The New York Times (2/28, Greenhouse, 1.16M) reports on the abuses faced by guest workers "at a time when President Bush and many in Congress are pushing to expand the guest worker program as part of an overhaul of the nation's immigration laws. … Labor experts say employers abuse guest workers far more than other workers because employers know they can ship them home the moment they complain. They also know these workers cannot seek other jobs if they are unhappy." The Times continues that the "workers often pay exorbitant fees and are frequently given fewer weeks of work and lower wages than promised. Many employers fail to make good on their commitment to pay transportation costs." Congressional proposals "to expand protections for guest workers include a provision to bar employers from retaliating when these workers protest and one that would let them sue in federal court over contract violations."

Studies Show Immigrants Increase Pay For Native-Born Citizens. The Los Angeles Times (2/28, Watanabe, 850K) reports a pair of studies released this week "counter negative perceptions that immigrants increase crime and job competition, showing that they are incarcerated at far lower rates than native-born citizens and actually help boost their wages. A study released Tuesday by the Public Policy Institute of California found that immigrants who arrived in the state between 1990 and 2004 increased wages for native workers by an average 4%." UC Davis economist Giovanni Peri, who conducted the study, said the presence of immigrants "pushed natives up the economic ladder into employment that required more English or know-how of the US system, he said." Meanwhile, a "study released Monday by the Washington-based Immigration Policy Center showed that immigrant men ages 18 to 39 had an incarceration rate five times lower than native-born citizens in every ethnic group examined." The Times notes that the studies "were released just days before the US Congress is to restart debate on major immigration reform legislation and as numerous states, including Texas, consider harsh measures against illegal migrants."

DOJ_NMG_0137550

US Urged To Change Immigration Rules To Focus On Skilled Workers. Michele Wucker, author of "Lockout: Why America Keeps Getting Immigration Wrong When Our Prosperity Depends on Getting It Right," in the New York Times (2/28, 1.16M) argues for changing immigration rules in order to shift the balance away from family reunification while continuing "to admit spouses, minor children and parents of naturalized and native-born American citizens without quotas" and towards "skilled workers." She writes that "there are shortages of both temporary and permanent visas for scientists, engineers, mathematicians, doctors and nurses" while "family chain migration is common." The problem is said to be limits on employment-based visas compounded by per-country visa caps. Wucker recommends "phasing out family-based preferences for adult siblings and adult children" to "free up 138,066 green cards a year."

Study Finds Immigrants Not Responsible For Most Crimes. The North County Times (2/28, Sifuentes) reports, "A common perception that immigrants are responsible for much of the nation's crime is not supported by evidence, according to a study released Monday by an immigrant rights group." The Times continues, "Violent and property crime rates have dropped 34 percent and 26 percent respectively since 1994. At the same time, the illegal immigrant population doubled to an estimated 12 million, according to the study, called the Myth of Immigrant Criminality and the Paradox of Assimilation. … But critics said the study is biased and based on incomplete Census data." The Times adds, "The authors, sociologists Ruben Rumbaut and Walter Ewing, said immigrants have faced similar perceptions throughout the nation's history. Previous waves of immigrants, such as Italians and Irish, were often viewed as more inclined to crime than native-born people, they said. … Similar views are now thrust upon the newest immigrants, who are predominantly from Latin America, the authors said." The Times notes, "Researchers said they did not analyze legal and illegal immigrant populations separately, because the U.S. Census data does not ask whether immigrants are in the country legally or illegally. … Based on 2000 Census information, the study concludes that the problem of crime in the United States is not caused or aggravated by immigrants, regardless of their legal status. The study was released by the Immigration Policy Center, a research organization that focuses on the contributions immigrants make the country. … The policy center is a division of the American Immigration Law Foundation, a Washington, D.C.-based nonprofit focusing on immigration. … One of the key findings the study cites is that U.S.-born men, ages 18-39, are five times more likely to be incarcerated than foreign-born men in the same age group. However, the 'paradox of assimilation' is that the children of immigrants tend to have higher incarceration rates than their parents, according to the study."

TAX:

Real-Estate Professionals Chafe At IRS Rules. The Wall Street Journal (2/28, Dunham) reports, "Some real-estate professionals say they are being mistaken for sometime investors by the Internal Revenue Service, and that could prohibit them from taking advantage of certain tax and economic benefits." The Journal continues, "Consider the case of David Friedman, a real-estate broker and property owner in Los Angeles. Like many professionals in the business, he not only sells homes to consumers, he also buys and sells undeveloped land and owns single-family homes that he rents out. He says he works every day and has amassed holdings in Southern California and Oklahoma that are valued at $20 million. … Yet after 20 years in the business, Mr. Friedman finds himself in a battle with the IRS, which is auditing his past tax returns over whether he is really a full-time real-estate professional or one of the many part-time real-estate investors who have sprung up across the country in the past decade." The Journal adds, "The distinction is important because full-time real-estate professionals, defined as someone who spends more than half of his working hours in real estate and more than 750 hours a year tending to real-estate activities, can fully deduct losses -- including depreciation, interest expense on loans and property taxes. … But those who don't fit into that category are typically considered to be 'passive' real-estate investors with a limited ability to deduct their losses, says Alan Weiner, a CPA and tax partner at the firm of Holtz Rubenstein Reminick LLP in Melville, N.Y. … Robert Marvin, a spokesman for the IRS, said the tax agency can't comment on individual taxpayer cases. However, he indicated that the agency is paying more attention to real-estate activity because it is one of the areas where research shows there is a large tax gap, meaning taxpayers are underreporting income to the IRS. The tax gap in income from rents and royalties is about $13 billion and $11 billion for capital gains. (Income from real-estate activity is included in, but not exclusive to, both categories.) Mr. Marvin said that several thousand returns of real-estate professionals have been audited since last year and approximately 3,000 are under audit now. … But some tax attorneys say these professionals are being unfairly scrutinized."

DOJ_NMG_0137551

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush To Visit Indiana School To Tout NCLB.

The Louisville Courier-Journal (2/28, Carroll) reports, "President Bush will visit New Albany's Silver Street Elementary School on Friday, in addition to attending a campaign fundraiser in Louisville. He also plans to meet with University of Louisville students." At Silver Street, Bush will "discuss his 'No Child Left Behind' program." The school "has made 'adequate yearly progress' each of the four years since the law went into effect." Superintendent Dennis Brooks "called the president's visit an 'unexpected opportunity' for students and teachers at the school." Afterwards "Bush will speak at a McConnell for Senate reception at the Seelbach Hilton Louisville."

The AP (2/28) reports, "President Bush will visit an elementary school in New Albany on Friday and will speak about reauthorizing the five-year-old No Child Left Behind law."

WDRB-TV Louisville, Kentucky (2/27) reported, "The president will be in town on Friday for a fundraiser for Kentucky Senator Mitch McConnell -- but he's also making a stop in Indiana. President Bush will visit a New Albany school on Friday. And right now, students and faculty members are sprucing things up for their special guest." Principal Tony Duffy said, "It's such an honor. It's a once in a lifetime opportunity for our students and our teachers and everyone involved in our school."

WLKY-TV Louisville, Kentucky (2/27) reported, "His itinerary includes a stop at Silver Street Elementary School in New Albany, where he'll talk about reauthorizing the five-year-old No Child Left Behind law. Afterward, he'll attend a fundraiser for Sen. Mitch McConnell (R-Kentucky)."

Business Groups Mount Offensive Against Employee Free Choice Act. The Wall Street Journal (2/28, A4, Maher, 2.04M) reports, "Organized labor aims to use the House's expected passage tomorrow of a pro-union bill to further the rest of its legislative agenda, even though the bill, under heated industry opposition, faces likely defeat in the Senate. The Employee Free Choice Act would make it easier to organize workers by giving them the right to unionize as soon as a majority signs cards in favor of a union, a process known as 'card check' that can take a few weeks." The Journal adds, "In the past two days, the National Association of Manufacturers sent two letters to members of Congress, saying that the association would use tomorrow's vote in determining its future support for lawmakers." The association "argues the bill 'further erodes the competitive capabilities of American manufacturers.' A coalition representing more than 300 state and local employer groups also is lobbying against the bill, and the US Chamber of Commerce said it has sent more than 24,000 emails to members of Congress to oppose it."

The Hill (2/28, Swanson) reports, "The US Chamber of Commerce is leading this drive, whose magnitude rivals the 2001 campaign supporting President Bush's tax cuts. As of last week, the Chamber alone had directed more than 24,000 letters, phone calls and e-mails to House members in opposition to H.R. 800, the Employee Free Choice Act of 2007." The effort "has continued this week with advertising in 60 conservative-leaning blogs and e-mail blasts to House chiefs of staff and legislative assistants on labor. Along with the Chamber of Commerce, the business coalition includes dozens of national and local business groups. Together, they are targeting 51 congressional districts with radio advertisements and phone calls urging constituents to press their representative to oppose H.R. 800." These districts "cover 29 Democrats and 22 Republicans, including freshman Reps. Heath Shuler (D-N.C.), Tim Mahoney (D-

DOJ_NMG_0137552

Fla.), Ron Klein (D-Fla.), Joe Courtney (D-Conn.), David Loebsack (D-Iowa), Jerry McNerney (D-Calif.), Vern Buchanan (R-Fla.), Steve Kagen (D-Wis.), and Carol Shea-Porter (D-N.H.). All but Mahoney and Buchanan are cosponsors of the bill."

However, Roll Call (2/28, Drucker) reports "the AFL-CIO, which held events in 90 Congressional districts with 150 House Members over the Presidents Day recess, is cautiously optimistic that H.R. 800 will pass the House." Bill Samuel, the union's spokesman, "said many Democrats from Republican-minded districts are unlikely to face reprisals at the ballot box for supporting the bill, because they represent areas that are culturally conservative but labor-friendly."

Walter Reed Controversy Spurs Bipartisan Call For Tighter Oversight. The Hill (2/28, Kaplan) reports, "The poor conditions and bureaucratic mazes facing wounded soldiers and Marines at the Walter Reed Army Medical Center have sparked condemnation from Democratic and Republican lawmakers as they prepare for a hearing next Monday at the hospital. Rep. John Tierney (D-Mass.), chairman of the Oversight and Government Reform national security subcommittee, with support from Republican Reps. Tom Davis (Va.) and Christopher Shays (Conn.), announced earlier this week that he would conduct a hearing at Walter Reed." The Hill notes that the controversy has been "generating headlines in local newspapers." Rep. Joe Donnelly, who sits on the Veterans Affairs Committee, "created a veterans' advisory board" and "told the South Bend Tribune yesterday that 'Everybody's in a very foul mood right now' with respect to the media accounts."

Congress Considers Cutting Several High-Profile Pentagon Programs. The Hill (2/28, Tiron) reports Congress "is grappling with how to fix a number of high-profile defense programs that are costing taxpayers billions of dollars yet have poor records of success. … Programs in danger may include the Army's Future Combat Systems and the Joint Tactical Radio System; the Air Force's Joint Strike Fighter and several satellite programs; and the Navy's Littoral Combat Ship. While outright cancellations do not appear imminent in the 2008 defense budget, defense authorizers and appropriators will focus on reevaluating, in some cases redirecting and reprogramming funds. Defense committees have begun to focus on somewhat less complex and less challenging systems. Too often, congressional sources say, the Pentagon embarks on ambitious programs with even more ambitious deadlines, and as a result forgoes critical early testing and evaluation on technologies. When the programs enter operational testing and so-called low-rate production, problems crop up, forcing the services to return to the drawing board and incurring cost overruns and delays."

Congressional Democrats Eager To Advance Domestic Agenda. The Politico (2/28, Cummings) reports that "even as Iraq dominates the headlines, congressional Democrats are moving swiftly on key domestic issues aimed at improving their 2008 reelection chances and splitting Republicans. This week's House debates on easing union organizing and giving Congress more say in foreign purchases of critical domestic infrastructure are cases in point. … Coming next are scheduled hearings and debates on health care, education, prescription drugs, stem-cell research and immigration reform, all issues that Democrats campaigned on during the 2006 midterms. This runup to the Easter break is just a sneak peak at the broader agenda Democrats are planning to put in place for the rest of the year. What it shows is that House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (Nev.) are in a hurry to pocket some key domestic victories and avoid the 'do nothing' label they gave Republicans last year.'

Blue Dogs' Influence Over Democratic Caucus Noted. Roll Call (2/28, Yachnin) reports "there are plenty of indications that the fiscally conservative Blue Dog Coalition's cache is expanding on Capitol Hill — an invitation to the White House, regular meetings with the Speaker, plum committee assignments. … Members of the Blue Dogs are anything but reticent about their growing influence within the new Democratic majority, as the moderate lawmakers — who now number nearly four dozen, the largest contingent in the group's 12-year history — seek to maximize their impact in the House following the power switch in the 110th Congress." Roll Cal notes that "even as the Blue Dogs acknowledge their own potential to serve as a bridge to their moderate Republican colleagues, however, the Democratic lawmakers seek to tamp down expectations that any formal bipartisan efforts are under way. … While members of both the Blue Dogs and the moderate Republican Tuesday Group previously have suggested the organizations could work together in the new session, for now the Democrats suggest those efforts are limited to one-on-one sessions or the committee level.'

DOJ_NMG_0137553

Lobbying Disclosure Act Does Not Require Firms To Disclose All Revenue. The Hill (2/28, Snyder, Young) reports that "some critics believe that the Lobbying Disclosure Act (LDA), the law that defines what activities a firm must report annually to Congress, hasn't kept pace with the industry's evolution. Firms now have public relations, strategic consulting, grassroots and federal marketing arms — all of which have the potential to influence public officials, but which often take place outside the public eye. … The firms themselves are sympathetic to complaints about the limitations of the LDA, albeit for different reasons. Believing annual revenue rankings are a potential marketing tool for their own businesses, firms are quick to note other revenue streams that aren't included in LDA figures — particularly if it's been a bad year for lobbying. The Senate has passed a bill to update the LDA, enacted in 1995, but — aside from a new requirement that lobbyists detail fundraising activities — the changes do not include expanding what type of activity should be reported."

Kerry Grills Swift Boat Contributor Nominated To Be Ambassador To Belgium. The Washington Post (2/28, A17, Akers, 690K) reports Sen. John F. Kerry "did seem to enjoy at least a small measure of satisfaction in making mega-GOP-donor Sam Fox squirm during yesterday's Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearing to consider Fox's nomination to be ambassador to Belgium. Fox contributed $50,000 to fund the infamous Swift Boat Veterans for Truth ads that sought to smear Kerry's Vietnam War record in the 2004 presidential campaign." Kerry "explained that he did not intend 'to play some sort of "gotcha" game,' but he wanted to know: How does the nominee feel about the level of 'personal destruction' in politics these days? Fox replied that he was 'very concerned' that politics have become too 'mean and destructive,' especially with the participation of independent '527' groups such as Swift Boat Veterans. He tried not so subtly to redirect Kerry's line of questioning by saying, 'Sir, you're a hero,' adding that no 527 group 'can take that away from you.'"

HUD Releasing "Groundbreaking" Study Of Homeless Population. USA Today (2/28, Koch, 2.27M) reports, "A groundbreaking survey of homelessness being released today found that 704,000 people nationwide sought shelter at least once in a three-month period. Families with children accounted for one-third of those seeking emergency shelter or transitional housing between February and April 2005, the most recent period studied, according to the report by the Department of Housing and Urban Development. The rest were individuals, mostly adult men. Nearly half were black." USA Today notes, "The count covered only those seeking shelter, not people living on the street, so the total number of homeless people would be higher. 'This first-of-its-kind study is a huge leap forward in our understanding of not only how many people are homeless, but also what their needs are,' HUD Secretary Alphonso Jackson says."

Watchdog Urges Ethics Committee To Investigate Doolittle. The Hill (2/28, Crabtree) reports, "Government watchdog group Democracy 21 singled out Rep. John Doolittle (R-Calif.) for special scrutiny yesterday, renewing its call for the ethics committee to conduct an investigation into multiple potential ethics violations by the lawmaker. Democracy 21 President Fred Wertheimer said there is no evidence that the committee had taken any action about Doolittle in the last Congress even though his group and a series of press reports raised serious questions about whether Doolittle violated House ethics rules. … Specifically, Wertheimer points to Doolittle's practice of paying his wife's company a 15 percent commission on all contributions that the company raised for Doolittle's campaign." Wertheimer "also called on the committee to look into whether fees paid to Doolittle's wife, Julie Doolittle, on contributions indicted defense contractor Brent Wilkes and his associates made to his campaign committee and PAC were linked or appeared to be linked to any official action Doolittle took to help Wilkes's company obtain millions of dollars in government earmarks."

Thune Role As Lobbyist May Have Killed Railway Loan. The Washington Post (2/28, A17, Williamson, 690K) reports the Federal Government "killed a $2.3 billion railway loan after opponents attacked Sen. John Thune (R-S.D.), because he was the railway's lobbyist before winning election and backing legislation favoring the loan to his former client." The privately held Dakota, Minnesota & Eastern Railroad "wanted the money for an 860-mile Midwestern rail-line renovation and expansion project. The Federal Railroad Administration said its denial was based on financial factors. But project backers and detractors said the loan sank after opponents, led by the Mayo Clinic, based in Rochester, Minn., ginned up congressional heat on the agency. The key to that was Thune's role: The Republican did nothing illegal, but his seamless transition from the railway's lobbyist to its Senate champion handed ammunition to opponents and their own lobbyists."

DOJ_NMG_0137554

Study Suggests Breakdowns Common Between Agency Field Staffs, Headquarters. The Washington Post's (2/28, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "Communication. Trust. Leadership. A report by the Interior Department inspector general, released this month, provides a glimpse of how these issues can arise in agencies that have to manage a workforce spread across the country. The report, by Earl E. Devaney, Interior's inspector general, focused on the law enforcement office at the Fish and Wildlife Service," but Devaney "found some problems in the law enforcement office, such as a 'general mistrust of senior management' and a lack of communication between the headquarters and the field, 'which has created a perception that there is a 'wall' between management and field personnel.'" The "IG review suggested" the agency's program risked "being undermined because of leadership and communication problems -- issues that hinder operations in many parts of the government. The report pointed out that the lack of communication between senior leaders and the field 'has significantly impacted morale and trust.'" The Post adds that the IG's report identifies areas of sensitivity such as "'unwritten requirement' for promotions" and bonuses and time-off inconsistencies as well as "disciplinary action proved to be another sensitive topic, the IG found."

Bush Hosts NBA Champions. NBC Nightly News (2/27, story 10, :35, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "You might as well see this following clip now because it may well appear on all the late night comedy talk shows this evening. The President hosted Shaquille O'Neal and the NBA champions, the Miami Heat. All went well until…the President started to dribble," and "the ball was under inflated. While the President's form was fine, of all people in that job, he knows well," that "some days the ball just doesn't bounce your way."

OTHER NEWS:

Stock Market Tumble Sparks Fears About US Economy. ABC World News (2/27, lead story, 2:50, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "American investors took a punch to the pocketbook today. And it was a sobering lesson in today's global marketplace, as nervous investors in China sparked the sell-off in New York. The Dow started its slide early. But then, in mid-afternoon, at times, seemed to be in free-fall. By the closing well, the industrial average, was off 416 points." The CBS Evening News (2/27, lead story, 2:50, Couric, 7.66M) noted, "We haven't seen a day like this on Wall Street in years." In addition to the Dow slide, "the NASDAQ gave up 96 points, nearly 4%." The Dow's 400-point "plunge is the biggest one-day point drop since this trading floor reopened after 9/11, back in 2001. And it was breath taking."

The New York Times (2/28, Norris, Peters, 1.16M) headlines its story "Wall St. Slide Fuels Worries On Economy," and reports the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index, "the benchmark index for many investors, slid 3.47 percent, and the technology-heavy Nasdaq composite index fell 3.86 percent. All three major indexes erased their gains for the year."

NBC Nightly News (2/27, lead story, 3:00, Williams, 9.87M) said, "It was almost scary to watch," while the New York Times (2/28, Barboza, 1.16M) reports, "The downturn shattered all sorts of records, and analysts said there was no clear reason for Tuesday's severe drop in Shanghai, equivalent to a 1,100-point drop in the Dow Jones industrial average." But "the Chinese stock market was rife with rumors that the government was considering new measures to tame the world's hottest stock market before a bubble developed."

USA Today (2/28, 1B, Shell, Waggoner, 2.27M) reports, "For weeks, stock gurus have warned that the Dow Jones industrial average's longest run without a 2% correction since 1954 was worrisome: Some negative catalyst was bound to spook investors and start a selling frenzy." The "selling spark came Tuesday across the globe in China, a highflying market with a speculative zeal rivaling the '90s dot-com stock gold rush. Shanghai's benchmark index plunged nearly 9% amid fears the Chinese government is moving to squash speculation in stocks." The Dow "swooned in response."

Fox News Special Report (2/27, Hume) reported senior White House officials "watched the market very closely," but they "insist the US economic fundamentals are still very strong, and they're very confident about that." However, as the markets closed President Bush spoke with Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson and relayed "a clear expression of concern" about the downturn.

DOJ_NMG_0137555

On NBC Nightly News (2/27, lead story, 3:00, 9.87M), CNBC's Maria Bartiromo summed up what most analysts see as the reasons for yesterday's market drop. She said, "Primarily, there were three factors contributing to today's downturn. First -- China. Today's sell off started over seas. In China the Shanghai Composite Index dropping almost 9%. Fears the government is trying to slow the economy. Second, durable goods. Sells of big ticket items like appliances and computers are slowing down. Third world tensions, instability in Afghanistan. News this morning of a suicide bomber attack at a check point not far from where Vice President Cheney was staying. Plus instability in Iran there nuclear capabilities and what that means for the US, all combining for some real market unrest today."

The Financial Times (2/28, Callan) reports, "US industrial investment appeared to have slowed at the start of this year as figures released on Tuesday showed a steep fall in demand for capital goods." There was "an unexpected drop in orders of durable goods across industry sectors as demand slid by a record 8 per cent to $204bn in January." The Wall Street Journal (2/28, Conkey, 2.04M) notes the Commerce Department "said new orders for durable goods fell 7.8% in January following a 2.8% increase in December, largely because there were fewer orders for transportation equipment." USA Today (2/28, 5B, Hagenbaugh, 2.27M) also runs a story on the durable goods report, titled "Economists Worry As Businesses Tighten Spending."

The Los Angeles Times (2/28, Hennessy-Fiske, Girion, 850K) reports this morning, "The dreaded 'R' word -- recession -- is back in play, contributing to Tuesday's stock market plunge. But is recession a real possibility? Many analysts say recession is unlikely this year, that Tuesday's market sell-off was long-anticipated and would be short-lived as the economy rebounds from a housing slump. Also helping the economy are renewed consumer and business spending, a strong but not overheated labor market and possible intervention by the Federal Reserve, analysts say." Another Los Angeles Times (2/28, Zimmenman, 850K) reports, "Don't panic. That's what financial planners were advising clients today as they tried to cope with the worst day for the stock market in almost four years."

The Washington Post (2/28, D1, Tse, 690K) reports, "Some market strategists said they were holding off on buying, seeing a potential for larger drops. Others characterized the retreat as a long-overdue correction and good for a market still fundamentally strong. They said recent increases in oil prices, geopolitical events in the Mideast and growing concern about the subprime-mortgage market combined to set off the market downturn."

The Wall Street Journal (2/28, 2.04M) editorializes that "when Adam Smith does a house cleaning like yesterday's, he sweeps the dirtiest corners first. The question is whether this is a forecast or merely a correction. As evidence of the latter, we'd point to Mr. Greenspan, whose Monday remarks seem to have been over-interpreted as a recession prediction. In the same discussion, we're told, he called the world economy 'benign and stable.' … We also wouldn't make too much of one month's decline in durable goods. These are notoriously volatile, especially in transportation, which was way down in January."

But other media outlets saw more ominous reasons for the market drop. McClatchy (2/28, Hall) says yesterday's plunge "may also signal worse news than that. A steady stream of recent data shows mixed signals about where the US economy is headed. The old sage himself, Alan Greenspan, suggests recession could be looming." Adds McClatchy, "Fasten your seat belts -- some economic chop could be coming."

The New York Times (2/28, Leonhardt, 1.16M) reports, "The nation's manufacturing sector managed to slip into a recession with almost nobody seeming to notice. Well, until yesterday." The new report on durable goods "seemed to focus investors' attention on the problems in manufacturing and became one more reason for people to sell stocks. By the time the market opened in New York, stocks in almost every industrialized country had already fallen sharply."

The Chicago Tribune (2/28, Barnhart, 617K) says "investors face two scenarios. One is that Tuesday's market action…represented a catharsis in market sentiment and mechanics unlikely to be repeated." The second "is that Tuesday's trading exposed long-simmering vulnerabilities in world markets, arising from investor exuberance, especially in Asia, and a wave of debt-financed speculation. Working through those issues could mean days, weeks or months of weak stock markets."

The Wall Street Journal (2/28, A1, Browning, Karmin, Areddy, Ip, 2.04M) reports "yesterday's plunge…signals that investors may finally be re-evaluating their insatiable appetite for risky investments. … A weaker-than-expected US economy could undermine many assumptions that have been underlying investors' embrace of risk. It could lead to higher defaults among companies that have taken on large amounts of debt. And it could undermine the outlook for foreign markets, which tend to depend far more on the US economy than the US depends on theirs."

DOJ_NMG_0137556

On ABC World News (2/27, story 2, 1:20, Gibson, 8.78M), Sam Stovall, the chief strategist at Standard and Poor's, said, "I think that we were forecasting, because the S&P had not seen a one-day decline of 2% in 950 days, which is the longest since 1950, that we were expecting some sort of decline to occur. We didn't know exactly when and what would trigger it." Gibson: "Some sort of decline. But did people think it would be so precipitous?" Stoval: "I don't think so. I think because we had seen another 250 to 300 points occur in the blink of an eye, that maybe we did have some computer programs kick in, etcetera. But in general, most were expecting more of an orderly decline." The Washington Post (2/28, A1, Cho, Tse, 690K) also reports "some analysts said…that it was about time for the market to cool after a breathless run-up in share prices." The Los Angeles Times (2/28, 850K) and Washington Times (2/28, Hill, 88K) run similar reports.

Greenspan's Continuing Influence On Markets Noted. The Wall Street Journal (2/28, C1, lp, 2.04M) reports, "As chairman of the Federal Reserve, Alan Greenspan had 200 Ph.D. economists at his disposal to help decipher economic and market trends. Now, in the year since retiring from the job he held for 18 years, he relies on less than a half-dozen staffers to analyze the same economic trends. The last 48 hours have made clear, though, that investors can be just as devoted to what he has to say about those trends -- a devotion some say makes it harder to concentrate on what his successor, Ben Bernanke, has to say." Greenspan "told an audience via satellite early Monday, Hong Kong time, that a US recession was possible." He "didn't say a recession was likely. Indeed, he said most forecasters don't see one, the global environment is 'benign' and there has been no 'significant spillover' from the contraction in housing activity." But "the perceived pessimism of the remarks grew as headlines made their way around trading rooms and were blamed for helping contribute to a two-day, world-wide selloff in stocks, a plunge in bond yields as bond prices rallied, and increased market expectations of a cut in interest rates by the Fed." USA Today (2/28, 1B, Hagenbaugh, 2.27M) runs a similar report under the headline "Greenspan Comments Helped Grease Markets' Skid."

Gasoline Prices Reach Five-Month High. The CBS Evening News (2/27, story 3, :15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Also hitting wallets all over the country tonight is the price of gasoline. It's on the rise. It's up more than 20 cents in the past four week to a nationwide average, $2.38 a gallon, the highest price in five months."

Expansion Of Federal Ethics Panels Raises Criticism From Researchers. The New York Times (2/28, Cohen) reports, "Ever since the gross mistreatment of poor black men in the Tuskegee Syphilis Study came to light three decades ago, the federal government has required ethics panels to protect people from being used as human lab rats in biomedical studies. Yet now, faculty and graduate students across the country increasingly complain that these panels have spun out of control, curtailing academic freedom and interfering with research in history, English and other subjects that poses virtually no danger to anyone." The Times continues, "The panels, known as Institutional Review Boards, are required at all institutions that receive research money from any one of 17 federal agencies and are charged with signing off in advance on almost all studies that involve a living person, whether a former president of the United States or your own grandmother. This results, critics say, in unnecessary and sometimes absurd demands." The Times adds, "Among the incidents cited in recent report by the American Association of University Professors are a review board asking a linguist studying a preliterate tribe to 'have the subjects read and sign a consent form,' and a board forbidding a white student studying ethnicity to interview African-American Ph.D. students 'because it might be traumatic for them.' … Review boards, first created in 1974, were initially restricted to biomedical research. In 1981 the regulations were revised to cover all research that involves 'human subjects' and is designed to contribute to 'generalizable knowledge.' … Yet precisely how to interpret these rules has largely been left to each review board — 5,564 in all. And while the regulations apply specifically to research that gets federal dollars, many colleges use Institutional Review Boards to monitor all research, no matter where the funds come from. This system of helter-skelter enforcement, critics say, has no meaningful oversight and no appeal process."

DOJ_NMG_0137557

Panel Criticizes Breakthrough Study Of Adult Stem Cells. The New York Times (2/28, Wade, 1.16M) reports, "An inquiry panel has found what it called 'significantly flawed' data in a major stem cell paper published in Nature in 2002. The article, which claimed stem cells isolated from an adult could change into all the major tissue types of the body, was seized on by opponents of abortion as showing that embryonic stem cell research was unnecessary since adult stem cells could provide all the predicted benefits. The lead author of the article, Catherine Verfaillie, said yesterday that she had sent a letter to Nature stating that the flawed data should not be relied on but that they did not affect the article's conclusions."

Campaign Document Says Romney Vulnerable To "Flip-Flop" Charge. The Boston Globe (2/27, Helman, 413K) reported, "Here are some views of Mitt Romney causing concern inside his campaign: His hair looks too perfect, he's not a tough war time leader, and he has earned a reputation as 'Slick Dancing Mitt' or 'Flip-Flop Mitt.'" Romney and his advisers "have identified those perceptions as threats to his bid for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination, according to an exhaustive internal campaign document obtained by the Globe. The 77-slide PowerPoint presentation offers a revealing look at Romney's pursuit of the White House, outlining a plan for branding himself, framing his competitors, and allaying voter concerns about his record, his Mormon faith, and his shifts on key issues like abortion."

The AP (2/28) reports the "internal document shows Mitt Romney's presidential campaign is concerned about his vulnerability to charges of flip-flopping, while suggesting he can differentiate from President Bush with a single word: 'intelligence.'" The document "also outlines plans for positively branding the Republican contender, negatively framing rivals John McCain and Rudy Giuliani, and allaying voter concerns about his record and Mormon faith." The blueprint, "dated Dec. 11, was drafted in part by Alex Castellanos, Romney's media adviser."

The Washington Post (2/28, A7, Cillizza, Shear, 690K) reports Romney's "advisers confront the challenges that the former governor faces as he seeks the Republican nomination. Among them, the document says, are his newly conservative positions on social issues and his belief in the Mormon faith, which is viewed skeptically by many members of other Christian denominations." The document "notes that Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) is seen as a war hero but also as an inside-the-Beltway politician, the Globe reported. It sees Giuliani's political strength emanating from his post-Sept. 11, 2001, actions as mayor, but touches on his 'personal political liabilities' -- a reference, perhaps, to his nasty and public divorce from his second wife, Donna Hanover."

Edwards Says Repeated Apologies For Iraq Vote Won't Turn Off Voters. The AP (2/28, Fouhy) reports Democrat John Edwards "said Tuesday that honesty and openness were essential qualities for a president, and that he was proud to acknowledge his 2002 vote authorizing the invasion of Iraq was a mistake." Edwards was "trolling for campaign cash on a three-day visit to New York — home of his chief Democratic rival, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton," and he "spoke to reporters after attending a union-sponsored workshop on eradicating poverty." Asked whether his "repeated apologies for his vote would be a turnoff to voters over time, the 2004 vice presidential nominee said that after six years of President Bush, voters craved a president willing to acknowledge errors and change course if necessary."

Giuliani, Clinton Lead Primary Fields In ABC/Washington Post Poll. ABC World News (2/27, story 5, 1:55, Stephanopoulos, 8.78M) reported the results of the latest ABC News/Washington Post' poll, noting that, "We asked voters how closely are you watching the campaign right now? 65% said they were watching it closely. That is just extraordinary. You usually see those kind of numbers around the conventions. Not 20 months before election day." On the Republican side, "Rudy Giuliani, the former mayor of New York, has opened a big lead over John McCain. 44% to 21%. That's triple until the last month. Newt Gingrich, not even officially in the race, is third at 15%. And Mitt Romney, who is in the race, has dropped since his entry down to 4%." On the Democratic side, "Hillary Clinton, still the frontrunner, but Barack Obama has cut into her lead. It's now a 12-point lead [36%-24%]. Most of that has come from African-American voters. Another person not in the race, Al Gore, is third, he is getting a little bit of an Oscars bounce up to at 14%. And John Edwards, exactly where he was a month ago, at 12%."

DOJ_NMG_0137558

The Washington Post (2/28, A1, Balz, Cohen, 690K) reports in a front page story that the "opening stages of the campaign for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination have produced a noticeable shift in sentiment among African American voters, who little more than a month ago heavily supported Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton but now favor the candidacy of Sen. Barack Obama." Clinton "continues to lead Obama and other rivals in the Democratic contest, according to the latest Washington Post-ABC News poll. But her once-sizable margin over the freshman senator from Illinois was sliced in half during the past month largely because of Obama's growing support among black voters." On the GOP side, the "principal reason" Giuliani was able to expand his lead over McCain "was a shift among white evangelical Protestants, who now clearly favor Giuliani over McCain. Giuliani is doing well among this group of Americans despite his support of abortion rights and gay rights, two issues of great importance to religious conservatives."

Clinton-Giuliani Matchup Hearkens Back To 2000 Senate Race. ABC World News (2/27, story 5, 1:55, Stephanopoulos, 8.78M) reported, "If it turned out to be a Clinton/Giuliani race, and there's a long way to go, but that was almost supposed be the race in the 2000 Senate race in New York, they were supposed to oppose each other." Stephanopoulos: "That's right, but since then, Rudy Giuliani has gotten a halo over the American public. And he much more favorable ratings than Hillary Clinton does right now. Look at that. 64%, to 28%, favorable/unfavorable for Rudy Giuliani. Hillary Clinton, split right down the middle, 49%-48%. Rudy Giuliani is more popular with Democrats than Hillary Clinton is with Republicans."

Clinton Sees Pardon Controversy Reemerge As Issue. The Boston Globe (2/28, Kranish, 413K) reports, "Six years ago, the launch of Hillary Clinton's career in the US Senate was marred by allegations that her brothers had received payments from people pardoned by President Bill Clinton in the waning months of his presidency. Now, in the wake of the launch of her presidential campaign, the pardon controversy has reemerged in an obscure court case in which Senator Clinton's brother Tony is battling an order to repay more than $100,000 he received from a couple pardoned by President Clinton. Tony Rodham, who acknowledged approaching the president about a pardon for the couple, is the second of Hillary Clinton's brothers to receive money from people who were eventually pardoned by President Clinton. Hugh Rodham received $400,000 from two people, one of whom was pardoned and one whose sentence was commuted. But while Hillary Clinton immediately expressed chagrin over the news in 2001 that Hugh received the money -- and asked him to return it -- she said Tony was 'not paid,' according to a congressional report." On Tuesday, "US Bankruptcy Court Judge Marian Harrison of Nashville ordered Tony Rodham to respond by March 16 to the allegation that he failed to repay a loan of $107,000 from the couple pardoned by Clinton."

Clinton's Senate Filings Neglected To Disclose Family Foundation. The New York Times (2/28, Healy, 1.16M) reports the "charitable family foundation that Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton and former President Bill Clinton have operated since 2001 has not been listed on Mrs. Clinton's annual Senate financial disclosure reports for five years." Aides to the Clintons "said that the omission was a clerical error and that it was corrected immediately after The Washington Post brought it to their attention on Monday." Clinton spokesman Philippe Reines said, "It was inadvertently omitted from her Senate filing, an oversight that has since been corrected." According to the IRS filings, "the Clintons have contributed $5 million to the charity, the Clinton Family Foundation, and it has made grants to Yale University, where they both attended law school, and to other charities that have personal meaning for the Clintons."

Leading 2008 Candidates Push States To Join February 5 Primary. The Hill (2/28, Bolton) reports, "Pressure from the leading presidential candidates has set the stage for a Feb. 5 national primary that will likely include 20 states, possibly more." Working "behind the scenes and mostly through surrogates, Democratic Sens. Barack Obama (Ill.) and Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), and Republicans Sen. John McCain (Ariz.), former Gov. Mitt Romney (Mass.) and former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani have fueled a rush of states to hold primary elections on Feb. 5 next year, or earlier. As many as 23 states are in the frame to hold primary elections on that date." Delaware, Missouri, New Mexico and Oklahoma "in 2004 held their nominating contests on the first Tuesday of February, and are likely be joined this time by such big states as California, Illinois, Michigan, New Jersey, New York and Texas. They may be joined also by smaller states including Tennessee, Arkansas, Arizona, Alabama, Georgia, North Dakota, Utah,

DOJ_NMG_0137559

Kansas, Colorado and (for the GOP only) West Virginia and Nevada. The legislatures of Pennsylvania and North Carolina are holding hearings on the issue but the outcomes of these are uncertain." The allies of candidates "who expect to do well in these states are taking lead roles in moving primaries there to early February. By holding primaries soon after the Iowa caucuses, the first contest of the year, such states will have a bigger impact than before on who becomes the Republican and Democratic presidential nominees."

Morris Notes Move To National Primary Makes Money Critical. In his column in The Hill (2/28), Dick Morris notes the rush to the February 5 primary date, adding, "In effect, we will now have a national primary and the presidential nominating season will last only three weeks from start to finish. The effect of this gigantic sea change will be that whoever is the frontrunner in each party by the fall of 2007 will be virtually certain to win the nomination because only the frontrunner can possibly hope to amass enough money to compete in half the country at once. Nobody but the likely winner in each party will be able to compete at that level on Feb. 5." As a result, "Money will now be king. Nothing else will count very much. If you can afford to run a national campaign three weeks after the first caucus, you will win. If you can't, you're doomed. And the polling that designates a frontrunner now will do much to determine the nominee."

NYTimes Says Congress Should Repair Public Finance System. The New York Times (2/28, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "If nothing else, the disheartening frenzy to raise huge campaign donations in this front-loaded presidential race is making money — lots and lots of money — a public issue. In the cross-fire, federal election regulators are expected to approve Senator Barack Obama's clever but cagey attempt to claim a reformer's mantle: he wants to let the nominees keep bagging unlimited private donations in the run-up to the primaries, then have the choice of returning a chunk of it after the conventions and accepting limited public financing for the general election." Obama is "proposing to adopt the even-money truce — should he win the nomination — only if the Republican nominee does the same. Behind this shadowboxing is the fact that the post-Watergate public financing of presidential elections has not kept pace with inflation. This failure, which a conscientious Congress would repair in time for the 2012 election, has put private fund-raisers back at the wheel."

Conservative Group Criticizes Gore's Electricity Consumption. USA Today/AP (2/28) reports Al Gore, "a leading voice in the fight against global warming, is being called a hypocrite by a conservative group that claims his Nashville mansion uses too much electricity." A spokeswoman for Gore "said the former vice president invests in enough renewable energy to make up for the home's power consumption." Gore's documentary film, An Inconvenient Truth, "which chronicled his campaign against global warming, won an Academy Award on Sunday. The next day, the Tennessee Center for Policy Research put out a news release saying Gore was not doing enough to reduce his own consumption of electricity. The group disputes whether global warming is a serious problem." Utility records "show the Gore family paid an average monthly electric bill of about $1,200 last year for its 10,000-square-foot home." The Gores "used about 191,000 kilowatt hours in 2006, according to bills reviewed by The Associated Press spanning the period from Feb. 3, 2006, to Jan. 5. That is far more than the typical Nashville household, which uses about 15,600 kilowatt-hours per year."

The Washington Times (2/28, Pierce, 88K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column that Drew Johnson, president of the Tennessee Center for Policy Research, said, "If this were any other person with $30,000-a-year in utility bills, I wouldn't care. But he tells other people how to live, and he's not following his own rules." The Times adds Kalee Kreider, "a spokeswoman for the Gores, did not dispute the center's figures, taken as they were from public records. But she pointed out that both Al and Tipper Gore work out of their home, and she argued that 'the bottom line is that every family has a different carbon footprint. And what Vice President Gore has asked is for families to calculate that footprint and take steps to reduce and offset it.'"

WZTV-TV Nashville (2/27, 9:08 pm) reported, "It's being called Al Gore's own inconvenient truth. A local watchdog group says Gore's Nashville home uses more electricity in a month than most families use in a year. … The Tennessee Center for Policy Research points to the former vice president's electric bills for his Belle Meade home, which Fox 17 News has obtained. On average, US households use 938 kilowatt hours of electricity a month. Records show since January 2006 Gore's home has used 15,813 kilowatt hours a month, with an average power bill approaching $1,200."

WFAA-TV Dallas (2/27, 6:40 am) reported, "Hollywood environmentalists might be feeling a little less love for Al Gore.

DOJ_NMG_0137560

Fresh off of his win for his documentary, reports show that he uses 20 times more energy than the average household American."

Bush Ranch In Crawford Is Eco-Friendly. The Washington Times (2/28, Pierce, 88K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column in "contrast to Al Gore's profligate use of energy at his Tennessee mansion, President Bush's 4,000-square-foot house in Crawford, Texas, is 'a model of environmental rectitude,' according to a 2001 article by Rob Sullivan in the Chicago Tribune." Marc Morano, "an aide to Senate Environment and Public Works Committee ranking member Sen. James M. Inhofe, Oklahoma Republican, posted the Tribune article yesterday at www.epw.senate.gov."

"Green" Politicians' Jet Travel Criticized. The Los Angeles Times (2/28, Pringle, 850K) reports California Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D) "offers plenty of tips on how California households can combat global warming." But "one bit of information Feinstein declines to share is the number of times that she flew last year on her husband's Gulfstream jet, which burns much more fuel per passenger-mile than commercial airliners." California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) "also has asked constituents to do their part to conserve energy...even though he takes to the skies on leased executive jets." Aides "say there is nothing contradictory between the pro-green pronouncements and the flying habits of the Democratic senator and Republican governor. Some environmentalists aren't so sure." The Times adds, "Noncommercial aircraft and other carbon-related indulgences have caused politicians considerable turbulence recently."

Dowd Says Gore Would Make Campaign More Interesting. In her New York Times column (2/28), Maureen Dowd says, "The best ex-president who was never president could make one of the most interesting campaigns in American history even more interesting." Will Al Gore "use his green moment on the red carpet in black tie to snag blue states and win the White House? Only the Goracle knows the answer. The man who was prescient on climate change, the Internet, terrorism and Iraq admitted that maybe his problem had been that he was too far ahead of the curve. He realized at a conference that "there're ideas that are mature, ideas that are maturing, ideas that are past their prime ... and a category called 'predawn.'" Dowd adds, "With Hillary overproduced and Barack Obama an unfinished script, maybe it's time to bring the former vice president out of turnaround. Hillary's henchmen try to prognosticate the Goracle's future by looking at his waistline, according to Newsday; they think if he's going to run, he'll get back to fighting weight."

Link Between Gore Movie, Child Obesity Postulated. The Washington Times (2/28, McCaslin, 88K) reports in its "Inside the Beltway" column that it "may have discovered why Mr. Gore is so suddenly rotund: 'An Inconvenient Truth.' Iain Murray, senior fellow for global climate change and environmental science at the Competitive Enterprise Institute, forwards speculation that Mr. Gore's Oscar-winning movie could be hazardous to the former vice president's health, and everybody else's for that matter." The Scotsman, "Scotland's national newspaper, is claiming that half of the children between the ages of 7 and 11 in that country are now so anxious about global warming that they're losing sleep over it." Science Daily "is reporting that children who don't get enough sleep are more prone to obesity." Murray said, "One has to wonder just how much damage to civilization that Gore and company will do to impose their climate-control regime on the world."

Gingrich Says GOP Needs To Avoid Centrism, Hillary Bashing. The Washington Times (2/28, Pierce, 88K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column former Speaker Newt Gingrich "says Republicans must avoid bland centrism and Hillary-bashing if they are to win in 2008." In an email "inviting conservatives to the Conservative Political Action Conference," Gingrich says, "There are two big facts about the 2008 election. Fact No. 1: Running as a bland, business-as-usual Republican will be a dead loser. In 2006, the American people repudiated the GOP because the idea of Republicans' trying to manage the liberal welfare state they inherited from the Democrats was a dead loser. I am not sure many Republican consultants have come to understand this." The second point Gingrich raises is that "focusing on an anti-Hillary campaign will also be a dead loser. … If a campaign is going to degenerate into a mud-slinging contest, the Clintons will always win because they are vastly more ready to jump into the pit."

Thompson To Hold First DC Fundraiser. Roll Call (2/28, Newmyer, Ackley) reports in its "K Street Files" column, "Add one more name to the long list of politicians that want some K Street cash. Former Health and Human Services Secretary Tommy Thompson, who is mulling whether he wants to give up his plush office at Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld for the Oval Office, is having his first

DOJ_NMG_0137561

Washington, D.C., fundraiser next week. The money goes to his coffers at the Thompson Presidential Exploratory Committee — 2008." The event is "sponsored by Barbour Griffith & Rogers lobbyist Robert Wood, who was Thompson's chief of staff at HHS, and others around town, said Darrin Schmitz of the committee, known as 'Tommy 2008.'"

Some Republicans Hope Huckabee Will Run For Senate. The Hill (2/28, Blake) reports that although his "long-shot presidential campaign is still in its early stages, some wish former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee would drop his national aspirations and return home to wage what they see as a vital campaign against Sen. Mark Pryor (D-Ark.) in 2008 instead." Observers say Arkansas is "often listed among the top Republican pickup opportunities in the country, but Huckabee is the only Republican who matches up to Pryor and there are no comparable alternatives, observers say." Although those "close to Huckabee chalk up the Senate talk to overanxious bloggers and speculation, some see Huckabee-for-Senate as a real possibility and most Republicans make it clear they would welcome him home." One state GOP source "familiar with Huckabee's campaign said a Senate bid could indeed materialize and that it's something Huckabee has considered and analyzed. Huckabee ran for Senate in 1992." Huckabee "couldn't wait too long to abandon the presidential bid, the source said, and the Aug. 11 Republican straw poll in Ames, Iowa, could be a fork in the road." Even if Huckabee "were to enter the Senate race, Republicans see the 10-year governor as an underdog. Despite his long tenure in state government's top office, he was reelected with just 53 percent of the vote in 2002, which was less than Pryor's 54 percent in a good year for Republicans nationally."

NRSC Donates $20,000 Contribution From Man Charged With Aiding Terrorists. The AP (2/28) reports, "A Republican Party campaign committee that received $20,000 in 2003 from a man now accused of helping terrorists has donated the money to a foundation that comforts families of wounded soldiers." The NRSC "renounced the contribution after news reports identified Abdul Tawala Ibn Ali Alishtari as an NRSC 'Inner Circle Member for Life.' Federal prosecutors charged Alishtari two weeks ago in New York with terrorism financing, material support of terrorism and money laundering. Alishtari pleaded not guilty in U.S. District Court in Manhattan." The NRSC "gave $20,000 last week to the Fisher House Foundation, which provides housing for families on the grounds of military and Veterans' Administration hospitals."

Special Election For Norwood Seat Set For June 19. The Washington Post (2/28, A7, Cillizza, Shear, 690K) reports June 19 is "the day that Gov. Sonny Perdue (R-Ga.) has chosen for the special election to fill the vacancy created when Rep. Charlie Norwood (R) died on Feb. 13." The two leading Republican candidates "to replace him are state senators. Ralph Hudgens is making his second try at the seat after losing to Norwood in a 1994 primary. In that race, Hudgens led on the initial ballot but lost 51 percent to 49 percent to Norwood in a runoff." Hudgens's primary challenge "will come from Jim Whitehead, who is seeking to tie himself to Norwood's legacy."

Rothenberg Sees No "Wave" In House Races For 2008. The Washington Times (2/28, Pierce, 88K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column that in his "early preview of House races in 2008, election forecaster Stuart Rothenberg says 'a huge political wave favoring one party is not very likely' next year." Rothenberg "still thinks Democrats will have 'plenty of opportunities again next year, including almost a dozen districts they narrowly lost and a handful of districts where they unwisely failed to field a strong challenger.'" But with "the White House held by Republicans and Democrats in charge of Congress, 'voters aren't going to blame one party entirely for whatever problems exist,' he says in his Rothenberg Political Report newsletter."

Schwarzenegger Unfazed By Unflattering Picture. Roll Call (2/28, Heil) reports in its "Heard on the Hill" column, "We knew our favorite governor/action star was up to something here in Washington more blockbuster-worthy than discussing Medicare (snore) and getting Congressional briefings. Turns out, California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) has much more exciting plans, like possibly destroying an alien force." At a "briefing in the Capitol on Tuesday, a reporter ribbed the governator about his photo, which appeared on the cover of that day's Roll Call. In the picture, Schwarzenegger is gesturing with an outstretched arm, a slightly demonic expression on his face. 'Is there a worse picture of you?' the snarky scribe queried." Schwarzenegger had "a better assessment of the pic. 'It actually looks more like I'm about to get ready to attack an evil army or something,' he joked."

DOJ_NMG_0137562

Top Democrats Seek Governors' Support For Corporate Disclosure Legislation. USA Today (2/28, 2.27M) reports Sens. Carl Levin and Barack Obama, as well as Rep. Rahm Emanuel, "urged the National Governors Association Tuesday to support proposed legislation aimed at anonymously-controlled companies involved in crime. … While acknowledging that most of those companies operate legally, the lawmakers warned that some instead function 'as conduits for organized crime, money laundering, terrorist financing securities fraud, tax evasion and other misconduct.' They asked the governors to back proposed federal legislation that would require those who register new companies in the 50 states to first gather information about their clients' identities. The proposal would also include company formation agents in federal anti-money laundering regulations."

Conservatives Unhappy With Recent Moves By Perry. The Washington Times (2/28, Aynesworth, 88K) reports Texas Gov. Rick Perry, "elected with strong conservative support in November, has taunted that political base recently and could face serious opposition in the state Legislature amid a developing power struggle. … His executive order earlier this month ordering all Texas girls entering the sixth grade to be immunized against a venereal disease that causes cervical cancer provided the most heat and criticism from conservatives. But another Perry edict, to speed up state review of proposed coal-fired power plants, was checked by a state judge last week. And another Perry suggestion, that the state should sell its lottery to help fund cancer research and care, hasn't caught on.

O'Malley Among Supporters Of Maryland Assault Weapons Ban. The Baltimore Sun (2/28, Skalka, 257K) reports that "advocates for a state assault weapons ban said Tuesday that they have the legislative backing and momentum to pass a bill this session." Gov. Martin O'Malley and state Attorney General Douglas F. Gansler "are behind a proposal that would forbid the transport, sale, possession or purchase of military-style assault weapons."

WPost Claims Maryland Early Voting Bill Discriminates Against GOP. The Washington Post (2/28, A18, 690K), in an editorial, writes, "Both houses of the [Maryland] General Assembly have approved a constitutional amendment to permit early voting, making it almost certain there will be a referendum in 2008. The action follows a rancorous two-year fight in which Democrats rammed through measures that gave them a clear advantage over Republicans. For instance, the only places where people would have been able to vote ahead of time just happened to be in heavily Democratic precincts. Republicans were right to think the effort was more about helping Democrats than helping voters."

States' Unfunded Pension Liabilities Continue To Skyrocket. The Wall Street Journal (2/28, A2, Cooper, 2.04M) reports state governments' unfunded pension liabilities "continue to increase despite a recent rise in tax receipts, in a continuation of a spiral that began in the late 1990s, according to a Standard & Poor's analysis to be released today. The report says states collectively had about $330 billion in unfunded pension obligations in fiscal 2005, the last period for which complete data are available. That is $46 billion more than in fiscal 2004. … Among the states with the biggest unfunded obligations were Connecticut, Illinois and Oklahoma, the report said, all of which had gaps in the lower 40% range. West Virginia had the biggest gap, with an unfunded liability of more than 50%. By contrast, the state in the best shape was Florida, with obligations funded at 107.3%."

States' Initiatives Seen As Likely To Increase Total Healthcare Spending. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (2/28, A14, 2.04M) MIT's Amy Finkelstein writes, "several states have recently mandated universal coverage for their residents. Massachusetts enacted legislation last spring; other proposals are brewing in California, Pennsylvania and elsewhere. … Recent state efforts to create universal health-insurance coverage would reduce the fraction of the population in a state without insurance by similar amounts as did the introduction of Medicare nationwide. And if that program is any guide, we may perhaps see changes in the structure of the health-care system, such as the development and adoption of new medical technologies. We are likely to witness an improvement in the financial security of the currently uninsured. There are also likely to be increases in health-care spending -- quite possibly substantial ones."

DOJ_NMG_0137563

"Congestion Pricing" Considered Unlikely To Alleviate Traffic Concerns. In an op-ed for USA Today (2/28, 10A, 2.27M) Bill Graves, president and CEO of the American Trucking Associations, writes, "Congestion pricing, touted as a cure for gridlock, is unfair, ineffective and ignores the transportation needs of Americans. The several forms of congestion pricing all rely on giving motorists better highway access for a price. In many uses, it does not markedly reduce congestion, but merely raises revenues — taxes, in other words. Congestion pricing increases cargo transportation costs and hurts the economy. Higher manufacturers' and retailers' operating costs mean higher costs to consumers for everything from gasoline and clothing to food."

Trial Lawyers Accused Of Manipulating Alien Tort Statute. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (2/28, A15, 2.04M) Joseph G. Finnerty III, heads the New York Litigation Practice Group for DLA Piper, and John Merrigan, a partner at DLA Piper, writes, "While asbestos and tobacco litigation bonanzas are winding down, America's most aggressive contingency-fee law firms still have in place a fee structure in search of an investment strategy. And so, faced with shrinking domestic opportunities, these firms have gone global. Consider one class-action lawsuit, in which a plaintiffs firm sued Deutsche Bank on behalf of an African tribe which suffered atrocities committed by imperial Germany in the 19th century. Or another, consolidating 10 complaints filed around the country on behalf of all South Africans injured by the former apartheid regime from 1948 to the present. … The law used to lodge these massive foreign class actions in the U.S. is the Alien Tort Statute (ATS). This obscure piece of legislation adopted in 1789 gave federal district courts jurisdiction in civil cases brought by an alien for a tort committed in violation of the law of nations, or of a U.S. treaty."

WSJournal Claims CFIUS Reviews Of Foreign Investment Are "Too Stringent." The Wall Street Journal (2/28, 2.04M) editorializes, "Limits on foreign investment here will only invite retaliation abroad. … The protectionists can't really rebut any of this, so instead they play up the 'security' angle. And there is no denying that some foreign takeovers deserve to be scrutinized on national security grounds . That's precisely what the executive branch now does via the Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States, or CFIUS, an interagency group that has up to 75 days to inspect transactions. A handful are changed or disapproved, but 94% of all foreign investment in the U.S. is made by European and other OECD nations that are hardly a threat. In the wake of the Dubai Ports debacle, the Bush Administration is already making CFIUS review too stringent. A new study by the National Foundation for American Policy finds that in the last year the 'process for securing approvals within CFIUS has grown more difficult and uncertain for foreign investors' with a tripling in the number of investigations and a doubling in the number of withdrawn mergers."

US, Pyongyang To Take First Steps Towards Normalizing Relations. On its front page, the Washington Times (2/28, A1, Salmon, 88K) reports, "North Korea's top nuclear negotiator was on his way to the United States yesterday for talks on issues that a State Department official said would include the first steps toward the normalization of diplomatic relations." Kim Kye-gwan's trip "reflects the rapid easing of tensions with President Kim Jong-Il's regime" since North Korea agreed this month to freeze its nuclear program in exchange for heavy fuel oil and other concessions. Kim is expected to arrive in San Francisco tomorrow, a State Department official told The Times, and "will continue to New York" for talks with Assistant Secretary Christopher Hill, "which will likely begin early next week."

DNI McConnell Says Iran Training Shiite Militias In Lebanon. In an article on US participation in a regional summit on Iraq, the New York Times (2/28, A1,Cooper, Semple, 1.16M) says new DNI Mike McConnell told a Senate committee Tuesday "that Iran was training anti-American Iraqi Shiites at sites in Lebanon and Iran to use armor-piercing weapons against American troops." McConnell said it was "probable" that top Iranian leaders, including Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, "were aware that weapons had been supplied by Iran." At the State Department, Assistant Secretary McCormack said the Iranian-made weapons would be "certainly at the top of our list" in the regional meetings.

Similarly, the Washington Post (2/28, A1, Kessler, 690K) notes briefly in report on the summit that McConnell said "that while Iran is contributing weapons to Iraqi militias that 'raises the cost to the United States' of its fighting in Iraq, he did not see 'any direct linkage from Iran dictating events inside Iraq.'"

DOJ_NMG_0137564

The Washington Times (2/28, Gertz, 88K) reports McConnell also said "Iran's development of nuclear arms is 'very dangerous,' and Tehran could deploy the weapons within the next several years." He added, "We assess that Tehran seeks to develop nuclear weapons and has shown greater interest in drawing out the negotiations rather than reaching an acceptable diplomatic solution. … This is a very dangerous situation, as a nuclear Iran could prompt destabilizing countermoves by other states in this volatile region." Iran "could have the capability to build nuclear weapons by 2015 and about the same time will be able to mount a nuclear warhead on a missile," McConnell said in response to a question from Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton.

The Christian Science Monitor (2/28, Grier, 59K) reports, "The consensus view of US intelligence agencies is that Iran is a power on the rise in the Middle East, eager to expand its military might and committed to the development of nuclear weapons." McConnell's "warning comes at a time when the US has charged that Iranian forces are sending deadly weapons to Shiite militias inside Iraq. In addition, US officials have cited the potential threat of long-range Iranian missiles as a reason why Europe might need US-made missile defenses." But "critics of the White House say that the US may be misusing intelligence information to create a pretext for conflict with Iran, in a manner similar to the run-up to the Iraq war."

Pace "Categorically" Denies Plans For Iran Air Strikes. AFP (2/28) reports General Peter Pace, chairman of the joint chiefs of staff, declared "categorically" Tuesday that the US is not planning air strikes against Iran. During congressional testimony, Pace responded, "It is not true," when asked about suggestions that the US military was preparing to launch air strikes on Iran. Asked by Senator Robert Byrd if he was categorically denying the reports, Pace replied: "Categorically sir."

But the New Yorker's Seymour Hersh, on MSNBC's Hardball (2/27, Matthews) said, "I don't think the President will leave office without dealing with Iran in some way. … They're putting a lot of squeeze on them economically, but I don't think that's going to work. And I think they maybe think they can scare them into something." Hersh added that the President "wouldn't wait that late because it would already be close to an election. They want the Republicans to hang in there somehow in `08. If he does anything, he'll probably do it this year."

Meanwhile, the AP (2/28, Faramarzi) reports the deputy chief of Hezbollah warned Tuesday that any "military adventure" by the US and Israel against Iran "would have dangerous consequences across the Mideast." In an interview with the AP, Sheik Naim Kassem suggested Hezbollah "would not get involved if the US attacks Iran, but he raised the possibility that Israel might attack Lebanon as part of such an assault -- in which case, he said, Hezbollah would 'definitely' respond."

Encouraged By Strategy Versus North Korea, US Targets Iran's Finances. The Financial Times (2/28, Dinmore) reports, "Encouraged by what it sees as the success of financial sanctions imposed on North Korea, the Bush administration is embarking on an aggressive policy of raising the cost to Iran of its alleged nuclear and terrorist activities by targeting non-US private sector ties to Tehran." The Times adds, "Officials say the policy has support from 'hawks' in the administration who see actions against financing as a key component in the 'war on terror.'"

David Ignatius writes in the Washington Post (2/28, A19, 690K), "Everybody knows that economic sanctions don't work. Just look at the decades of fruitless pressure on Cuba. But guess what? In the recent cases of North Korea and Iran, a new variety of US Treasury sanctions is having a potent effect, suggesting that the conventional wisdom may be wrong. These new, targeted financial measures are to traditional sanctions what Super Glue is to Elmer's Glue-All. That is, they really stick." Deputy Treasury Secretary Robert Kimmitt "doesn't even like to call them sanctions, preferring the term 'law enforcement measures.' … The new sanctions are toxic because they effectively limit a country's access to the global ATM. In that sense, they impose -- at last -- a real price on countries such as North Korea and Iran that have blithely defied UN resolutions on proliferation."

Russian Deals In Middle East "Snarl" US Strategy On Iran. On its front page, the Wall Street Journal (2/28, A1, White, Jr., 2.04M) reports, "As the US struggles to contain Iran and its nuclear program, it is bumping into a new impediment: an assertive Russia bent on regaining leverage -- and markets -- in the Middle East." While the US and Russia have "tussled" autumn over a U.N. resolution to rein in Iran's nuclear program, Moscow "quietly moved ahead on another front," delivering "more than $700 million worth of air-defense systems to help protect Iran's nuclear enrichment and research sites from attack, Russian officials confirmed in December." Former Ambassador John Bolton said, "Russia is a huge problem on the Iran front." However, current Administration officials working closely with Russia "aren't quite so harsh, but concerns over Moscow's intentions in the Middle East -- as well as its overall foreign policy -- are rising."

DOJ_NMG_0137565

Russia Says Hamas Will End Attacks Against Israel. USA Today (2/28, 8A, 2.27M) reports, "Hamas supreme leader Khaled Mashaal promised during a meeting Tuesday with Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov in Moscow that the militant Palestinian group will end missile attacks and other violence against Israel, Lavrov said." However, Mashaal "said his group is not ready to recognize the Jewish state."

ICC Charges Former Sudanese Official With War Crimes. The Washington Times (2/28, Pisik, 88K) reports, "The International Criminal Court yesterday charged a former Sudanese official and the leader of the government-backed Janjaweed militia with committing war crimes in Darfur, the first of many anticipated attempts to punish participants in the bloody ethnic conflict." The court, which has been "collecting evidence on Darfur for 20 months," accused Ahmad Mohammed Harun, "formerly the junior interior minister in charge of the western Sudanese region, and Janjaweed commander Ali Kushayb of being involved in war crimes and crimes against humanity between August 2003 and March 2004." The Bush Administration, "until recently a foe of the ICC because of claims it lacks safeguards to protect U.S. soldiers and civilians in conflict zones, praised the court action. 'We fully support bringing to justice those responsible for crimes and atrocities that have occurred in Darfur,' State Department spokesman Sean McCormack told reporters in Washington."

The Los Angeles Times (2/28, Farley, Sanders, 850K) reports prosecutor Luis Moreno-Ocampo "presented results of a 21-month investigation that he said showed 'reasonable evidence' that Ahmed Haroun, then state minister for the interior, and imprisoned militia leader Ali Kushayb, 'bear criminal responsibility' for mass executions, rapes and the forcible removal of thousands of people from their homes." The allegations, "which are not an indictment, are a first step that could lead to arrests and prosecutions by the court at The Hague, and they come amid an international campaign to halt the violence in Darfur, which has killed more than 200,000 people and displaced 2.5 million in the last four years." Prosecution, however, "will not be easy. Sudan's justice minister immediately rejected the allegations and said the suspects would not be handed over for trial."

The New York Times (2/28, Simons, 1.16M) notes Moreno-Ocampo "declined to say whether the most important figures in Sudan's political or military hierarchy would be held accountable for the mass killing, looting, rape and general devastation in Darfur, which has uprooted more than two and a half million people, according to the United Nations." The Christian Science Monitor (2/28, Marquand, 59K) also reports the story.

Meanwhile, in an op-ed in the Washington Post (2/28, A19, 690K), actress Angelina Jolie, who is "a goodwill ambassador for the United Nations High Commission for Refugees," writes, "As the prosecutions unfold, I hope the international community will intervene, right away, to protect the people of Darfur and prevent further violence. The refugees don't need more resolutions or statements of concern. They need follow-through on past promises of action."

US Says Cuba Stepping Up Repression. The Financial Times (2/28, Dinmore) reports Caleb McCarry, the State Department's Cuba Transition Coordinator, Tuesday "claimed the Castro government was stepping up its internal repression in response to an increasingly active opposition movement." McCarry cited "independent Cuban journalists" as saying civil society "had become more active, especially in the provinces, since Fidel Castro temporarily passed power to his brother Raúl last July." The Times says McCarry's remarks to the American Enterprise Institute "contrasted with that of analysts and members of Congress who recently returned from Cuba with reports of a smooth transition of power."

However, the AP (2/28, Schweid) reports new DNI Mike McConnell told Congress Tuesday that "repression is increasing in Cuba under the control of Raul Castro, and the domination of the government by his brother, Fidel, is nearing an end." McConnell told the Senate Armed Services Committee "that significant positive change immediately after Fidel Castro's death was unlikely."

Ban Institutes Personnel Policy Changes At UN. The New York Times (2/28, Hoge, 1.16M) reports, "Secretary General Ban Ki-moon is installing tough new requirements for hundreds of jobs at the United Nations that he hopes will begin to dispel the reputation for inaction and bloat that has long dogged the institution, according to officials in his office." Ban "is adopting the changes, which include increasing internal competition for jobs and removing some job guarantees, first in his own office, and is calling on others to follow suit or leave the organization. … High-level officials will be reviewed at the end of their first two years, and all positions will be considered five-year appointments. The secretary general's term is five years, and aides say Mr. Ban believes that other officials should pass through the same reappraisal process he will face if he runs for a second term."

DOJ_NMG_0137566

British Tories Urged To Adopt More "Traditional" Foreign Policy. Kim R. Holmes and Nile Gardiner, who are, respectively, vice president for foreign policy and director of the Margaret Thatcher Center for Freedom, at the Heritage Foundation, write in the Wall Street Journal (2/28, A15, 2.04M), "For over half a century the Anglo-American 'special relationship' has been a dominant force in world affairs. Today it is the engine of the global war on terror, and its enduring strength continues to confound and even infuriate leaders in continental Europe. Britain is the only nation the US truly trusts as an ally; it is the British prime minister and not the German chancellor, the French president or the U.N. secretary-general, to whom the US president looks first for partnership in addressing the big international security matters of the day." They add that if the Conservatives "take office in 2009 or 2010, the relationship between the White House and Downing Street could well be a tense one whether the Republicans or Democrats are in power, with a great deal of bad blood generated in advance. … It is not too late, though, for the Conservatives to adopt a more traditional and pragmatic foreign-policy position, one that recognizes the huge stakes involved in maintaining the alliance."

WPost Denounces Egypt's Crackdown On "Secular Democrats." The Washington Post (2/28, A18, 690K) editorializes, "The Bush administration has tolerated Egypt's brutal crackdown on domestic dissent and the broader reversal of its democratic spring of 2005 in part because President Hosni Mubarak argues that his adversaries are dangerous Islamic extremists. It's true that the largest opposition movement in Egypt is the Muslim Brotherhood; how dangerous it is can be debated." But "what is overlooked is that Mr. Mubarak reserves his most relentless repression not for the Islamists -- who hold a fifth of the seats in parliament -- but for the secular democrats who fight for free elections, a free press, rights for women and religious tolerance." The Post adds, "The latest case in point is a blogger named Abdel Kareem Nabil Soliman, who was sentenced to four years in prison last week on charges of religious incitement, disrupting public order and 'insulting the president.'"

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"God's Word, Plus Static, On Calvary Satellite Network."
"Police Probe Death In Organ Donation Case."
"U.S. To Join Iran, Syria In Iraq talks."
"San Diego Diocese Files For Bankruptcy."
"Sudan Official Accused In Darfur Atrocities."
"Worldwide Sell-Off Hits Wall Street."

USA Today:

"It's A Hard Sell For Some, Big Easy For Others."
"HUD Gets New View Of Who's Homeless."
"704,000 Sought Shelter."

New York Times:

"Wall St. Tumble Adds To Worries About Economies."
"Low Pay And Broken Promises Greet Guest Workers."
"2 New Drugs Offer Options In H.I.V. Fight."
"Deal in Albany Overhauls Pay For Worker Aid."
"As Ethics Panels Expand Grip, No Field Is Off Limits."
"Afghan Bombing Sends A Danger Signal To U.S.."

Washington Post:

"Stock Sell-Off in China Hits Wall Street."
"U.S. Will Join Talks With Iran And Syria."
"Millions In U.S. Infected With HPV."
"New Light Shed on CIA's 'Black Site' Prisons."
"Bombing Near Cheney Displays Boldness of Resurgent Taliban."
"Blacks Shift To Obama, Poll Finds."
"With Woods's Backing, PGA Tour to Return to Area."

Washington Times:

"US, N. Korea To Normalize Ties."
"Doubts Trigger 416-Point Dow Dive."
"Tiger Brings Tourney To DC."
"Lost Of Stings, No Pain."

DOJ_NMG_0137567

"New Lawmakers Seek War Debate."
"US To Attend talks With Iraq, Neighbors."
"Maoris Seek To limit Number Of Migrants Form Britain."

Detroit Free Press:
"Chrysler Offers $100,000."
"TV's Woodruff Is back: Mich. Family Is Thrilled."
"'These Were babies Not Drug-Runners, Families Say."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Fierce Debate Over Payday Loans."
"Taliban's Message To Cheney."
"Market Plunge To Deepen?"
"Perdue Appointee's Firm Fined For Spill."
"In Iraq, The Sounds Of Beauty Being Made."

Houston Chronicle:
"Dow falls 416 Points On China Syndrome."
"Local Firm Accused In Steroid Scheme."
"An American Dream Collapsed."
"Study: More Than 1 In 4 Women Has HPV."
"Legislators Move Swiftly To review, Block TXU Sale."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Stock Market Drop; Stock Market-Analysis; Cheney Suicide Bomber Target; US Talks-Iran & Syria; Campaign '08; HPV Virus-Study; Shuttle Launch-Delay; Toyota Opens New Plants; Bob Woodruff's Recovery; VA Screens-Brain Injuries; Bob Woodruff Interview.
CBS: Stock Market Drops; Stock Market Analysis; Gas Prices; Iraq Diplomacy; Cheney-Afghanistan Attack; Civil Rights-Cold Cases; IL Bombing Suspect; Heart Attack Treatment; HPV Infections; Homework Bans; Iraq Boy-US Surgery.
NBC: Stock Market Drop; Stock Market-Analysis; Cheney Suicide Bomber's Target; Sectarian Violence; US Talks-Iran & Syria; HPV Virus Study; Airvac Missions; Civil Rights-Cold Cases; JetBlue Flight Delay; Bush Invites-Miami Heat; YouTube Generation.
ABC: Asian Stock Markets; Wall Street; Duke Lacrosse Rape Case; HUD Homelessness Study; Los Angeles Man Claims British Singer Ran Over His Foot; Anna Nicole Smith's Mother Reportedly Allowed To Spend Time With Granddaughter.
CBS: Wall Street; Asian Stock Markets; London Stock Exchange; Chrysler Buyout Offers; Rice-Iraq Summit With Iran And Syria; Iraq-Car Bombing; Libby Trial; CO-Baby Reportedly Traded For Car.
NPR: Wall Street; Asian Stock Markets; Rice-Iraq Summit With Iran And Syria; Congressional Testimony From Intelligence Officials-Iranians Training Iraqi Extremists; Cheney-Attack On Army Base In Afghanistan; Cheney, Karzai Meeting; UN Committee-India's Caste-Based System.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.
White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Meets with Military Service Organizations, Roosevelt Room.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

LAURA BUSH — Views the Red Dress Collection and participates in a roundtable on heart health, Reagan Presidential Library, Simi Valley, Calif.; participates in a National Park Service Event, Balboa Magnet School, Northridge, Calif.

US Senate: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 9:30 a.m. FLOOR SCHEDULE _ the Senate convenes and proceed to a period of morning business. Following morning business, the Senate will begin consideration of S.4, the 9/11 Commissions Recommendations bill.

9:30 a.m. JOINT ECONOMIC _ Full Committee. Hearing on wage and income instability. CBO Director Peter Orszag; Lael Brainard, The Brookings Institution; Lily Batchelder, New York University School of Law; Bradley R. Schiller, American University. Location: Room 562, Dirksen.

10 a.m. COMMERCE, SCIENCE AND TRANSPORTATION _ Consumer Affairs, Insurance and Automotive Safety Subcommittee. Hearing on vehicle safety for children. Location: Room 253, Russell.

10 a.m. JUDICIARY _ full Committee. Hearing on immigration reform. Commerce Secretary Gutierrez, Homeland Security Secretary Chertoff. Location: Room 216, Hart.

10 a.m. SMALL BUSINESS AND ENTREPRENEURSHIP _ Full Committee. Hearing on the FY08 budget request for the SBA. Location: Room 428A, Russell.

10:30 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Transportation, HUD and Related Agencies Subcommittee. Hearing on the FY08 Amtrak budget. Alexander Kummant, president and CEO, Amtrak; FRA Administrator Joseph H. Boardman; David Tornquist, Office of the Inspector General, Transportation Department; Robert Serlin, president, Rail Infrastructure

DOJ_NMG_0137568

Management; Edward Wytkind, president, Transportation Trades Department, AFL-CIO. Location: Room 138, Dirksen.

10:30 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Defense Subcommittee. Hearing on the FY08 budget for the Defense Department. Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon England. Location: Room 106, Dirksen.

10:30 a.m. BANKING, HOUSING AND URBAN AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Hearing on the terrorism risk insurance program. Location: Room 538, Dirksen.

10:30 a.m. SPECIAL AGING _ Full Committee. Hearing on the impact of the aging workforce. Comptroller General David Walker; Donald Kohn, vice chairman, Board of Governors, Federal Reserve System; Marcie Pitt-Catsouphes, director, Center on Aging and Work/Workplace Flexibility; Javon Bea, president and CEO, Mercy Health System; Preston Pulliams, Portland Community College. Location: Room 628, Dirksen.

2 p.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Labor, HHS, Education and Related Agencies Subcommittee. Hearing on efforts to improve mine safety. Assistant Labor Secretary Richard Stickler; John Howard, director, National Institute of Occupational Safety and Health; J. Davitt McAteer, Wheeling Jesuit University, Shepherdstown, W.Va.; Chris Hamilton, West Virginia Coal Association; Cecil Roberts, international president, United Mine Workers of America; Bruce Watzman, National Mining Association. Location: Room 124, Dirksen.

2:30 p.m. COMMERCE, SCIENCE AND TRANSPORTATION _ Space, Aeronautics and Related Sciences Subcommittee. Hearing on the FY08 budget for NASA. Location: Room 253, Russell.

US House: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 10 a.m. Meets for legislative business. Highlights: H.R. 556 - National Security Foreign Investment Reform and Strengthened Transparency Act of 2007.

9:30 a.m. JOINT ECONOMIC _ Full Committee. Hearing on wage and income instability. CBO Director Peter Orszag; Lael Brainard, The Brookings Institution; Lily Batchelder, New York University School of Law; Bradley R. Schiller, American University. Location: Room 562, Dirksen.

9 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Interior, Enviornment and Related Agencies Subcommittee. Hearing on the FY08 budget for the EPA. Administrator Stephen Johnson. Location: Room B-308, Rayburn.

9:30 a.m. ENERGY AND COMMERCE _ Commerce, Trade and Consumer Protection Subcommittee. Hearing on ``The Lack of Diversity in Leadership Positions in NCAA Collegiate Sports." Rev. Jesse Jackson; Myles Brand, President, NCAA; Floyd Keith, Executive Director, Black Coaches Association; Nolan Richardson, former head basketball coach, University of Arkansas; Richard Lapchick, Sports Management; Tim Weiser, Athletic Director, Kansas State University; Fitz Hill, President, Arkansas Bible College, former Head Coach, San Jose State football. Location: Room 2322, Rayburn.

10 a.m. AGRICULTURE _ Horticulture and Organic Agriculture Subcommittee. Hearing on proposals for the farm bill with respect to specialty crops and organic agriculture. Location: Room 1302, Longworth.

10 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Commerce, Justice and Science Subcommittee. Hearing on the FY08 budget for the National Science Board. Location: Room 2359, Rayburn.

10 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Financial Services and General Government Subcommittee. Hearing on consuymer issues. FTC Chair Deborah Platt Majoras; Nancy Nord, acting chairwoman, Consumer Product Safety Commission; Janell Mayo Duncan, Consumers Union; Rachel Weintraub, Consumer Federation of America; Ari Schwartz, Center for Democracy and Technology. Location: Room 2220, Rayburn.

10 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Energy and Water Development and Related Agencies Subcommittee. Hearing on the 10-year energy research and development outlook. EIA Administrator Guy Caruso; Jim Wells, GAO; Daniel M. Kammen, UC Berkeley; David Hawkins, Natural Resources Defense Council; Ernest J. Moniz, Massachusetts Institute of Technology; David Nemtzow, energy consultant; John DeCicco, Automotive Strategies at Environmental Defense; others. Location: Room 2362B, Rayburn.

10 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Transportation, HUD, and Related AGencies Subcommittee. Hearing on transportation and housing trends over the last 10 years. Tom Lomax, Texas Transportation Institute; Bruce Katz, Brookings Institution; Margery Austin Turner, Urban Institute. Location: Room 2358, Rayburn.

10 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Labor, HHS, Education and Related Agencies Subcommittee. Hearings on the Health Resources Administration Budget. Administrator Elizabeth Duke. Location: Room 2212, Rayburn.

10 a.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Full Committee. Hearing on the FY08 Air Force Budget. Secretary Michael Wynne; Chief of Staff Gen. T. Michael Moseley. Location: Room 2118, Rayburn.

DOJ_NMG_0137569

10 a.m. BUDGET _ Full Committee. Hearing on long-term fiscal challenges and the economy. Federal Reserve Board Chairman Ben Bernanke. Location: Room 210, Cannon.

10 a.m. FOREIGN AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Hearing on Iraq. Former UN Amb. Richard Holbrooke, Frederick Kagan, AEI. Location: Room 2172, Rayburn.

10 a.m. HOMELAND SECURITY _ Emergency Communication, Preparedness and Response Subcommittee and th4e Management, Investigation and Oversight Subcommittee. Joint hearing on reforming FEMA. Location: Room 311, Cannon.

10 a.m. NATURAL RESOURCES _ Full Committee. Oversight hearing on the ``Evolving West." Montana Gov. Brian Schweitzer; Russell Vaagen, Vice President, Vaagen Brothers Lumber Company; Clifford Lyle Marshall, Chairman, Hoopa Valley Tribe; Luther Probst, Executive Director, The Sonoran Institute; former Rep. Pat Williams, Senior Fellow, O'Connor Center for the Rocky Mountain West; Matthew Box, Vice Chairman, Southern Ute Tribe; Bob Lee, University of Washington. Location: Room 1324, Longworth.

10 a.m. OVERSIGHT AND GOVERNMENT REFORM _ Full Committee. Business meeting followed immediately by a hearing on reforming the presidential library funding disclosure process. Location: Room 2154, Rayburn.

10 a.m. SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY _ Full Committee. Markup of pending legislation. Location: Room 2318, Rayburn.

10 a.m. SMALL BUSINESS _ Full Committee. Markup of the views and estimates for FY08. Location: Room 2360, Rayburn.

10 a.m. VETERANS AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Meetingon views and estimates report. Location: Room 334, Cannon.

10 a.m. WAYS AND MEANS _ Full Committee. Meeting on views and estimates report to the Budget Committee. Location: Room 1100, Rayburn.

10:15 a.m. JUDICIARY _ Full Committee. Markup of pending business. Location: Room 2141, Rayburn.

10:30 a.m. EDUCATION AND LABOR _ Early Childhood, Elementary and Secondary Education Subcommittee. Hearing on improving Head Start. Ross A. Thompson, University of California at Davis; Mac McKeever, Out-County Head Start, Flint, Mich.; Barbara Haxton, Ohio Head Start Association; Pearlie Elloie, Youth and Families Total Community Action, Inc., New Orleans; Ellen Frede, National Institute for Early Education Research, New Brunswick, N.J. Location: Room 2175, Rayburn.

10:30 a.m. WAYS AND MEANS _ Full Committee. Hearing on energy and tax policy. Ronald Prinn, MIT; Stephen Schneider, Stanford University; Eileen Claussen, Pew Center on Global Climate Change; W. David Montgomery, CRA International. Location: Room 1100, Longworth.

12 p.m. OVERSIGHT AND GOVERNMENT REFORM _ Government Management, Organization and Procurement Subcommittee. Hearing on federal monitoring and treatment of residents and responders following 9/11. Location: Room 2247, Rayburn.

1:30 p.m. FOREIGN AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Hearing on North Korea. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill. Location: Room 2172, Rayburn.

2 p.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Commerce, Justice and Science Subcommittee. Hearing on science funding in the FY08 budget. Norman Augustine, retired CEO, Lockheed Martin Corp.; Alan Lesher, CEO, American Association for the Advancement of Science. Location: Room 2359, Rayburn.

2 p.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Full committee. Hearing on HR 1102, Total Force Educational Assistance Enhancement and Integration Act of 2007. Keith Wilson, director, Benefits, Department of Veterans Affairs; Michael L. Dominguez - principal deputy under secretary of Defense for personnel and readiness; Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness David S.C. Chu. Location: Room 2118, Rayburn.

2 p.m. FINANCIAL SERVICES _ Oversight and Investigations Subcommittee. Hearing on Hurricane Katrina insurance issues. Location: Room 2128, Rayburn.

Other: AMERICAN INDIANS _ The National Congress of American Indians holds its 110th Congress Executive Council ``Tribal Nations Legislative Summit." Highlights: 9:10 a.m. Sen. Kent Conrad. 9:30 a.m. Rep. Dale Kildee. 11 a.m. Rep. Rick Renzi. Location: Wyndham Hotel, 1400 M St. NW.

HOMELAND SECURITY _ AFCEA hosts its 6th annual Homeland Security Conference, ``Intelligence and Information-Fusion Beyond Sharing." Highlights: 8 a.m. Intelligence Forum with VADM Herb Browne, USN (Ret.), President and CEO, AFCEA International; Charles Allen, Assistant Secretary for Intelligence & Analysis/Chief Intelligence Officer, Department of Homeland Security; and Dale Meyerrose, Associate Director of National Intelligence & Chief Information Officer, Office of the Director of National Intelligence. 3:30 p.m. Keynote Address by Scott Charbo, Chief Information Officer Department of Homeland Security.

DOJ_NMG_0137570

MISSILE DEFENSE _ 9 a.m. - 1 p.m. The American Foreign Policy Council holds its 5th annual Conference on Missile Defense. Highlights: 9:15 a.m. Keynote address - former DHS Secretary Tom Ridge. 9:45 a.m. Session on proliferation and missile defense, with Peter Brookes of Heritage Foundation, Ilan Berman of the AFPC, and Stephen Yatres of AFPC. Location: Capitol Hill Club, 300 1st St. SE.

JOHANNS _ 8 a.m. Agriculture Secretary Johanns speaks to the National Potato Council's annual meeting. Location: L'Enfant Plaza Hotel, 480 L'Enfant Plaza, SW.

LAVIN-TRADE _ 9 a.m. The Washington International Trade Association hosts A breakfast discussion with Undersecretary of Commerce for International Trade Franklin Lavin, who will discuss ``Record Imports, Record Exports: Analyzing Trends in US International Trade." Location: Horizon Ballroom, Ronald Reagan Building and International Trade Center (Ground Level), 1300 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM _ 9:30 a.m. The American Humanist Association holds a rally in support of religious liberty and in opposition to the Office of the Faith-Based Initiatives in Hein v. Freedom From Religion Foundation pending in the Supreme Court. Location: Steps of the Supreme Court.

ILLEGAL IMMIGRATION _ 9:30 a.m. - 11 a.m. Judicial Watch hosts a panel discussion, ``Local Governments and Illegal Immigration." Participants: Mayor Louis Barletta, Hazleton, Pa.; Starletta Hairston, Former Council Member, Beaufort County, S.C.; Delegate Jackson H. Miller, District 50, Prince William County, Va.; and Tom Fitton, President, Judicial Watch. Location: National Press Club, First Amendment Lounge.

2008 ELECTION _ 9:30 a.m. - 12:30 p.m. The Brooking Institution hosts an event, ``Opportunity 08: Independent Ideas for Our Next President," featuring opening remarks from Brookings President Strobe Talbott followed by three panels focused on a variety of domestic and foreign policy issues that will influence the 2008 campaign, including energy security, Iraq, trade policy and immigration. Highlights: Panel One: Why Issues Matter? Moderator: George Stephanopoulos, ABC News Chief Washington Correspondent; Host of ``This Week. Panelists: Thomas Donilon, Opportunity 08 Advisory Council Chair; and Kenneth Duberstein, Opportunity 08 Advisory Council Chair. Panel Two: Foreign Policy Solutions. Moderator: Torie Clarke, Former Assistant Secretary of Defense for Public Affairs, ABC News Consultant. Panelists: Amy Walter, Senior Editor and Political Analyst, The Cook Political Report; Martin Indyk, Director, Saban Center for Middle East Policy; Jeffrey A. Bader, Director, John L. Thornton China Center; and Carlos Pascual, Vice President and Director, Foreign Policy Studies. Panel Three: Domestic Policy Solutions. Moderator: Mark McClellan, Visiting Senior Fellow, AEI-Brookings Joint Center for Regulatory Studies; Panelists: Lael Brainard, Vice President and Director, Global Economy and Development Program; Ron Haskins, Co-director, Center on Children and Families; and David Sandalow, Energy and Environment Scholar. Location: Brookings Institution, Falk Auditorium, 1775 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

HOUSE REPUBLICANS _ 10 a.m. House Republican leadership holds a media availability following the 9 a.m. meeting of the House Republican Conference. Location: RNC lobby, 310 1st St. SE.

REFINERIES-BODMAN _ 10 a.m. Energy Secretary Bodman holds a news conference to announce selection of biorefinery projects, as part of the administration's goal of reducing gasoline consumption by 20 percent in 10 years. Location: Energy Department.

EDUCATIONAL EFFECTIVENESS _ 10 a.m. - 11:30 a.m. The Center for American Progress and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce hosts a panel and release of ``Leaders and Laggards: A State-by-State Report Card on Educational Effectiveness." Speakers: Thomas J. Donohue, President and CEO, U.S. Chamber of Commerce; John D. Podesta, President and Chief Executive Officer, Center for American Progress; Panelists: Ulrich Boser, Freelance Writer and Contributing Editor at US News and World Report; Cynthia G. Brown, Director of Education Policy, Center for American Progress; and Frederick M. Hess, Resident Scholar and Director of Education Policy Studies, American Enterprise Institute. Moderator: Arthur J. Rothkopf, Senior Vice-President and Counselor to the President, U.S. Chamber of Commerce. Location: U.S. Chamber of Commerce, Hall of Flags, 1615 H St. NW.

EMPLOYEE FREE CHOICE _ 11 a.m. Congressional leadership, workers hold a news conference to urge Congress to pass the Employee Free Choice Act. Location: Room 2261, Rayburn.

ENERGY _ 11 a.m. A coalition of agricultural, energy, environmental, business and labor groups holds a news conference to announce a plan to have 25 percent of the nation's energy supply come from renewable sources by 2025. Location: Room HC-6, Capitol.

DOJ_NMG_0137571

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM _ 11 a.m. The Family Research Council holds a lecture on religious freedom, with William Saunders. Location: 801 G St. NW.

ENDANGERED SPECIES _ 11:15 a.m. Sens. Mike Crapo, Blanche Lincoln, Max Baucus and Charles Grassley hold a news conference on bipartisan legislation to provide financial incentives for conservation efforts, the Endangered Species Recovery Act of 2007. Location: Room 215, Dirksen.

HOMELAND SECURITY _ 11:30 a.m. Science and Technologys Command, Control and Interoperability Director Dr. David Boyd will deliver a presentation to the Federal Communications Bar Associations Homeland Security and Emergency Communications Committee. Location: Akin, Gump, Strauss, Hauer and Feld, 1333 New Hampshire Ave. NW.

CLEAN AIR _ 12 p.m. The Clean Air Task Force holds a briefing to release a report, ``No Escape from Diesel Exhaust: How to Reduce Commuter Exposure." Location: National Press Club.

CURRENCY RATES _ 12 p.m. Reps. Tim Ryan and Duncan Hunter hold a news conference on reintroduction of the Fair Currency Act to limit exchange rate manipulation. Location: Cannon Terrace.

MIDEAST _ 12 p.m. The Middle East Institute and the Foundation for Middle East Peace hold a discussion with Haggai Alon, senior adviser to Israeli Defense Minister Amir Peretz, discussing economic polikcy for Israel and the Palestinian territories. Location: 1779 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

EMPLOYEE CHOICE _ 12:45 p.m. Rep. Eric Cantor, others, holds a news conference on the Employee Free Choice Act. Location: House Radio-TV Gallery.

EDUCATION _ 1 p.m. The Heritage Foundation holds a discussion on educational freedom in the wake of the No Child Left Behind law, with Rep. Peter Hoekstra, Colorado State Board of Education Vice Chairman Bob Schaffer, others. Location: Lehrman Auditorium, Heritage Foundation, 214 Massachusetts Ave. NE.

HOMELESSNESS _ 1 p.m. HUD holds a news conference with Deputy Secretary Roy Bernardi, others, on the scope and nature of homelessness in America. Location: HUD, 451 7th St. SW.

NARCOTICS REPORT _ 1 p.m. The International Narcotics Control Board releases its annual report. Location: UN Foundation, 1800 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

CLIMATE CHANGE _ 2 p.m. The Scientific Expert Group on Climate Change and Sustainable Development, convened by the UN Foundation and Sigma XI, releases its final report with a roadmap for preventing unmanageable climate change. Location: Room 366, Dirksen.

GAYS-MILITARY _ 2 p.m. Rep. Marty Meehan, D-Mass., holds a news conference to re-introduce The Military Readiness Enhancement Act, a congressional bill to repeal the military's ``Don't Ask, Don't Tell" ban on lesbian, gay and bisexual military personnel. Meehan will be joined by C. Dixon Osburn, executive director of Servicemembers Legal Defense Network; BG Evelyn ``Pat" Foote, USA (Ret.), a member of the Network's honorary board; and former Marine Sergeant Brian Fricke, an openly gay veteran of the war in Iraq. Location: Room 2216, Rayburn House Office Building.

US-VISIT _ 2 p.m. US-Visit Acting Director Robert Mocny participates in a discussion at the Armed Forces Communications and Electric Association Homeland Security Conference. Location: Reagan Trade Building.

IRAQ STRATEGY _ 2 p.m. - 4 p.m. CDI's Straus Military Reform Project sponsors a colloquium on the future of U.S. strategy in Iraq. Panelists: Dr. Ted Galen Carpenter, vice president for defense and foreign policy studies at the Cato Institute; Helle Dale, deputy director for the Davis Institute for International Studies and director of the Douglas and Sarah Allison Center for Foreign Policy Studies at the Heritage Foundation; Col. Douglas A. Macgregor, U.S. Army (ret.), author of three books on military affairs and a frequent commentator on radio and television; Frank Gaffney, president of the Center for Security Policy and a syndicated columnist, was assistant secretary of defense for international security policy under President Reagan; and Frank Anderson, who served 27 years at the CIA, in many senior posts including chief of the Near East Division. Location: National Press Club, Holeman Lounge.

ROHRABACHER _ 2:30 p.m. Rep. Dana Rohrabacher holds a news conference to discuss new developments in the border patrol agents case. Location: House Radio-TV Gallery.

BORDER _ 3:30 p.m. Rep. Virgil Goode hosts a screening of a new documentary, BORDER," on the U.S.-Mexican border situation. Location: Room 122, Cannon.

DOJ_NMG_0137572

TECHNOLOGY-FREE MARKET _ 4 p.m. CPAC holds a briefing on technology, intellectual property and competitive markets, with David Williams of Citizens Against Government Waste, Ray Keating of the Small Business and Entrepreneurship Council, and Solveig Singleton of the Progress and Freedom Foundation. Location: Capitol Hill Club.

Copyright 2007 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:
Navy Brig Officials Testify Padilla Not Physically Abused 3
Georgia Imam Sentenced To Seven Years For Hamas Funding Scheme 3
Group Wants Information On 16 Allegedly Detained In CIA Prisons 4
Canada Allows Two Anti-Terror Laws To Lapse 4

Patriot Act:
EFF Sues DOJ For Release Of FISA Court Rules On NSA Program 4

Homeland Response:
Bush Will Veto 9/11 Bill If It Contains Labor Provisions..... 5
DHS Data-Mining Program Said To Have Violated Privacy Laws In Testing Phase 5
WPost Questions Technological Feasibility Of Nuclear Scanning Around Manhattan 5
New Orleans Population Holding Steady As New City Emerges .. 6

War News:
Democrats Increasingly Divided On Iraq 6
DNI McConnell Says Term "Civil War" Accurately Describes Elements Of Iraqi Conflict 8
Officials Give Mixed Review Of Iraq Security Plan So Far 8
In Policy Shift, Rice Says US Will Attend Regional Summit On Iraq 9
Taliban Says Cheney Was Target Of Suicide Attack 10
DNI McConnell Warns Al Qaeda Rebuilding In Pakistan 11

DOJ:
Critics See Politics Behind US Attorney Dismissals 12
DOJ Pilots Federated ID Management System..... 12

Corporate Scandals:
Former McAfee Counsel Charged In Options Probe..... 13
Mutual Benefits Managers Plead Guilty To Securities Fraud 13
California Broker Pleads Guilty To Securities Fraud 14
US To Produce Nacchio Witness List On Thursday..... 14
Former FDA Commissioner Crawford Given Probation, Fined ... 14

Criminal Law:
House Leaders Reach Agreement On Cunningham Probe Subpoenas..... 14
Gonzales Asked To Probe Smithsonian Official's Conduct..... 15
Colorado Deputy Sheriff Charged With Child Pornography 15
Iowa Man Given More Jail Time For Child Pornography..... 15
Florida Couple Sentenced To Prison For Spying For Cuba 16
Florida Police Chief Defends Decision To Tell Officials About FBI Probe 16
Virginia Sheriff's Deputy Pleads Guilty In Corruption Probe..... 16
6th Circuit Overturns Georgia Corruption Conviction 16
Washington Woman Admits To Teaching Children To Fake Retardation For Benefits 16
Indiana Men Sentenced To Prison For Mortgage Fraud 17
Massachusetts State Trooper Sentenced To Prison For Online Solicitation 17
California Transplant Doctor Under Probe In Organ Donor's Death 17
Judge Asked To Delay Sentencing For Louisiana Hospital Owner 17
Convicted Ney Aide Made Appearance At Media Party 17

Civil Law:
High Court Considers Case On Bush's Faith-Based Initiative..... 18
Closing Arguments Made At FBI Wrongful Imprisonment Trial... 18
Federal Procurement Fraud Task Force Cracks Down On Contractors 19
Attorney Claims FBI Knew Men Convicted Of Murder Were Innocent 19

Civil Rights:
FBI Launches Civil Rights Murder Probes, As Mississippi Closes Till Case 19
Grand Jury Will Not Issue Indictment In 1955 Till Slaying..... 21
DOJ Drops Probe Of Virginia Church Zoning Dispute..... 22
Rep. Rohrabacher To Present New Evidence In Shooting Involving Former Border Patrol Agents 22
Fayetteville, NC, To Draw New Voting Maps..... 22
Meehan To Reintroduce Bill Lifting Ban On Gays In The Military 23
Sex Abuse Scandal At Texas Juvenile Schools Sparks Uproar.. 23

Antitrust:
House To Hold Hearing On Proposed XM-Sirius Merger..... 23
TXU Profit Up 33 Percent Last Quarter 25
6th Circuit Panel Sides With Cigarette Maker In Pricing Dispute 25
WMware Blasts Microsoft Over Customer Choice Restrictions .. 26

One Defendant In Midwest Hospital Antitrust Suit Reaches Settlement ... 26
FTC Clears Onex Bid For Kodak's X-Ray Unit ... 26
Judge Puts Qualcomm Patent Dispute With Nokia On Hold ... 26

Environment:

Los Alamos Operator Cited For Safety Violations ... 27
Scientists Call For Action To Avoid Climate "Tipping Point." ... 27

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Grassley Asks Whether FBI Whistleblower's Supervisors Face Punishment ... 28
Pharmacists, Athletes, Celebrities Accused In Investigation Of Fraudulent Internet Drug Sales ... 28
Texas Woman Pleads Guilty To Money Laundering ... 29
SAMHSA Study Quantifies Rates Of Illegal Drug Use, Drinking ... 30
Poppy Eradication In Afghanistan Said To Be Threatened By Corruption ... 30
Minnesota Explosives Search Turns Up Munitions ... 30
ATF Joins Search For Florida Road-Rage Gun ... 30
ATF Agent Testifies To Discussing Buying Arms From Texas Man ... 30

Immigration:

Five Plead Guilty In Illegal Workers Probe ... 31
Chertoff Takes Push For Immigration Reform To Capitol Hill ... 31
Study Finds Immigrants Not Responsible For Most Crimes ... 32

Tax:

Real-Estate Professionals Chafe At IRS Rules ... 32

Congress-Administration:

Bush To Visit Indiana School To Tout NCLB ... 33
Business Groups Mount Offensive Against Employee Free Choice Act ... 33
Walter Reed Controversy Spurs Bipartisan Call For Tighter Oversight ... 33
Congress Considers Cutting Several High-Profile Pentagon Programs ... 34
Congressional Democrats Eager To Advance Domestic Agenda 34
Lobbying Disclosure Act Does Not Require Firms To Disclose All Revenue ... 34
Kerry Grills Swift Boat Contributor Nominated To Be Ambassador To Belgium ... 34
HUD Releasing "Groundbreaking" Study Of Homeless Population ... 34
Watchdog Urges Ethics Committee To Investigate Doolittle ... 35
Thune Role As Lobbyist May Have Killed Railway Loan ... 35
Study Suggests Breakdowns Common Between Agency Field Staffs, Headquarters ... 35
Bush Hosts NBA Champions ... 35

Other News:

Stock Market Tumble Sparks Fears About US Economy ... 35
Gasoline Prices Reach Five-Month High ... 37
Expansion Of Federal Ethics Panels Raises Criticism From Researchers ... 37
Panel Criticizes Breakthrough Study Of Adult Stem Cells ... 38
Campaign Document Says Romney Vulnerable To "Flip-Flop" Charge ... 38
Edwards Says Repeated Apologies For Iraq Vote Won't Turn Off Voters ... 38
Giuliani, Clinton Lead Primary Fields In ABC/Washington Post Poll ... 38
Clinton Sees Pardon Controversy Reemerge As Issue ... 39
Leading 2008 Candidates Push States To Join February 5 Primary ... 39
Conservative Group Criticizes Gore's Electricity Consumption ... 40
Gingrich Says GOP Needs To Avoid Centrism, Hillary Bashing ... 41
Thompson To Hold First DC Fundraiser ... 41
Some Republicans Hope Huckabee Will Run For Senate ... 41
NRSC Donates $20,000 Contribution From Man Charged With Aiding Terrorists ... 41
Special Election For Norwood Seat Set For June 19 ... 42
Rothenberg Sees No "Wave" In House Races For 2008 ... 42
Schwarzenegger Unfazed By Unflattering Picture ... 42
Top Democrats Seek Governors' Support For Corporate Disclosure Legislation ... 42
Conservatives Unhappy With Recent Moves By Perry ... 42
O'Malley Among Supporters Of Maryland Assault Weapons Ban 42
States' Unfunded Pension Liabilities Continue To Skyrocket ... 42
States' Initiatives Seen As Likely To Increase Total Healthcare Spending ... 43
"Congestion Pricing" Considered Unlikely To Alleviate Traffic Concerns ... 43
Trial Lawyers Accused Of Manipulating Alien Tort Statute ... 43
WSJournal Claims CFIUS Reviews Of Foreign Investment Are "Too Stringent." ... 43
US, Pyongyang To Take First Steps Towards Normalizing Relations ... 43
DNI McConnell Says Iran Training Shiite Militias In Lebanon ... 44
Russia Says Hamas Will End Attacks Against Israel ... 45
ICC Charges Former Sudanese Official With War Crimes ... 45
US Says Cuba Stepping Up Repression ... 45
Ban Institutes Personnel Policy Changes At UN ... 45
British Tories Urged To Adopt More "Traditional" Foreign Policy 46
WPost Denounces Egypt's Crackdown On "Secular Democrats." 46

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages ... 46

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington ... 47

DOJ_NMG_0137575

TERRORISM NEWS:

Navy Brig Officials Testify Padilla Not Physically Abused. The AP (2/28, Anderson) reports, "The exterior window in Jose Padilla's 80-square-foot cell in a Navy brig was painted over. At times, he had to sleep on a steel bunk with no mattress. He went months without a clock and was sometimes seen weeping in his cell. But officials at the brig in Charleston, S.C., testified Tuesday that the alleged al-Qaida operative was not physically abused during his 3 1/2 years in military custody, nor did he display serious symptoms of mental problems." The AP adds, "U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke barred Padilla's lawyers from delving into the details of this testimony unless it was directly related to a competency report prepared by a Bureau of Prisons psychologist. Cooke scheduled closing arguments on the competency issue for Wednesday. It was not clear when she would rule."

USA Today (2/28, 8A, Parker, 2.27M) notes brig technical director Sandy Seymour and brig psychologist Craig Noble "appeared as reluctant star witnesses in a mental competency hearing that became a fierce tug-of-war between prosecutors and defense attorneys over how much about Padilla's detention will be revealed." USA adds that Seymour "provided a glimpse into Padilla's paranoia — a condition described in defense court papers. Padilla feared guards had pumped noxious gas into his cell. He also thought he had been injected with truth serum before meeting with his interrogators. Seymour said that the brig is near a pulp mill, which spews foul odors, and that Padilla received a flu shot. He did not say whether anyone at the brig ever attempted to disabuse Padilla of his misimpressions."

Under the headline "Aspects Of Padilla's Treatment Confirmed," the Los Angeles Times (2/28, Williams, 850K) notes Padilla's "defense attorneys contend that Padilla's sensory deprivation and treatment were tantamount to torture." The Times adds that Seymour "appeared reluctant to disclose details of the 'special care' ordered by the federal government for Padilla. Prolonged silences by Seymour followed each of…Caruso's questions, as the witness waited for prosecutor…Pell to object, which she did at least a dozen times. When Cooke said he should answer, Seymour said he had 'no specific recollection,' asked to hear the question again, or gave a cryptic response."

The New York Times (2/28, Sontag, 1.16M) reports that yesterday's "scattershot revelations…did not add up to a comprehensive portrait of Mr. Padilla's time in the brig. But they were nonetheless significant, marking the first time Mr. Padilla's military jailers were forced to speak publicly about the conditions of his secretive confinement without charges." Meanwhile, the Washington Post (2/28, Whoriskey, 690K) reports on the officials' testimony, under the headline "Padilla Was Deprived, Not Abused, Court Told."

Georgia Imam Sentenced To Seven Years For Hamas Funding Scheme. The Rome (GA) News-Tribune (2/28, Gellatly) reports, "A Floyd County man who led interfaith relations after 9/11 and educated students on the virtues of many religions was sentenced Tuesday for supporting a foreign terrorist group." Mohamed Shorbagi "was sentenced…to serve seven years and eight months in prison for funneling money to the militant group Hamas during a four-year period." The News-Tribune notes, "The charges stem from donations Shorbagi made to the Holy Land Foundation for Relief and Development, an Islamic charity shut down by federal authorities in 2001. A former member of the Rome-Floyd International Committee and an Imam of a Muslim congregation, he was presented by the defense as an intelligent man much respected by his community."

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (2/28, Torpy, 379K) notes Shorbagi "could have been sentenced to 15 years but received a lighter sentence for helping federal authorities in another prosecution. … Shorbagi, who has been in the United States for 22 years, testified in a Chicago trial last year against Mohammed Salah, who was later acquitted of charges of aiding Hamas. Because of his cooperation in the case, Shorbagi is eligible to get a visa to stay in the U.S and enter the witness protection program, according to court papers." WXIA-TV Atlanta (2/27, Rowson) reported on its Web site from a broadcast story, "For the first time in the history of the state of Georgia, a defendant has been sentenced for an international terrorism-related crime. … Unites States Attorney David Nahmias said, 'The people who financially support terrorism are not the people who are personally building bombs or setting off bombs.' Nahmias added, 'But, they're the people who make that kind of activity possible.'"

The Atlanta Business Journal (2/27) also reports on the sentencing, as does the AP (2/28, Yee), in a widely-distributed story.

Prosecutors To Investigate Inaccurate Summaries Of FBI Transcripts. Under the headline "False Quotes Shake Up Terror Trial," the Los Angeles Times (2/28, Krikorian, 850K) reports, "The mystery of how and why a government wiretap summary falsely attributed anti-Jewish slurs to officials of a Muslim charity remained unanswered Tuesday as federal prosecutors pledged to look into the matter. In court papers filed late Monday, the U.S. attorney's office in Dallas said it was trying to determine how the recently declassified summary of a 1996 FBI wiretap of the Holy Land Foundation for Relief and Development included vitriolic language that was not found in a verbatim transcript of a recorded conversation. … Meanwhile, the unexplained discrepancies have brought potential controversy to the government's biggest terrorism funding case to date." However, the Times notes that "government prosecutors said it was 'an overreaction' to extrapolate that all of the government summaries were useless on the basis of discrepancies found in one set of documents."

DOJ_NMG_0137576

Group Wants Information On 16 Allegedly Detained In CIA Prisons. The Financial Times (2/28, Sevastopulo) reports the Bush Administration "was urged on Tuesday to reveal the whereabouts of 16 men who were allegedly detained in secret Central Intelligence Agency prisons." In a letter "to Mr Bush, Human Rights Watch named 16 men it said were held in CIA prisons and another 22 who it said might have been in the secret facilities. The whereabouts of all the individuals concerned was unknown, the group said."

The Washington Post (2/28, A1, Linzer, Tate, 690K) reports in a front page story, "On his last day in CIA custody, Marwan Jabour, an accused al-Qaeda paymaster, was stripped naked, seated in a chair and videotaped by agency officers. Afterward, he was shackled and blindfolded, headphones were put over his ears, and he was given an injection that made him groggy." Jabour's "release from a secret facility in Afghanistan on June 30, 2006, was a surprise" to him, "and came just after the Supreme Court rejected the Bush administration's assertion that the Geneva Conventions do not apply to prisoners like him." Jabour had "spent two years in 'black sites' -- a network of secret internment facilities the CIA operated around the world. His account of life in that system, which he described in three interviews with The Washington Post, offers an inside view of a clandestine world that held far more prisoners than the 14 men President Bush acknowledged and had transferred out of CIA custody in September." Jabour's "experience -- also chronicled by Human Rights Watch, which yesterday issued a report on the fate of former 'black site' detainees -- often does not accord with the portrait the administration has offered of the CIA system, such as the number of people it held and the threat detainees posed."

Congress Urged To Act Against Foreign Prosecutions Of US Agents. In a Washington Post op-ed (2/28, A19), former Justice Department attorneys David B. Rivkin Jr. and Lee A. Casey say, "An Italian court announced this month that it is moving forward with the indictment and trial of 25 CIA agents charged with kidnapping a radical Muslim cleric. These proceedings may well violate international law, but the case serves as a wake-up call to the United States. Overseas opponents of American foreign policy are increasingly turning to judicial proceedings against individual American officials as a means of reformulating or frustrating US aims, and action to arrest this development is needed." The US "must still vigorously resist the prosecution of its indicted agents. If they acted with the knowledge and consent of the Italian government (as The Post's Dana Priest reported in 2005), they are immune from criminal prosecution in that country." Congress should "make it a crime to initiate or maintain a prosecution against American officials if the proceeding itself otherwise violates accepted international legal norms."

Canada Allows Two Anti-Terror Laws To Lapse. The New York Times (2/28, Austen, 1.16M) reports Canada's Parliament "voted Tuesday not to extend two measures that were passed as part of a sweeping package of antiterrorism laws weeks after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on the United States." The measures "will expire Thursday. One allows the police to arrest people suspected of preparing to commit an act of terrorism and hold them for 72 hours without charges, and the other enables courts to compel witnesses to testify at special hearings similar to grand jury proceedings in the United States. Neither has ever been used." The vote "took place just days after the Supreme Court struck down a law allowing the government to detain foreign-born terrorism suspects indefinitely using secret evidence and without charges while their deportations were being considered." The debate "reflected the fractious politics of Canada's Parliament, which is not controlled by any single party, as much as a national reassessment of antiterrorism measures."

PATRIOT ACT:

EFF Sues DOJ For Release Of FISA Court Rules On NSA Program. InformationWeek (2/28, Jones) reports, "The Electronic Frontier Foundation has sued the Department of Justice, demanding the release of records related to court orders authorizing electronic surveillance." IW continues, "The EFF filed a lawsuit Tuesday seeking information on changes to the National Security Agency's surveillance program. The program, which the federal government maintains targets communications involving at least one suspected terrorist, was secret until the New York Times reported on it in December 2005." IW adds, "The government acknowledged that it was conducting surveillance without warrants from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court and argued that presidential powers and recent legislation authorized the practice. After defending against allegations that the practice was illegal, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced last month that the government changed its practices and would seek court approval to monitor communications. … EFF used the Freedom of Information Act in an attempt to obtain records showing the court's approval, but the Department of Justice didn't respond to a written request. EFF is seeking immediate release of orders allowing the government to monitor communications and any rules or guidelines associated with the orders. White House Press Secretary Tony Snow has made public comments that indicate the court issued guidelines or parameters that have allowed the government to continue surveillance with court approval. … EFF refers to those statements in its filing. It's not alone in seeking details about the guidelines. News reporters who have been covering the issue have also pressed to find out the parameters of ongoing surveillance."

DOJ_NMG_0137577

Technology News Daily (2/28) reports, "When press reports forced the White House to acknowledge the program in December of 2005, the administration claimed that the massive program could be conducted without warrants or judicial authorization of any kind. However, in January of this year, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced that the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court (FISC) had authorized collection of some communications and that the surveillance program would now operate under its approval. EFF's suit comes after the Department of Justice failed to respond to a Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) request for records concerning the purported changes in the program. … 'While national security and law enforcement demand a limited amount of secrecy, Americans have the right to know the government's basic guidelines for this kind of invasive electronic surveillance of their personal communications,' said EFF Senior Counsel David Sobel. 'The burden is on the Justice Department to justify its failure to disclose the information we've requested.'" TND adds, "EFF's suit demands the immediate release of the FISC orders regarding the surveillance program and any FISC rules and guidelines associated with such orders."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Bush Will Veto 9/11 Bill If It Contains Labor Provisions. The Washington Times (2/28, Waterman, 88K) reports, "President Bush will veto a proposed bill to implement measures recommended by the September 11 commission if the bill is passed with language granting collective-bargaining rights to airport passenger and baggage screeners employed by the Transportation Security Administration, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff told Republican senators yesterday." Chertoff's comments "at a private luncheon were reported by Sen. Jim DeMint, South Carolina Republican, and confirmed by the Department of Homeland Security and a senior administration official authorized to speak to the press." DHS spokesman Russ Knocke said Chertoff "did make very clear that if the bill goes to the White House with the current provision related to TSA personnel authorities, his recommendation, and that of other senior administration officials, would be to veto it." The Times adds, "A letter sent yesterday to Mr. Bush from 36 Republican senators shows that the votes are there to sustain a veto, according to Republican aides."

The AP (2/28, Kellman) reports, "The White House made its displeasure with the union provision clear before the House passed it as part of its Homeland Security bill. Sen. Susan Collins said Chertoff told her that a statement Thursday would include an explicit veto threat." The AP adds, "Casting the provision as a deal-killer would flex Bush's political muscle with the new, Democratic-led Congress on the old battleground of labor rights. It also could throw an obstacle into talks over how to debate and pass the recommendations of the Sept. 11 Commission."

The Washington Post's "Federal Diary" column (2/28, D4, Barr) reports Scott Stanzel, a White House spokesman, said yesterday, "We vigorously disagree with the provisions of the Senate legislation that would eliminate the flexibility given to TSA to perform its transportation security missions." The TSA "needs the ability to quickly reassign and move screeners to respond to threats, he said." The New York Times (2/28, Lipton, 1.16M) notes Stanzel also said, "Existing authority permits TSA the flexibility to manage and deploy their work force. … We do think that it is important that TSA maintain that flexibility for personnel performing key homeland security roles."

DHS Data-Mining Program Said To Have Violated Privacy Laws In Testing Phase. The Washington Post (2/28, D3, Nakashima, Klein, 690K) reports DHS "is testing a data-mining program that would attempt to spot terrorists by combing vast amounts of information about average Americans, such as flight and hotel reservations." Analysis, Dissemination, Visualization, Insight and Semantic Enhancement, which resembles "a Pentagon program killed by Congress in 2003 over concerns about civil liberties, …could take effect as soon as next year. But researchers testing the system are likely to already have violated privacy laws by reviewing real information, instead of fake data, according to a source familiar with a congressional investigation into the $42.5 million program. … The privacy violation, described in a Government Accountability Office report that is due out soon, was one of three by separate government data mining programs, according to the GAO. 'Undoubtedly there are likely to be more,' GAO Comptroller David M. Walker said in a recent congressional hearing."

WPost Questions Technological Feasibility Of Nuclear Scanning Around Manhattan. The

DOJ_NMG_0137578

Washington Post (2/28, A18, 690K) editorializes that DHS's recently announced plan to scan large numbers of vehicles entering Manhattan "for radioactive materials without bringing life to a standstill" would "do what many scientists had once thought impossible. … Experts today say that the nuclear weapons are heavily shielded, making detection tricky, and that current front-line scanners have difficulty in reliably detecting even those nuclear materials not encased in a bomb. Nevertheless, DHS is pushing forward with a pilot program to test the feasibility of scanning large numbers of cars and trucks entering Manhattan for radioactivity." If the program is "successful, it would require little or no effort from those being inspected, so it wouldn't snarl traffic in the tri-state area. Another point in its favor is that the pilot program is not very expensive, as Homeland Security projects go, and that even if the resulting system is not perfect, it will foster development of newer and better technologies that will make Americans safer." Still, the Post continues that it is "glad Homeland Security is not breaking the bank on its latest experiment. Based on the available information on the inconsistency of nuclear detection technology, it is fair to wonder whether this is the right time to conduct such a large-scale test and whether such a program may be an inefficient use of government resources."

New Orleans Population Holding Steady As New City Emerges. USA Today (2/28, 1A, Konigsmark, 2.27M) reports on its front page that while the decision by celebrities Brad Pitt and Angelina Jolie to buy in New Orleans generated international headlines, "each day, in much smaller ways, other people are coming and buying stakes in a city that still has less than half the population it had before Hurricane Katrina. People continue to move out, some after returning here and becoming overwhelmed by the neighborhoods of empty houses, a crime wave and a general uncertainty about the future. Despite all that, New Orleans is finding a way to hold steady. The population, now at about 191,000, hasn't changed significantly in months. … All around, there are signs that New Orleans is coming back, but not quite as the city it used to be. A US government survey reveals a whiter populace: New Orleans was two-thirds black before Katrina hit in August 2005; today it's 47% black and 42% white. It's also more Hispanic, thanks mostly to an influx of workers coming here for plentiful construction jobs."

WAR NEWS:

Democrats Increasingly Divided On Iraq. Media reports this morning suggest Democratic divisions on Iraq are keeping the caucus from moving forward with a plan to challenge the President's "surge" strategy. The Los Angeles Times (2/28, Levey, Simon, 850K), under the headline "War Bill Divides Democrats," reports this morning, "Democratic lawmakers, who earlier this month nearly unanimously backed resolutions condemning President Bush's plans to boost troop levels in Iraq, are struggling to agree on what to do next in their drive to bring the war to an end." In the Senate, "party leaders who faced dissent in their own caucus have decided to postpone consideration of a binding resolution that would set limits on what US forces could do in the conflict." And in the House, "Democrats are wrestling with even deeper divisions." The Times adds "the apparent deceleration of the legislative drive to end the war is dismaying antiwar activists." McClatchy (2/28, Talev) adds that the "division and confusion over how to proceed could anger voters who put Democrats in control of Congress largely in frustration over the war." But "Democrats are nervous about cutting off money in a way that could undermine soldiers who already are in Iraq - or expose Democrats to Republican charges that they're doing that."

Fox News' Special Report (2/27, Hume) reported, "The Democrats ambitious plans to limit President Bush's war authority and force a change of course in Iraq are faltering amidst party divisions over how quickly and aggressively they should act." Senate Democrats beset by divisions set aside the Iraq debate in favor of a bill to fulfill unmet 9/11 Commission recommendations. They denied the onset of political paralysis. … But Senate Democrats are so divided over whether to deny funds for President Bush's troop surge -- while others want to revoke authorization for the war, and still others don't want to do either – that the party now finds its antiwar efforts visibly hobbled." Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid "couldn't say whether he prefers 'deauthorizing' the war or limiting funds for the troop surge. … Moderate Democrats are already distancing themselves from the newest antiwar strategy -- revoking the 2002 war authorization." Sen. Kent Conrad "opposes the idea." Sens. Ben Nelson and Mark Pryor "lean against it."

The Hill (2/28, Schor) reports, "Senate Democrats reversed course yesterday and vowed to keep the Iraq war out of the ongoing 9/11 Commission bill debate, but the lack of a consensus approach exposed by the new majority's move risks alienating anti-war allies and giving political momentum to Republicans." Democrats "first began eyeing the 9/11 Commission measure as a vehicle for binding checks on…Bush's war strategy during debate on the non-binding resolution billed as their first step in repudiating the White House." Yet "Democrats held off on their second step amid GOP insistence on a symbolic vote on troop funding and calls for a clean bill from Sen. Joe Lieberman (D-Conn.), who helps maintain their narrow hold on the Senate."

The Washington Post (2/28, A4, Weisman, Murray, 690K) reports "House Democratic leaders offered a full-throated defense Tuesday night of their plans to link Iraq war spending with rigorous standards for resting, training and equipping combat troops, saying that they would hold President Bush accountable for failing to meet those readiness tests." But "after a fractious meeting of the House Democratic caucus, Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., said Democratic members still have not united around the proposal." Roll Call (2/28, Yachnin, Stanton) reports "aides said the House Democratic Caucus may hold a second meeting this week to further discuss the proposed spending bill.

DOJ_NMG_0137579

The AP (2/28, Flaherty) reports, "House Democratic leaders are backing away from a plan to scale back US involvement in the Iraq war by using Congress' most powerful tool-–– withholding money in the budget." Instead, "party officials said Tuesday, leaders are weighing a proposal that would attempt to embarrass Bush into abandoning his war strategy. Under a plan discussed behind closed doors, Democrats probably would fund President Bush's entire $93.4 billion request for war spending this year but require that any troops sent into battle that don't meet certain standards receive a presidential waiver and that Congress be notified of the shortcoming." The compromise "is an attempt to please members who want to end the war immediately by cutting funding and others who do not want to appear as though Democrats are turning their back on troops."

The New York Times (2/28, Zeleny, Toner, 1.16M) describes the Democratic Congress as "divided over strategy, stymied by ideological divisions, but still hoping to escalate pressure on the White House to change the course of the war." The Washington Times (2/28, Bellantoni, 88K), meanwhile, reports Congressional Democrats, " especially new members -- are clamoring for action on the Iraq war, citing polls showing that American voters want to change course, but leaders have delayed significant action.

Local TV last night ran a number of stories on Democratic divisions. For example, WMDT-TV Salisbury, MD (2/27, 11:08 pm) said Democrats "nearly all across the board are sure they want to bring the troops home, but they are not sure how. Democrats on Capitol Hill are divided over how quickly and aggressively they should act to force a change of course on the Iraq war."

WLOS-TV Greenville, SC (2/27, 11:08 pm) reported, "At a Senate appropriations committee hearing, key Administration officials sought $100 billion in emergency funds for the war in Iraq and Afghanistan. … Democrats maintain a critical stance on the war. Still, some stopped short of supporting a proposal to use Congress' budget power to put limits on the President's troop surge." KTVU-TV in San Francisco (2/27, 10:23 pm), KVII-TV Amarillo (10/27, 10:17 pm), and WJSU-TV Birmingham (2/27, 10:12 pm), among other stations in various other parts of the country, aired similar reports.

Senate Democratic Leaders Under Fire Inside Their Caucus. The Politico (2/28, Bresnahan) reports "Senate Democrats are accusing their leaders of mismanaging the twin efforts to block…Bush's troop surge in Iraq and force a quicker end to the war." Reid "is facing criticism from both flanks of his party." Sen. Ben Nelson, "a conservative Democrat from Nebraska, said the new Democratic strategy could unfairly hamstring the president and military commanders." Also, Sen. Russ Feingold, "a liberal Democrat from Wisconsin, criticized the latest Democratic strategy as too timid and toothless in stopping the war. Approving a new authorization resolution would be the same 'as voting for a new Iraq war and that I am not going to do.'" Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph R. Biden Jr., who is a "seeking the presidency, and Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin (D-Mich.) wrote the new plan. Senate insiders faulted Biden and, to a lesser extent, Levin, for telegraphing their plans to Republicans prematurely -- before most members were fully briefed on it."

Pelosi Blasts Cheney For Comments On Murtha Plan. In an interview with CNN's Larry King Live (2/28), House Speaker Nancy Pelosi responded to recent criticism from Vice President Cheney, who said, "If we were to do what speaker Pelosi and Congressman Murtha are suggesting, all it would do is validate the Al Qaeda strategy." Pelosi said, "What the Vice President said what beneath the dignity of his office and beneath the sacrifice of our men and women in uniform, to equate our position with the position of the Al Qaeda. The Vice President is in a place that is out of touch with the American people, out of touch with what the former generals are saying, and out of touch with even the bipartisan majority in the Congress of the United States."

Editor Says He, Not Murtha, Coined Term "Slow Bleed." In The Politico (2/28), editor John Harris writes, "With a mixture of pride and remorse, I have a confession: I am the author of the Democratic Party's 'slow-bleed strategy' for ending the war in Iraq. … As it happens, Murtha's idea is itself bleeding support, hit by a barrage of denunciations from people who say it does indeed amount to abandoning the troops. In retrospect, it probably has already occurred to Murtha and his supporters that from a public relations perspective, 'slow-bleed' was not the most winning description. How could they have been so stupid? That's where I come in. 'Slow bleed' is my phrase. Murtha had nothing to do with it. Neither did John Bresnahan, the reporter whose name was on the Politico story in which the 'slow-bleed strategy' made its debut." Bresnahan "wrote an article that was the first to detail the emerging Democratic strategy of challenging Bush on Iraq. Here was the lead paragraph of the draft he submitted: 'Even as the House begins debate on a resolution opposing President Bush's plan to send 21,500 more U.S. combat troops to Iraq, leading anti-war groups are preparing a multi-million dollar TV ad campaign and grassroots lobbying blitz designed to pressure vulnerable incumbent lawmakers to end their support for the war.'"

DOJ_NMG_0137580

Harris changed it to: "Top House Democrats, working in concert with anti-war groups, have decided against using congressional power to force a quick end to US involvement in Iraq, and instead will pursue a slow-bleed strategy designed to gradually limit the administration's options."

Some Soldiers Asking Congress To Stop War. The New York Times (2/28, Alvarez, 1.16M) reports, "In a small but growing sign of dissent, a group of active-duty military personnel and reservists, including many who have served in Iraq, is denouncing the war and asking Congress for the prompt withdrawal of troops. The service members, who number more than 1,600, have sent an Appeal for Redress to their Congressional representatives, a form of protest permitted by military rules. Most of those who signed the appeal, at www.appealforredress.org, are enlisted soldiers in the Army, from the lowest to the highest ranks." The Times adds, "While the 1,600 make up a tiny part of the armed services, the appeal is one of the first official signs of protest from people within the military. An estimated 70 percent of those who have signed it are on active duty; the rest are members of the Reserves or the National Guard, and about 100 officers have signed it."

DNI McConnell Says Term "Civil War" Accurately Describes Elements Of Iraqi Conflict. USA Today (2/28, Michaels, 2.27M) reports, "The nation's spy chief said Tuesday that the violence in Iraq resembles a civil war and the Iraqi government has the "close to impossible" job of trying to end the violence. The 'term "civil war" accurately describes key elements of the Iraqi conflict,' Mike McConnell, the new director of national intelligence, said in a statement to the Senate Armed Services Committee." The Bush Administration "has avoided using the term civil war to describe the violence in Iraq. McConnell is the highest-ranking administration official to use the term to describe events in Iraq."

Fox News' Special Report (2/27, Hume) reported that in testimony before the Senate Armed Services Committee, National Intelligence Director Mike McConnell "says an assessment by the intelligence community suggests sectarian violence has become 'self sustaining' and has political implications." McConnell: "The current level of sectarian animosity will make political reconciliation difficult over the next 12-18 months."

Officials Give Mixed Review Of Iraq Security Plan So Far. McClatchy (2/28, Strobel, Landay, Schoof) reports "top US intelligence officials disclosed that the deployment of Iraqi forces into Baghdad under President Bush's new plan to stabilize Iraq is running behind schedule and that all of the units sent so far have arrived under strength, some by more than half. Top military officials…gave a mixed review on the early implementation of the plan, which is aimed at ending carnage in the capital between Shiites and Sunni Muslims." Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, "said the Iraqi military was 'good for the most part,' but uneven. 'The Iraqi military is coming on very well,' he said, adding that the soldiers should be able to replace U.S. troops by late 2007. 'We should have significant turnover this year,' he said."

Fox News Special Report (2/27, Hume) reported, "As for the surge of U.S. Troops, back in January, here is how President Bush envisioned it working." President Bush was shown saying, "These troops will work alongside Iraqi units and be embedded in their formations." However, Sen. John Warner, "A Republican critic of the surge," said Iraqi forces "just are not participating." Warner: "I do not…have strong evidence that the Iraqi forces are measuring up in any amount to what the President laid down on January 10." Defense Secretary Gates "said to day that the military will be able to assess pretty quickly if the Iraqis are living up to their commitments on the military and security angles. In fact he says he may have more information by Thursday when he briefs members of congress on Iraq in a closed door hearing."

Rep. Debbie Wasserman Schultz, on MSNBC's Hardball (2/27, Matthews), said, "We should not be escalating this war. We should be making sure that we develop a plan and we press the president to develop a plan to eventually bring our troops home, and make sure that the Iraqis can stand up on their own and move forward with the democracy that we helped them create."

Violence Continues. NBC Nightly News (2/27, story 4, :40, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "In Iraq tonight we learned today three US soldiers were killed by a roadside bomb south of the city of Baghdad. And there are two very different versions of an incident today in Ramadi, a center of Sunni violence west of the city of Baghdad. According to the Iraqi side, at least 18 boys playing soccer were killed when a car bomb exploded near a public park. The US military however says the explosion was not a car bomb, but instead was caused when US troops intentionally detonated 15 bags of explosives that had been recovered in Ramadi. Some 30 people were injured, the military says. None of the injuries said to be life-threatening."

The Washington Post (2/28, A15, Londoño, 690K) reports, "Ramadi, capital of Anbar province, is a stronghold of the Sunni insurgent group Al-Qaeda in Iraq. More than a quarter of the US troops killed in Iraq have died in Anbar, where President Bush is sending 4,000 additional Marines as part of a temporary increase of US forces in the country."

The Los Angeles Times (2/28, 850K) reports, "Two weeks after a new US-Iraqi security crackdown was launched here, bombers struck popular public gathering spots ranging from an ice cream parlor to a kebab shop Tuesday, causing at least eight deaths. Police in the capital also reported discovering the bodies of 31 men who had been shot to death, apparent victims of Shiite death squads. And the US military reported the deaths of five more American troops." The Times adds, "Rage and frustration in Baghdad over the continuing bloodshed was accompanied by a sense of confusion over an afternoon incident in Ramadi."

DOJ_NMG_0137581

More Commentary. The New York Times (2/28, 1.16M) editorializes, "There's little surprise that the White House is trying to claim the draft oil law as progress. There is no other good news to report: no security from the security sweep in Baghdad, no visible movement to purge the Iraqi police of sectarian death squads and no effort by Washington to impose benchmarks on Iraq's leaders for achieving national unity. ... In a bow to the reality of a splintering Iraq, the administration says it is now ready to sit down with Iraq's neighbors, including Iran and Syria. ... But the most important steps need to be taken by the Iraqi government itself. Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki and his cabinet need to take responsibility for unifying a nation torn apart by decades of dictatorship and insurgency, rather than further inflaming those divisions by exacting vengeance on the formerly dominant Sunni Arab minority. ... And oil, Iraq's principal resource, must be equitably shared without regard to geography, religion or ethnic group."

In Policy Shift, Rice Says US Will Attend Regional Summit On Iraq. ABC World News (2/27, story 4, 0:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported the Bush administration made a "major shift" Tuesday in its policy toward Iran and Syria. The US has "refused contacts with those nations, saying they're fueling the violence in Iraq. But now, the US says it will join with Iran and Syria at a summit. A 'neighbors meeting' in Baghdad, to explore how to stabilize Iraq."

Also calling the move a "major strategy change," the CBS Evening News (2/27, story 4, 1:25, Couric, 7.66M) said the "policy reversal," announced by Secretary Rice, "could bring the US and two bitter enemies together next month at a meeting in Baghdad." CBS (Axelrod) said the conference, which is planned for mid-march, "will focus on reconstruction, economic development, as well as security, which White House aides say will present a chance to press Iran on Iranian IEDs found in Iraq."

Similarly, the AP (2/28, Murphy) says the gathering "could offer a forum for Washington to amplify its concerns about Iranian involvement in Iraq."

NBC Nightly News (2/27, story 5, 0:35, Williams, 9.87M) said the State Department "would not rule out that Secretary Rice would meet separately with her Iranian and Syrian counterparts" as the "Iraq Study Group and others have been calling for."

Fox News' Special Report (2/27, Hume) showed Rice saying, "We hope that all governments will seize this opportunity to improve their relationships with Iraq and to work towards peace and stability in the region." And State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said, "Let's all assume the best intentions for all the states that are going to attend this meeting."

Calling the announcement a "diplomatic turnabout," the AP (2/28, Burns) says the move was "welcomed by Democrats and Republicans alike." Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid called it "a first step," but called for "a robust diplomatic effort in the Middle East," saying the Administration "cannot again settle for mere half measures."

USA Today (2/28, Slavin, 2.27M) notes that in December, "a bipartisan panel reviewing US options in Iraq urged the administration to open discussions with the two countries as part of an Iraq 'support group' and also one-to-one. James Baker, the former secretary of State who headed the commission, said that the administration's announcement was 'a move in the right direction.'" But the Washington Post (2/28, A1, Kessler, 690K) notes Rice "and other administration officials emphasized…that these conferences would be led and organized by the Iraqi government and not," as the Iraq Study Group suggested, the United States. Still, Democrats "seized on the announcement as a long-overdue change in direction by the Administration." Rice's announcement "appeared intended to assuage congressional concerns about the Administration's Iraq policy."

The Financial Times (2/28, Negus) reports US officials "did not exclude the possibility of bilateral discussions with Iran on the subject of Iraq, but would refuse to discuss the nuclear issue."

The New York Times (2/28, A1,Cooper, Semple, 1.16M) says, "While the newly scheduled meetings may not include direct negotiations between the United States and Iran, and are to focus strictly on stabilizing Iraq rather than other disputes, they could crack open a door to a diplomatic channel." The first meeting, "which will include senior Bush administration officials like the State Department Iraq envoy David Satterfield, will be in Baghdad in the first half of March," administration officials said. Then, in early April Secretary Rice "will attend a ministerial level conference, presumably with her Iranian and Syrian counterparts, which will likely be somewhere else in the region," administration officials said.

The Wall Street Journal (2/28, A3, King, Solomon, 2.04M) reports, "Rice's announcement came as many Arab leaders say they see some positive trends emerging in the region, despite the continuing carnage in Iraq. In Lebanon, attempts by the Iranian-backed Shiite militia and political party, Hezbollah, to overthrow the government of Prime Minister Fuad Siniora have waned. Last month, Saudi Arabia brokered the creation of a unity government in the Palestinian territories between Iranian-funded Hamas and Fatah, in a bid to avert civil war and kick-start a new round of Arab-Israeli peace talks." The Journal adds, "Arab diplomats tie these developments to Saudi Arabia's recent diplomatic offensive, largely aimed at preventing the spread of Iraq's Sunni-Shiite violence across the region. In addition, they said, Tehran is taking a more conciliatory stance toward its Middle East neighbors, in part because of threats by the US, Saudi Arabia and other regional allies to try and contain its growing influence in the region." The Washington Times (2/28, Sands, 88K) and Los Angeles Times (2/28, Richter, 850K) also report the story.

DOJ_NMG_0137582

Rice Warns Of Al Qaeda Comeback If US Fails In Iraq. AFP (2/28) reports Secretary Rice warned "a doubting US Congress" Tuesday that Al-Qaeda will "come back to haunt us" if the US does not pursue its effort to stabilize Iraq. Rice told the Senate Appropriations Committee, "If they have a safe haven, a sophisticated and central place like Iraq, I believe strongly that that's going to enhance their capability to do so." Rice and Defense Secretary Robert Gates "underwent a grilling" Tuesday, as Senators "repeatedly questioned the government's rationale for remaining in Iraq amid sectarian violence that borders on civil war."

More Commentary. The Los Angeles Times (2/28, 850K) editorializes that the move is "a welcome about-face for the Bush administration." Bush and Rice "may have felt that this was a good time to announce talks without appearing weak, given broader developments in the Persian Gulf region. Events within Iraq may not be going well, but the US Navy has been flexing its muscles in the region. Moreover, U.S. diplomacy has helped to win a U.N. Security Council resolution denouncing Iran's nuclear program, and Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad appears to be in some political trouble with the ruling mullahs in Tehran, partly because of his perceived recklessness."

Taliban Says Cheney Was Target Of Suicide Attack. In continuing coverage of the suicide attack Tuesday outside the US base in Bagram, Afghanistan where Vice President Cheney was staying, killing at least 23 people, ABC World News (2/27, story 3, 2:25, Karl, 8.78M) reported, "A Taliban spokesperson has claimed responsibility" for the attack, "saying the intended target was, in fact, Vice President Cheney. But the bomber never got anywhere near the Vice President." The CBS Evening News (2/27, story 5, 2:15, Martin, 7.66M) notes "US officials insisted" the Vice President's "overnight stay at Bagram was a closely held secret unknown to the enemy, but that didn't stop the Taliban from claiming Vice President Cheney was the target of today's attack."

The Financial Times (2/28, Mojumdar, Bokhari, Sevastopulo) reports, "While his arrival on Monday was shrouded in secrecy, some experts questioned whether a one-day delay in meeting" Afghan President Hamid Karzai, "because of inclement weather had provoked a security breach." The Washington Times/AP (2/28, Tang) says "it was the closest that militants have come to a top US official visiting Afghanistan."

USA Today (2/28, Wiseman, 2.27M) reports Cheney "met with…Karzai in Kabul before heading back to the USA via the Persian Gulf state of Oman. During their private, hour-long meeting, Cheney and Karzai spoke about the 'problems coming from Pakistan,' according to an Afghan government official who spoke to the Associated Press on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the matter."

NBC Nightly News (2/27, story 3, 2:40, Gregory, 9.87M) reported, "Back at the White House, the President was not awakened with the news, but briefed later. Mr. Cheney kept his schedule, meeting with Afghan President Hamid Karzai. Speaking to reporters, the Vice President said the terrorists were trying to undermine the Karzai government. 'Striking at Bagram with a suicide bomber, I suppose is one way to do that. But it shouldn't affect our behavior at all.' There are questions for investigators." The White House "insisted this is not a sign of the Taliban's strength." Tony Snow, White House Press Secretary: "I'm not sure it says anything because you've got an isolated attack." However, added NBC, "terrorism experts say the attack packed a psychological punch."

The New York Times (2/28, A9, Wafa, Gall, 1.16M) says while the attack "laid bare the rising insecurity in Afghanistan as American and NATO forces battle a growing Taliban insurgency, Afghan and American officials said it fell well short of a serious assassination attempt." Meanwhile, the Washington Post (2/28, A1, Witte, 690K) says despite the Taliban claim, US officials "disputed the assertion that Cheney was the target, noting that his overnight stay at the sprawling Bagram air base had been unplanned and that he was well away from the blast."

In a front page news analysis titled "Afghan Bombing Sends a Danger Signal to US," the New York Times (2/28, A1, Sanger, 1.16M) says the "audacity" of the attack "underscores why President Bush sent him there -- a deepening American concern that the Taliban and Al Qaeda are resurgent." While it was "more successful at grabbing headlines and filling television screens" than "at getting anywhere near" Cheney, the strike "nonetheless demonstrated that Al Qaeda and the Taliban appear stronger and more emboldened in the region than at any time since the American invasion of the country five years ago." Likewise, the Chicago Tribune (2/28, Silva, Fang, 617K) reports the attack "underscored concerns Tuesday about the resurgence of Taliban militants and other Islamic radicals in Afghanistan --the very reason for Cheney's visit." The Los Angeles Times (2/29, Barnes, Meyer, King, 850K) also reports the story.

DOJ_NMG_0137583

Huffington Blog Posters Regretted Attempt On Cheney Wasn't Successful. The Washington Times (2/28, Pierce, 88K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column that the "liberal Huffington Post Web site (www.huffingtonpost.com) ran a wire story yesterday about the apparent attempt to assassinate Vice President Dick Cheney in Afghanistan. A number of its readers proceeded to make postings in which they expressed regret that the attack had not succeeded." Talk radio host Rush Limbaugh "read about a half-dozen of the foul postings on the air yesterday, and linked to the Huffington Post from his own Web site (www.rushlimbaugh.com). Not long afterward, the Huffington Post removed the most offensive of the missives."

Cheney's Cargo Plane Named "Spirit Of Strom Thurmond." The Washington Post (2/28, C3, Argetsinger, Roberts, 690K) reports in its "Reliable Source" column, "To evade detection by terrorists, Dick Cheney parked Air Force Two and flew to Pakistan and Afghanistan in a military cargo plane, the 'Spirit of Strom Thurmond.' (Make up your own joke. We're busy.)"

DNI McConnell Warns Al Qaeda Rebuilding In Pakistan. The New York Times (2/28, A6, Mazzetti, 1.16M) reports the new Director of National Intelligence, Mike McConnell, told members of Congress Tuesday that senior leaders of Al Qaeda "were steadily rebuilding the network's bases inside Pakistan and that future attacks against the United States could be planned from Pakistan's remote western mountains." In his first testimony since taking office, McConnell "issued a blunter assessment" of Pakistan's efforts in the war on terror, saying "We believe they could do more." In addition to McConnell, Lt. Gen. Michael D. Maples, director of the Defense Intelligence Agency, described the border region as a "haven for Al Qaeda's leadership."

The Washington Post (2/28, A4, Pincus, 690K) reports McConnell said the US is "very concerned" that Osama bin Laden and the al-Qaeda leadership are attempting to rebuild their terrorist network," but said they lack the experience of the old leadership, nearly three-quarters of which has been killed or captured.

The AP (2/28, Shrader) reports McConnell said the US believes bin Laden and al-Zawahri "are hiding in the rugged frontiers of northwestern Pakistan and are attempting to establish an operational base there." McConnell's push for action along the Afghan-Pakistani border "echoed concerns raised" by Vice President Cheney "during a face-to-face meeting Monday with Pakistani President Gen. Pervez Musharraf."

The Christian Science Monitor (2/28, Sappenfield, 59K) reports, "Since last summer, when the Taliban seized entire districts in the southernmost provinces and attempted to encircle Kabul, the United States has refocused its attention on Afghanistan. Recently, the Bush administration proposed $10.6 billion in aid, announced the overhaul of its diplomatic mission here, and increased the number of American troops to 27,000 – the highest level since the 2001 invasion." It is, "in part, an attempt to save what has been promoted as the administration's great overseas achievement, even as Iraq slips further into chaos." But "Tuesday's events are indicative of the Taliban's eagerness to escalate the fight, and analysts question whether America's increased commitment to Afghanistan will be sufficient to make the country's democratic experiment successful."

Holbrooke Accuses The Administration Of Ignoring Warnings On Afghanistan. Former US ambassador to the UN Richard Holbrooke, on MSNBC's Hardball (2/27, Mattews), said, " A year ago, I went to Afghanistan…and I wrote a column for The Washington Post. And I said, the situation was deteriorating rapidly. We were facing an upsurge. We had to do something about it. Two of the most senior officials in the United States government, short of the president and vice president, both called me…to say I was too pessimistic about Afghanistan. I am still angry about that. Why? Because I was trying to help create a bipartisan position that said that Afghanistan is indispensable to our national security and should be separated from the Iraq crisis. And, instead, they ignored the warning sounds, until a few days ago. President Bush finally got up and semi-admitted that things were not as good as they ought to be, or as he had said they are. And I remain angry about that."

More Commentary. The Wall Street Journal (2/28, 2.04M) editorializes, "There's no need to accuse Pakistani intelligence of tipping off the Taliban about Mr. Cheney's whereabouts to see a connection between decisions in Islamabad and terrorism in Bagram. Mr. Cheney reportedly delivered a stiff message to Mr. Musharraf about the need for Pakistan to deny the Taliban sanctuary along its frontier with Afghanistan. That's a message Islamabad needs to hear, even if an Islamabad spokeswoman did insist after Mr. Cheney's visit that 'Pakistan does not accept dictation.'" However, adds the Journal, "policing its long and mountainous border with Afghanistan has exacted a high price in Pakistani lives and treasure," but "failing to police it may exact a higher one."

Rep. Chris Shays, on MSNBC's Hardball (2/27, Matthews) noted that "the key in Afghanistan is, we have gotten the Europeans to do some lifting there, where they don't want to do it in Iraq. So, we have, I think, more of the world community with us. … But give this administration credit for at least finding a way to engage the Europeans in something. As someone told me, Europe has never had what they call an away game since Afghanistan. They have always depended on the United States."

DOJ_NMG_0137584

Fox News' Bill O'Reilly, in the opening segment of his O'Reilly Factor (2/27), contended that the attack "should remind everybody that the global war on terror is still underway and things are not going well. … Right now the Taliban is taking advantage of Pakistan's unwillingness to shut them down. The Taliban killers have a sanctuary in their country. And president Musharraf is basically hiding under his desk."

DOJ:

Critics See Politics Behind US Attorney Dismissals. In an article posted on Salon.com (2/28), Mark Follman writes, "Ever since the Bush administration shocked the legal community by dismissing eight U.S. attorneys in December, Justice Department leaders have vigorously denied that the firings were politically motivated. … But at least three of the eight fired attorneys were told by a superior they were being forced to resign to make jobs available for other Bush appointees, according to a former senior Justice Department official knowledgeable about their cases. That stands in contradiction to administration claims that the firings were related either to job performance or policy differences. A fourth U.S. attorney was told by a top Justice Department official that the dismissal in that attorney's case was not necessarily related to job performance. Meanwhile, U.S. Attorney David Iglesias in New Mexico -- who officially steps down from his post on Wednesday, and who says he was never told by superiors about any problems with his work -- plans to go public with documentation of the achievements of his office. … 'I never received any indication at all of a problem' regarding performance or policy differences, Iglesias told Salon on Monday. 'That only leaves a third option: politics.'" Follman continues, "Suspicions about the unusual purge of eight U.S. attorneys in December burst into the open within the legal community and on Capitol Hill after McNulty conceded in Senate testimony on Feb. 6 that the U.S. attorney in Arkansas, Bud Cummins, was pushed out for no reason other than to give someone else a shot at the job. Using a little-noticed provision in the Patriot Act allowing interim appointments, Gonzales gave the post to Timothy Griffin -- who had been both an operative for the Republican National Committee and a deputy to senior White House advisor Karl Rove -- in what many believe was a maneuver to sidestep the traditional Senate confirmation process for U.S. attorneys. … While Cummins was first informed of his dismissal last June, it wasn't until Dec. 7 that Michael Battle, a top Justice Department official, informed the rest of the group of U.S. attorneys in phone calls that they would be required to step down. That group included Daniel Bogden in Nevada, Paul Charlton in Arizona, John McKay in Seattle, Carole Lam in San Diego, and David Iglesias in New Mexico -- all of whom had received positive job reviews before they were dismissed and some of whom are viewed by colleagues and law enforcement officials as exceptional leaders. Most of them have said publicly that they were never told of any management or policy problems by their superiors. … According to the former senior Justice Department official, one of the U.S. attorneys in the group was told by Battle on Dec. 7: 'It's hard not to think you did something wrong when you get a call like this, but that's not always the case.' Two other U.S. attorneys in the group, upon seeking clarification from superiors in Washington, were told by a different top Justice Department official that they were being pushed out to give other Bush appointees their posts. A current senior Justice Department official confirmed that one of those two was Bogden in Nevada. Bryan Roehrkasse, a public affairs spokesman for the Justice Department, declined to comment about 'specific personnel matters.' … Former officials, legal scholars and U.S. lawmakers from both parties have publicly questioned the administration's stated rationale for the firings and have suggested troubling theories about the real reasons for the housecleaning, which experts say is without precedent. Some former Justice Department officials say they believe the administration's moves are a politically driven power grab -- aimed not only at a tighter grip on policy from Washington, but also at creating openings with which to reward their friends and build up a bench of conservative loyalists positioned to serve in powerful posts in future administrations." Follman continues, "Administration officials have declined to provide further explanation for any of the attorneys' dismissals, including McKay's. … Questions remain about how the Bush administration will seek to fill the newly vacant posts. Some former Justice Department officials say they believe that the Bush administration has since revised its plans to reward political loyalists with the jobs, due to the backlash against the decision to push out Cummins and hand his post to Griffin in Arkansas. Earlier this month, the administration withdrew Griffin's name from consideration for a permanent appointment, though he remains in office indefinitely."

DOJ Pilots Federated ID Management System. Government Computer News (2/28, Jackson) reports, "The Justice Department is piloting a federated identity management system that could be used to verify government online identities across different agencies." GCN continues, "The Law Enforcement Information Sharing Program, run by Justice's Office of the Chief Information Officer, could offer validated user credentials to multiple applications across multiple agencies, noted Boris Shur, a Justice IT manager who is working on the pilot. Shur outlined the project at the Collaborative Expedition Workshop, held today in Arlington, Va." GCN adds, "The system works by establishing a trust broker to act as a liaison between applications and providers of user credentials. With a trust broker in place, a user can request access to an application outside his or her own agency, and that application can request credentials from that broker, which has gathered such credentials from the identity providers. … Such a federated approach could cut the complexity that would ensue as more applications are opened to outside agencies. The trust broker could eliminate the need to establish individual handshakes between applications and identity providers. It could also cut down on the format headaches, as both applications and identity providers can communicate with the trusted broker in its own native format and protocol. It is up to the trusted broker to provide all the relevant protocols and formats, Shur said. At present, the LEISP system communicates credentials using the Public Key Infrastructure, the Security Assertion Markup Language and the Web Services Federation Language. It interacts with a number of applications as well as with a number of identity servers, such as the Sun One Identity Server and the Hewlett-Packard OpenView Select Federation."

DOJ_NMG_0137585

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Former McAfee Counsel Charged In Options Probe. The California Recorder (2/28, Scheck) reports, "Kent Roberts, the former chief counsel at McAfee Inc., on Tuesday became the first Silicon Valley lawyer charged in the stock options backdating debacle." The Recorder continues, "Roberts faces six counts of mail fraud, wire fraud and filing false SEC documents in connection with options grants given to himself and ex-McAfee CEO George Samenuk in 2000 and 2002. … The 11-page charging document tracks what Justice Department officials have repeatedly said they're looking for in deciding to charge in options cases: evidence of intentional fraud -- most importantly, concealing options manipulation." The Recorder adds, "The indictment says that in 2000, Roberts, who joined the company then called Network Associates in 1998, changed the grant date -- and thus lowered the price by nearly $10 a share -- on 20,000 options given to him by the board. … According to the charging document, Roberts was concerned that the original price of the options would not have benefited him since McAfee's share price was dropping at the time. … Months later, the indictment said, Roberts 'caused the grant date to be changed to April 14, 2000, and he caused the exercise price to be changed to $19.75, which was the closing price of Network Associates' stock on the new, fabricated grant date,' the indictment says. … While that may have been problematic, the indictment says Roberts exacerbated the situation in 2002, the year he became one of the three company officials on the 'Ethics First Committee,' which the company formed to root out internal problems that had resulted in past legal messes. … In that capacity, Roberts investigated the former controller, the indictment says, looking at allegations that the controller had manipulated options grant prices for employees of the company."

The Financial Times (2/28, Allison, Masters) reports, "If found guilty, he could face up to 20 years in jail and a fine of up to $250,000." The Times adds, "The indictment marked the latest sign that federal prosecutors and the SEC are pressing forward quickly with their cases against individuals involved with stock options backdating. … Earlier this month, the former general counsel of Monster Worldwide, the online jobs site, pleaded guilty to separate backdating charges." The Times notes, "Federal authorities are probing options granting practices at dozens of other companies, including Apple and Broadcom. … In many cases, investigators may be running up against statutory deadlines which require prosecutors to bring securities fraud cases within five years. Much of the options backdating appears to have ceased after the SEC changed disclosure rules for options grants in 2002."

The New York Times/AP (2/28) reports, "The indictment includes seven criminal counts of fraud, accusing Mr. Roberts of deceiving investors by filing false statements with the Securities and Exchange Commission and falsifying McAfee's books. … Besides shedding more light on the apparent misconduct of Mr. Roberts, the case provides the latest indication that the government crackdown on corporate America's widespread stock option abuses is progressing beyond the evidence-gathering stage." The AP notes, "Mr. Roberts became the third former executive in the last two weeks to be accused of illegally rigging stock options, joining the former chief executive of the video game maker Take-Two Interactive Software Inc. and a former senior vice president for the company that owns the online job search site Monster.com."

USA Today (2/28, 2B, Iwata) reports, "Since the backdating scandal arose last year, criminal charges have been brought against former executives at Brocade Communications Systems, Comverse Technology and Take-Two Interactive Software. About 200 companies have disclosed internal or federal investigations of their options grants. … Several corporate general counsels have resigned or been fired as a result of those investigations." USA adds, "General counsels are expected to monitor a company's legal and financial doings, so the spate of in-house attorneys involved in backdating cases is especially alarming to corporate-governance experts." The AP (2/28, Liektke) also reports this story.

Mutual Benefits Managers Plead Guilty To Securities Fraud. The AP (2/28) reports, "Two managers at Mutual Benefits Corp. pleaded guilty to securities fraud and agreed to pay about $830 million in restitution to investors, authorities said Tuesday. Carol Traina and Bari Wiggins each pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to commit securities fraud in connection with Mutual Benefits' billion dollar securities offering, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Southern District of Florida. Both face up to five years in prison." The South Florida Sun-Sentinel (2/28, 237K) notes, "Mutual Benefits, which was shut down in 2004, purchased life insurance policies from terminally ill and elderly people for less than face value and sold shares in the payouts to investors. Such deals, known as viaticals or life settlements, are profitable if the insured person dies within a particular period of time. Prosecutors said Mutual Benefits cheated investors by using artificially low projections of how long insured people would live and by understating the risk of the investments."

DOJ_NMG_0137586

California Broker Pleads Guilty To Securities Fraud. The San Fernando Valley Business Journal (2/26) reported, "A former account vice president for a Valencia brokerage firm pleaded guilty today to conspiring to commit securities fraud. Justin Paperny, a resident of Studio City, pleaded guilty that he helped operate the GLT Venture Fund at Capital Management Group in Valencia. … The deception resulted in more than 40 investors losing at least $2.5 million, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office. As part of the plea, Paperny agreed to cooperate with investigators in an ongoing criminal probe into Capital Management and the venture fund."

US To Produce Nacchio Witness List On Thursday. The Denver Post (2/28, Vuong) reports, "Federal prosecutors will produce for the first time Thursday a list of witnesses they plan to call during the criminal insider-trading trial of former Qwest chief executive Joe Nacchio." The Post continues, "U.S. District Judge Edward Nottingham has ordered the government to compile the list for the defense. It's unclear whether it will be made public. The defense has to submit its witness list by March 16." The Post adds, "James Payne, former senior vice president of Qwest's Government Systems Division, said Tuesday that he expects to be called to testify during the trial, which is set to begin March 19 in federal court in Denver. … 'I'm involved on both sides of the case,' Payne told The Denver Post in a phone interview from Washington, D.C. 'I'll be subpoenaed by one side or the other, and perhaps both.'" The Post notes, "Payne joined Qwest in August 1999 and worked directly with Nacchio on government contracts, including those with clandestine agencies that may play a key role in Nacchio's defense. … Former Qwest chief financial officer Robin Szeliga, former Qwest president Afshin Mohebbi and former board member Tom Stephens could be key witnesses for the government. … Payne is the first former Qwest official to publicly disclose that he expects to be involved during the trial. Payne said he has been contacted by prosecutors and defense attorneys a number of times. Court filings suggest he may be more helpful to the defense. … Nacchio is accused of selling $100.8 million in Qwest stock in early 2001 while he knew the company's finances were deteriorating. He has pleaded not guilty to 42 charges of illegal insider trading. … Nacchio's attorneys have said he had a positive outlook on Qwest during that time because he alone, among his inner circle of top executives, in Denver knew the company was in line to receive large top-secret government contracts."

Former FDA Commissioner Crawford Given Probation, Fined. The New York Times/AP (2/28) reports Lester M. Crawford, former commissioner of the Food and Drug Administration, "was ordered to pay about $90,000 in fines for lying about stock he owned in companies regulated by the agency. At his sentencing in federal court…Crawford, was also given three years' supervised probation and ordered to perform 50 hours of community service." Crawford "pleaded guilty last October to having a conflict of interest and false reporting of information about stock he and his wife owned."

CRIMINAL LAW:

House Leaders Reach Agreement On Cunningham Probe Subpoenas. The Hill (2/28, Crabtree) reports, "House leaders will not fight subpoenas for information from the U.S. Attorney's Office in San Diego stemming from a criminal investigation into activities related to the bribery case against Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham (R-Calif.), according to a release by Speaker Nancy Pelosi's (D-Calif.) office yesterday." The Hill continues, "The chairmen of three committees involved, working with the House General Counsel's office, have been negotiating for the last two months about how to respond to subpoenas for documents the U.S. Attorney sent the House Appropriations, Armed Services and Intelligence panels late last year. … It was unclear at press time how much GOP ranking members of the committees were consulted about which documents to hand over." The Hill adds, "A Democratic leadership aide insisted that Republicans were consulted because it involved 'their documents.' … But Brian Kennedy, spokesman for Minority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio), said his boss was not kept in the loop during any part of the negotiation process. … 'We were not party to or made aware of any of the agreements,' he said. … That is a distinct departure to what happened last year after the FBI raided the office of Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.), when the leadership of both parties invoked the Speech Debate Clause of the Constitution. … '… Because all of the information being provided to the U.S. Attorney is privileged under the Speech and Debate Clause of the Constitution, the committees have agreed to decline to assert the privilege with respect to that information,' the statement from Pelosi's office said. … 'The agreements permit the committees to cooperate with the investigation in a manner that respects the constitutional prerogatives of the House and does not impair the committees' functioning or compromise their legislative and oversight responsibilities,' the release said. … The negotiations went so smoothly that the U.S. attorney's office withdrew the subpoenas and the committees have already handed over some of the documents requested."

DOJ_NMG_0137587

The AP (2/28) reports, "Two committee staffers will appear March 1 before the federal grand jury in San Diego that has been considering evidence stemming from the Cunningham case, Daly said. … The subpoenas were sent in December and January to the Appropriations, Armed Services and Intelligence committees and the two staffers." The AP continues, "Cunningham, a San Diego-area Republican, was sentenced in March to more than eight years in prison for accepting $2.4 million in bribes in exchange for steering government business to defense contractors. … Earlier this month, the grand jury indicted a former top CIA official and a San Diego defense contractor on fraud and money laundering charges in an investigation that spun off from the Cunningham probe. The defense contractor, Brent Wilkes, was also charged in a separate indictment along with a New York mortgage banker on charges of bribing Cunningham. … The subpoena deal comes after nearly a year of negotiations over the documents that began while the House was still under Republican control."

Gonzales Asked To Probe Smithsonian Official's Conduct. The Washington Post (2/28, C03, Trescott) reports, "A Washington watchdog group yesterday asked the attorney general to investigate whether Smithsonian Secretary Lawrence M. Small violated the law by using federal money to pay for travel and other expenses." The Post continues, "The group also asked the Justice Department to determine whether the Smithsonian Board of Regents, which is chaired by John G. Roberts Jr., chief justice of the Supreme Court, broke the law by approving Small's expenses." The Post adds, "In a letter to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington said the $90,000 in unauthorized expenses that Small accumulated between 2000 and 2005 was 'troubling.' Questions raised by Smithsonian's inspector general about Small's expenses were first reported by The Washington Post on Sunday. … 'Mr. Small's conduct not only diminishes the stature of the Smithsonian Institution, it smacks of self-dealing and self-enrichment at the expense of the general public. The Board of Regents failure to take action against Mr. Small -- incomprehensibly choosing to endorse his conduct instead -- is similarly distressing,' said the letter, signed by Melanie Sloan, CREW's executive director, a former federal prosecutor. The group describes itself as nonpartisan; it has received funding from liberal Democratic sources." The Post notes, "Sen. Charles Grassley (R-Iowa), ranking member of the Senate Finance Committee, has asked Roberts, chancellor of the Smithsonian Regents, to review what Grassley has called 'lavish expenditures' by Small. Grassley said the board appeared to be 'rubber-stamping the actions of Secretary Small and turning a blind eye to very serious issues raised by the inspector general.' The senator suggested this week that the Smithsonian's budget be cut because of excessive spending and proposed changing the composition of the Board of Regents."

Colorado Deputy Sheriff Charged With Child Pornography. The Rocky Mountain News (2/28) reports, "A 53-year-old Arapahoe County (CO) sheriff's deputy has been indicted by a federal grand jury on child pornography charges." The News continues, "Douglas Morrill Peek of Centennial is charged with transportation, possession, distribution and receipt of child pornography. … He was arrested by the FBI this morning without incident and made his initial appearance in U.S. District Court in Denver this afternoon." The News adds, "If convicted he faces up to 20 years in a federal prison and up to a $250,000 fine. … 'The Department of Justice will pursue and prosecute those who commit crimes involving the exploitation of children, no matter who they are, or what position they hold,' said United States Attorney Troy Eid. … This case is being brought as part of Project Safe Childhood."

Iowa Man Given More Jail Time For Child Pornography. The Iowa City Press-Citizen (2/28, McWilliams) reports, "An Iowa City man already serving 10 years in prison for lascivious acts with a child received an additional seven-plus years behind bars for storing child pornography on his home computer." The Press-Citizen continues, "Jackie Dean Burtlow, 40, pleaded guilty to receipt of child pornography. A federal judge initially sentenced Burtlow to 10 years and two months in prison but gave him credit for 33 months previously served for related state charges, which leaves seven years and five months." The Press-Citizen adds, "According to a news release from the U.S Department of Justice: … The FBI started investigating Burtlow in May 2004 when agents in Cleveland found an e-mail that was later determined to have been sent from Burtlow's computer. Police searched Burtlow's Iowa City residence and seized a computer that contained numerous images, including video clips of children engaged in sexually explicit conduct. … When questioned, Burtlow admitted that he had child pornography stored on his computer and also said he had chatted and sent e-mails to other people about child pornography, according to the release."

DOJ_NMG_0137588

Florida Couple Sentenced To Prison For Spying For Cuba. In a story distributed by McClatchy, the Miami Herald (2/28, Weaver, 286K) reports, "Convicted ex-Florida International University academics Carlos and Elsa Alvarez apologized Tuesday as a pair of tearful defendants, expressing regret for a secret life of informing on Miami's exile community for Cuba. … U.S. District Judge K. Michael Moore slammed Carlos Alvarez with the maximum five-year prison sentence for conspiring to act as an unregistered Cuban agent and Elsa Alvarez with the maximum three years' imprisonment for harboring her husband's illicit intelligence work and failing to report it to authorities." The Herald adds, "In sentencing them, Moore acknowledged the couple's supporters who testified about their honesty, integrity and spirituality as Catholics, but he condemned them for breaking federal law with their 'personal foreign policy.'"

Florida Police Chief Defends Decision To Tell Officials About FBI Probe. The Miami Herald (2/28, DeMarzo, 286K) reports, "Hollywood Police Chief James Scarberry, who admitted he leaked information about an ongoing federal probe of his department, defended his decision Tuesday, saying the FBI told him he could use his 'discretion' in discussing the probe with others. Scarberry told as many as eight city officials about the two-year undercover investigation, but insists that he did not tip off the targets of the probe. Scarberry said he 'has his suspicions' who leaked the information to those involved, but doesn't believe it came from within his department or City Hall." The Herald notes that the officers' "arrests could jeopardize more than 60 criminal cases handled by the four detectives. Prosecutors began sending letters to defense attorneys representing clients involved in the cases, advising them of the situation."

Virginia Sheriff's Deputy Pleads Guilty In Corruption Probe. The AP (2/28) reports, "A former officer charged in a federal investigation of corruption in a rural sheriff's department pleaded guilty Tuesday to one count of possessing stolen firearms. Patrick Martin, who was a sergeant in the vice unit of the Henry County Sheriff's Department, faces a maximum sentence of 10 years in prison and a fine of $250,000." The AP notes, "Martin's case had been set for a jury trial but he decided Tuesday morning to plead guilty instead, his attorney, Art Strickland, said. … During the court hearing," Assistant U.S. Attorney Thomas Bondurant "played a recording from portions of a three-hour interview that an FBI agent and a state police officer conducted with Martin in which he said he was not aware of any drugs or guns stolen from the sheriff's department by officers."

6th Circuit Overturns Georgia Corruption Conviction. The Macomb Daily (2/28, Cook) reports, "A federal appeals court reversed the conviction of a former Warren city councilman on fraud charges because of a federal judge's secret communication with government lawyers during jury deliberations in his first trial. William Barnwell's convictions for theft, embezzlement and conspiracy were dismissed and the case was remanded back to the U.S. District Court, a Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals panel ruled Tuesday." The Daily notes, "Assistant U.S. attorney Keith Corbett went to the judge after the FBI was conducting a telephone wiretap in an unrelated case and heard a reference to the Barnwell case -- the results of an informal jury vote, which is supposed to be done in secret. An FBI agent said that a juror was the sister of a subject in the unrelated case, and the judge and government lawyers discussed the potentially contaminated juror. … The discussions were kept from the defense attorneys in the case, a move that the appeals court determined tainted the case not only for the first trial but also the second trial in which a new jury found Barnwell guilty."

Washington Woman Admits To Teaching Children To Fake Retardation For Benefits. The AP (2/28) reports from Tacoma, WA, "A woman admitted Monday that she coached her two children to fake retardation starting when they were 4 and 8 years old so she could collect Social Security benefits on their behalf." The AP continues, "Rosie Costello, 46, admitted in U.S. District Court that she collected more than $280,000 in benefits, beginning in the mid-1980s. Most was from Social Security, but the state social services agency paid $53,000. … Costello pleaded guilty to conspiracy to defraud the government and Social Security fraud. Her son, Pete, 26, pleaded guilty earlier this month. Federal prosecutors in Seattle said Monday authorities had not yet located her daughter, Marie." The AP adds, "According to the plea agreement, Costello began coaching her daughter at age 4, and later used the same ruse with her son. He feigned retardation into his mid-20s - picking at his face, slouching and appearing uncommunicative in meetings with Social Security officials. … Social Security workers became suspicious and uncovered a video of Pete Costello ably contesting a traffic ticket in a Vancouver courtroom. … Pete Costello is scheduled to be sentenced May 11 and faces from six months to a year in prison, as well as $59,000 in restitution. … Rosie Costello is scheduled for sentencing May 17."

DOJ_NMG_0137589

Indiana Men Sentenced To Prison For Mortgage Fraud. The Indianapolis Star (2/24, 268K) reported, "Two Indianapolis men received prison terms Friday for mortgage scams. Federal judges sentenced John Wagner, 46, to 37 months in prison and Frankie Lamont Howard, 38, to 24 months. Since a federal fraud task force was formed in 2002 to look into the area's rash of mortgage crimes, 58 people have been convicted, including Wagner and Howard, who each had pleaded guilty to charges of mail fraud and money laundering." The AP (2/24) also reported on the sentencings.

Massachusetts State Trooper Sentenced To Prison For Online Solicitation. The Boston Globe (2/28, Ballou, 413K) reports, "A federal judge gave the minimum sentence to a former Massachusetts state trooper and decorated Army war veteran who admitted trying to solicit sex over the Internet from someone he thought was a 14-year-old boy. Brian O'Hare, 46, of Lancaster was sentenced to the mandatory minimum of five years in prison yesterday in federal court in Boston after he pleaded guilty." The Globe notes that "the person he was chatting with was actually FBI agent Jeremy Morrissey, working in an Internet sting operation. O'Hare was arrested last February when he drove to Meadow Glen Mall…for what he thought was a meeting with the boy." The AP (2/28) also notes, "O'Hare allegedly had several sexually explicit chats with an FBI agent who was posing as a 14-year-old high school boy, and the two arranged to meet.

California Transplant Doctor Under Probe In Organ Donor's Death. The Los Angeles Times (2/28, Ornstein, Weber) reports, "Police are investigating whether a Kaiser Permanente transplant surgeon attempted to hasten the death last February of a 26-year-old San Luis Obispo man on life support in order to harvest his organs more quickly." The Times continues, "The allegations, if true, would constitute a grave breach of the nation's organ transplant rules, as well as a public relations setback for those promoting organ donation, experts in transplantation said. … San Luis Obispo police and the Medical Board of California are looking into the conduct of Dr. Hootan Roozrokh, who was a surgeon at Kaiser's now-defunct kidney transplant program in San Francisco." The Times adds, "At issue is whether he ordered excessive doses of powerful pain medication to speed the death of Ruben Navarro, according to several sources familiar with the case who spoke on condition of anonymity because investigations are ongoing. … Medical board spokeswoman Candis Cohen said her agency is also investigating the conduct of a second physician present during the incident. That person, Kaiser officials confirmed, is Dr. Arturo Martinez, who at the time was the surgical director of Kaiser's transplant program. … Neither surgeon was attempting to recover the organs on behalf of Kaiser; rather, they were working on behalf of the group that procures and distributes organs in much of Northern and Central California. Transplant surgeons commonly perform such duties."

Judge Asked To Delay Sentencing For Louisiana Hospital Owner. The Shreveport (LA) Times (2/28, Mahfoufi) reports, "The same day Doctors' Hospital filed for bankruptcy last week, owner David LeBlanc's attorneys asked a federal judge to reschedule his sentencing on a charge of illegal campaign contributions." The Times continues, "It will be the third time LeBlanc, who is facing jail time and/or a fine, will have had his sentencing postponed. … 'The defendant is cooperating in an ongoing criminal investigation, and the government cannot make an informed recommendation as to the defendant's sentence until the defendant completes his cooperation,' the trial attorneys with the U.S. Department of Justice Criminal Division Public Integrity Section wrote in an earlier motion. … There was no reference to the ongoing investigation in the latest request to reschedule LeBlanc's sentencing to March 23. … A Department of Justice spokeswoman said she could not comment on the investigation." The Times adds, "LeBlanc pleaded guilty last March after an internal investigation by LifeCare -- the hospital chain he co-founded 15 years ago with two dozen leased beds within Doctors' Hospital -- found he and then-Government Relations Vice President Donald Boucher made federal political contributions in their and their wives' names. … LifeCare used corporate funds to reimburse LeBlanc and Boucher $50,000 through bonuses, salary increases and expense reimbursements. LeBlanc authorized the payments. … LeBlanc and Boucher, both fired by LifeCare, admitted to knowingly and willfully violating the law. LeBlanc agreed to pay a $100,000 civil penalty and Boucher agreed to pay a $50,000 penalty. Both also entered criminal plea agreements with the Department of Justice."

Convicted Ney Aide Made Appearance At Media Party. The Roll Call (2/28, Heil) reports in its "Heard on the Hill" column, "Neil Volz, former aide to convicted ex-Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), may have gotten some unwanted headlines when he pleaded guilty in May 2006 to federal conspiracy charges in the ongoing investigation into disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff's dealings on Capitol Hill." But "just a few weeks ago, Volz was mingling — voluntarily — with members of the Fourth Estate. An HOH spy belatedly tipped off HOH that Volz attended the after-party hosted by CQ following the Washington Press Club Foundation's dinner Feb. 6 at the Ritz-Carlton." Volz was "wearing a newly grown beard and a dark suit, which practically constituted a disguise since many of the aides and reporters in attendance didn't recognize him. An acquaintance jokingly asked what Volz was doing walking 'into the lion's den,' said the HOH tipster, who added that the disgraced aide who now faces prison time appeared to be in 'good spirits.'"

DOJ_NMG_0137590

CIVIL LAW:

High Court Considers Case On Bush's Faith-Based Initiative. USA Today (2/28, Biskupic, 2.27M) reports, "The Wisconsin-based Freedom From Religion Foundation has sued to get rid of crosses in city parks, to end Good Friday public holidays and, most vigorously, to thwart President Bush's faith-based initiative. Now, the group that for 30 years has sought a firm divide between church and state will be at the Supreme Court on Wednesday in a case that could affect taxpayers' ability to challenge -- and government's ability to defend -- a multitude of public programs that involve groups with a religious affiliation." The White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives "was set up in 2001 to help religious groups compete with secular organizations for federal grants to provide social services." The case "focuses on regional conferences that promoted the initiative. The Freedom From Religion Foundation likened the conferences to 'revival meetings' and said they boosted the grant prospects for religious groups 'without similar advocacy for secular community-based organizations.'" The legal question "is not whether those conferences violated the constitutional separation of church and state, but more fundamentally when a taxpayer may even get into court to challenge such mingling of government and religion."

The Christian Science Monitor (2/28, Richey, 59K) reports, "Although the case revolves around the esoteric issue of taxpayer standing to sue, analysts say the case could foreshadow a shift in the Supreme Court's church-state jurisprudence." It "marks the first opportunity for the high court to rule in a major religion case since the retirement of key swing voter Sandra Day O'Connor and the addition of Chief Justice John Roberts and Associate Justice Samuel Alito."

More Commentary. The New York Times (2/28, 1.16M), in an editorial titled "Government By Law, Not Faith," says the Administration "is pushing an incorrect view of standing as it tries to stop the courts from reaching the First Amendment issue. Taxpayers can challenge the financing of religious activity, the administration claims, only when a Congressional statute expressly authorizes the spending. There is no statute behind the faith-based initiative. In his decision for the appeals court, Judge Richard Posner of the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit, in Chicago, convincingly explained why this argument is inconsistent with the Supreme Court's precedents on the Establishment Clause. … The justices should affirm Judge Posner's ruling so the courts can move on to the important question: Do the Bush administration's faith-based policies violate the Constitution?"

Closing Arguments Made At FBI Wrongful Imprisonment Trial. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/28, Lavoie) reports, "The FBI considered the lives of four men who spent decades in prison for a murder they didn't commit 'acceptable collateral damage' in the fight against organized crime, a lawyer for the families of the men said Tuesday. Peter Limone, Joseph Salvati and the families of two other men who died in prison after being convicted in the 1965 gangland killing of Edward 'Teddy' Deegan are suing the federal government for malicious prosecution." The AP adds, "In closing arguments Tuesday, attorney Michael Avery said Boston agents knew that FBI informant Joseph 'The Animal' Barboza lied when he named the four men as Deegan's killers. Barboza wanted to protect a fellow FBI informant, Vincent 'Jimmy' Flemmi, who was involved in Deegan's killing, Avery said." However, "Justice Department lawyer Bridge Bailey Lipscomb said Tuesday that federal authorities cannot be held responsible for the results of a state prosecution. Lipscomb said the state investigated the case for eight months and had 10 investigators working on it."

The Boston Globe (2/28, Murphy, 413K) reports that the plaintiffs' lawyers "argued yesterday that the FBI was squarely to blame for withholding critical evidence during their trial and urged a federal judge to order the government to compensate them for the decades they spent in prison. 'It was more important for the FBI to protect their informants than to protect innocent people who had families,' said Victor Garo." However, Lipscomb said, "The United States is not liable to plaintiffs because they were convicted as a result of a state prosecution. The FBI did not initiate this prosecution, and there is no duty of the FBI to submit to state or local governments any of its internal files." The Globe notes, "Three members of Congress who were involved in a two-year investigation of the FBI's mishandling of informants and had condemned the government's handling of the Deegan case were in court yesterday for final arguments, including Dan Burton, an Indiana Republican who spearheaded the probe and formerly chaired the House Committee on Government Reform."

In a Boston Herald (2/28, 184K) column titled "At What Price The FBI's Treachery?," Peter Gelzinis writes, "The story of how a ruthlessly ambitious pair of G-men, H. Paul Rico and Dennis Condon, conspired to protect a psychotic hit man and serial killer…was laid out in linear fashion, with the FBI's own internal documents as road signs. 'When you hear the story presented like that,' Bill Delahunt remarked, 'you gain a real appreciation for the culture of treachery that existed.' And still exists. As sinister and sordid as this 'liability' presentation was, the most haunting aspect of what occurred in Nancy Gertner's courtroom yesterday was when the 'damages' inflicted upon wives, children, grandparents, brothers, sisters, grandchildren -- all the so-called 'acceptable collateral damage' -- was spelled out."

DOJ_NMG_0137591

Federal Procurement Fraud Task Force Cracks Down On Contractors. The Legal Times (2/28, Schechter, Cochran, Newell) reports, "As spending on federal contracting reached record levels in recent years -- a reported $400 billion in 2005 alone -- the risks, as well as the rewards, of doing business with the federal government have never been greater." The Times continues, "The U.S. government has vowed to crack down on procurement fraud and other fraud in government programs. Last year's $3.1 billion in settlements and judgments in cases involving fraud against the government was the largest amount ever recovered in a single year. It included $615 million paid by the Boeing Co. to resolve claims relating to its use of confidential competitor information and the hiring of a former Air Force acquisition chief who had responsibility for its contracts; it also included numerous other cases involving defense procurement fraud, health-care fraud and other fraud against the government." The Times adds, "Last fall, the Justice Department launched a National Procurement Fraud Task Force to focus 'resources at all levels of government to increase criminal enforcement' in areas of procurement fraud. The stepped-up attention to this area throughout the government may signal that the $3.1 billion record in federal fraud recoveries in 2006 could soon be broken. More than 50 inspectors general from across all government departments and agencies also are actively pursuing thousands of investigations. … In addition, powerful newly installed Democratic committee and subcommittee chairs in Congress are launching dozens of oversight investigations of alleged government and contractor abuses, focusing on the reconstruction effort in Iraq and in the U.S. Gulf Coast following Hurricane Katrina, numerous areas of military and homeland-security procurement, the pricing of pharmaceuticals and other significant areas of federal contracting. For instance, House Oversight and Government Reform Committee Chairman Henry Waxman, D-Calif., in the first week of February began one set of hearings on alleged waste, fraud and abuse by government contractors in Iraq and another set of hearings on alleged overcharging by drug companies in federal health programs." The Times notes, "Contractors long have known that the government has a broad range of investigative and enforcement powers that can turn what would be a normal business dispute in a private commercial transaction into allegations of civil or criminal fraud, leading to massive fines and penalties, as well as disqualification from receiving new government contracts. Given the broad sweep of the government's investigative powers and the complexity of procurement rules, companies that are wholly innocent of an intent to fleece the feds may nonetheless find themselves under scrutiny. What is striking about the current environment is the scope and intensity of federal investigative and prosecutorial resources directed at this activity. … The procurement fraud initiative, created by Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty, was modeled after his 2005 Procurement Fraud Working Group, begun when he served as the U.S. Attorney General for the Eastern District of Virginia and led the prosecution of former Air Force acquisition chief Darleen Druyun and Boeing for contract favoritism in exchange for job offers. The current initiative focuses on virtually all areas of alleged procurement fraud, from pricing irregularities and labor mischarging, to misuse of classified and procurement sensitive information, and ethics and conflict-of-interest violations."

Attorney Claims FBI Knew Men Convicted Of Murder Were Innocent. The AP (2/28, Lavoie) reports, "The FBI considered the lives of four men who spent decades in prison for a murder they didn't commit 'acceptable collateral damage' in the fight against organized crime, a lawyer for the families of the men said Tuesday." The AP continues, "Peter Limone, Joseph Salvati and the families of two other men who died in prison after being convicted in the 1965 gangland killing of Edward "Teddy" Deegan are suing the federal government for malicious prosecution. … Lawyers have not specified the amount they are seeking, but have cited court decisions that show other plaintiffs were awarded $1 million for each year in prison." The AP adds, "In closing arguments Tuesday, attorney Michael Avery said Boston agents knew that FBI informant Joseph 'The Animal' Barboza lied when he named the four men as Deegan's killers. Barboza wanted to protect a fellow FBI informant, Vincent 'Jimmy' Flemmi, who was involved in Deegan's killing, Avery said. … The men were 'acceptable collateral damage' in the FBI's priority at the time — taking down the Mafia through the use of criminal informants, Avery said." The AP notes, "The government has argued federal authorities had no duty to share information with state officials who prosecuted Limone, Salvati, Henry Tameleo and Louis Greco. Justice Department lawyer Bridge Bailey Lipscomb said Tuesday that federal authorities cannot be held responsible for the results of a state prosecution. … Lipscomb said the state investigated the case for eight months and had 10 investigators working on it."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

FBI Launches Civil Rights Murder Probes, As Mississippi Closes Till Case. Attorney General

DOJ_NMG_0137592

Alberto Gonzales and FBI Director Robert Mueller announced at a press conference yesterday that the FBI is opening new investigations into unsolved civil rights era murders. The story is widely reported in national media, and on local TV news in the south, and many stories include Mueller's comment, "Many individuals have quite literally gotten away with murder."

The CBS Evening News (2/27, story 6, 2:25, Couric, 7.66M) reported that "a Mississippi grand jury closed the book today on" the Emmett Till "case that helped ignite the civil rights movement," but "the search for justice goes on in other cold cases dating back that that era." CBS (Orr) added that the murder of "Oneal Moore, a black deputy sheriff in Louisiana…in June 1965," is "just one of about 100 cases…now getting a fresh look from the FBI. And agents say they're pursuing promising new leads in more than a dozen of the race-related crimes." FBI Director Robert Mueller: "Too many instances, the truth has been hidden for too long. Many individuals have, quite literally, gotten away with murder." Orr: "The Justice Department concedes many of the killings may never be solved. … But the government is feeling pressure from people who have waited decades for answers. … In recent years, the FBI has been able to solve a few high-profile civil rights killings. But many more cases remain unsolved, a festering reminder of an ugly time in America."

NBC Nightly News (2/27, story 8, 1:45, Williams, 9.87M) reported that in light of the grand jury decision, Till's "murder will soon be considered a closed case." NBC (P. Williams) added, "The men suspected of killing him…have since died. One was married to the woman who said she was whistled at. She still lives," but the grand jury "has declined to prosecute her for manslaughter. … But the Justice Department says it's not turning its back on civil rights era killings. The FBI is taking a new look at more than 100 cases like the 1946 lynching of four sharecroppers in this bridge an hour east of Atlanta. … FBI agents say a dozens of cases are now under active investigation. They're hoping for a different result than in the case of Emmett Till."

In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/28) reports, "The high-priority cases, which…Mueller described as numbering between 10 and 12, are among an estimated 100 that investigators nationwide are looking at as possible civil rights-related murders. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales acknowledged that many of the cases may be beyond the boundaries of what the federal government can legally prosecute. But they 'remain on our radar,' he said…. Addressing civil rights violators, Gonzales said: 'You have not gotten away with anything -- we are still on your trail.'" The AP adds, "Mueller said the FBI began re-examining its old case files over a year ago amid of spate of civil rights cases that investigators and prosecutors successfully solved."

Under the headline "Justice Dept. Widens FBI Probe Of Deaths During Civil Rights Era," USA Today (2/28, 3A, Johnson, 2.27M) reports DOJ "is expanding significantly its review of scores of civil-rights-era homicides that the FBI says may have never been fully investigated by local authorities." Gonzales, "appearing with Mueller and national civil rights leaders, said the government's expanded review of suspicious deaths would include a nationwide plea for information on other 'cold cases' that never have been resolved, were misidentified as accidental deaths or were never previously reported. 'We can't right these wrongs, but we can try to bring some measure of justice,' Mueller said."

Also coupling the cold case and Till grand jury stories, the Washington Post (2/28, A10, Fears, 690K) notes that at yesterday's press conference, Gonzales and Mueller said "the task of closing the cases will be daunting as witnesses die and evidence disappears. … 'Many individuals have quite literally gotten away with murder,' Mueller said. But the government has a message to killers who remain alive, he said: 'You've not gotten away with anything. We're still on your trail.' The NAACP, the National Urban League and the Southern Poverty Law Center will share information with federal authorities as partners in a new Civil Rights Era Cold Case Initiative, Mueller said." Hearst Newspapers (2/28, Duray), Gannett News Service (2/28, Radelat, Mitchell), Bloomberg (2/28, Schmidt) and ABC News.com (2/27, Cook, Garber) also report on yesterday's press conference and the FBI initiative.

Meanwhile, in a widely-distributed story about the Till decision, the AP (2/28, Elliott, Breed) reports, "The district attorney…had sought a manslaughter charge against the white woman, Carolyn Bryant Donham," but the grand jury "found insufficient evidence, according to documents made public Tuesday. … 'You're looking at Mississippi. I guess it's about the same way it was 50 years ago,' said a disappointed Simeon Wright, 64, a black man who heard his cousin whistle. 'We had overwhelming evidence, and they came back with the same decision..'" The AP notes, "The FBI reopened the case in 2004 but decided in 2006 not to press charges. The case was turned over to local prosecutors, with the FBI suggesting they take a closer look at Donham. Some witnesses said a woman's voice could be heard at the scene of the abduction." The New York Times (2/28, Dewan, 1.16M) also reports on the Till decision, under the headline "After Inquiry, Grand Jury Refuses To Issue New Indictments In Till Case," noting yesterday's Gonzales-Mueller press conference in the story.

New FBI Investigations Widely-Reported On Southern Local TV. The announcement also received widespread local TV coverage across the south, generally highlighting their local unsolved cases. Some examples: WJTV-TV Jackson, MS (2/27, McCaffrey) reported on its Web site from its broadcast story, "The FBI says it hopes to solve dozens of cases that were racially based crimes. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales says the suspects have not gotten away with anything, and the government is still on their trail. With the passage of time, some worry witnesses and evidence may now be unavailable." Jerry Mitchell of the Jackson Clarion-Ledger said, "These were cases where guys got away with murder and everybody knew they were getting away with murder, so its kind of injustice at its height."

DOJ_NMG_0137593

WDEF-TV Chattanooga, TN (2/27, Parker) reported, "The FBI today announced they plan to review around a hundred unsolved deaths from the Civil Rights era in the South. And that includes two cases here in the Tennessee Valley. … FBI Director Robert Mueller says, 'As you know all too well, many murders during the Civil Rights era were not fully investigated, were covered up or were mis-identified as an accidental death or disappearance.'" WMC-TV Memphis (2/27) noted, "Nearly 50 years ago, 16-year-old Larry Payne was shot to death at what used to be a housing project. Tonight, his death is one of dozens of unsolved civil rights cases the FBI will re-open."

WCNC-TV Charlotte, NC (2/27, Crowley) reported, "They are called 'the forgotten.' They are 76 people who died in from 1952 to 1968. … Tuesday the FBI was pulling those case files and taking a second look at the information in them. Two of the cases are local. … 'We are committed to reexamining these cases and doing all we can to bring justice to the criminals who may have avoided punishment for so long,' Gonzales said."

WIS-TV Columbia, SC (2/27) reported, "The FBI says the case involving the Orangeburg Massacre may be one of the many re-opened. … It's one of three South Carolina cases local FBI agents are looking into. The attention comes following a news conference Tuesday on a nationwide initiative to investigate unsolved murders committed in the 50s and 60s. FBI Director Robert Mueller says, 'In too many instances the truth has been hidden for too long. Many individuals have quite literally gotten away with murder.'

KSLA-TV Shreveport, LA (2/27) reported, "The case of a black man killed at the hands of a white police officer in Ruston, back in 1965, may be re-opened by the FBI. Then, the shooting of John Wessley Wilder was ruled justifiable by the coroner of Lincoln parish," but the "Southern Poverty Law Center believes Wilder's death may have been racially motivated. They've brought his case, and nearly one hundred others, to the attention of the FBI."

Grand Jury Will Not Issue Indictment In 1955 Till Slaying. The AP (2/28, Elliott, Breed) reports, "All but closing the books on a crime that helped give rise to the civil rights movement, a grand jury has refused to bring any new charges in the 1955 slaying of Emmett Till, a black teenager who was beaten and shot after whistling at a white woman in the Mississippi Delta." The AP continues, "The district attorney in rural Leflore County had sought a manslaughter charge against the white woman, Carolyn Bryant Donham, who was suspected of pointing out Till to her husband to punish the boy for what was a grave offense in the segregated South. … But the grand jury last Friday issued a 'no bill,' meaning it found insufficient evidence, according to documents made public Tuesday." The AP adds, "Federal authorities decided last year not to prosecute anyone, saying the statute of limitations for federal charges had run out. Mississippi authorities represented the last, best hope of bringing someone to justice. No one has ever been convicted in the slaying."

The New York Times (2/28, Dewan) reports, "Two men, now dead, admitted to the killing in 1956 after they were acquitted by an all-white jury in Sumner, Miss. But the Justice Department reopened the case in 2004 in search of others who had participated in the beating and shooting of Emmett, a black 14-year-old. By then, so much time had passed that the country store where the victim was said to have whistled at a white woman, Carolyn Bryant, was in ruins." The Times continues, "The new inquiry was conducted by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, which turned over a report of more than 8,000 pages to the district attorney, Joyce L. Chiles. Ms. Chiles sought a manslaughter charge against Ms. Bryant, 73, the last known living suspect in the case, but the grand jury decided last week not to issue an indictment, a court clerk said. The action was reported Tuesday in The Jackson Clarion-Ledger. … 'If Carolyn Bryant is truly not guilty in being involved in the killing of Emmett Till or there is insufficient evidence to indict her, then the grand jury did the right thing,' said Alvin Sykes, the president of the Emmett Till Justice Campaign. … The grand jury's decision illustrates the difficulty of prosecuting such old cases, even as the Justice Department has begun its first systematic effort to identify them. At a news conference on Tuesday in Washington, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and Robert S. Mueller III, the director of the F.B.I., said about a dozen such cases had been selected, from a list of about 100, for immediate action. … 'New information, sometimes an innocuous small bit of information, can be crucial to breaking these decades-old cases,' Mr. Gonzales said. 'A secret harbored for many years can be the piece of evidence we need to make our case.'"

The Los Angeles Times (2/28, Jarvie, Fausset) reports, "The murder case of Emmett Till — one of the most infamous slayings of the civil rights era — appears to be drawing to a fruitless close 52 years after the black teenager whistled at a white woman, then turned up dead in Mississippi's Tallahatchie River." The Times continues, "It was disclosed Tuesday that a grand jury in Leflore County, Miss., had declined to bring a manslaughter indictment against Carolyn Bryant Donham, the white shopkeeper who witnesses said

DOJ_NMG_0137594

Till had admired one August afternoon in the rural community of Money, Miss. … Donham, 73, was suspected of pointing out Till to her then-husband, Roy Bryant. He and his half brother, J.W. Milam, were charged in the killing of the 14-year-old but were acquitted by an all-white jury in 1955 after a little more than an hour of deliberations. A year later they admitted in a magazine interview that they had killed Till." The Times adds, "Till's family has watched with hope in recent years as a parade of old and often recalcitrant Southerners have been dragged into court and found guilty of heinous crimes against blacks. But Tuesday, it felt like a door briefly open to the past — and, potentially, to justice — had been shut for good. … 'This was our last hope — and it was dashed today,' said Simeon Wright, 64, Till's cousin, who was with him at the grocery store and heard him whistle at Donham. 'The Emmett Till case started with one person, and that person is still alive. She played a role in identifying Emmett, she participated in his kidnapping, and now she is getting away with murder.' … Donham, who is thought to be a resident of Greenwood, Miss., could not be reached for comment. She has long maintained her innocence to the FBI, and chances of new charges, although possible, appear slim."

DOJ Drops Probe Of Virginia Church Zoning Dispute. The Lynchburg (VA) News & Advance (2/28, Faulconer) reports, "The U.S. Department of Justice has decided to step out of a zoning dispute between a Moneta 'cowboy' church and Bedford County officials." The N&A continues, "In letters this month to the Rev. Raymond Bell of the Cowboy Church of Virginia and Bedford's community development director George Nester, the federal department concluded no further action is warranted in deciding if Bedford zoning laws infringe upon a federal act that protects religious land use. … The Cowboy Church holds services in a large barn off Horseshoe Bend Road in Moneta." The N&A adds, "Six months ago, the department began investigating if the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act was violated. Bell has been against the county's requirement that a special use permit be obtained to hold religious services, claiming it violates the separation of church and state. … Nester said it's standard procedure that churches obtain a special use permit to hold religious services in newly constructed buildings or new additions to existing buildings. … He said Tuesday he is pleased and relieved that the investigation has been dropped, but some questions still remain. For instance, he doesn't know if the matter was dropped because the church asked it to be or because there is a violation. The letter doesn't state whether a violation took place." The N&A notes, "A spokesperson for the Department of Justice declined to comment Tuesday about the matter. Bell declined to comment also and said he would have more to say later this week. … The Cowboy Church started meeting about a year ago in the Moneta barn, on a farm owned by Garland Simmons. Since then, it has been involved in zoning red tape with the county. … The county originally said using the barn as a church violated building codes and was unsafe for large gatherings. That matter has since been resolved because it was determined the structure is not predominantly used as a church, Nester said."

Rep. Rohrabacher To Present New Evidence In Shooting Involving Former Border Patrol Agents. The El Paso (TX) Times (2/28) reports the "drug smuggler who was shot…by two El Paso Border Patrol agents who went to prison for it was involved in another drug smuggling attempt," according to U.S. Rep. Dana Rohrabacher. Rohrabacher "said he would talk today in a news conference in Washington, D.C., about new evidence he said proves that Osvaldo Aldrete Davila was again involved in drug smuggling after the Feb. 17, 2005, shooting." U.S. Attorney Johnny Sutton "had repeatedly denied knowledge of a second arrest, but Rohrabacher said Sutton's statements were misleading because Aldrete Davila was not arrested either time." Rohrabacher "said Sutton was briefed by the Drug Enforcement Administration about Aldrete Davila's 'direct involvement' in a second offense."

Supervisors In California Support Former Agents. The Inland Valley Daily Bulletin (2/28) reports that according to a unanimous resolution by San Bernardino County's Board of Supervisors, President Bush "should consider pardoning two former Border Patrol agents convicted of shooting an alleged drug smuggler. … The agents, Ignacio Ramos…and Jose Alonso Compean…were convicted last year of shooting Aldrete-Davila, who allegedly brought a van loaded with marijuana across the border from Mexico." He "was granted immunity for his testimony against the agents."

Fayetteville, NC, To Draw New Voting Maps. The Fayetteville (NC) Observer (2/28, Worthington) reports, "Residents will get their say March 29 on the boundaries for six Fayetteville City Council districts. … The City Council will hold a public hearing that evening at 7." The Observer continues, "The council is drawing new maps in response to the Feb. 6 election. Residents voted in favor of a council with six members representing districts and three members elected at-large. The current council has nine members, all elected from districts. … The change must be approved by the U.S. Department of Justice. The city is trying to have the plan and map approved by April. The city hopes to have federal approval in time for the July filing date for the municipal elections." The Observer adds, "City Council members met Tuesday with their redistricting lawyer, Michael Crowell, to discuss options for drawing the six districts. …

DOJ_NMG_0137595

The Department of Justice will look at the map to make sure it does not affect minority voting. Crowell has said he believes a map that has three districts where minorities constitute the majority of voters will pass federal review."

Meehan To Reintroduce Bill Lifting Ban On Gays In The Military. USA Today (2/28, Stone, 2.27M) reports Rep. Marty Meehan will reintroduce his Military Readiness Enhancement Act, which would repeal the "don't ask, don't tell" policy President Clinton "approved in 1993 as a compromise between ending a ban and gays serving openly. That would leave gays free to serve without limits. … The measure had 122 co-sponsors last year but died in the Republican-controlled Congress. Now that Democrats are in charge, Meehan plans to hold hearings as early as April. He says the bill has more than 100 original co-sponsors and seven freshmen. Three Republicans have signed on, including Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen of Florida. She says her husband, Dexter, was cared for by a lesbian nurse when he was injured during combat in Vietnam." USA Today notes that "since the policy began, nearly 11,000 troops, the equivalent of an Army division, have been discharged."

Iraq War Vet Who Lost Leg Backs Meehan Bill. The Washington Post (2/28, C1, Vargas, 690K) interviews retired Sgt. Eric Alva, "lost his right leg when he stepped on a land mine on March 21, 2003, the first day of Operation Iraqi Freedom. As the war's first injured soldier, Alva was an instant celebrity. He was on 'Oprah.' President Bush awarded him the Purple Heart. Donald Rumsfeld visited. … Today he'll stand alongside" Meehan. Alva is quoted as saying, "I have to say something. I mean, you're asking men and women to lie about their orientation, to keep their personal lives private, so they can defend the rights and freedoms of others in this country. … That's one factor. The other factor is, we're losing probably thousands of men and women that are skilled at certain types of jobs, from air traffic controllers to linguists, because of this broken policy."

Sex Abuse Scandal At Texas Juvenile Schools Sparks Uproar. The New York Times (2/28, Blumenthal) reports from Austin, TX, "A long-simmering scandal over sexual abuse of juveniles at schools for youthful offenders broke into the open on Tuesday with an outraged state senator calling for a takeover of the troubled Texas Youth Commission." The Times continues, "At a school in West Texas, a youth commission official acknowledged at a hearing of the State Senate Criminal Justice Committee, the school's superintendent was aware that two supervisors routinely awakened boys for late-night encounters behind closed doors in deserted offices. … The two supervisors — one of whom had been transferred from another state school after pornography was found on his work computer — were allowed to resign in 2005 without charges. One became the principal of a charter school in Midland, Tex., state officials said. The superintendent was promoted to director of juvenile corrections, a post he still holds, the youth commission confirmed." The Times adds, "Gov. Rick Perry, a Republican, called the revelations 'absolutely reprehensible' and would not rule out a takeover, said a spokesman, Ted Royer. … Accusations that staff members at the West Texas State School in Pyote were sexually preying on youths there were made to the youth commission as early as December 2003, according to a timeline presented at the hearing. … The complaints did not reach the Texas Rangers until February 2005 and remained largely secret until accounts began appearing in recent weeks on the Web site of the Texas Observer and the pages of The Dallas Morning News. … The problems were widespread at the agency, which annually places some 3,000 juveniles ages 10 to 17 at the time of their felonies in 13 secure schools, senators and witnesses said."

ANTITRUST:

House To Hold Hearing On Proposed XM-Sirius Merger. The Washington Post (2/28, D1, Babington) reports, "Congress and federal regulators need to get with the times. … That's the message that Mel Karmazin, chief executive of Sirius Satellite Radio, plans to deliver today at the first public hearing on a proposal to merge the nation's two satellite radio companies, Sirius and XM Satellite Radio Holdings." The Post continues, "Karmazin, who will face skeptical members of the House Judiciary Committee's newly formed antitrust task force, says satellite radio is in stiff competition not only with free, over-the-air radio but also with such newer products as MP3 players, Internet radio and music-downloading cellphones. "What I need to do is lay out the realities of the marketplace as we see it," Karmazin said in a telephone interview yesterday. … He can expect resistance. 'What I'm concerned about now is whether we're creating a monopolistic situation,' Rep. John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.), who will chair the task force hearing, said in an interview yesterday. 'I don't think it will stimulate competition, and it could very well take away from the competition taking place now in the industry.'" The Post adds, "The Justice Department and Federal Communications Commission, not Congress, will decide whether to allow Washington-based XM and New York-based Sirius to merge. But today's hearing seems certain to introduce the chief arguments for and against the plan, whose outcome may not be decided for nearly a year. … Sharing a witness table with opponents from the broadcast industry and consumer groups, Karmazin said he will remind Congress that XM and Sirius charge customers about $13 a month and struggle to attract enough subscribers to make money."

DOJ_NMG_0137596

Sirius CEO Selling Merger. The New York Times (2/28, Siklos) reports, "The chief executive of Sirius Satellite Radio, Mel Karmazin, is taking the campaign to sell his company's proposed merger with XM Satellite Radio to Washington." The Times continues, "On Monday, Mr. Karmazin appeared on the often-bawdy Howard Stern show on Sirius. Today, he will speak at a hearing of the newly created House Antitrust Task Force in Washington. … 'I absolutely welcome the opportunity because I think there is a lot of misinformation out there about the merger,' Mr. Karmazin said of the hearing." The Times adds, "In particular the National Association of Broadcasters, which represents the commercial radio stations and has been an opponent of satellite radio, has warned that the merger announced last week would create a monopoly that would limit consumer choice and lead to higher prices. … Mr. Karmazin said yesterday that he would tell the task force that the opposite was true. Consumers will be more inclined to subscribe to a single service, he said, because XM and Sirius delivered exclusive programming — like Mr. Stern on Sirius and the Major League Baseball on XM — that the other service does not. … And he said he was willing to commit to the Federal Communications Commission that the merger would lower consumer prices below the $12.95 a month both charge, although he did not specify how much."

The Financial Times (2/28, Washington) reports, "Mel Karmazin, the chief executive of Sirius, is expected to receive a sceptical reception today when he appears before a congressional committee to defend the satellite radio company's proposed $11.4bn merger with rival XM." The Times continues, "John Conyers, the Democratic chairman of the House judiciary committee, like legislators on both sides of the aisle, is suspicious not only about the benefits to the public of yet another mega-media merger. Mr Conyers is also unconvinced - so far - of the merits of the legal argument on which, lawyers agree, the fate of the entire deal rests." The Times adds, "To prove that the merger of the only two satellite radio companies in the US will not lead to a monopoly, Mr Karmazin and a team of antitrust attorneys and lobbyists will have to prove that other devices and media outlets - from terrestrial radio to iPods to mobile phones - will constrain the merged entity enough to prevent it from raising prices. … Ultimately Congress will not have a formal say on whether or not the deal will be approved, but political pressure can influence the two government agencies that will investigate the deal: the Department of Justice, the chief antitrust authority, and the Federal Communications Commission, the media regulator. … Lawyers working on the deal said this week the combined company's prices would also be constrained by the fact it would seek to attract the 90 per cent of the US population that does not subscribe to either group."

Sirius Narrows Loss As Revenue Increases. The Wall Street Journal (2/28, C10, Sheng) reports, "Sirius Satellite Radio Inc., which recently agreed to merge with rival XM Satellite Holdings Inc., posted a narrower fourth-quarter net loss Tuesday as revenue more than doubled and subscriber growth continued." The Journal continues, "Sirius, New York, which boasts a programming lineup that includes shock jock Howard Stern and National Football League games, also said it expects to end the year with eight million subscribers, up from its current 6.02 million, and to post total revenue of about $1 billion. … The country's second-largest satellite radio company behind XM Satellite, Sirius said the results pointed to its continued strength. Since adding Howard Stern and others to its lineup, the operator has enjoyed stronger retail sales growth than its rival." The Journal adds, "Sirius added 905,247 net new subscribers during the quarter, down from 1.14 million a year ago. By contrast, XM Satellite said Monday it added 442,679 net new subscribers during the quarter, down from 898,315 the year earlier. Last year's fourth quarter was the first holiday season before the highly hyped Mr. Stern started airing exclusively on Sirius. The buzz around Mr. Stern last year helped boost subscriber additions at both satellite radio companies to record levels. … For the full year 2006, Sirius said it added 2.7 million, up from 2.17 million the year before. XM said Monday it added 1.7 million net new subscribers in 2006, compared with 2.2 million the year before. … Sirius posted a fourth-quarter loss of $245.6 million, or 17 cents a share, compared with a loss of $311.4 million, or 23 cents a share, in the year-earlier period."

More Commentary. The Wall Street Journal (2/28, A15), David R. Henderson, a research fellow at the Hoover Institution, writes, "In expressing its strong reservations about the proposed merger between Sirius and XM, the Federal Communications Commission seems to think that there are only two competitors and that a merger would reduce the number to one. But that's true only if the relevant market is the satellite broadcasting market. … In fact, the market is much larger, including at a minimum all existing radio stations. If you doubt that, ask yourself how you would decide whether or not to subscribe to Sirius or XM. Surely a big part of your decision is the quality and range of programming you can get on 'free' radio." Henderson continues, "That alone is strong enough evidence for allowing the merger. But there is even stronger evidence, and it has to do with how XM's and Sirius's 'free-radio' competitors view the merger. … Here we might draw upon the wisdom of MIT economist Morris Adelman, who wrote about 50 years ago: 'A useful if not very precise index of the strength of competition . . . is the resentment of unsuccessful competitors.' … In other words, if some competitors in an industry resent others and even end up going out of business, competition is alive and well. It's when the competitors get too cozy that we need to worry. It follows that if existing competitors oppose a merger, the merger is likely to be good for consumers." Henderson concludes, "If competitors began to anticipate that regulators would take into account their opposition to, or support of, a merger, they might try to game the system. If they actually wanted the merger blocked, they would publicly support it. If they thought prices would rise after the merger to their benefit, they might publicly oppose it. … But we can trust that the FCC is not thinking that way, as it is still hung up on a fallaciously narrow definition of the market. This is the bottom line: If the FCC cares about consumers and not about making things cozy for traditional broadcasters, it should allow the XM-Sirius merger."

DOJ_NMG_0137597

TXU Profit Up 33 Percent Last Quarter. The AP (2/28) reports, "The Dallas-based utility TXU Corporation reported a 33 percent increase in profit yesterday, despite weak revenue caused by mild winter weather, but another Texas utility, Dynegy, swung to a loss of $58 million as revenue fell and it took charges for a revamping." The AP continues, "TXU, which has accepted an offer to be bought for $45 billion in what would be the largest leveraged buyout ever, said it earned $475 million, or $1.03 a share, up from $356 million, or 74 cents a share, in the fourth quarter a year earlier. … Excluding what TXU termed one-time charges, the company said it would have earned $1.20 a share, which matched the forecast of analysts, who usually exclude those items from their estimates." The AP adds, "For all of 2006, TXU said it earned $2.55 billion, or $5.46 a share, up from $1.71 billion, or $2.50 a share, in 2005. … Dynegy, a power producer based in Houston that flirted with bankruptcy a few years ago, said yesterday that its loss for the fourth quarter was 12 cents a share, in contrast to a profit of $293 million, or 74 cents a share, in the quarter a year ago, when income from discontinued operations lifted results." The AP notes, "Sales fell 36 percent, to $397 million, from $622 million in the year-ago period. For all of 2006, Dynegy said it lost $342 million, or 75 cents a share, as it incurred $343 million in after-tax charges related to its financial revamping. … The company said that it was positioning itself for growth, starting with the $4.1 billion acquisition of the generating power of a rival, the privately held LS Power Group; that deal is to be completed by the end of March. … The two companies also plan to become joint-venture partners in nine power plants under development."

Future Of TXU Discussed At Private Equity Conference. The New York Times (2/28, Sorkin) reports, "Will anyone dare to mount a rival bid for TXU? … That was the question being whispered yesterday in Frankfurt where many of the world's private equity chiefs were gathered for Super Return, one of the industry's best-attended gatherings." The Times continues, "Speakers included David Bonderman of the Texas Pacific Group, which helped to lead Monday's $45 billion TXU takeover; Todd Fisher of Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Company, the other lead investor in the TXU deal; and Stephen A. Schwarzman of the Blackstone Group, considered one of the most likely candidates to try to crash the TXU sale. … A private equity firm's effort to break up the TXU deal could be a crucial test of the intertwined relationships that so far have limited all-out brawls. Critics contend that the firms, which frequently partner with one another, have a gentleman's agreement not to start bidding wars once a deal is struck." The Times adds, "As an illustration of the clubbiness of the private equity business, no private equity firm to date has publicly tried to top an offer from one its rivals. The Justice Department started an informal inquiry into the possibility of collusion at at least four of the big firms — Kohlberg Kravis Roberts; the Carlyle Group; Silver Lake Partners; and Clayton, Dubilier & Rice — last fall. … It is an issue, among many, that has the buyout kings worried. Mr. Bonderman said during his keynote speech that the industry's image was 'something that's probably on everybody's mind.' … The industry may have begun to change that with its 'green' deal for TXU — among other things, the buyers agreed to scuttle plans for several new coal-fired power plants. A bidding battle over a deal could further change its reputation for mutual back-scratching."

6th Circuit Panel Sides With Cigarette Maker In Pricing Dispute. The AP (2/28, Mansfield) reports, "A federal appeals court on Tuesday rejected a lawsuit by 22 cigarette wholesalers claiming that R.J. Reynolds Co.'s discount pricing program was discriminatory." The AP continues, "The 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati affirmed a summary judgment in favor of the North Carolina-based tobacco company, a part of Reynolds American Inc., issued in 2005 by U.S. District Judge J. Ronnie Greer in Greeneville. … 'Defendant's program is designed to promote its financial welfare at the expense of the wholesalers,' the appeals court wrote. 'Perhaps it is unfair, but it is not illegal.'" The AP adds, "Smith Wholesale Co. Inc. of Johnson City and the other wholesalers claimed they experienced 'millions of dollars in lost profits' when Reynolds instituted a discount program in 2000 to boost sales of its so-called second-tier nonpremium 'savings' brands of cigarettes. … Reynolds, based in Winston-Salem, N.C., offered discounts and rebates to wholesalers selling the highest volume of Reynolds products. The plaintiffs, mostly smaller distributors in the Southeast, said that put them at a disadvantage because they had to cater to consumers demanding even cheaper cigarettes sold by other manufacturers. … 'Plaintiffs allege that the (program) disfavors them because, unlike RJR's other distributors, they operate largely in rural 'low-end' segments of the market where their retail customers demand fourth-tier brands, and RJR does not price any of its brands at the fourth-tier price level,' the court wrote. … The three-judge panel concluded that Reynolds' market-share discount program 'was offered to all wholesalers using a non-discriminatory formula. It was therefore functionally available to all wholesalers not only in theory, but in fact.' … The plaintiffs' ability to qualify for the discounts 'was a matter of marketing strategy and brand prioritization,' the court wrote. Since 'price discrimination has not been established,' the judges said, 'plaintiffs' claim therefore fails as a matter of law.'"

DOJ_NMG_0137598

WMware Blasts Microsoft Over Customer Choice Restrictions. CNET News.com (2/28, Shankland) reports, "VMware, the incumbent power in the blossoming realm of virtualization, has accused Microsoft of using foul play to promote its own competing products." CNET continues, "In a white paper published Friday, the EMC subsidiary said Microsoft is using Windows licensing terms to prevent customers from taking full advantage of virtualization. … 'Microsoft is trying to restrict customers' flexibility and freedom to choose virtualization software by limiting who can run their software and how they can run it,' VMware said." CNET adds, "The software giant rejected VMware's assertions. … 'Microsoft believes the claims made in VMware's white paper contain several inaccuracies and misunderstandings of our current license and use policies, our support policy and our commitment to technology collaboration,' Mike Neil, Microsoft's general manager of virtualization strategy, said in a statement Tuesday. 'We believe that we are being progressive and fair with our existing licensing and use policies and creating a level playing field for partners and customers,' he said … Neil added that he believes Microsoft and VMware will be able to settle their differences." CNET notes, "The Microsoft-VMware debate spotlights the difficult adjustments necessary, as the industry moves into a world where a new software layer breaks the hard link between operating systems and the hardware they use. … There are technical challenges. Software can't be as tightly tied to hardware such as hard drives or network cards, and an operating system might be moved from an overtaxed dual-processor server at one moment to a more powerful eight-processor machine the next. … And there are business challenges too, as companies such as Microsoft and VMware jockey for technology leadership and customer account control."

One Defendant In Midwest Hospital Antitrust Suit Reaches Settlement. The Kansas City Star (2/28, Karash) reports, "The fight isn't over, but an olive branch has appeared in a local health-care antitrust controversy." The Star continues, "The case involves Heartland Spine & Specialty Hospital of Overland Park. In 2005 Heartland sued several area hospitals and health insurers, alleging a conspiracy to drive it out of business in violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act. … The lawsuit alleged a conspiracy that included insurers refusing managed-care contracts to Heartland. Heartland said being shut out of those networks caused it severe financial damage." The Star adds, "Mary Nan Holley, Heartland's chief executive officer, said last week that the hospital had worked out a settlement with one defendant, UnitedHealthcare, effective March 1. That means Heartland will become an in-network provider for about 350,000 UnitedHealthcare members in western Missouri and eastern Kansas. … Holley said UnitedHealthcare was the first defendant to settle and, as a result, will be the first major insurer in the area to allow Heartland in its network. The arrangement is expected to increase Heartland's patient volume 15 percent to 20 percent, she said. The hospital last year had 827 inpatient admissions and 8,142 outpatient encounters." The Star notes, "The settlement is confidential, but it is no secret that most of Heartland's 150 or so employees receive their health insurance through UnitedHealthcare. … The remaining defendants in the lawsuit are: HCA Midwest Division; St. Luke's Health System; Carondelet Health; Shawnee Mission Medical Center; North Kansas City Hospital; Blue Cross and Blue Shield of Kansas City; Coventry Health Care of Kansas; Humana Health Plan; Aetna; and Cigna HealthCare of Kansas/Missouri. … The case is scheduled to go to trial April 1, 2008, in federal court in Wichita."

FTC Clears Onex Bid For Kodak's X-Ray Unit. Bloomberg (2/28, Rowley) reports, "Onex Corp., Canada's largest buyout firm, won U.S. antitrust clearance to purchase Eastman Kodak Co.'s health-care imaging unit, including an X-ray business the world's largest photography company started in 1896." Bloomberg continues, "The transaction was on a list of completed merger reviews published by the Federal Trade Commission in Washington." Bloomberg adds, "Kodak said in announcing the sale on Jan. 10 that it will be paid at least $2.35 billion in cash and up to $200 million more if certain milestones are met. The sale will allow Kodak, based in Rochester, New York, to pay down debt as it tries to build its digital photography business."

Judge Puts Qualcomm Patent Dispute With Nokia On Hold. The Wall Street Journal (2/28, B11) reports, "Nokia Corp. said a U.S. judge overseeing a patent dispute initiated by Qualcomm Inc. has put the proceedings on hold until further notice." The Journal continues, "Qualcomm, based in San Diego, has alleged the Finnish company violated several patents used to make U.S.

DOJ_NMG_0137599

cellphones running on the global system for mobile communications, or GSM, standard. … The patents were originally used for a rival technology called code division multiple access, or CDMA, which Qualcomm helped pioneer. Nokia maintains it hasn't infringed any of Qualcomm's patents. The administrative-law judge overseeing the International Trade Commission investigation has two options: dismiss the proceeding or resume the investigation." The Journal adds, "Richard Windsor, an analyst at Nomura, said the decision is likely 'about giving them more opportunity to reach an agreement.' Nokia said that since Qualcomm filed its complaint, it has voluntarily withdrawn three of the six patents from the suit."

ENVIRONMENT:

Los Alamos Operator Cited For Safety Violations. The AP (2/28) reports from Los Alamos, NM, "The National Nuclear Security Administration proposed a $1.1 million civil penalty against the former manager of a nuclear weapons lab for safety violations that included a researcher spreading radiological contamination to two other states and workers inhaling radioactive substances." The AP continues, "The agency announced the notice of violation Monday against the University of California for infractions that occurred in 2005, when UC was the sole manager of Los Alamos National Laboratory. … The notice spells out 15 separate incidents that violated the Department of Energy's nuclear safety rules." The AP adds, "The incidents include a Los Alamos researcher opening a package of slightly enriched uranium nitride pellets. The package was contaminated with americium 241, a radioactive decay product of plutonium. … The researcher unloaded the pellets without the help of a radiological control technician, and he spread the contamination to his home and places he visited in Colorado and Kansas. … Another incident involved workers who inhaled radioactive substances. … In both cases, the contamination was limited by 'good fortune' but had the potential to be significantly greater, acting NNSA director Thomas P. D'Agostino wrote in a Feb. 16 letter to lab director Michael Anastasio." The AP notes, "The notice also referred to a November 2005 inspection that exposed "long-standing" deficiencies in the lab's safety, health and environmental programs. … Since federal law exempted the non-profit university from financial liability at the time of the violations, the UC will not have to pay the fine. But the agency warned the lab's new management team - installed less than a year ago, in part to reverse years of security and safety problems - that those days are over. … 'Due both to the recent contract change and changes in the civil penalty provisions of the Atomic Energy Act, future monetary civil penalties imposed ... as part of a notice of violation will no longer be waived,' D'Agostino wrote."

Scientists Call For Action To Avoid Climate "Tipping Point." USA Today (2/28, 10D, O'Driscoll, 2.27M) reports, "Declaring there is 'no more time for delay,' an international panel of scientists urged the world's nations Tuesday to stave off climate-change 'catastrophe' by boosting clean-energy research and sharply cutting industrial emissions that fuel global warming. Otherwise, Earth this century could cross a climate threshold or 'tipping point that could lead to intolerable impacts on human well-being,' says the 166-page report prepared for the United Nations." The "two-year study, issued by the U.N. Foundation, says the risk of tipping over that climate threshold rises sharply if Earth's temperature increases 3.6 to 4.5 degrees above what it was in 1750 (it is 1.2 degrees above that point now)." The "scientists say a climate turnaround will take a huge effort."

The Los Angeles Times (2/28, Hotz, 850K) says the panel "called for bold actions, including carbon taxes, a ban on conventional coal-fired power plants and an end to beachfront construction worldwide." The scientists "urged stricter fuel efficiency standards, as well as fuel taxes, registration fees and rebates that favor more efficient transportation." They "also recommended the expanded use of biofuels" and "endorsed broader use of nuclear power, if it can be made safer. Energy research budgets worldwide ought to triple, they said." The researchers also "called for improved designs of energy-efficient appliances, office equipment and 'greener' commercial and residential buildings."

Scholar Praises Asia Pacific Partnership As Way To Curb Greenhouse Gases. In an op-ed in The Hill (2/28), Dr. Margo Thorning of the International Center for Capital Formation, a European think tank, writes, "While President Bush outlined bold steps in his State of the Union address to slow the growth of U.S. greenhouse gas emissions, Democratic leaders on Capitol Hill appear aggressively set on their own track to tackle the issue." But "before the nation is led down the path of the Kyoto protocol or the dramatic carbon dioxide emission reductions adopted in California,...a close look should be given to the high price tag of such 'solutions.'" Unless "the new majority in Congress looks at GHG reductions on a global scale, mandatory emission reductions in the U.S. would be all pain and little or no gain for the environment. A good first step for Congress would be to approve the $52 million in seed money for the Asia Pacific Partnership on Clean Development and Climate (AP6) as prescribed by the 2005 energy bill. The goals of the AP6 agreement are to promote both global economic development and the use of cleaner, less-emitting energy technologies."

NYTimes Praises TXU Buyout Deal, Says Congress Must Put Price On Carbon. Says Congress Should Drive

DOJ_NMG_0137600

Business To For In an editorial, the New York Times (2/28, 1.16M) writes, "People who worry about global warming...received some very good news over the weekend from a very unlikely source. As part of an ambitious buyout deal, TXU, a Texas utility that has long been a target of environmentalists, will abandon plans to build eight old-style coal-burning power plants." In "a gesture of potentially broad political consequence," the buyers "pledged to join other forward-looking companies in backing federal legislation imposing mandatory limits on emissions of carbon dioxide." The deal is "further evidence that the capital markets are becoming increasingly sensitive to the climate change issue. But the country and the environment cannot depend on good sense or even good business sense to persuade other corporate leaders to follow Kohlberg Kravis Roberts and Texas Pacific. Congress needs to move briskly toward legislation that would put a price on carbon, either by taxing it or capping emissions."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Grassley Asks Whether FBI Whistleblower's Supervisors Face Punishment. The AP (2/28, Frommer) reports, "One of the Senate's most vocal defenders of government whistleblowers wants to know if the FBI plans to discipline agents who a court found had retaliated against a Minneapolis agent who filed a sexual-discrimination complaint." Sen. Charles Grassley "sent the letter to FBI Director Robert S. Mueller on Monday regarding the case of Minneapolis agent Jane Turner, who recently won a $565,000 judgment against the agency. 'Given that her allegations have now been substantiated, I am writing to you for information about how you intend to hold supervisors accountable for the acts of retaliation,' Grassley wrote in a letter to Mueller." The AP notes, "Records show Turner was rated superior or exceptional in her job reviews until she filed a sex discrimination complaint against her supervisor." Turner said yesterday, "Senior managers in the FBI, by feeling they are a law unto themselves, are losing the legal and moral authority for the FBI."

Under the headline "Accounting Sought From FBI Director," the Minneapolis Star Tribune (2/28, Browning, 395K) reports, "The agent who directly supervised Turner when she filed her discrimination complaint, Craig Welken, has since retired. But the other two agents Grassley inquired about -- James (Chip) Burrus and James Casey -- still work for the FBI. … Mueller has said previously that he would not tolerate retaliation against FBI whistleblowers, a fact underscored by Grassley in his letter. 'Actions speak louder than words,' Grassley wrote." The Washington Times (2/28, Seper, 88K) notes, "Mr. Burrus is the assistant director of the FBI's criminal investigative division and Mr. Casey is chief of the bureau's counterterrorism section."

Pharmacists, Athletes, Celebrities Accused In Investigation Of Fraudulent Internet Drug Sales. There are more than 200 media references to an Orlando pharmacy raid Tuesday, which was reported to be part of a long-term investigation into illegal steroid and human growth hormone sales. Most news outlets used the AP story and many, including the AP, cited a story first posted on the Web site of New York's Albany Times-Union. The AP (2/28) reports athletes and celebrities "were involved as customers of an illicit steroid sales network that produced arrests of four company officials on Tuesday," according to a New York prosecutor. However, Albany County District Attorney P. David Soares "declined to name any consumers. He said his office was not investigating patients, but alleged producers and distributors, including doctors and pharmacists." Soares "was in Florida on Tuesday for two pharmacy raids conducted by federal and state agents at two Signature Pharmacy stores. Four company officials, including a married couple who are both pharmacists, were arrested. They were charged with criminal diversion of prescription medications and prescriptions, criminal sale of a controlled substance and insurance fraud." The AP notes that authorities said a search turned up a "raid card" at Signature Pharmacy employees' desks, and the top of the documents "identified it as a Food and Drug Administration/Drug Enforcement Agency telephone list, but only lawyers were on the card." CBS News, FOX News, MSNBC, Forbes, the San Francisco Chronicle, San Jose Mercury News, Houston Chronicle, and Baltimore Sun are among the news outlets that used the AP story.

In Orlando, the Albany (NY) Times Union (2/28) reports a downtown pharmacy "was raided by a law enforcement task force on Tuesday, the climax of a large New York state grand jury investigation into Internet drug sales that could expose widespread illicit steroid use by professional athletes and thousands of people across the nation. The unprecedented inquiry, led by Albany County's district attorney, has taken New York narcotics agents and an Orlando-based federal task force deep inside a maze of shadowy pharmacies and Web sites that have reaped millions of dollars in profit by allegedly exploiting federal and state prescription laws, according to court records." The Times Union "has learned that investigators in the year-old case…uncovered evidence that testosterone and other performance-enhancing drugs may have been fraudulently prescribed over the Internet to current and former Major League Baseball players, National Football League players, college athletes, high school coaches, a former Mr. Olympia champion and another leading contender in the bodybuilding competition."

DOJ_NMG_0137601

The New York Times (2/28) reports the arrests "followed a two-year investigation by the Albany County district attorney into Internet drug sales in New York State. The investigation spanned at least three states, and included numerous people reported to be customers of the pharmacy, including current and former Major League Baseball players, National Football League players, college athletes, coaches and doctors. At least two dozen other individuals are expected to face indictment in New York, according…Soares…including several doctors and pharmacists. At a news conference in Orlando on Tuesday, he said that three people from Texas whom he described as distributors in the operation had been arrested earlier, and that five other doctors would face professional disciplinary charges."

In Miami, the Washington Post (2/28) reports several professional athletes "were clients of another pharmacy in Mobile, Ala., that might have provided illicit drugs to professional athletes. The owners of that pharmacy recently were indicted in Albany County, the Times-Union reported. An attorney for that pharmacy, Applied Pharmacy Services, did not respond to a request for comment. Both of the pharmacies offered prescriptions over the Internet, which federal investigators believe has become a primary source for illicit sales of performance-enhancing drugs in recent years as pharmacists skirt lenient laws governing the industry."

The Orlando Sentinel (2/27) reported federal and state narcotics agents "arrested the owners of an Orlando pharmacy Tuesday as part of a New York state investigation into the sale of steroids and other performance enhancers to professional and college athletes over the Internet. Stan and Naomi Loomis, both licensed pharmacists who own the Signature Pharmacy in downtown Orlando and another nearby, and Stan's brother, Mike Loomis, were arrested." Carl Metzger, narcotics commander for Orlando's metropolitan bureau of investigation, "said authorities found a phone list at numerous employees' desks with contact information for lawyers and representatives with the Drug Enforcement Administration and the Food and Drug Administration."

Bloomberg (2/28, Matuszewski) reports, "As many as 24 people, including six doctors and three pharmacists, face felony charges for unlawfully distributing anabolic steroids and other controlled substances. The businesses shut by yesterday's arrests are believed to supply a large portion of the national market of the on-line sale of steroids, human-growth hormone and other illegal substances, Soares said. Statewide sales in New York totaled more than $10 million."

Sports Illustrated/CNN (2/27) reported, "As part of a broad operation to crack down on the sale of performance-enhancing drugs over the Internet, authorities raided an Orlando pharmacy and a Jupiter, Fla., 'anti-aging' clinic Tuesday morning. Sports Illustrated reporters Luis Fernando Llosa and L. Jon Wertheim accompanied investigators on the Jupiter raid, which authorities believe will reveal a trove of athletes as clients. … Authorities tell us that Signature Pharmacy in Orlando, which was also raided on Tuesday, did $17 million in business with Palm Beach Rejuvenation alone. When Diamondbacks pitcher, Jason Grimsley had his home raided last summer, he admitted to investigators that he was well aware of a conduit between steroids/HGH and wellness centers."

On its Web site, WESH-TV, Winter Park, Florida (2/27) reports the owners of Signature Compounding Pharmacy "were arrested and officials said they could be sent to New York state, where the whole case began." WESH reports the Loomises "are expected to face charges connected to the illegal distribution of steroids, human-growth hormones, and other drugs."

Pittsburgh Steelers Doctor Questioned. WTAE-TV, Pittsburgh (2/27) reports on its Web site that a report "said a doctor who works with the Pittsburgh Steelers was questioned in a steroids investigation. A reporter with the Albany Times Union said Dr. Richard Rydze was questioned about $150,000 in steroids purchases on his personal credit card." The report said "a New York state health department investigator, last month, flew to Pittsburgh as part of a wide-scale investigation into the online sale of steroids. … Rydze isn't breaking any laws or rules by buying HGH and testosterone online. However, the NFL has a clear policy banning the use of testosterone by players." KDKA-TV, Pittsburgh (2/27) has posted a similar report on its Web site.

The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (2/28) reports there "is no indication that Rydze has done anything wrong, and a spokeswoman for Albany County District Attorney P. David Soares would not say if he is a target of the investigation." The Tribune Review adds, "Pharmacy officials are accused of repeatedly filling prescriptions written by doctors, some of them not licensed, for patients they hadn't met, according to a statement released by Soares' office. At least $250,000 worth of illegal and controlled substances were sold and shipped to Albany with sales in New York alone totaling more than $10 million, according to the statement."

Texas Woman Pleads Guilty To Money Laundering. The Corpus Christi (TX) Caller Times (2/27) reported a Corpus Christi woman on Monday "pleaded guilty to federal charges in connection with a money laundering and drug distribution operation out of Country Meat Market, which she and her husband own." Rosalinda Perez "pleaded guilty to money laundering." The Caller Times says her husband Alfredo Garcia "pleaded guilty on Feb. 15. to conspiring to distribute cocaine out of the meat market. … Investigation into the couple began in September 2005, when authorities in

DOJ_NMG_0137602

New York notified Drug Enforcement Administration agents in Corpus Christi that a vehicle registered to …Garcia had been found in New York with a small quantity of cocaine inside."

SAMHSA Study Quantifies Rates Of Illegal Drug Use, Drinking. USA Today (2/28, 3A, Leinwand, 2.27M) reports, "Seven states in the South and Midwest are driving an increase in the percentage of people nationwide who drink alcohol regularly, a new study shows. Alaska for the third year in a row has the highest rate of illegal drug use in the nation, the study found. The study, being released today by the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration (SAMHSA), found rates of illicit drug use significantly higher than the national average in nine other states — Rhode Island, Vermont, Colorado, Montana, Oregon, Maine, Massachusetts, New York and Connecticut — plus Washington, D.C. … Nationally, 51.1% of Americans reported drinking alcohol in the past month, up from 50.2% in the previous study."

Poppy Eradication In Afghanistan Said To Be Threatened By Corruption. The UK's Telegraph (2/28) reports the British-backed campaign to "eradicate opium poppy growing in Afghanistan has fallen behind schedule and is threatened by corruption. … A policeman provided a detailed account of systematic corruption within the force. 'The only people [whose crops are] being eradicated are those without money or connections,'" said the policeman. If the campaign "fails in Helmand, which produced 40 percent of the country's opium last year, then British officials admit that US-led pressure for a radical campaign of aerial spraying of poppy next year will become irresistible."

Minnesota Explosives Search Turns Up Munitions. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (2/28, Xiong) reports, "Military-grade ammunition was found Tuesday at a south Minneapolis building linked to a man jailed the day before on suspicion of having military explosives at his home, Minneapolis police said." The Tribune continues, "A federal investigation that remains closely guarded by authorities became public Monday during a search of the man's Bloomington house. The investigation continued Tuesday at a commercial retail building at 5200 47th Av. S., which is owned by the man's wife, said Minneapolis Police Deputy Chief Rob Allen. The findings in Minneapolis are not as worrisome as those in Bloomington, he said. … 'There's nothing that's raised our concern to the degree they were at in Bloomington,' Allen said. 'She's [the wife] being very cooperative.'" The Tribune adds, "Authorities would not speak in further detail about what was found in the Minneapolis building's garage. The building houses a convenience store, a massage center, a hair salon run by the suspect's wife and a second-floor apartment. No one was arrested Tuesday. … Allen said the man -- described by one acquaintance as a gun-show regular -- stored items on the property. Tenants said he was also the building's repairman. A Minneapolis police bomb squad was called to the scene, and a block was taped off. … The man, who hasn't been charged with a crime, was arrested Monday after authorities found 'small quantities' of explosive materials and 'quite a few' firearms at his home in the 1700 block of W. 84th Street, said Steve Bogdalek, assistant special agent in charge of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms. … Authorities from the ATF, the FBI and the state Bureau of Criminal Apprehension wouldn't say why or for how long the man was being investigated for possessing the materials. They refused to say whether his cache of detonation cords, blasting caps, guns and explosive materials was part of a larger operation. FBI special agent Paul McCabe said there is no public safety risk at this point."

ATF Joins Search For Florida Road-Rage Gun. The Orlando Sentinel (2/28) reports from Deland, FL, "Four specially-trained canines are being sent out today to help deputies look for the gun used in a road-rage incident that killed a race fan on Interstate 4." The Sentinel continues, "The canines and their handlers are from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives. They will team up with the Volusia County Sheriff's Office to search a large area along I-4 where Erik Houk, 36, was shot and killed while driving back to Land O'Lakes from the Daytona 500, ATF officials said. … Houk was transported to Florida Hospital DeLand after the Feb. 18 shooting, where he was pronounced dead." The Sentinel adds, "Three men -- David P. Edwards, 21, Ronlee Harvin, 21, and Charles Onasanya, 18 -- were arrested in Sanford after the shooting and told police they threw the gun somewhere along I-4 after they left the scene, officials said. Deputies have been looking for the weapon ever since. … The ATF bureau is the Department of Justice's lead agency for training dogs to detect explosives. Its canines are certified to detect 19,000 odors, including gunpowder and explosives, Davidson said. Officials will also use a portable Raytheon Thermal Imaging device to look for the gun."

ATF Agent Testifies To Discussing Buying Arms From Texas Man. The El Paso Times (2/28, Meritz) reports, "A federal agent testified Tuesday that he discussed purchasing firearms, in addition to explosive devices, from one of the two men accused of making and possessing pipe bombs that authorities discovered in a sting earlier this month." The Times continues, "Meanwhile, lawyers for the defendants argued Tuesday before U.S. District Court Magistrate Judge Michael McDonald that the government had not established that the suspected pipe bombs actually could have exploded and caused a danger to the public." The Times adds, "Alfredo Rubio, 23, of San Elizario, along with Juan Ortiz, 22, of Socorro, are accused of conspiring to make and possess 15 pipe bombs that Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives undercover agents discovered Feb. 21 during a meeting in Canutillo. … Frank Henderson, a special agent with ATF, said in court Tuesday that he was working to arrange a purchase of weapons as well, including a MAC-10 assault rifle, rocket launchers and a machine gun. … Henderson testified that the Feb. 21 meeting was the second between him and Rubio. The agent said that during the first meeting, on Jan. 20 at a parking lot in the Northeast, he paid Rubio $2,000 for seven pipe bombs, then transported them in the front seat of his truck. Henderson also testified that law enforcement had not tested the devices to determine whether they would explode as designed."

DOJ_NMG_0137603

IMMIGRATION:

Five Plead Guilty In Illegal Workers Probe. The AP (2/28, Virtanen) reports from Albany, NY, "Five former managers from a major crate and pallet manufacturer that employed illegal immigrants pleaded guilty Tuesday, 10 months after federal agents staged sweeping raids at company sites in 26 states." The AP continues, "James Rice, 37, of Houston, an executive regional general manager of IFCO Systems, pleaded guilty to conspiring to employ illegal workers. Robert Belvin, 43, of Stuart, Fla., a former general manager of the Albany IFCO plant, pleaded guilty to two felony conspiracy charges. … The two executives could face up to two years in prison and a $250,000 fine, Assistant U.S. Attorney Tina Sciocchetti said." The AP adds, "Netherlands-based IFCO Systems NV describes itself as the leading pallet services company in America. It reported $108 million in profits in 2006 on revenues of $647 million. …. In April, more than 1,100 people were arrested on administrative immigration charges at more than 40 IFCO sites. More than half of IFCO Systems' roughly 5,800 employees during 2005 had invalid or mismatched Social Security numbers, the government said at the time. … U.S. Department of Homeland Security officials said the raids were part of a stepped-up effort to target employers of illegal immigrants." The AP notes, "Defense lawyers said they reviewed prosecution material that included taped conversations involving their clients."

Chertoff Takes Push For Immigration Reform To Capitol Hill. The Los Angeles Times (2/28, Gaouette, 850K) reports, "For weeks, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff has waged a clandestine charm offensive on behalf of an immigration overhaul. He consulted with supportive lawmakers, listened to adversarial congressmen and slipped into the private offices of wary senators, the only sign of his presence the beefy security men waiting outside." Having taken a group of "skeptical members of Congress" on a tour of the southern border last week, Chertoff will today launch "a higher-profile effort to win enough votes to pass a comprehensive overhaul when he testifies at the first Capitol Hill hearing on immigration legislation since Democrats took over. Chertoff's campaign has impressed some lawmakers who may be crucial to the fate of his effort, but it's not clear whether they have been swayed enough to support it." The Times quotes Sen. Johnny Isakson, who said his border trip with Chertoff reaffirmed "that what we tried to do last year was right — that is, delineate the need for security and require its completion first." Chertoff told reporters Tuesday that the administration wants "to work with Congress. That's the whole point of being in government — to get stuff done."

Guest Workers Often Receive Lower Pay, Less Work Than Promised. The New York Times (2/28, Greenhouse, 1.16M) reports on the abuses faced by guest workers "at a time when President Bush and many in Congress are pushing to expand the guest worker program as part of an overhaul of the nation's immigration laws. … Labor experts say employers abuse guest workers far more than other workers because employers know they can ship them home the moment they complain. They also know these workers cannot seek other jobs if they are unhappy." The Times continues that the "workers often pay exorbitant fees and are frequently given fewer weeks of work and lower wages than promised. Many employers fail to make good on their commitment to pay transportation costs." Congressional proposals "to expand protections for guest workers include a provision to bar employers from retaliating when these workers protest and one that would let them sue in federal court over contract violations."

Studies Show Immigrants Increase Pay For Native-Born Citizens. The Los Angeles Times (2/28, Watanabe, 850K) reports a pair of studies released this week "counter negative perceptions that immigrants increase crime and job competition, showing that they are incarcerated at far lower rates than native-born citizens and actually help boost their wages. A study released Tuesday by the Public Policy Institute of California found that immigrants who arrived in the state between 1990 and 2004 increased wages for native workers by an average 4%." UC Davis economist Giovanni Peri, who conducted the study, said the presence of immigrants "pushed natives up the economic ladder into employment that required more English or know-how of the US system, he said." Meanwhile, a "study released Monday by the Washington-based Immigration Policy Center showed that immigrant men ages 18 to 39 had an incarceration rate five times lower than native-born citizens in every ethnic group examined." The Times notes that the studies "were released just days before the US Congress is to restart debate on major immigration reform legislation and as numerous states, including Texas, consider harsh measures against illegal migrants."

DOJ_NMG_0137604

US Urged To Change Immigration Rules To Focus On Skilled Workers. Michele Wucker, author of "Lockout: Why America Keeps Getting Immigration Wrong When Our Prosperity Depends on Getting It Right," in the New York Times (2/28, 1.16M) argues for changing immigration rules in order to shift the balance away from family reunification while continuing "to admit spouses, minor children and parents of naturalized and native-born American citizens without quotas" and towards "skilled workers." She writes that "there are shortages of both temporary and permanent visas for scientists, engineers, mathematicians, doctors and nurses" while "family chain migration is common." The problem is said to be limits on employment-based visas compounded by per-country visa caps. Wucker recommends "phasing out family-based preferences for adult siblings and adult children" to "free up 138,066 green cards a year."

Study Finds Immigrants Not Responsible For Most Crimes. The North County Times (2/28, Sifuentes) reports, "A common perception that immigrants are responsible for much of the nation's crime is not supported by evidence, according to a study released Monday by an immigrant rights group." The Times continues, "Violent and property crime rates have dropped 34 percent and 26 percent respectively since 1994. At the same time, the illegal immigrant population doubled to an estimated 12 million, according to the study, called the Myth of Immigrant Criminality and the Paradox of Assimilation. … But critics said the study is biased and based on incomplete Census data." The Times adds, "The authors, sociologists Ruben Rumbaut and Walter Ewing, said immigrants have faced similar perceptions throughout the nation's history. Previous waves of immigrants, such as Italians and Irish, were often viewed as more inclined to crime than native-born people, they said. … Similar views are now thrust upon the newest immigrants, who are predominantly from Latin America, the authors said." The Times notes, "Researchers said they did not analyze legal and illegal immigrant populations separately, because the U.S. Census data does not ask whether immigrants are in the country legally or illegally. … Based on 2000 Census information, the study concludes that the problem of crime in the United States is not caused or aggravated by immigrants, regardless of their legal status. The study was released by the Immigration Policy Center, a research organization that focuses on the contributions immigrants make the country. … The policy center is a division of the American Immigration Law Foundation, a Washington, D.C.-based nonprofit focusing on immigration. … One of the key findings the study cites is that U.S.-born men, ages 18-39, are five times more likely to be incarcerated than foreign-born men in the same age group. However, the 'paradox of assimilation' is that the children of immigrants tend to have higher incarceration rates than their parents, according to the study."

TAX:

Real-Estate Professionals Chafe At IRS Rules. The Wall Street Journal (2/28, Dunham) reports, "Some real-estate professionals say they are being mistaken for sometime investors by the Internal Revenue Service, and that could prohibit them from taking advantage of certain tax and economic benefits." The Journal continues, "Consider the case of David Friedman, a real-estate broker and property owner in Los Angeles. Like many professionals in the business, he not only sells homes to consumers, he also buys and sells undeveloped land and owns single-family homes that he rents out. He says he works every day and has amassed holdings in Southern California and Oklahoma that are valued at $20 million. … Yet after 20 years in the business, Mr. Friedman finds himself in a battle with the IRS, which is auditing his past tax returns over whether he is really a full-time real-estate professional or one of the many part-time real-estate investors who have sprung up across the country in the past decade." The Journal adds, "The distinction is important because full-time real-estate professionals, defined as someone who spends more than half of his working hours in real estate and more than 750 hours a year tending to real-estate activities, can fully deduct losses -- including depreciation, interest expense on loans and property taxes. … But those who don't fit into that category are typically considered to be 'passive' real-estate investors with a limited ability to deduct their losses, says Alan Weiner, a CPA and tax partner at the firm of Holtz Rubenstein Reminick LLP in Melville, N.Y. … Robert Marvin, a spokesman for the IRS, said the tax agency can't comment on individual taxpayer cases. However, he indicated that the agency is paying more attention to real-estate activity because it is one of the areas where research shows there is a large tax gap, meaning taxpayers are underreporting income to the IRS. The tax gap in income from rents and royalties is about $13 billion and $11 billion for capital gains. (Income from real-estate activity is included in, but not exclusive to, both categories.) Mr. Marvin said that several thousand returns of real-estate professionals have been audited since last year and approximately 3,000 are under audit now. … But some tax attorneys say these professionals are being unfairly scrutinized."

DOJ_NMG_0137605

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush To Visit Indiana School To Tout NCLB. The Louisville Courier-Journal (2/28, Carroll) reports, "President Bush will visit New Albany's Silver Street Elementary School on Friday, in addition to attending a campaign fundraiser in Louisville. He also plans to meet with University of Louisville students." At Silver Street, Bush will "discuss his 'No Child Left Behind' program." The school "has made 'adequate yearly progress' each of the four years since the law went into effect." Superintendent Dennis Brooks "called the president's visit an 'unexpected opportunity' for students and teachers at the school." Afterwards "Bush will speak at a McConnell for Senate reception at the Seelbach Hilton Louisville."

The AP (2/28) reports, "President Bush will visit an elementary school in New Albany on Friday and will speak about reauthorizing the five-year-old No Child Left Behind law."

WDRB-TV Louisville, Kentucky (2/27) reported, "The president will be in town on Friday for a fundraiser for Kentucky Senator Mitch McConnell -- but he's also making a stop in Indiana. President Bush will visit a New Albany school on Friday. And right now, students and faculty members are sprucing things up for their special guest." Principal Tony Duffy said, "It's such an honor. It's a once in a lifetime opportunity for our students and our teachers and everyone involved in our school."

WLKY-TV Louisville, Kentucky (2/27) reported, "His itinerary includes a stop at Silver Street Elementary School in New Albany, where he'll talk about reauthorizing the five-year-old No Child Left Behind law. Afterward, he'll attend a fundraiser for Sen. Mitch McConnell (R-Kentucky)."

Business Groups Mount Offensive Against Employee Free Choice Act. The Wall Street Journal (2/28, A4, Maher, 2.04M) reports, "Organized labor aims to use the House's expected passage tomorrow of a pro-union bill to further the rest of its legislative agenda, even though the bill, under heated industry opposition, faces likely defeat in the Senate. The Employee Free Choice Act would make it easier to organize workers by giving them the right to unionize as soon as a majority signs cards in favor of a union, a process known as 'card check' that can take a few weeks." The Journal adds, "In the past two days, the National Association of Manufacturers sent two letters to members of Congress, saying that the association would use tomorrow's vote in determining its future support for lawmakers." The association "argues the bill 'further erodes the competitive capabilities of American manufacturers.' A coalition representing more than 300 state and local employer groups also is lobbying against the bill, and the US Chamber of Commerce said it has sent more than 24,000 emails to members of Congress to oppose it."

The Hill (2/28, Swanson) reports, "The US Chamber of Commerce is leading this drive, whose magnitude rivals the 2001 campaign supporting President Bush's tax cuts. As of last week, the Chamber alone had directed more than 24,000 letters, phone calls and e-mails to House members in opposition to H.R. 800, the Employee Free Choice Act of 2007." The effort "has continued this week with advertising in 60 conservative-leaning blogs and e-mail blasts to House chiefs of staff and legislative assistants on labor. Along with the Chamber of Commerce, the business coalition includes dozens of national and local business groups. Together, they are targeting 51 congressional districts with radio advertisements and phone calls urging constituents to press their representative to oppose H.R. 800." These districts "cover 29 Democrats and 22 Republicans, including freshman Reps. Heath Shuler (D-N.C.), Tim Mahoney (D-Fla.), Ron Klein (D-Fla.), Joe Courtney (D-Conn.), David Loebsack (D-Iowa), Jerry McNerney (D-Calif.), Vern Buchanan (R-Fla.), Steve Kagen (D-Wis.), and Carol Shea-Porter (D-N.H.). All but Mahoney and Buchanan are cosponsors of the bill."

However, Roll Call (2/28, Drucker) reports "the AFL-CIO, which held events in 90 Congressional districts with 150 House Members over the Presidents Day recess, is cautiously optimistic that H.R. 800 will pass the House." Bill Samuel, the union's spokesman, "said many Democrats from Republican-minded districts are unlikely to face reprisals at the ballot box for supporting the bill, because they represent areas that are culturally conservative but labor-friendly."

Walter Reed Controversy Spurs Bipartisan Call For Tighter Oversight. The Hill (2/28, Kaplan) reports, "The poor conditions and bureaucratic mazes facing wounded soldiers and Marines at the Walter Reed Army Medical Center have sparked condemnation from Democratic and Republican lawmakers as they prepare for a hearing next Monday at the hospital. Rep. John Tierney (D-Mass.), chairman of the Oversight and Government Reform national security subcommittee, with support from Republican Reps. Tom Davis (Va.) and Christopher Shays (Conn.), announced earlier this week that he would conduct a hearing at Walter Reed." The Hill notes that the controversy has been "generating headlines in local newspapers." Rep. Joe Donnelly, who sits on the Veterans Affairs Committee, "created a veterans' advisory board" and "told the South Bend Tribune yesterday that 'Everybody's in a very foul mood right now' with respect to the media accounts."

DOJ_NMG_0137606

Congress Considers Cutting Several High-Profile Pentagon Programs. The Hill (2/28, Tiron) reports Congress "is grappling with how to fix a number of high-profile defense programs that are costing taxpayers billions of dollars yet have poor records of success. … Programs in danger may include the Army's Future Combat Systems and the Joint Tactical Radio System; the Air Force's Joint Strike Fighter and several satellite programs; and the Navy's Littoral Combat Ship. While outright cancellations do not appear imminent in the 2008 defense budget, defense authorizers and appropriators will focus on reevaluating, in some cases redirecting and reprogramming funds. Defense committees have begun to focus on somewhat less complex and less challenging systems. Too often, congressional sources say, the Pentagon embarks on ambitious programs with even more ambitious deadlines, and as a result forgoes critical early testing and evaluation on technologies. When the programs enter operational testing and so-called low-rate production, problems crop up, forcing the services to return to the drawing board and incurring cost overruns and delays."

Congressional Democrats Eager To Advance Domestic Agenda. The Politico (2/28, Cummings) reports that "even as Iraq dominates the headlines, congressional Democrats are moving swiftly on key domestic issues aimed at improving their 2008 reelection chances and splitting Republicans. This week's House debates on easing union organizing and giving Congress more say in foreign purchases of critical domestic infrastructure are cases in point. … Coming next are scheduled hearings and debates on health care, education, prescription drugs, stem-cell research and immigration reform, all issues that Democrats campaigned on during the 2006 midterms. This runup to the Easter break is just a sneak peak at the broader agenda Democrats are planning to put in place for the rest of the year. What it shows is that House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (Nev.) are in a hurry to pocket some key domestic victories and avoid the 'do nothing' label they gave Republicans last year.'

Blue Dogs' Influence Over Democratic Caucus Noted. Roll Call (2/28, Yachnin) reports "there are plenty of indications that the fiscally conservative Blue Dog Coalition's cache is expanding on Capitol Hill — an invitation to the White House, regular meetings with the Speaker, plum committee assignments. … Members of the Blue Dogs are anything but reticent about their growing influence within the new Democratic majority, as the moderate lawmakers — who now number nearly four dozen, the largest contingent in the group's 12-year history — seek to maximize their impact in the House following the power switch in the 110th Congress." Roll Cal notes that "even as the Blue Dogs acknowledge their own potential to serve as a bridge to their moderate Republican colleagues, however, the Democratic lawmakers seek to tamp down expectations that any formal bipartisan efforts are under way. … While members of both the Blue Dogs and the moderate Republican Tuesday Group previously have suggested the organizations could work together in the new session, for now the Democrats suggest those efforts are limited to one-on-one sessions or the committee level.'

Lobbying Disclosure Act Does Not Require Firms To Disclose All Revenue. The Hill (2/28, Snyder, Young) reports that "some critics believe that the Lobbying Disclosure Act (LDA), the law that defines what activities a firm must report annually to Congress, hasn't kept pace with the industry's evolution. Firms now have public relations, strategic consulting, grassroots and federal marketing arms — all of which have the potential to influence public officials, but which often take place outside the public eye. … The firms themselves are sympathetic to complaints about the limitations of the LDA, albeit for different reasons. Believing annual revenue rankings are a potential marketing tool for their own businesses, firms are quick to note other revenue streams that aren't included in LDA figures — particularly if it's been a bad year for lobbying. The Senate has passed a bill to update the LDA, enacted in 1995, but — aside from a new requirement that lobbyists detail fundraising activities — the changes do not include expanding what type of activity should be reported."

Kerry Grills Swift Boat Contributor Nominated To Be Ambassador To Belgium. The Washington Post (2/28, A17, Akers, 690K) reports Sen. John F. Kerry "did seem to enjoy at least a small measure of satisfaction in making mega-GOP-donor Sam Fox squirm during yesterday's Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearing to consider Fox's nomination to be ambassador to Belgium. Fox contributed $50,000 to fund the infamous Swift Boat Veterans for Truth ads that sought to smear Kerry's Vietnam War record in the 2004 presidential campaign." Kerry "explained that he did not intend 'to play some sort of "gotcha" game,' but he wanted to know: How does the nominee feel about the level of 'personal destruction' in politics these days? Fox replied that he was 'very concerned' that politics have become too 'mean and destructive,' especially with the participation of independent '527' groups such as Swift Boat Veterans. He tried not so subtly to redirect Kerry's line of questioning by saying, 'Sir, you're a hero,' adding that no 527 group 'can take that away from you.'" reports, "A groundbreaking survey of homelessness being released today found that 704,000 people nationwide sought shelter at least once in a three-month period. Families with children accounted for one-third of those seeking emergency shelter or transitional housing between February and April 2005, the most recent period studied, according to the report by the Department of Housing and Urban Development. The rest were individuals, mostly adult men. Nearly half were black." USA Today notes, "The count covered only those seeking shelter, not people living on the street, so the total number of homeless people would be higher. 'This first-of-its-kind study is a huge leap forward in our understanding of not only how many people are homeless, but also what their needs are,' HUD Secretary Alphonso Jackson says."

HUD Releasing "Groundbreaking" Study Of Homeless Population. USA Today (2/28, Koch, 2.27M)

DOJ_NMG_0137607

Watchdog Urges Ethics Committee To Investigate Doolittle. The Hill (2/28, Crabtree) reports, "Government watchdog group Democracy 21 singled out Rep. John Doolittle (R-Calif.) for special scrutiny yesterday, renewing its call for the ethics committee to conduct an investigation into multiple potential ethics violations by the lawmaker. Democracy 21 President Fred Wertheimer said there is no evidence that the committee had taken any action about Doolittle in the last Congress even though his group and a series of press reports raised serious questions about whether Doolittle violated House ethics rules. … Specifically, Wertheimer points to Doolittle's practice of paying his wife's company a 15 percent commission on all contributions that the company raised for Doolittle's campaign." Wertheimer "also called on the committee to look into whether fees paid to Doolittle's wife, Julie Doolittle, on contributions indicted defense contractor Brent Wilkes and his associates made to his campaign committee and PAC were linked or appeared to be linked to any official action Doolittle took to help Wilkes's company obtain millions of dollars in government earmarks."

Thune Role As Lobbyist May Have Killed Railway Loan. The Washington Post (2/28, A17, Williamson, 690K) reports the Federal Government "killed a $2.3 billion railway loan after opponents attacked Sen. John Thune (R-S.D.), because he was the railway's lobbyist before winning election and backing legislation favoring the loan to his former client." The privately held Dakota, Minnesota & Eastern Railroad "wanted the money for an 860-mile Midwestern rail-line renovation and expansion project. The Federal Railroad Administration said its denial was based on financial factors. But project backers and detractors said the loan sank after opponents, led by the Mayo Clinic, based in Rochester, Minn., ginned up congressional heat on the agency. The key to that was Thune's role: The Republican did nothing illegal, but his seamless transition from the railway's lobbyist to its Senate champion handed ammunition to opponents and their own lobbyists."

Study Suggests Breakdowns Common Between Agency Field Staffs, Headquarters. The Washington Post's (2/28, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "Communication. Trust. Leadership. A report by the Interior Department inspector general, released this month, provides a glimpse of how these issues can arise in agencies that have to manage a workforce spread across the country. The report, by Earl E. Devaney, Interior's inspector general, focused on the law enforcement office at the Fish and Wildlife Service," but Devaney "found some problems in the law enforcement office, such as a 'general mistrust of senior management' and a lack of communication between the headquarters and the field, 'which has created a perception that there is a 'wall' between management and field personnel.'" The "IG review suggested" the agency's program risked "being undermined because of leadership and communication problems -- issues that hinder operations in many parts of the government. The report pointed out that the lack of communication between senior leaders and the field 'has significantly impacted morale and trust.'" The Post adds that the IG's report identifies areas of sensitivity such as "'unwritten requirement' for promotions" and bonuses and time-off inconsistencies as well as "disciplinary action proved to be another sensitive topic, the IG found."

Bush Hosts NBA Champions. NBC Nightly News (2/27, story 10, :35, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "You might as well see this following clip now because it may well appear on all the late night comedy talk shows this evening. The President hosted Shaquille O'Neal and the NBA champions, the Miami Heat. All went well until…the President started to dribble," and "the ball was under inflated. While the President's form was fine, of all people in that job, he knows well," that "some days the ball just doesn't bounce your way."

OTHER NEWS:

Stock Market Tumble Sparks Fears About US Economy. ABC World News (2/27, lead story, 2:50, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "American investors took a punch to the pocketbook today. And it was a sobering lesson in today's global marketplace, as nervous investors in China sparked the sell-off in New York. The Dow started its slide early. But then, in mid-afternoon, at times, seemed to be in free-fall. By the closing well, the industrial average, was off 416 points." The CBS Evening News (2/27, lead story, 2:50, Couric, 7.66M) noted, "We haven't seen a day like this on Wall Street in years." In addition to the Dow slide, "the NASDAQ gave up 96 points, nearly 4%." The Dow's 400-point "plunge is the biggest one-day point drop since this trading floor reopened after 9/11, back in 2001. And it was breath taking."

DOJ_NMG_0137608

The New York Times (2/28, Norris, Peters, 1.16M) headlines its story "Wall St. Slide Fuels Worries On Economy," and reports the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index, "the benchmark index for many investors, slid 3.47 percent, and the technology-heavy Nasdaq composite index fell 3.86 percent. All three major indexes erased their gains for the year."

NBC Nightly News (2/27, lead story, 3:00, Williams, 9.87M) said, "It was almost scary to watch," while the New York Times (2/28, Barboza, 1.16M) reports, "The downturn shattered all sorts of records, and analysts said there was no clear reason for Tuesday's severe drop in Shanghai, equivalent to a 1,100-point drop in the Dow Jones industrial average." But "the Chinese stock market was rife with rumors that the government was considering new measures to tame the world's hottest stock market before a bubble developed."

USA Today (2/28, 1B, Shell, Waggoner, 2.27M) reports, "For weeks, stock gurus have warned that the Dow Jones industrial average's longest run without a 2% correction since 1954 was worrisome: Some negative catalyst was bound to spook investors and start a selling frenzy." The "selling spark came Tuesday across the globe in China, a highflying market with a speculative zeal rivaling the '90s dot-com stock gold rush. Shanghai's benchmark index plunged nearly 9% amid fears the Chinese government is moving to squash speculation in stocks." The Dow "swooned in response."

Fox News Special Report (2/27, Hume) reported senior White House officials "watched the market very closely," but they "insist the US economic fundamentals are still very strong, and they're very confident about that." However, as the markets closed President Bush spoke with Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson and relayed "a clear expression of concern" about the downturn.

On NBC Nightly News (2/27, lead story, 3:00, 9.87M), CNBC's Maria Bartiromo summed up what most analysts see as the reasons for yesterday's market drop. She said, "Primarily, there were three factors contributing to today's downturn. First -- China. Today's sell off started over seas. In China the Shanghai Composite Index dropping almost 9%. Fears the government is trying to slow the economy. Second, durable goods. Sells of big ticket items like appliances and computers are slowing down. Third world tensions, instability in Afghanistan. News this morning of a suicide bomber attack at a check point not far from where Vice President Cheney was staying. Plus instability in Iran there nuclear capabilities and what that means for the US, all combining for some real market unrest today."

The Financial Times (2/28, Callan) reports, "US industrial investment appeared to have slowed at the start of this year as figures released on Tuesday showed a steep fall in demand for capital goods." There was "an unexpected drop in orders of durable goods across industry sectors as demand slid by a record 8 per cent to $204bn in January." The Wall Street Journal (2/28, Conkey, 2.04M) notes the Commerce Department "said new orders for durable goods fell 7.8% in January following a 2.8% increase in December, largely because there were fewer orders for transportation equipment." USA Today (2/28, 5B, Hagenbaugh, 2.27M) also runs a story on the durable goods report, titled "Economists Worry As Businesses Tighten Spending."

The Los Angeles Times (2/28, Hennessy-Fiske, Girion, 850K) reports this morning, "The dreaded 'R' word -- recession -- is back in play, contributing to Tuesday's stock market plunge. But is recession a real possibility? Many analysts say recession is unlikely this year, that Tuesday's market sell-off was long-anticipated and would be short-lived as the economy rebounds from a housing slump. Also helping the economy are renewed consumer and business spending, a strong but not overheated labor market and possible intervention by the Federal Reserve, analysts say." Another Los Angeles Times (2/28, Zimmenman, 850K) reports, "Don't panic. That's what financial planners were advising clients today as they tried to cope with the worst day for the stock market in almost four years."

The Washington Post (2/28, D1, Tse, 690K) reports, "Some market strategists said they were holding off on buying, seeing a potential for larger drops. Others characterized the retreat as a long-overdue correction and good for a market still fundamentally strong. They said recent increases in oil prices, geopolitical events in the Mideast and growing concern about the subprime-mortgage market combined to set off the market downturn."

The Wall Street Journal (2/28, 2.04M) editorializes that "when Adam Smith does a house cleaning like yesterday's, he sweeps the dirtiest corners first. The question is whether this is a forecast or merely a correction. As evidence of the latter, we'd point to Mr. Greenspan, whose Monday remarks seem to have been over-interpreted as a recession prediction. In the same discussion, we're told, he called the world economy 'benign and stable.' … We also wouldn't make too much of one month's decline in durable goods. These are notoriously volatile, especially in transportation, which was way down in January."

But other media outlets saw more ominous reasons for the market drop. McClatchy (2/28, Hall) says yesterday's plunge "may also signal worse news than that. A steady stream of recent data shows mixed signals about where the US economy is headed. The old sage himself, Alan Greenspan, suggests recession could be looming." Adds McClatchy, "Fasten your seat belts -- some economic chop could be coming."

The New York Times (2/28, Leonhardt, 1.16M) reports, "The nation's manufacturing sector managed to slip into a recession with almost nobody seeming to notice. Well, until yesterday." The new report on durable goods "seemed to focus investors' attention on the problems in manufacturing and became one more reason for people to sell stocks. By the time the market opened in New York, stocks in almost every industrialized country had already fallen sharply."

DOJ_NMG_0137609

The Chicago Tribune (2/28, Barnhart, 617K) says "investors face two scenarios. One is that Tuesday's market action…represented a catharsis in market sentiment and mechanics unlikely to be repeated." The second "is that Tuesday's trading exposed long-simmering vulnerabilities in world markets, arising from investor exuberance, especially in Asia, and a wave of debt-financed speculation. Working through those issues could mean days, weeks or months of weak stock markets."

The Wall Street Journal (2/28, A1, Browning, Karmin, Areddy, lp, 2.04M) reports "yesterday's plunge…signals that investors may finally be re-evaluating their insatiable appetite for risky investments. … A weaker-than-expected US economy could undermine many assumptions that have been underlying investors' embrace of risk. It could lead to higher defaults among companies that have taken on large amounts of debt. And it could undermine the outlook for foreign markets, which tend to depend far more on the US economy than the US depends on theirs."

On ABC World News (2/27, story 2, 1:20, Gibson, 8.78M), Sam Stovall, the chief strategist at Standard and Poor's, said, "I think that we were forecasting, because the S&P had not seen a one-day decline of 2% in 950 days, which is the longest since 1950, that we were expecting some sort of decline to occur. We didn't know exactly when and what would trigger it." Gibson: "Some sort of decline. But did people think it would be so precipitous?" Stoval: "I don't think so. I think because we had seen another 250 to 300 points occur in the blink of an eye, that maybe we did have some computer programs kick in, etcetera. But in general, most were expecting more of an orderly decline." The Washington Post (2/28, A1, Cho, Tse, 690K) also reports "some analysts said…that it was about time for the market to cool after a breathless run-up in share prices." The Los Angeles Times (2/28, 850K) and Washington Times (2/28, Hill, 88K) run similar reports.

Greenspan's Continuing Influence On Markets Noted. The Wall Street Journal (2/28, C1, lp, 2.04M) reports, "As chairman of the Federal Reserve, Alan Greenspan had 200 Ph.D. economists at his disposal to help decipher economic and market trends. Now, in the year since retiring from the job he held for 18 years, he relies on less than a half-dozen staffers to analyze the same economic trends. The last 48 hours have made clear, though, that investors can be just as devoted to what he has to say about those trends -- a devotion some say makes it harder to concentrate on what his successor, Ben Bernanke, has to say." Greenspan "told an audience via satellite early Monday, Hong Kong time, that a US recession was possible." He "didn't say a recession was likely. Indeed, he said most forecasters don't see one, the global environment is 'benign' and there has been no 'significant spillover' from the contraction in housing activity." But "the perceived pessimism of the remarks grew as headlines made their way around trading rooms and were blamed for helping contribute to a two-day, world-wide selloff in stocks, a plunge in bond yields as bond prices rallied, and increased market expectations of a cut in interest rates by the Fed." USA Today (2/28, 1B, Hagenbaugh, 2.27M) runs a similar report under the headline "Greenspan Comments Helped Grease Markets' Skid."

Gasoline Prices Reach Five-Month High. The CBS Evening News (2/27, story 3, :15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Also hitting wallets all over the country tonight is the price of gasoline. It's on the rise. It's up more than 20 cents in the past four week to a nationwide average, $2.38 a gallon, the highest price in five months."

Expansion Of Federal Ethics Panels Raises Criticism From Researchers. The New York Times (2/28, Cohen) reports, "Ever since the gross mistreatment of poor black men in the Tuskegee Syphilis Study came to light three decades ago, the federal government has required ethics panels to protect people from being used as human lab rats in biomedical studies. Yet now, faculty and graduate students across the country increasingly complain that these panels have spun out of control, curtailing academic freedom and interfering with research in history, English and other subjects that poses virtually no danger to anyone." The Times continues, "The panels, known as Institutional Review Boards, are required at all institutions that receive research money from any one of 17 federal agencies and are charged with signing off in advance on almost all studies that involve a living person, whether a former president of the United States or your own grandmother. This results, critics say, in unnecessary and sometimes absurd demands." The Times adds, "Among the incidents cited in recent report by the American Association of University Professors are a review board asking a linguist studying a preliterate tribe to 'have the subjects read and sign a consent form,' and a board forbidding a white student studying ethnicity to interview African-American Ph.D. students 'because it might be traumatic for them.' … Review boards, first created in 1974, were initially restricted to biomedical research. In 1981 the regulations were revised to cover all research that involves 'human subjects' and is designed to contribute to 'generalizable knowledge.' … Yet precisely how to interpret these rules has largely been left to each review board — 5,564 in all. And while the regulations apply specifically to research that gets federal dollars, many colleges use

DOJ_NMG_0137610

Institutional Review Boards to monitor all research, no matter where the funds come from. This system of helter-skelter enforcement, critics say, has no meaningful oversight and no appeal process."

Panel Criticizes Breakthrough Study Of Adult Stem Cells. The New York Times (2/28, Wade, 1.16M) reports, "An inquiry panel has found what it called 'significantly flawed' data in a major stem cell paper published in Nature in 2002. The article, which claimed stem cells isolated from an adult could change into all the major tissue types of the body, was seized on by opponents of abortion as showing that embryonic stem cell research was unnecessary since adult stem cells could provide all the predicted benefits. The lead author of the article, Catherine Verfaillie, said yesterday that she had sent a letter to Nature stating that the flawed data should not be relied on but that they did not affect the article's conclusions."

Campaign Document Says Romney Vulnerable To "Flip-Flop" Charge. The Boston Globe (2/27, Helman, 413K) reported, "Here are some views of Mitt Romney causing concern inside his campaign: His hair looks too perfect, he's not a tough war time leader, and he has earned a reputation as 'Slick Dancing Mitt' or 'Flip-Flop Mitt.'" Romney and his advisers "have identified those perceptions as threats to his bid for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination, according to an exhaustive internal campaign document obtained by the Globe. The 77-slide PowerPoint presentation offers a revealing look at Romney's pursuit of the White House, outlining a plan for branding himself, framing his competitors, and allaying voter concerns about his record, his Mormon faith, and his shifts on key issues like abortion."

The AP (2/28) reports the "internal document shows Mitt Romney's presidential campaign is concerned about his vulnerability to charges of flip-flopping, while suggesting he can differentiate from President Bush with a single word: 'intelligence.'" The document "also outlines plans for positively branding the Republican contender, negatively framing rivals John McCain and Rudy Giuliani, and allaying voter concerns about his record and Mormon faith." The blueprint, "dated Dec. 11, was drafted in part by Alex Castellanos, Romney's media adviser."

The Washington Post (2/28, A7, Cillizza, Shear, 690K) reports Romney's "advisers confront the challenges that the former governor faces as he seeks the Republican nomination. Among them, the document says, are his newly conservative positions on social issues and his belief in the Mormon faith, which is viewed skeptically by many members of other Christian denominations." The document "notes that Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) is seen as a war hero but also as an inside-the-Beltway politician, the Globe reported. It sees Giuliani's political strength emanating from his post-Sept. 11, 2001, actions as mayor, but touches on his 'personal political liabilities' -- a reference, perhaps, to his nasty and public divorce from his second wife, Donna Hanover."

Edwards Says Repeated Apologies For Iraq Vote Won't Turn Off Voters. The AP (2/28, Fouhy) reports Democrat John Edwards "said Tuesday that honesty and openness were essential qualities for a president, and that he was proud to acknowledge his 2002 vote authorizing the invasion of Iraq was a mistake." Edwards was "trolling for campaign cash on a three-day visit to New York — home of his chief Democratic rival, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton," and he "spoke to reporters after attending a union-sponsored workshop on eradicating poverty." Asked whether his "repeated apologies for his vote would be a turnoff to voters over time, the 2004 vice presidential nominee said that after six years of President Bush, voters craved a president willing to acknowledge errors and change course if necessary."

Giuliani, Clinton Lead Primary Fields In ABC/Washington Post Poll. ABC World News (2/27, story 5, 1:55, Stephanopoulos, 8.78M) reported the results of the latest ABC News/Washington Post' poll, noting that, "We asked voters how closely are you watching the campaign right now? 65% said they were watching it closely. That is just extraordinary. You usually see those kind of numbers around the conventions. Not 20 months before election day." On the Republican side, "Rudy Giuliani, the former mayor of New York, has opened a big lead over John McCain. 44% to 21%. That's triple until the last month. Newt Gingrich, not even officially in the race, is third at 15%. And Mitt Romney, who is in the race, has dropped since his entry down to 4%." On the Democratic side, "Hillary Clinton, still the frontrunner, but Barack Obama has cut into her lead. It's now a 12-point lead [36%-24%]. Most of that has come from African-American voters. Another person not in the race, Al Gore, is third, he is getting a little bit of an Oscars bounce up to at 14%. And John Edwards, exactly where he was a month ago, at 12%."

The Washington Post (2/28, A1, Balz, Cohen, 690K) reports in a front page story that the "opening stages of the campaign for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination have produced a noticeable shift in sentiment among African American voters, who little more than a month ago heavily supported Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton but now favor the candidacy of Sen. Barack Obama." Clinton "continues to lead Obama and other rivals in the Democratic contest, according to the latest Washington Post-ABC News poll. But her once-sizable margin over the freshman senator from Illinois was sliced in half during the past month largely because of Obama's growing support among black voters." On the GOP side, the "principal reason" Giuliani was able to expand his lead over McCain "was a shift among white evangelical Protestants, who now clearly favor Giuliani over McCain. Giuliani is doing well among this group of Americans despite his support of abortion rights and gay rights, two issues of great importance to religious conservatives."

DOJ_NMG_0137611

Clinton-Giuliani Matchup Hearkens Back To 2000 Senate Race. ABC World News (2/27, story 5, 1:55, Stephanopoulos, 8.78M) reported, "If it turned out to be a Clinton/Giuliani race, and there's a long way to go, but that was almost supposed be the race in the 2000 Senate race in New York, they were supposed to oppose each other." Stephanopoulos: "That's right, but since then, Rudy Giuliani has gotten a halo over the American public. And he much more favorable ratings than Hillary Clinton does right now. Look at that. 64%, to 28%, favorable/unfavorable for Rudy Giuliani. Hillary Clinton, split right down the middle, 49%-48%. Rudy Giuliani is more popular with Democrats than Hillary Clinton is with Republicans."

Clinton Sees Pardon Controversy Reemerge As Issue. The Boston Globe (2/28, Kranish, 413K) reports, "Six years ago, the launch of Hillary Clinton's career in the US Senate was marred by allegations that her brothers had received payments from people pardoned by President Bill Clinton in the waning months of his presidency. Now, in the wake of the launch of her presidential campaign, the pardon controversy has reemerged in an obscure court case in which Senator Clinton's brother Tony is battling an order to repay more than $100,000 he received from a couple pardoned by President Clinton. Tony Rodham, who acknowledged approaching the president about a pardon for the couple, is the second of Hillary Clinton's brothers to receive money from people who were eventually pardoned by President Clinton. Hugh Rodham received $400,000 from two people, one of whom was pardoned and one whose sentence was commuted. But while Hillary Clinton immediately expressed chagrin over the news in 2001 that Hugh received the money -- and asked him to return it -- she said Tony was 'not paid,' according to a congressional report." On Tuesday, "US Bankruptcy Court Judge Marian Harrison of Nashville ordered Tony Rodham to respond by March 16 to the allegation that he failed to repay a loan of $107,000 from the couple pardoned by Clinton."

Clinton's Senate Filings Neglected To Disclose Family Foundation. The New York Times (2/28, Healy, 1.16M) reports the "charitable family foundation that Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton and former President Bill Clinton have operated since 2001 has not been listed on Mrs. Clinton's annual Senate financial disclosure reports for five years." Aides to the Clintons "said that the omission was a clerical error and that it was corrected immediately after The Washington Post brought it to their attention on Monday." Clinton spokesman Philippe Reines said, "It was inadvertently omitted from her Senate filing, an oversight that has since been corrected." According to the IRS filings, "the Clintons have contributed $5 million to the charity, the Clinton Family Foundation, and it has made grants to Yale University, where they both attended law school, and to other charities that have personal meaning for the Clintons."

Leading 2008 Candidates Push States To Join February 5 Primary. The Hill (2/28, Bolton) reports, "Pressure from the leading presidential candidates has set the stage for a Feb. 5 national primary that will likely include 20 states, possibly more." Working "behind the scenes and mostly through surrogates, Democratic Sens. Barack Obama (Ill.) and Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), and Republicans Sen. John McCain (Ariz.), former Gov. Mitt Romney (Mass.) and former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani have fueled a rush of states to hold primary elections on Feb. 5 next year, or earlier. As many as 23 states are in the frame to hold primary elections on that date." Delaware, Missouri, New Mexico and Oklahoma "in 2004 held their nominating contests on the first Tuesday of February, and are likely be joined this time by such big states as California, Illinois, Michigan, New Jersey, New York and Texas. They may be joined also by smaller states including Tennessee, Arkansas, Arizona, Alabama, Georgia, North Dakota, Utah, Kansas, Colorado and (for the GOP only) West Virginia and Nevada. The legislatures of Pennsylvania and North Carolina are holding hearings on the issue but the outcomes of these are uncertain." The allies of candidates "who expect to do well in these states are taking lead roles in moving primaries there to early February. By holding primaries soon after the Iowa caucuses, the first contest of the year, such states will have a bigger impact than before on who becomes the Republican and Democratic presidential nominees."

Morris Notes Move To National Primary Makes Money Critical. In his column in The Hill (2/28), Dick Morris notes the rush to the February 5 primary date, adding, "In effect, we will now have a national primary and the presidential nominating season will last only three weeks from start to finish. The effect of this gigantic sea change will be that whoever is the frontrunner in each party by the fall of 2007 will be virtually certain to win the nomination because only the frontrunner can possibly hope to amass enough money to compete in half the country at once. Nobody but the likely winner in each party will be able to compete at that level on Feb. 5." As a result, "Money will now be king. Nothing else will count very much. If you can afford to run a national campaign three weeks after the first caucus, you will win. If you can't, you're doomed. And the polling that designates a frontrunner now will do much to determine the nominee."

DOJ_NMG_0137612

NYTimes Says Congress Should Repair Public Finance System. The New York Times (2/28, 1.16M) says in an editorial, "If nothing else, the disheartening frenzy to raise huge campaign donations in this front-loaded presidential race is making money — lots and lots of money — a public issue. In the cross-fire, federal election regulators are expected to approve Senator Barack Obama's clever but cagey attempt to claim a reformer's mantle: he wants to let the nominees keep bagging unlimited private donations in the run-up to the primaries, then have the choice of returning a chunk of it after the conventions and accepting limited public financing for the general election." Obama is "proposing to adopt the even-money truce — should he win the nomination — only if the Republican nominee does the same. Behind this shadowboxing is the fact that the post-Watergate public financing of presidential elections has not kept pace with inflation. This failure, which a conscientious Congress would repair in time for the 2012 election, has put private fund-raisers back at the wheel."

Conservative Group Criticizes Gore's Electricity Consumption. USA Today/AP (2/28) reports Al Gore, "a leading voice in the fight against global warming, is being called a hypocrite by a conservative group that claims his Nashville mansion uses too much electricity." A spokeswoman for Gore "said the former vice president invests in enough renewable energy to make up for the home's power consumption." Gore's documentary film, An Inconvenient Truth, "which chronicled his campaign against global warming, won an Academy Award on Sunday. The next day, the Tennessee Center for Policy Research put out a news release saying Gore was not doing enough to reduce his own consumption of electricity. The group disputes whether global warming is a serious problem." Utility records "show the Gore family paid an average monthly electric bill of about $1,200 last year for its 10,000-square-foot home." The Gores "used about 191,000 kilowatt hours in 2006, according to bills reviewed by The Associated Press spanning the period from Feb. 3, 2006, to Jan. 5. That is far more than the typical Nashville household, which uses about 15,600 kilowatt-hours per year."

The Washington Times (2/28, Pierce, 88K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column that Drew Johnson, president of the Tennessee Center for Policy Research, said, "If this were any other person with $30,000-a-year in utility bills, I wouldn't care. But he tells other people how to live, and he's not following his own rules." The Times adds Kalee Kreider, "a spokeswoman for the Gores, did not dispute the center's figures, taken as they were from public records. But she pointed out that both Al and Tipper Gore work out of their home, and she argued that 'the bottom line is that every family has a different carbon footprint. And what Vice President Gore has asked is for families to calculate that footprint and take steps to reduce and offset it.'"

WZTV-TV Nashville (2/27, 9:08 pm) reported, "It's being called Al Gore's own inconvenient truth. A local watchdog group says Gore's Nashville home uses more electricity in a month than most families use in a year. … The Tennessee Center for Policy Research points to the former vice president's electric bills for his Belle Meade home, which Fox 17 News has obtained. On average, US households use 938 kilowatt hours of electricity a month. Records show since January 2006 Gore's home has used 15,813 kilowatt hours a month, with an average power bill approaching $1,200."

WFAA-TV Dallas (2/27, 6:40 am) reported, "Hollywood environmentalists might be feeling a little less love for Al Gore. Fresh off of his win for his documentary, reports show that he uses 20 times more energy than the average household American."

Bush Ranch In Crawford Is Eco-Friendly. The Washington Times (2/28, Pierce, 88K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column in "contrast to Al Gore's profligate use of energy at his Tennessee mansion, President Bush's 4,000-square-foot house in Crawford, Texas, is 'a model of environmental rectitude,' according to a 2001 article by Rob Sullivan in the Chicago Tribune." Marc Morano, "an aide to Senate Environment and Public Works Committee ranking member Sen. James M. Inhofe, Oklahoma Republican, posted the Tribune article yesterday at www.epw.senate.gov."

"Green" Politicians' Jet Travel Criticized. The Los Angeles Times (2/28, Pringle, 850K) reports California Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D) "offers plenty of tips on how California households can combat global warming." But "one bit of information Feinstein declines to share is the number of times that she flew last year on her husband's Gulfstream jet, which burns much more fuel per passenger-mile than commercial airliners." California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) "also has asked constituents to do their part to conserve energy...even though he takes to the skies on leased executive jets." Aides "say there is nothing contradictory between the pro-green pronouncements and the flying habits of the Democratic senator and Republican governor. Some environmentalists aren't so sure." The Times adds, "Noncommercial aircraft and other carbon-related indulgences have caused politicians considerable turbulence recently."

Dowd Says Gore Would Make Campaign More Interesting. In her New York Times column (2/28), Maureen Dowd says, "The best ex-president who was never president could make one of the most interesting campaigns in American history even more interesting." Will Al Gore "use his green moment on the red carpet in black tie to snag blue states and win the White House? Only the Goracle knows the answer. The man who was prescient on climate change, the Internet, terrorism and Iraq admitted that maybe his problem had been that he was too far ahead of the curve. He realized at a conference that "there're ideas that are mature, ideas that are maturing, ideas that are past their prime ... and a category called 'predawn.'" Dowd adds, "With Hillary overproduced and Barack Obama an unfinished script, maybe it's time to bring the former vice president out of turnaround. Hillary's henchmen try to prognosticate the Goracle's future by looking at his waistline, according to Newsday; they think if he's going to run, he'll get back to fighting weight."

DOJ_NMG_0137613

Link Between Gore Movie, Child Obesity Postulated. The Washington Times (2/28, McCaslin, 88K) reports in its "Inside the Beltway" column that it "may have discovered why Mr. Gore is so suddenly rotund: 'An Inconvenient Truth.' Iain Murray, senior fellow for global climate change and environmental science at the Competitive Enterprise Institute, forwards speculation that Mr. Gore's Oscar-winning movie could be hazardous to the former vice president's health, and everybody else's for that matter." The Scotsman, "Scotland's national newspaper, is claiming that half of the children between the ages of 7 and 11 in that country are now so anxious about global warming that they're losing sleep over it." Science Daily "is reporting that children who don't get enough sleep are more prone to obesity." Murray said, "One has to wonder just how much damage to civilization that Gore and company will do to impose their climate-control regime on the world."

Gingrich Says GOP Needs To Avoid Centrism, Hillary Bashing. The Washington Times (2/28, Pierce, 88K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column former Speaker Newt Gingrich "says Republicans must avoid bland centrism and Hillary-bashing if they are to win in 2008." In an email "inviting conservatives to the Conservative Political Action Conference," Gingrich says, "There are two big facts about the 2008 election. Fact No. 1: Running as a bland, business-as-usual Republican will be a dead loser. In 2006, the American people repudiated the GOP because the idea of Republicans' trying to manage the liberal welfare state they inherited from the Democrats was a dead loser. I am not sure many Republican consultants have come to understand this." The second point Gingrich raises is that "focusing on an anti-Hillary campaign will also be a dead loser. … If a campaign is going to degenerate into a mud-slinging contest, the Clintons will always win because they are vastly more ready to jump into the pit."

Thompson To Hold First DC Fundraiser. Roll Call (2/28, Newmyer, Ackley) reports in its "K Street Files" column, "Add one more name to the long list of politicians that want some K Street cash. Former Health and Human Services Secretary Tommy Thompson, who is mulling whether he wants to give up his plush office at Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld for the Oval Office, is having his first Washington, D.C., fundraiser next week. The money goes to his coffers at the Thompson Presidential Exploratory Committee — 2008." The event is "sponsored by Barbour Griffith & Rogers lobbyist Robert Wood, who was Thompson's chief of staff at HHS, and others around town, said Darrin Schmitz of the committee, known as 'Tommy 2008.'"

Some Republicans Hope Huckabee Will Run For Senate. The Hill (2/28, Blake) reports that although his "long-shot presidential campaign is still in its early stages, some wish former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee would drop his national aspirations and return home to wage what they see as a vital campaign against Sen. Mark Pryor (D-Ark.) in 2008 instead." Observers say Arkansas is "often listed among the top Republican pickup opportunities in the country, but Huckabee is the only Republican who matches up to Pryor and there are no comparable alternatives, observers say." Although those "close to Huckabee chalk up the Senate talk to overanxious bloggers and speculation, some see Huckabee-for-Senate as a real possibility and most Republicans make it clear they would welcome him home." One state GOP source "familiar with Huckabee's campaign said a Senate bid could indeed materialize and that it's something Huckabee has considered and analyzed. Huckabee ran for Senate in 1992." Huckabee "couldn't wait too long to abandon the presidential bid, the source said, and the Aug. 11 Republican straw poll in Ames, Iowa, could be a fork in the road." Even if Huckabee "were to enter the Senate race, Republicans see the 10-year governor as an underdog. Despite his long tenure in state government's top office, he was reelected with just 53 percent of the vote in 2002, which was less than Pryor's 54 percent in a good year for Republicans nationally."

NRSC Donates $20,000 Contribution From Man Charged With Aiding Terrorists. The AP (2/28) reports, "A Republican Party campaign committee that received $20,000 in 2003 from a man now accused of helping terrorists has donated the money to a foundation that comforts families of wounded soldiers." The NRSC "renounced the contribution after news reports identified Abdul Tawala Ibn Ali Alishtari as an NRSC 'Inner Circle Member for Life.' Federal prosecutors charged Alishtari two weeks ago in New York with terrorism financing, material support of terrorism and money laundering. Alishtari pleaded not guilty in U.S. District Court in Manhattan." The NRSC "gave $20,000 last week to the Fisher House Foundation, which provides housing for families on the grounds of military and Veterans' Administration hospitals."

DOJ_NMG_0137614

Special Election For Norwood Seat Set For June 19. The Washington Post (2/28, A7, Cillizza, Shear, 690K) reports June 19 is "the day that Gov. Sonny Perdue (R-Ga.) has chosen for the special election to fill the vacancy created when Rep. Charlie Norwood (R) died on Feb. 13." The two leading Republican candidates "to replace him are state senators. Ralph Hudgens is making his second try at the seat after losing to Norwood in a 1994 primary. In that race, Hudgens led on the initial ballot but lost 51 percent to 49 percent to Norwood in a runoff." Hudgens's primary challenge "will come from Jim Whitehead, who is seeking to tie himself to Norwood's legacy."

Rothenberg Sees No "Wave" In House Races For 2008. The Washington Times (2/28, Pierce, 88K) reports in its "Inside Politics" column that in his "early preview of House races in 2008, election forecaster Stuart Rothenberg says 'a huge political wave favoring one party is not very likely' next year." Rothenberg "still thinks Democrats will have 'plenty of opportunities again next year, including almost a dozen districts they narrowly lost and a handful of districts where they unwisely failed to field a strong challenger.'" But with "the White House held by Republicans and Democrats in charge of Congress, 'voters aren't going to blame one party entirely for whatever problems exist,' he says in his Rothenberg Political Report newsletter."

Schwarzenegger Unfazed By Unflattering Picture. Roll Call (2/28, Heil) reports in its "Heard on the Hill" column, "We knew our favorite governor/action star was up to something here in Washington more blockbuster-worthy than discussing Medicare (snore) and getting Congressional briefings. Turns out, California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) has much more exciting plans, like possibly destroying an alien force." At a "briefing in the Capitol on Tuesday, a reporter ribbed the governator about his photo, which appeared on the cover of that day's Roll Call. In the picture, Schwarzenegger is gesturing with an outstretched arm, a slightly demonic expression on his face. 'Is there a worse picture of you?' the snarky scribe queried." Schwarzenegger had "a better assessment of the pic. 'It actually looks more like I'm about to get ready to attack an evil army or something,' he joked."

Top Democrats Seek Governors' Support For Corporate Disclosure Legislation. USA Today (2/28, 2.27M) reports Sens. Carl Levin and Barack Obama, as well as Rep. Rahm Emanuel, "urged the National Governors Association Tuesday to support proposed legislation aimed at anonymously-controlled companies involved in crime. … While acknowledging that most of those companies operate legally, the lawmakers warned that some instead function 'as conduits for organized crime, money laundering, terrorist financing securities fraud, tax evasion and other misconduct.' They asked the governors to back proposed federal legislation that would require those who register new companies in the 50 states to first gather information about their clients' identities. The proposal would also include company formation agents in federal anti-money laundering regulations."

Conservatives Unhappy With Recent Moves By Perry. The Washington Times (2/28, Aynesworth, 88K) reports Texas Gov. Rick Perry, "elected with strong conservative support in November, has taunted that political base recently and could face serious opposition in the state Legislature amid a developing power struggle. … His executive order earlier this month ordering all Texas girls entering the sixth grade to be immunized against a venereal disease that causes cervical cancer provided the most heat and criticism from conservatives. But another Perry edict, to speed up state review of proposed coal-fired power plants, was checked by a state judge last week. And another Perry suggestion, that the state should sell its lottery to help fund cancer research and care, hasn't caught on.

O'Malley Among Supporters Of Maryland Assault Weapons Ban. The Baltimore Sun (2/28, Skalka, 257K) reports that "advocates for a state assault weapons ban said Tuesday that they have the legislative backing and momentum to pass a bill this session." Gov. Martin O'Malley and state Attorney General Douglas F. Gansler "are behind a proposal that would forbid the transport, sale, possession or purchase of military-style assault weapons."

WPost Claims Maryland Early Voting Bill Discriminates Against GOP. The Washington Post (2/28, A18, 690K), in an editorial, writes, "Both houses of the [Maryland] General Assembly have approved a constitutional amendment to permit early voting, making it almost certain there will be a referendum in 2008. The action follows a rancorous two-year fight in which Democrats rammed through measures that gave them a clear advantage over Republicans. For instance, the only places where people would have been able to vote ahead of time just happened to be in heavily Democratic precincts. Republicans were right to think the effort was more about helping Democrats than helping voters."

States' Unfunded Pension Liabilities Continue To Skyrocket. The Wall Street Journal (2/28, A2, Cooper, 2.04M) reports state governments' unfunded pension liabilities "continue to increase despite a recent rise in tax receipts, in a continuation of a spiral that began in the late 1990s, according to a Standard & Poor's analysis to be released today. The report says states collectively had about $330 billion in unfunded pension obligations in fiscal 2005, the last period for which complete data are available. That is $46 billion more than in fiscal 2004. … Among the states with the biggest unfunded obligations were Connecticut, Illinois and Oklahoma, the report said, all of which had gaps in the lower 40% range. West Virginia had the biggest gap, with an unfunded liability of more than 50%. By contrast, the state in the best shape was Florida, with obligations funded at 107.3%."

DOJ_NMG_0137615

States' Initiatives Seen As Likely To Increase Total Healthcare Spending. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (2/28, A14, 2.04M) MIT's Amy Finkelstein writes, "several states have recently mandated universal coverage for their residents. Massachusetts enacted legislation last spring; other proposals are brewing in California, Pennsylvania and elsewhere. … Recent state efforts to create universal health-insurance coverage would reduce the fraction of the population in a state without insurance by similar amounts as did the introduction of Medicare nationwide. And if that program is any guide, we may perhaps see changes in the structure of the health-care system, such as the development and adoption of new medical technologies. We are likely to witness an improvement in the financial security of the currently uninsured. There are also likely to be increases in health-care spending -- quite possibly substantial ones."

"Congestion Pricing" Considered Unlikely To Alleviate Traffic Concerns. In an op-ed for USA Today (2/28, 10A, 2.27M) Bill Graves, president and CEO of the American Trucking Associations, writes, "Congestion pricing, touted as a cure for gridlock, is unfair, ineffective and ignores the transportation needs of Americans. The several forms of congestion pricing all rely on giving motorists better highway access for a price. In many uses, it does not markedly reduce congestion, but merely raises revenues — taxes, in other words. Congestion pricing increases cargo transportation costs and hurts the economy. Higher manufacturers' and retailers' operating costs mean higher costs to consumers for everything from gasoline and clothing to food."

Trial Lawyers Accused Of Manipulating Alien Tort Statute. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (2/28, A15, 2.04M) Joseph G. Finnerty III, heads the New York Litigation Practice Group for DLA Piper, and John Merrigan, a partner at DLA Piper, writes, "While asbestos and tobacco litigation bonanzas are winding down, America's most aggressive contingency-fee law firms still have in place a fee structure in search of an investment strategy. And so, faced with shrinking domestic opportunities, these firms have gone global. Consider one class-action lawsuit, in which a plaintiffs firm sued Deutsche Bank on behalf of an African tribe which suffered atrocities committed by imperial Germany in the 19th century. Or another, consolidating 10 complaints filed around the country on behalf of all South Africans injured by the former apartheid regime from 1948 to the present. … The law used to lodge these massive foreign class actions in the U.S. is the Alien Tort Statute (ATS). This obscure piece of legislation adopted in 1789 gave federal district courts jurisdiction in civil cases brought by an alien for a tort committed in violation of the law of nations, or of a U.S. treaty."

WSJournal Claims CFIUS Reviews Of Foreign Investment Are "Too Stringent." The Wall Street Journal (2/28, 2.04M) editorializes, "Limits on foreign investment here will only invite retaliation abroad. … The protectionists can't really rebut any of this, so instead they play up the 'security' angle. And there is no denying that some foreign takeovers deserve to be scrutinized on national security grounds . That's precisely what the executive branch now does via the Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States, or CFIUS, an interagency group that has up to 75 days to inspect transactions. A handful are changed or disapproved, but 94% of all foreign investment in the U.S. is made by European and other OECD nations that are hardly a threat. In the wake of the Dubai Ports debacle, the Bush Administration is already making CFIUS review too stringent. A new study by the National Foundation for American Policy finds that in the last year the 'process for securing approvals within CFIUS has grown more difficult and uncertain for foreign investors' with a tripling in the number of investigations and a doubling in the number of withdrawn mergers."

US, Pyongyang To Take First Steps Towards Normalizing Relations. On its front page, the Washington Times (2/28, A1, Salmon, 88K) reports, "North Korea's top nuclear negotiator was on his way to the United States yesterday for talks on issues that a State Department official said would include the first steps toward the normalization of diplomatic relations." Kim Kye-gwan's trip "reflects the rapid easing of tensions with President Kim Jong-Il's regime" since North Korea agreed this month to freeze its nuclear program in exchange for heavy fuel oil and other concessions. Kim is expected to arrive in San Francisco tomorrow, a State Department official told The

DOJ_NMG_0137616

Times, and "will continue to New York" for talks with Assistant Secretary Christopher Hill, "which will likely begin early next week."

DNI McConnell Says Iran Training Shiite Militias In Lebanon. In an article on US participation in a regional summit on Iraq, the New York Times (2/28, A1,Cooper, Semple, 1.16M) says new DNI Mike McConnell told a Senate committee Tuesday "that Iran was training anti-American Iraqi Shiites at sites in Lebanon and Iran to use armor-piercing weapons against American troops." McConnell said it was "probable" that top Iranian leaders, including Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, "were aware that weapons had been supplied by Iran." At the State Department, Assistant Secretary McCormack said the Iranian-made weapons would be "certainly at the top of our list" in the regional meetings.

Similarly, the Washington Post (2/28, A1, Kessler, 690K) notes briefly in report on the summit that McConnell said "that while Iran is contributing weapons to Iraqi militias that 'raises the cost to the United States' of its fighting in Iraq, he did not see 'any direct linkage from Iran dictating events inside Iraq.'"

The Washington Times (2/28, Gertz, 88K) reports McConnell also said "Iran's development of nuclear arms is 'very dangerous,' and Tehran could deploy the weapons within the next several years." He added, "We assess that Tehran seeks to develop nuclear weapons and has shown greater interest in drawing out the negotiations rather than reaching an acceptable diplomatic solution. … This is a very dangerous situation, as a nuclear Iran could prompt destabilizing countermoves by other states in this volatile region." Iran "could have the capability to build nuclear weapons by 2015 and about the same time will be able to mount a nuclear warhead on a missile," McConnell said in response to a question from Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton.

The Christian Science Monitor (2/28, Grier, 59K) reports, "The consensus view of US intelligence agencies is that Iran is a power on the rise in the Middle East, eager to expand its military might and committed to the development of nuclear weapons." McConnell's "warning comes at a time when the US has charged that Iranian forces are sending deadly weapons to Shiite militias inside Iraq. In addition, US officials have cited the potential threat of long-range Iranian missiles as a reason why Europe might need US-made missile defenses." But "critics of the White House say that the US may be misusing intelligence information to create a pretext for conflict with Iran, in a manner similar to the run-up to the Iraq war."

Pace "Categorically" Denies Plans For Iran Air Strikes. AFP (2/28) reports General Peter Pace, chairman of the joint chiefs of staff, declared "categorically" Tuesday that the US is not planning air strikes against Iran. During congressional testimony, Pace responded, "It is not true," when asked about suggestions that the US military was preparing to launch air strikes on Iran. Asked by Senator Robert Byrd if he was categorically denying the reports, Pace replied: "Categorically sir."

But the New Yorker's Seymour Hersh, on MSNBC's Hardball (2/27, Matthews) said, "I don't think the President will leave office without dealing with Iran in some way. … They're putting a lot of squeeze on them economically, but I don't think that's going to work. And I think they maybe think they can scare them into something." Hersh added that the President "wouldn't wait that late because it would already be close to an election. They want the Republicans to hang in there somehow in `08. If he does anything, he'll probably do it this year."

Meanwhile, the AP (2/28, Faramarzi) reports the deputy chief of Hezbollah warned Tuesday that any "military adventure" by the US and Israel against Iran "would have dangerous consequences across the Mideast." In an interview with the AP, Sheik Naim Kassem suggested Hezbollah "would not get involved if the US attacks Iran, but he raised the possibility that Israel might attack Lebanon as part of such an assault -- in which case, he said, Hezbollah would 'definitely' respond."

Encouraged By Strategy Versus North Korea, US Targets Iran's Finances. The Financial Times (2/28, Dinmore) reports, "Encouraged by what it sees as the success of financial sanctions imposed on North Korea, the Bush administration is embarking on an aggressive policy of raising the cost to Iran of its alleged nuclear and terrorist activities by targeting non-US private sector ties to Tehran." The Times adds, "Officials say the policy has support from 'hawks' in the administration who see actions against financing as a key component in the 'war on terror.'"

David Ignatius writes in the Washington Post (2/28, A19, 690K), "Everybody knows that economic sanctions don't work. Just look at the decades of fruitless pressure on Cuba. But guess what? In the recent cases of North Korea and Iran, a new variety of US Treasury sanctions is having a potent effect, suggesting that the conventional wisdom may be wrong. These new, targeted financial measures are to traditional sanctions what Super Glue is to Elmer's Glue-All. That is, they really stick." Deputy Treasury Secretary Robert Kimmitt "doesn't even like to call them sanctions, preferring the term 'law enforcement measures.' … The new sanctions are toxic because they effectively limit a country's access to the global ATM. In that sense, they impose -- at last -- a real price on countries such as North Korea and Iran that have blithely defied UN resolutions on proliferation."

Russian Deals In Middle East "Snarl" US Strategy On Iran. On its front page, the Wall Street Journal (2/28, A1, White, Jr., 2.04M) reports, "As the US struggles to contain Iran and its nuclear program, it is bumping into a new impediment: an assertive Russia bent on regaining leverage -- and markets -- in the Middle East." While the US and Russia have "tussled" autumn over a U.N. resolution to rein in Iran's nuclear program, Moscow "quietly moved ahead on another front," delivering "more than $700 million worth of air-defense systems to help protect Iran's nuclear enrichment and research sites from attack, Russian officials confirmed in December." Former Ambassador John Bolton said, "Russia is a huge problem on the Iran front." However, current Administration officials working closely with Russia "aren't quite so harsh, but concerns over Moscow's intentions in the Middle East -- as well as its overall foreign policy -- are rising."

DOJ_NMG_0137617

Russia Says Hamas Will End Attacks Against Israel. USA Today (2/28, 8A, 2.27M) reports, "Hamas supreme leader Khaled Mashaal promised during a meeting Tuesday with Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov in Moscow that the militant Palestinian group will end missile attacks and other violence against Israel, Lavrov said." However, Mashaal "said his group is not ready to recognize the Jewish state."

ICC Charges Former Sudanese Official With War Crimes. The Washington Times (2/28, Pisik, 88K) reports, "The International Criminal Court yesterday charged a former Sudanese official and the leader of the government-backed Janjaweed militia with committing war crimes in Darfur, the first of many anticipated attempts to punish participants in the bloody ethnic conflict." The court, which has been "collecting evidence on Darfur for 20 months," accused Ahmad Mohammed Harun, "formerly the junior interior minister in charge of the western Sudanese region, and Janjaweed commander Ali Kushayb of being involved in war crimes and crimes against humanity between August 2003 and March 2004." The Bush Administration, "until recently a foe of the ICC because of claims it lacks safeguards to protect U.S. soldiers and civilians in conflict zones, praised the court action. 'We fully support bringing to justice those responsible for crimes and atrocities that have occurred in Darfur,' State Department spokesman Sean McCormack told reporters in Washington."

The Los Angeles Times (2/28, Farley, Sanders, 850K) reports prosecutor Luis Moreno-Ocampo "presented results of a 21-month investigation that he said showed 'reasonable evidence' that Ahmed Haroun, then state minister for the interior, and imprisoned militia leader Ali Kushayb, 'bear criminal responsibility' for mass executions, rapes and the forcible removal of thousands of people from their homes." The allegations, "which are not an indictment, are a first step that could lead to arrests and prosecutions by the court at The Hague, and they come amid an international campaign to halt the violence in Darfur, which has killed more than 200,000 people and displaced 2.5 million in the last four years." Prosecution, however, "will not be easy. Sudan's justice minister immediately rejected the allegations and said the suspects would not be handed over for trial."

The New York Times (2/28, Simons, 1.16M) notes Moreno-Ocampo "declined to say whether the most important figures in Sudan's political or military hierarchy would be held accountable for the mass killing, looting, rape and general devastation in Darfur, which has uprooted more than two and a half million people, according to the United Nations." The Christian Science Monitor (2/28, Marquand, 59K) also reports the story.

Meanwhile, in an op-ed in the Washington Post (2/28, A19, 690K), actress Angelina Jolie, who is "a goodwill ambassador for the United Nations High Commission for Refugees," writes, "As the prosecutions unfold, I hope the international community will intervene, right away, to protect the people of Darfur and prevent further violence. The refugees don't need more resolutions or statements of concern. They need follow-through on past promises of action."

US Says Cuba Stepping Up Repression. The Financial Times (2/28, Dinmore) reports Caleb McCarry, the State Department's Cuba Transition Coordinator, Tuesday "claimed the Castro government was stepping up its internal repression in response to an increasingly active opposition movement." McCarry cited "independent Cuban journalists" as saying civil society "had become more active, especially in the provinces, since Fidel Castro temporarily passed power to his brother Raúl last July." The Times says McCarry's remarks to the American Enterprise Institute "contrasted with that of analysts and members of Congress who recently returned from Cuba with reports of a smooth transition of power."

However, the AP (2/28, Schweid) reports new DNI Mike McConnell told Congress Tuesday that "repression is increasing in Cuba under the control of Raul Castro, and the domination of the government by his brother, Fidel, is nearing an end." McConnell told the Senate Armed Services Committee "that significant positive change immediately after Fidel Castro's death was unlikely."

Ban Institutes Personnel Policy Changes At UN. The New York Times (2/28, Hoge, 1.16M) reports, "Secretary General Ban Ki-moon is installing tough new requirements for hundreds of jobs at the United Nations that he hopes will begin to dispel the reputation for inaction and bloat that has long dogged the institution, according to officials in his office." Ban "is adopting the changes, which include increasing internal competition for jobs and removing some job guarantees, first in his own office, and is calling on others to follow suit or leave the organization. … High-level officials will be reviewed at the end of their first two years, and all positions will be considered five-year appointments. The secretary general's term is five years, and aides say Mr. Ban believes that other officials should pass through the same reappraisal process he will face if he runs for a second term."

DOJ_NMG_0137618

British Tories Urged To Adopt More "Traditional" Foreign Policy. Kim R. Holmes and Nile Gardiner, who are, respectively, vice president for foreign policy and director of the Margaret Thatcher Center for Freedom, at the Heritage Foundation, write in the Wall Street Journal (2/28, A15, 2.04M), "For over half a century the Anglo-American 'special relationship' has been a dominant force in world affairs. Today it is the engine of the global war on terror, and its enduring strength continues to confound and even infuriate leaders in continental Europe. Britain is the only nation the US truly trusts as an ally; it is the British prime minister and not the German chancellor, the French president or the U.N. secretary-general, to whom the US president looks first for partnership in addressing the big international security matters of the day." They add that if the Conservatives "take office in 2009 or 2010, the relationship between the White House and Downing Street could well be a tense one whether the Republicans or Democrats are in power, with a great deal of bad blood generated in advance. … It is not too late, though, for the Conservatives to adopt a more traditional and pragmatic foreign-policy position, one that recognizes the huge stakes involved in maintaining the alliance."

WPost Denounces Egypt's Crackdown On "Secular Democrats." The Washington Post (2/28, A18, 690K) editorializes, "The Bush administration has tolerated Egypt's brutal crackdown on domestic dissent and the broader reversal of its democratic spring of 2005 in part because President Hosni Mubarak argues that his adversaries are dangerous Islamic extremists. It's true that the largest opposition movement in Egypt is the Muslim Brotherhood; how dangerous it is can be debated." But "what is overlooked is that Mr. Mubarak reserves his most relentless repression not for the Islamists -- who hold a fifth of the seats in parliament -- but for the secular democrats who fight for free elections, a free press, rights for women and religious tolerance." The Post adds, "The latest case in point is a blogger named Abdel Kareem Nabil Soliman, who was sentenced to four years in prison last week on charges of religious incitement, disrupting public order and 'insulting the president.'"

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"God's Word, Plus Static, On Calvary Satellite Network."
"Police Probe Death In Organ Donation Case."
"U.S. To Join Iran, Syria In Iraq talks."
"San Diego Diocese Files For Bankruptcy."
"Sudan Official Accused In Darfur Atrocities."
"Worldwide Sell-Off Hits Wall Street."

USA Today:
"It's A Hard Sell For Some, Big Easy For Others."
"HUD Gets New View Of Who's Homeless."
"704,000 Sought Shelter."

New York Times:
"Wall St. Tumble Adds To Worries About Economies."
"Low Pay And Broken Promises Greet Guest Workers."
"2 New Drugs Offer Options In H.I.V. Fight."
"Deal in Albany Overhauls Pay For Worker Aid."
"As Ethics Panels Expand Grip, No Field Is Off Limits."
"Afghan Bombing Sends A Danger Signal To U.S.."

Washington Post:
"Stock Sell-Off in China Hits Wall Street."
"U.S. Will Join Talks With Iran And Syria."
"Millions In U.S. Infected With HPV."
"New Light Shed on CIA's 'Black Site' Prisons."
"Bombing Near Cheney Displays Boldness of Resurgent Taliban."
"Blacks Shift To Obama, Poll Finds."
"With Woods's Backing, PGA Tour to Return to Area."

Washington Times:
"US, N. Korea To Normalize Ties."
"Doubts Trigger 416-Point Dow Dive."
"Tiger Brings Tourney To DC."
"Lost Of Stings, No Pain."
"New Lawmakers Seek War Debate."
"US To Attend talks With Iraq, Neighbors."
"Maoris Seek To limit Number Of Migrants Form Britain."

Detroit Free Press:
"Chrysler Offers $100,000."
"TV's Woodruff Is back: Mich. Family Is Thrilled."
"'These Were babies Not Drug-Runners, Families Say."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Fierce Debate Over Payday Loans."
"Taliban's Message To Cheney."
"Market Plunge To Deepen?"
"Perdue Appointee's Firm Fined For Spill."
"In Iraq, The Sounds Of Beauty Being Made."

DOJ_NMG_0137619

Houston Chronicle:
"Dow falls 416 Points On China Syndrome."
"Local Firm Accused In Steroid Scheme."
"An American Dream Collapsed."
"Study: More Than 1 In 4 Women Has HPV."
"Legislators Move Swiftly To review, Block TXU Sale."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Stock Market Drop; Stock Market-Analysis; Cheney Suicide Bomber Target; US Talks-Iran & Syria; Campaign '08; HPV Virus-Study; Shuttle Launch-Delay; Toyota Opens New Plants; Bob Woodruff's Recovery; VA Screens-Brain Injuries; Bob Woodruff Interview.
CBS: Stock Market Drops; Stock Market Analysis; Gas Prices; Iraq Diplomacy; Cheney-Afghanistan Attack; Civil Rights-Cold Cases; IL Bombing Suspect; Heart Attack Treatment; HPV Infections; Homework Bans; Iraq Boy-US Surgery.
NBC: Stock Market Drop; Stock Market-Analysis; Cheney Suicide Bomber's Target; Sectarian Violence; US Talks-Iran & Syria; HPV Virus Study; Airvac Missions; Civil Rights-Cold Cases; JetBlue Flight Delay; Bush Invites-Miami Heat; YouTube Generation.
ABC: Asian Stock Markets; Wall Street; Duke Lacrosse Rape Case; HUD Homelessness Study; Los Angeles Man Claims British Singer Ran Over His Foot; Anna Nicole Smith's Mother Reportedly Allowed To Spend Time With Granddaughter.
CBS: Wall Street; Asian Stock Markets; London Stock Exchange; Chrysler Buyout Offers; Rice-Iraq Summit With Iran And Syria; Iraq-Car Bombing; Libby Trial; CO-Baby Reportedly Traded For Car.
NPR: Wall Street; Asian Stock Markets; Rice-Iraq Summit With Iran And Syria; Congressional Testimony From Intelligence Officials-Iranians Training Iraqi Extremists; Cheney-Attack On Army Base In Afghanistan; Cheney, Karzai Meeting; UN Committee-India's Caste-Based System.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Meets with Military Service Organizations, Roosevelt Room.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

LAURA BUSH — Views the Red Dress Collection and participates in a roundtable on heart health, Reagan Presidential Library, Simi Valley, Calif.; participates in a National Park Service Event, Balboa Magnet School, Northridge, Calif.

US Senate: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 9:30 a.m. FLOOR SCHEDULE _ the Senate convenes and proceed to a period of morning business. Following morning business, the Senate will begin consideration of S.4, the 9/11 Commissions Recommendations bill.

9:30 a.m. JOINT ECONOMIC _ Full Committee. Hearing on wage and income instability. CBO Director Peter Orszag; Lael Brainard, The Brookings Institution; Lily Batchelder, New York University School of Law; Bradley R. Schiller, American University. Location: Room 562, Dirksen.

10 a.m. COMMERCE, SCIENCE AND TRANSPORTATION _ Consumer Affairs, Insurance and Automotive Safety Subcommittee. Hearing on vehicle safety for children. Location: Room 253, Russell.

10 a.m. JUDICIARY _ full Committee. Hearing on immigration reform. Commerce Secretary Gutierrez, Homeland Security Secretary Chertoff. Location: Room 216, Hart.

10 a.m. SMALL BUSINESS AND ENTREPRENEURSHIP _ Full Committee. Hearing on the FY08 budget request for the SBA. Location: Room 428A, Russell.

10:30 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Transportation, HUD and Related Agencies Subcommittee. Hearing on the FY08 Amtrak budget. Alexander Kummant, president and CEO, Amtrak; FRA Administrator Joseph H. Boardman; David Tornquist, Office of the Inspector General, Transportation Department; Robert Serlin, president, Rail Infrastructure Management; Edward Wytkind, president, Transportation Trades Department, AFL-CIO. Location: Room 138, Dirksen.

10:30 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Defense Subcommittee. Hearing on the FY08 budget for the Defense Department. Deputy Defense Secretary Gordon England. Location: Room 106, Dirksen.

10:30 a.m. BANKING, HOUSING AND URBAN AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Hearing on the terrorism risk insurance program. Location: Room 538, Dirksen.

10:30 a.m. SPECIAL AGING _ Full Committee. Hearing on the impact of the aging workforce. Comptroller General David Walker; Donald Kohn, vice chairman, Board of Governors, Federal Reserve System; Marcie Pitt-Catsouphes, director, Center on Aging and Work/Workplace Flexibility; Javon Bea, president and CEO, Mercy Health System; Preston Pulliams, Portland Community College. Location: Room 628, Dirksen.

2 p.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Labor, HHS, Education and Related Agencies Subcommittee. Hearing on efforts to improve mine safety. Assistant Labor Secretary Richard Stickler; John Howard, director, National Institute of Occupational Safety and Health; J. Davitt McAteer, Wheeling Jesuit University, Shepherdstown, W.Va.; Chris Hamilton, West Virginia Coal Association; Cecil Roberts, international president, United Mine Workers of America; Bruce Watzman, National Mining Association. Location: Room 124, Dirksen.

DOJ_NMG_0137620

2:30 p.m. COMMERCE, SCIENCE AND TRANSPORTATION _ Space, Aeronautics and Related Sciences Subcommittee. Hearing on the FY08 budget for NASA. Location: Room 253, Russell.

US House: FLOOR SCHEDULE _ 10 a.m. Meets for legislative business. Highlights: H.R. 556 - National Security Foreign Investment Reform and Strengthened Transparency Act of 2007.

9:30 a.m. JOINT ECONOMIC _ Full Committee. Hearing on wage and income instability. CBO Director Peter Orszag; Lael Brainard, The Brookings Institution; Lily Batchelder, New York University School of Law; Bradley R. Schiller, American University. Location: Room 562, Dirksen.

9 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Interior, Enviornment and Related Agencies Subcommittee. Hearing on the FY08 budget for the EPA. Administrator Stephen Johnson. Location: Room B-308, Rayburn.

9:30 a.m. ENERGY AND COMMERCE _ Commerce, Trade and Consumer Protection Subcommittee. Hearing on ``The Lack of Diversity in Leadership Positions in NCAA Collegiate Sports." Rev. Jesse Jackson; Myles Brand, President, NCAA; Floyd Keith, Executive Director, Black Coaches Association; Nolan Richardson, former head basketball coach, University of Arkansas; Richard Lapchick, Sports Management; Tim Weiser, Athletic Director, Kansas State University; Fitz Hill, President, Arkansas Bible College, former Head Coach, San Jose State football. Location: Room 2322, Rayburn.

10 a.m. AGRICULTURE _ Horticulture and Organic Agriculture Subcommittee. Hearing on proposals for the farm bill with respect to specialty crops and organic agriculture. Location: Room 1302, Longworth.

10 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Commerce, Justice and Science Subcommittee. Hearing on the FY08 budget for the National Science Board. Location: Room 2359, Rayburn.

10 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Financial Services and General Government Subcommittee. Hearing on consuymer issues. FTC Chair Deborah Platt Majoras; Nancy Nord, acting chairwoman, Consumer Product Safety Commission; Janell Mayo Duncan, Consumers Union; Rachel Weintraub, Consumer Federation of America; Ari Schwartz, Center for Democracy and Technology. Location: Room 2220, Rayburn.

10 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Energy and Water Development and Related Agencies Subcommittee. Hearing on the 10-year energy research and development outlook. EIA Administrator Guy Caruso; Jim Wells, GAO; Daniel M. Kammen, UC Berkeley; David Hawkins, Natural Resources Defense Council; Ernest J. Moniz, Massachusetts Institute of Technology; David Nemtzow, energy consultant; John DeCicco, Automotive Strategies at Environmental Defense; others. Location: Room 2362B, Rayburn.

10 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Transportation, HUD, and Related AGencies Subcommittee. Hearing on transportation and housing trends over the last 10 years. Tom Lomax, Texas Transportation Institute; Bruce Katz, Brookings Institution; Margery Austin Turner, Urban Institute. Location: Room 2358, Rayburn.

10 a.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Labor, HHS, Education and Related Agencies Subcommittee. Hearings on the Health Resources Administration Budget. Administrator Elizabeth Duke. Location: Room 2212, Rayburn.

10 a.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Full Committee. Hearing on the FY08 Air Force Budget. Secretary Michael Wynne; Chief of Staff Gen. T. Michael Moseley. Location: Room 2118, Rayburn.

10 a.m. BUDGET _ Full Committee. Hearing on long-term fiscal challenges and the economy. Federal Reserve Board Chairman Ben Bernanke. Location: Room 210, Cannon.

10 a.m. FOREIGN AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Hearing on Iraq. Former UN Amb. Richard Holbrooke, Frederick Kagan, AEI. Location: Room 2172, Rayburn.

10 a.m. HOMELAND SECURITY _ Emergency Communication, Preparedness and Response Subcommittee and th4e Management, Investigation and Oversight Subcommittee. Joint hearing on reforming FEMA. Location: Room 311, Cannon.

10 a.m. NATURAL RESOURCES _ Full Committee. Oversight hearing on the ``Evolving West." Montana Gov. Brian Schweitzer; Russell Vaagen, Vice President, Vaagen Brothers Lumber Company; Clifford Lyle Marshall, Chairman, Hoopa Valley Tribe; Luther Probst, Executive Director, The Sonoran Institute; former Rep. Pat Williams, Senior Fellow, O'Connor Center for the Rocky Mountain West; Matthew Box, Vice Chairman, Southern Ute Tribe; Bob Lee, University of Washington. Location: Room 1324, Longworth.

10 a.m. OVERSIGHT AND GOVERNMENT REFORM _ Full Committee. Business meeting followed immediately by a hearing on reforming the presidential library funding disclosure process. Location: Room 2154, Rayburn.

10 a.m. SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY _ Full Committee. Markup of pending legislation. Location: Room 2318, Rayburn.

10 a.m. SMALL BUSINESS _ Full Committee. Markup of the views and estimates for FY08. Location: Room 2360, Rayburn.

10 a.m. VETERANS AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Meetingon views and estimates report. Location: Room 334, Cannon.

10 a.m. WAYS AND MEANS _ Full Committee. Meeting on views and estimates report to the Budget Committee. Location: Room 1100, Rayburn.

10:15 a.m. JUDICIARY _ Full Committee. Markup of pending business. Location: Room 2141, Rayburn.

DOJ_NMG_0137621

10:30 a.m. EDUCATION AND LABOR _ Early Childhood, Elementary and Secondary Education Subcommittee. Hearing on improving Head Start. Ross A. Thompson, University of California at Davis; Mac McKeever, Out-County Head Start, Flint, Mich.; Barbara Haxton, Ohio Head Start Association; Pearlie Elloie, Youth and Families Total Community Action, Inc., New Orleans; Ellen Frede, National Institute for Early Education Research, New Brunswick, N.J. Location: Room 2175, Rayburn.

10:30 a.m. WAYS AND MEANS _ Full Committee. Hearing on energy and tax policy. Ronald Prinn, MIT; Stephen Schneider, Stanford University; Eileen Claussen, Pew Center on Global Climate Change; W. David Montgomery, CRA International. Location: Room 1100, Longworth.

12 p.m. OVERSIGHT AND GOVERNMENT REFORM _ Government Management, Organization and Procurement Subcommittee. Hearing on federal monitoring and treatment of residents and responders following 9/11. Location: Room 2247, Rayburn.

1:30 p.m. FOREIGN AFFAIRS _ Full Committee. Hearing on North Korea. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill. Location: Room 2172, Rayburn.

2 p.m. APPROPRIATIONS _ Commerce, Justice and Science Subcommittee. Hearing on science funding in the FY08 budget. Norman Augustine, retired CEO, Lockheed Martin Corp.; Alan Lesher, CEO, American Association for the Advancement of Science. Location: Room 2359, Rayburn.

2 p.m. ARMED SERVICES _ Full committee. Hearing on HR 1102, Total Force Educational Assistance Enhancement and Integration Act of 2007. Keith Wilson, director, Benefits, Department of Veterans Affairs; Michael L. Dominguez - principal deputy under secretary of Defense for personnel and readiness; Under Secretary of Defense for Personnel and Readiness David S.C. Chu. Location: Room 2118, Rayburn.

2 p.m. FINANCIAL SERVICES _ Oversight and Investigations Subcommittee. Hearing on Hurricane Katrina insurance issues. Location: Room 2128, Rayburn.

Other: AMERICAN INDIANS _ The National Congress of American Indians holds its 110th Congress Executive Council ``Tribal Nations Legislative Summit." Highlights: 9:10 a.m. Sen. Kent Conrad. 9:30 a.m. Rep. Dale Kildee. 11 a.m. Rep. Rick Renzi. Location: Wyndham Hotel, 1400 M St. NW.

HOMELAND SECURITY _ AFCEA hosts its 6th annual Homeland Security Conference, ``Intelligence and Information-Fusion Beyond Sharing." Highlights: 8 a.m. Intelligence Forum with VADM Herb Browne, USN (Ret.), President and CEO, AFCEA International; Charles Allen, Assistant Secretary for Intelligence & Analysis/Chief Intelligence Officer, Department of Homeland Security; and Dale Meyerrose, Associate Director of National Intelligence & Chief Information Officer, Office of the Director of National Intelligence. 3:30 p.m. Keynote Address by Scott Charbo, Chief Information Officer Department of Homeland Security.

MISSILE DEFENSE _ 9 a.m. - 1 p.m. The American Foreign Policy Council holds its 5th annual Conference on Missile Defense. Highlights: 9:15 a.m. Keynote address - former DHS Secretary Tom Ridge. 9:45 a.m. Session on proliferation and missile defense, with Peter Brookes of Heritage Foundation, Ilan Berman of the AFPC, and Stephen Yatres of AFPC. Location: Capitol Hill Club, 300 1st St. SE.

JOHANNS _ 8 a.m. Agriculture Secretary Johanns speaks to the National Potato Council's annual meeting. Location: L'Enfant Plaza Hotel, 480 L'Enfant Plaza, SW.

LAVIN-TRADE _ 9 a.m. The Washington International Trade Association hosts A breakfast discussion with Undersecretary of Commerce for International Trade Franklin Lavin, who will discuss ``Record Imports, Record Exports: Analyzing Trends in US International Trade." Location: Horizon Ballroom, Ronald Reagan Building and International Trade Center (Ground Level), 1300 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM _ 9:30 a.m. The American Humanist Association holds a rally in support of religious liberty and in opposition to the Office of the Faith-Based Initiatives in Hein v. Freedom From Religion Foundation pending in the Supreme Court. Location: Steps of the Supreme Court.

ILLEGAL IMMIGRATION _ 9:30 a.m. - 11 a.m. Judicial Watch hosts a panel discussion, ``Local Governments and Illegal Immigration." Participants: Mayor Louis Barletta, Hazleton, Pa.; Starletta Hairston, Former Council Member, Beaufort County, S.C.; Delegate Jackson H. Miller, District 50, Prince William County, Va.; and Tom Fitton, President, Judicial Watch. Location: National Press Club, First Amendment Lounge.

2008 ELECTION _ 9:30 a.m. - 12:30 p.m. The Brooking Institution hosts an event, ``Opportunity 08: Independent Ideas for Our Next President," featuring opening remarks from Brookings President Strobe Talbott followed by three panels focused on a variety of domestic and foreign policy issues that will influence the 2008 campaign, including energy security, Iraq, trade policy and immigration. Highlights: Panel One: Why Issues Matter? Moderator: George Stephanopoulos, ABC News Chief Washington Correspondent; Host of ``This Week. Panelists: Thomas Donilon, Opportunity 08 Advisory Council Chair; and Kenneth Duberstein, Opportunity 08 Advisory Council Chair. Panel Two: Foreign Policy Solutions. Moderator: Torie Clarke, Former Assistant Secretary of Defense for Public Affairs, ABC News Consultant. Panelists: Amy Walter, Senior Editor and Political Analyst, The Cook Political Report; Martin Indyk, Director, Saban Center for Middle East Policy; Jeffrey A. Bader, Director, John L. Thornton China Center; and Carlos

DOJ_NMG_0137622

Pascual, Vice President and Director, Foreign Policy Studies. Panel Three: Domestic Policy Solutions. Moderator: Mark McClellan, Visiting Senior Fellow, AEI-Brookings Joint Center for Regulatory Studies; Panelists: Lael Brainard, Vice President and Director, Global Economy and Development Program; Ron Haskins, Co-director, Center on Children and Families; and David Sandalow, Energy and Environment Scholar. Location: Brookings Institution, Falk Auditorium, 1775 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

HOUSE REPUBLICANS _ 10 a.m. House Republican leadership holds a media availability following the 9 a.m. meeting of the House Republican Conference. Location: RNC lobby, 310 1st St. SE.

REFINERIES-BODMAN _ 10 a.m. Energy Secretary Bodman holds a news conference to announce selection of biorefinery projects, as part of the administration's goal of reducing gasoline consumption by 20 percent in 10 years. Location: Energy Department.

EDUCATIONAL EFFECTIVENESS _ 10 a.m. - 11:30 a.m. The Center for American Progress and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce hosts a panel and release of ``Leaders and Laggards: A State-by-State Report Card on Educational Effectiveness." Speakers: Thomas J. Donohue, President and CEO, U.S. Chamber of Commerce; John D. Podesta, President and Chief Executive Officer, Center for American Progress; Panelists: Ulrich Boser, Freelance Writer and Contributing Editor at US News and World Report; Cynthia G. Brown, Director of Education Policy, Center for American Progress; and Frederick M. Hess, Resident Scholar and Director of Education Policy Studies, American Enterprise Institute. Moderator: Arthur J. Rothkopf, Senior Vice-President and Counselor to the President, U.S. Chamber of Commerce. Location: U.S. Chamber of Commerce, Hall of Flags, 1615 H St. NW.

EMPLOYEE FREE CHOICE _ 11 a.m. Congressional leadership, workers hold a news conference to urge Congress to pass the Employee Free Choice Act. Location: Room 2261, Rayburn.

ENERGY _ 11 a.m. A coalition of agricultural, energy, environmental, business and labor groups holds a news conference to announce a plan to have 25 percent of the nation's energy supply come from renewable sources by 2025. Location: Room HC-6, Capitol.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM _ 11 a.m. The Family Research Council holds a lecture on religious freedom, with William Saunders. Location: 801 G St. NW.

ENDANGERED SPECIES _ 11:15 a.m. Sens. Mike Crapo, Blanche Lincoln, Max Baucus and Charles Grassley hold a news conference on bipartisan legislation to provide financial incentives for conservation efforts, the Endangered Species Recovery Act of 2007. Location: Room 215, Dirksen.

HOMELAND SECURITY _ 11:30 a.m. Science and Technologys Command, Control and Interoperability Director Dr. David Boyd will deliver a presentation to the Federal Communications Bar Associations Homeland Security and Emergency Communications Committee. Location: Akin, Gump, Strauss, Hauer and Feld, 1333 New Hampshire Ave. NW.

CLEAN AIR _ 12 p.m. The Clean Air Task Force holds a briefing to release a report, ``No Escape from Diesel Exhaust: How to Reduce Commuter Exposure." Location: National Press Club.

CURRENCY RATES _ 12 p.m. Reps. Tim Ryan and Duncan Hunter hold a news conference on reintroduction of the Fair Currency Act to limit exchange rate manipulation. Location: Cannon Terrace.

MIDEAST _ 12 p.m. The Middle East Institute and the Foundation for Middle East Peace hold a discussion with Haggai Alon, senior adviser to Israeli Defense Minister Amir Peretz, discussing economic polikcy for Israel and the Palestinian territories. Location: 1779 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

EMPLOYEE CHOICE _ 12:45 p.m. Rep. Eric Cantor, others, holds a news conference on the Employee Free Choice Act. Location: House Radio-TV Gallery.

EDUCATION _ 1 p.m. The Heritage Foundation holds a discussion on educational freedom in the wake of the No Child Left Behind law, with Rep. Peter Hoekstra, Colorado State Board of Education Vice Chairman Bob Schaffer, others. Location: Lehrman Auditorium, Heritage Foundation, 214 Massachusetts Ave. NE.

HOMELESSNESS _ 1 p.m. HUD holds a news conference with Deputy Secretary Roy Bernardi, others, on the scope and nature of homelessness in America. Location: HUD, 451 7th St. SW.

NARCOTICS REPORT _ 1 p.m. The International Narcotics Control Board releases its annual report. Location: UN Foundation, 1800 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

CLIMATE CHANGE _ 2 p.m. The Scientific Expert Group on Climate Change and Sustainable Development, convened by the UN Foundation and Sigma XI, releases its final report with a roadmap for preventing unmanageable climate change. Location: Room 366, Dirksen.

GAYS-MILITARY _ 2 p.m. Rep. Marty Meehan, D-Mass., holds a news conference to re-introduce The Military Readiness Enhancement Act, a congressional bill to repeal the military's ``Don't Ask, Don't Tell" ban on lesbian, gay and bisexual military personnel. Meehan will be joined by C. Dixon Osburn, executive director of Servicemembers Legal Defense Network; BG Evelyn ``Pat" Foote, USA (Ret.), a member of the Network's honorary board; and former Marine Sergeant Brian Fricke, an openly gay veteran of the war in Iraq. Location: Room 2216, Rayburn House Office Building.

DOJ_NMG_0137623

US-VISIT _ 2 p.m. US-Visit Acting Director Robert Mocny participates in a discussion at the Armed Forces Communications and Electric Association Homeland Security Conference. Location: Reagan Trade Building.

IRAQ STRATEGY _ 2 p.m. - 4 p.m. CDI's Straus Military Reform Project sponsors a colloquium on the future of U.S. strategy in Iraq. Panelists: Dr. Ted Galen Carpenter, vice president for defense and foreign policy studies at the Cato Institute; Helle Dale, deputy director for the Davis Institute for International Studies and director of the Douglas and Sarah Allison Center for Foreign Policy Studies at the Heritage Foundation; Col. Douglas A. Macgregor, U.S. Army (ret.), author of three books on military affairs and a frequent commentator on radio and television; Frank Gaffney, president of the Center for Security Policy and a syndicated columnist, was assistant secretary of defense for international security policy under President Reagan; and Frank Anderson, who served 27 years at the CIA, in many senior posts including chief of the Near East Division. Location: National Press Club, Holeman Lounge.

ROHRABACHER _ 2:30 p.m. Rep. Dana Rohrabacher holds a news conference to discuss new developments in the border patrol agents case. Location: House Radio-TV Gallery.

BORDER _ 3:30 p.m. Rep. Virgil Goode hosts a screening of a new documentary, BORDER," on the U.S.-Mexican border situation. Location: Room 122, Cannon.

TECHNOLOGY-FREE MARKET _ 4 p.m. CPAC holds a briefing on technology, intellectual property and competitive markets, with David Williams of Citizens Against Government Waste, Ray Keating of the Small Business and Entrepreneurship Council, and Solveig Singleton of the Progress and Freedom Foundation. Location: Capitol Hill Club.

Copyright 2007 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Wednesday, February 28, 2007 9:08 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Wednesday, February 28, 2007
Attachments:	dojclips070228.pdf; dojclips070228.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Terror Suspect's Brig Life Detailed (AP) ... 4
Brig Officials Offer Look At Padilla's Detention (USAT) ... 5
Aspects Of Padilla's Treatment Confirmed (LAT) ... 5
Jailers Testify About Padilla's Confinement (NYT) ... 6
Padilla Was Deprived, Not Abused, Court Told (WP) ... 8
Shorbagi Sentence – 7 Years, 8 Months (ROMENT) ... 9
Rome Imam Sentenced In Terror Case Palestinian Native Gave Money To Islamic Militant Group Hamas (AJC) ... 9
First Terrorism Sentence In Georgia (WXIA) ... 10
Georgia Man Sent To Jail For Aiding Hamas (ATLBIZ) ... 10
Ga. Imam Sentenced For Aiding Hamas (AP) ... 11
False Quotes Shake Up Terror Trial (LAT) ... 11
Details Of Men Held In CIA Jails Demanded (FT) ... 12
New Light Shed On CIA's 'Black Site' Prisons (WP) ... 12
Europe's Runaway Prosecutions (WP) ... 15
Canadian Parliament Decides To Let 2 Measures Passed After 9/11 Expire (NYT) ... 16

Patriot Act:

DoJ Sued For Release Of FISA Court Rules On Spy Program (INFOWEEK) ... 17
EFF Files Suit Against DoJ (TND) ... 18

Homeland Response:

Bush Will Veto Union Rights For Federal Airport Screeners (WT) ... 18
Labor Language Threatens Antiterror Bill (AP) ... 19
FEDERAL DIARY: Interior Report Finds 'Wall' Between Field Staff, Leaders (WP) ... 20
Call To Expand Union Rights Could Derail Antiterror Bill (NYT). 21
New Profiling Program Raises Privacy Concerns (WP) ... 22
Under The Gantry (WP) ... 23
It's A Hard Sell For Some, Big Easy For Others (USAT) ... 23

War News:

War Bill Divides Democrats (LAT) ... 25
Democrats Struggle To Reach Consensus On Iraq (MCT) ... 27
Senate Democrats Backtrack, Opt Not To Tackle Iraq In 9/11 Commission Bill (HILL) ... 27
Iraq Bill Vexes Democrats (WP) ... 28
Iraq Moves Unclear (RC) ... 29
Democrats Back Away From War Fund Plan (AP) ... 31
Divided Congress Prepares To Debate Financing And Strategy For Iraq War (NYT) ... 31
New Lawmakers Seek War Debate (WT) ... 32
Democrats Snipe At Senate Leaders Over Handling Of Iraq Issue (POL) ... 33
An Editor's Confession: I'm The Source Of 'Slow Bleed' (POL) . 35
Service Members Sign Appeal Calling For Troop Withdrawal (NYT) ... 36
Spy Chief Uses 'Civil War' To Describe Iraq (USAT) ... 37
Bush Administration To Join Iraqi-led Talks Attended By Iran, Syria (MCT) ... 37
Car Bomb Near Soccer Field Kills 16 Children, 2 Women In Ramadi (WP) ... 38
Iraq Bombers Target Ice Cream Shop, Restaurants (LAT) ... 39
Coming Soon, Maybe: An Iraqi Oil Law (NYT) ... 40
Iran, Syria May Join Baghdad Talks (AP) ... 41
U.S. Joins Regional Talks To Secure Iraq (AP) ... 41
U.S. To Sit Down With Syria, Iran For Regional Conference On Iraq (USAT) ... 43
U.S. Will Join Talks With Iran And Syria (WP) ... 44
Iraq Calls For Two Regional Summits (FT) ... 45
U.S. Set To Join Iran And Syria In Talks On Iraq (NYT) ... 45
U.S. To Enter Iraq Talks With Iran, Syria (WSJ) ... 47
U.S. To Attend Talks With Iraq, Neighbors (WT) ... 48
U.S. To Join Iran, Syria In Iraq Talks (LAT) ... 49
Al-Qaeda Will Come Back To Haunt US If It Fails In Iraq: Rice (AFP) ... 50
Making Nice With Iraq's Neighbors (LAT) ... 51
Taliban Say Attack Aimed At Cheney (FT) ... 51
Cheney Escapes Harm In Blast (WT/AP) ... 52
Cheney, Karzai Discuss 'Problems From Pakistan' (USAT) ... 53
A Mile From Cheney, Afghan Bomber Kills At Least 23 (NYT) .. 53
Bombing Near Cheney Displays Boldness Of Resurgent Taliban (WP) ... 54
Afghan Bombing Sends A Danger Signal To U.S. (NYT) ... 56
Cheney OK After Afghan Suicide Bombing (CHIT) ... 57
Taliban Says It Targeted Cheney (LAT) ... 58
Inside Politics (WT) ... 59
The Reliable Source (WP) ... 61

Qaeda Rebuilding In Pakistan, Intelligence Chief Tells Panel (NYT) ... 62
U.S. Sees New Al-Qaeda Threat (WP) ... 63
Spy Chief Pushes For Action In Pakistan (AP) ... 63
US Ramps Up Taliban Fight (CSM) ... 64
Warning To Pakistan (WSJ) ... 66

DOJ:

Inside Bush's Prosecutor Purge (SALON) ... 66
Justice Pilots Federated ID Broker (GCN) ... 69

Corporate Scandals:

Former McAfee GC Indicted Over Stock Options (LAW) ... 70
Ex-McAfee Counsel Charged With Fraud (FT) ... 71
McAfee's Ex-Lawyer Indicted (NYT/AP) ... 71
McAfee's Ex-general Counsel Indicted In Stock-option Backdating Case (USAT) ... 72
Fired McAfee Executive Is Charged With Options Fraud (WP/AP) ... 72
MBC Managers Plead Guilty In $830 Million Securities Fraud (AP) ... 73
Former FDA Official Gets Three Years Probation, Fine (FLSUNSEN) ... 73
Feds To List Witnesses In Nacchio Trial (DENP) ... 73
Fine And Probation For Former F.D.A. Chief (NYT/AP) ... 74

Criminal Law:

House Leaders Reach Deal On Subpoenas (HILL) ... 74
Deal Reached On Cunningham Subpeonas (AP) ... 75
Group Asks Gonzales To Review Small's Conduct (WP) ... 75
Deputy Sheriff Charged With Child Pornography (RMN) ... 76
More Jail Time For IC Man (ICPC) ... 76
FIU Couple Heading To Jail (MIH) ... 77
Hollywood Chief Defends Exposing Probe (AP) ... 78
Former Officer Pleads Guilty To Possessing Stolen Firearms (AP) ... 79
Ex-councilman's Conviction Tossed (MACOMBD) ... 79
Mom Taught Children To Fake Retardation (AP) ... 81
Two Indianapolis Men Received Prison Terms Friday For Mortgage Scams. (INDYSTAR) ... 81
3rd Person Charged In $4.2 Million Mortgage Fraud (AP) ... 82
Ex-trooper Gets 5 Years For Soliciting Sex (BOS) ... 82
Former State Trooper Sentenced To 5 Years In Prison In Internet Sex Case (BOS) ... 83
Police Probe Death In Organ Donation Case (LAT) ... 83
Doctors' Hospital Owner's Sentencing Rescheduled (SHRVTIMES) ... 84
Roughing It, Senate Style (RC) ... 84

Civil Law:

Church-state Question Before Justices (USAT) ... 86
Supreme Court Takes Up Church-state Case (CSM) ... 86
Government By Law, Not Faith (NYT) ... 88
Lawyer: FBI Knew Convicts Were Innocent (BSH) ... 88
Wrongly Convicted Say FBI Was At Fault (BOS) ... 89
At What Price The FBI's Treachery? (BOSH) ... 89
Government Contractors Must Take Early Compliance Steps (LAW) ... 90
Lawyer: FBI Knew Convicts Were Innocent (AP) ... 93

Civil Rights:

Justice Dept. Widens FBI Probe Of Deaths During Civil Rights Era (USAT) ... 93
Justice Dept. To Revisit Civil-Rights-Era Killings (WP) ... 94
FBI, Justice Department To Reopen Nearly 100 Cases Of Unsolved Civil Rights-era Killings (MINNST) ... 95
Justice Officials Looking To Prosecute Old Civil Rights Murders (GANNETT) ... 95
FBI, Justice Department To Revisit Civil Rights-Era Killings (BLOOM) ... 96
Attorney General To Civil Rights Era Killers: 'We Are Still On Your Trail' (ABC) ... 96
No Indictment In '55 Emmett Till Slaying (BVND) ... 97
After Inquiry, Grand Jury Refuses To Issue New Indictments In Till Case (NYT) ... 98
The FBI Is Reopening 70 Cold Cases From The Civil Rights Era. (WJTV) ... 99
Two Local Civil Rights Era Deaths Will Get FBI Review (WEDF) 99
FBI To Reopen Memphis Civil-rights Era Cold Case (WMC) ... 99
Feds Probe Two Civil Rights Era Deaths Here (WCNC) ... 99
No Indictment In '55 Emmett Till Slaying (AP) ... 100
No Indictment In Emmett Till Slaying (LAT) ... 101
Cowboy Church Probe Dropped (LYNNA) ... 102
Man Who Was Shot By Ex-EP Border Agents Is Arrested (EPT) 102
S.B. Supervisors Back Ex-border Agents (IVDB) ... 103
Council To Draw New District Maps (FAYOBS) ... 103
Bill Targets 'Don't Ask, Don't Tell' (USAT) ... 104
Defending His Country, But Not Its 'Don't Ask, Don't Tell' Policy (WP) ... 105
Texan Calls For Takeover Of State's Juvenile Schools (NYT) ... 105

Antitrust:

House Gets First Crack At XM-Sirius Proposal (WP) ... 107
Sirius Radio Chief Urges Merger (NYT) ... 108
Satellite Radio Chief To Clear Political Air (FT) ... 108
Sirius Narrows Loss On Subscriber Gains (WSJ) ... 109
Sirius Business (WSJ) ... 109
TXU Profit Up 33%; Dynegy Posts Loss (AP) ... 110
Next Step In TXU Deal Is Backdrop Of Conference (NYT) ... 111
Court Sides With N.C. Cigarette Maker In Wholesalers Dispute (AP) ... 112
VMware Fires Broadside At Microsoft (CNET) ... 113
A Bit Of Movement In Antitrust Suit (KCS) ... 114
Onex Gets U.S. Antitrust Clearance To Buy Kodak's X-Ray Unit (BLOOM) ... 115
Qualcomm Lawsuit Against Nokia On Hold (WSJ) ... 115

Environment:

Nuclear Lab Operator Cited For Safety (AP) ... 115
Study: 'Tipping Point' For Climate Is Near (USAT) ... 116

DOJ_NMG_0137627

Conservation May Limit Global Warming (LAT)..... 116
Congress Needs A Marshall Plan In Climate-change Debate (HILL) 117
A Green Deal On Coal (NYT) 119

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Sen. Asks If FBI Will Punish Those Who Retaliated Against Agent (BVND) 119
Accounting Sought From FBI Director (MINNST) 120
Senator Presses FBI For Disciplining (WT) 120
Athletes, Celebs Accused In Steroids Rap (AP) 121
Albany DA Raids Fla. Steroids Center (ALBANYTU) 122
4 Tied To Pharmacy Are Arrested In Inquiry Into Steroid Sales (NYT) 125
Investigation Of Steroids And HGH Produces Arrests In Three States (WP) 126
Drug Agents Raid Downtown Pharmacy After Steroid Probe (ORS) 127
Pro Athletes Received Steroids From Drug Ring, Prosecutor Says (BLOOM) 128
SI Reporters Witness Raid (SI/CNN)..... 128
Owners Of Local Pharmacy Arrested Following RaidsRaids Stem From New York Investigation (WESH) 129
Steelers' Doctor Questioned In Steroids Investigation (WTAE) 130
Steelers' Doctor Questioned In Steroids Probe (KDKA) 130
Steelers Doctor Questioned In Steroid Probe (PTR) 130
Woman, 49, Pleads Guilty To Money Laundering (CCCT)..... 131
Nationwide Study: Drug Use Dips, But Alcohol Use On Rise (USAT) 132
Bribery Wrecks Drive To Root Out Opium (TEL) 133
Bloomington Explosives Case Expands With Munitions Find (MINNST)..... 133
Canines Help Search For Gun In Road-rage Case (ORS)..... 134
Agent Says He Discussed Buying Arms From Man (ELPT)..... 134

Immigration:

5 Plead Guilty In Illegal Workers Case (AP) 135
White House Pushes Immigration Overhaul (LAT)..... 135
Low Pay And Broken Promises Greet Guest Workers (NYT) .. 136
Immigrants Boost Pay, Not Prison Populations, New Studies Show (LAT)..... 138
Family Second (NYT) 140
Report: Immigrants Do Not Commit Most Crimes (NCT)..... 140

Tax:

Real-Estate Professionals Say IRS Snares Them By Mistake (WSJ) 142

Congress-Administration:

Bush To Visit Floyd School (LCJ)..... 143
President Bush To Visit New Albany School (AP) 143
President Bush To Visit Southern Indiana School (WDRB)..... 143
Bush To Visit Silver Street Elementary (WLKY)..... 144
Labor Rides Political-Wind Shift (WSJ) 144
Labor Looks To Score First Big Win In Years (HILL)..... 145
Business Group Raps Freshmen (RC) 147
Walter Reed Puts Congress In Bipartisan 'foul Mood' (HILL)... 148
Congress Reevaluates High-cost Defense Programs As Budget Ax Looms (HILL)..... 149
House Democrats Angling On Domestic Issues (POL) 150
Blue Dogs Believe Their Day Is Here (RC) 152
Lobbying Law Misses Some K St. Numbers (HILL)..... 153
Kerry Puts GOP Donor On Defensive (WP)..... 155
HUD Gets New View Of Who's Homeless (USAT)..... 155
Democracy 21 Renews Calls For Doolittle Probe (HILL)..... 156
Senator's Railway Lobby Link May Have Helped Derail Loan (WP) 156

Other News:

Wall St. Slide Fuels Worries On Economy (NYT) 157
From Shanghai, Tremors Heard Around The World (NYT) 159
China Volatility Sparks U.S. Sell-off (USAT) 160
US Durable Goods Orders Slide (FT) 162
Durable-Goods Orders Plunged 7.8% In January (WSJ) 163
Economists Worry As Businesses Tighten Spending (USAT).. 164
Recession Unlikely This Year, Many Economists Say (LAT) ... 164
Financial Experts Say Investors Shouldn't Panic (LAT)..... 165
Anatomy Of A Wall Street Freefall (WP) 166
Credit Correction (WSJ)..... 167
Economy Appears Headed For A Period Of Turbulence (MCT)167
A Recession That Arrived On Cats' Paws (NYT)..... 168
Plunge Leads To Predictions (CHIT)..... 170
SUDDEN RETREAT Markets' Slide Spotlights Risks (WSJ).... 171
Stock Sell-Off In China Hits Wall Street (WP) 173
Biggest Loss Since Sept. 11 For Wall Street (LAT) 175
Doubts Trigger 416-point Dow Dive (WT) 175
Markets Find It Hard To Break The Greenspan Habit (WSJ) ... 176
Greenspan Comments Helped Grease Markets' Skid (USAT). 178
As Ethics Panels Expand Grip, No Field Is Off Limits (NYT).... 178
Panel Finds Flawed Data In A Major Stem Cell Report (NYT) . 180
Document Shows Romney's Strategies (BOS)..... 181
Internal Romney Document Airs Concerns (AP) 182
Romney Latest To See Internal Critique Leaked (WP)..... 183
Edwards Apologizes For 2002 War Vote (AP)..... 184
Blacks Shift To Obama, Poll Finds (WP) 184
Pardons Reemerge As Issue In Clinton Run (BOS) 185
Clinton Foundation Not Listed On Senator's Disclosure Reports (NYT) 187
Feb. 5 National Primary (HILL)..... 187
Only Strong Will Survive This Big Bang (HILL) 189
Competing In The Money Marathon (NYT)..... 190
Group Says Gore's Home Overuses Electricity (USAT/AP)..... 190
Politicians' Flights Called Wasteful (LAT)..... 191
Ozone Man Sequel (NYT) 192
Inside The Beltway (WT) 193
Up In The Air (RC) 194
Some Push For Huckabee To Run For Senate, Not President (HILL) 196
NRSC Donates Funds From Terror Suspect (CCT) 197

DOJ_NMG_0137628

Corporate Execs' Names Should Be Disclosed, Lawmakers Tell Governors (USAT) ... 197
Perry's 'Bizarre' Moves Vex Conservatives (WT) ... 198
Advocates Hopeful On Gun Ban (BSUN) ... 199
Changing The Constitution (WP) ... 200
States' Pension Shortfalls Widen Amid An Increase In Tax Receipts (WSJ) ... 200
The Cost Of Coverage (WSJ) ... 201
Add Roads, Not Tolls (USAT) ... 202
Legal Imperialism (WSJ) ... 202
American Insourcing (WSJ) ... 204
U.S., N. Korea To Normalize Ties (WT) ... 205
McConnell Fears Iran Nukes By 2015 (WT) ... 206
Iran Worries US Officials Beyond Its Nuclear Plans (CSM) ... 207
US Military Chief "Categorically" Denies Plans For Iran Air Strikes (AFP) ... 207
Hezbollah Warns U.S. Against Iran Attack (AP) ... 208
US Targets Iran's Financial Underbelly (FT) ... 208
U.S. Sanctions With Teeth (WP) ... 209
GLOBAL POSITIONING Russian Deals In Middle East Snarl U.S. Strategy On Iran (WSJ) ... 210
Russia: Hamas To End Attacks Against Israel (USAT) ... 213
Ex-official, Militia Chief Charged With War Crimes (WT) ... 213
Sudan Official Accused In Darfur Atrocities (LAT) ... 214
2 Face Trials At The Hague Over Darfur Atrocities (NYT) ... 215
World Court's Big Move On Darfur (CSM) ... 217
Justice For Darfur (WP) ... 218
US Sees Repression 'worsening In Cuba' (FT) ... 219
McConnell: Repression In Cuba Increases (AP) ... 220
New United Nations Chief Tackles The Agency's Tradition Of Patronage Jobs (NYT) ... 220
The End Of The Affair? (WSJ) ... 221
Blogger On Ice (WP) ... 222

TERRORISM NEWS:

Terror Suspect's Brig Life Detailed (NSDY)

By Curt Anderson

Long Island Newsday/AP, February 28, 2007

MIAMI -- The exterior window in Jose Padilla's 80-square-foot cell in a Navy brig was painted over. At times, he had to sleep on a steel bunk with no mattress. He went months without a clock and was sometimes seen weeping in his cell.

But officials at the brig in Charleston, S.C., testified Tuesday that the alleged al-Qaida operative was not physically abused during his 3 1/2 years in military custody, nor did he display serious symptoms of mental problems.

Craig Noble, the brig's main psychologist, and Sanford Seymour, the brig's technical director, testified for the first time in public Tuesday in Padilla's competency hearings. The hearings are to determine whether Padilla can stand trial in April on terrorism-related charges.

Padilla, a 36-year-old U.S. citizen and Muslim convert, was arrested in 2002 in Chicago in what U.S. authorities initially claimed was a mission to set off a radioactive "dirty bomb" in a major city. He was held at the brig without being charged after President Bush declared him an enemy combatant.

Padilla was added to a Miami terrorism support case in late 2005. That indictment does not mention the "dirty bomb" plot.

Two mental experts hired by Padilla's lawyers say he cannot assist in his defense because he suffers from post-traumatic stress disorder, which they claim results from isolation and alleged torture at the brig. U.S. officials deny he was tortured.

Noble said he examined Padilla when he arrived June 10, 2002, and again on May 14, 2004. He said Padilla had begun wearing glasses, but he found the second visit "unremarkable" for any signs of problems.

The second interview was conducted at Padilla's cell door, with the prisoner speaking through a small slot, Noble said.

"He was responsive, made good eye contact, in fact smiled frequently," Noble said. "There were no changes."

Seymour described some of the cell conditions, including the painted-over window, lack of clock and periodic removal of Padilla's mattress and Quran. He also said he remembered two instances where he watched Padilla -- who was under 24-hour surveillance -- crying in his cell.

But Seymour also said that the brig staff allowed Padilla outside for recreation, when he sometimes shot baskets. He was allowed no contact with any other inmate.

"Sometimes he sat in the sun," Seymour said. "If it was a nice day, we tried to get him out."

Padilla has claimed his cell was often filled with noxious fumes and that brig staff injected him with LSD or some other hallucinogenic drug.

Seymour said the injection was a flu shot. And he testified that the odors come from a paper mill less than a mile away. "We often had a nasty odor throughout the facility," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0137629

U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke barred Padilla's lawyers from delving into the details of this testimony unless it was directly related to a competency report prepared by a Bureau of Prisons psychologist.

Cooke scheduled closing arguments on the competency issue for Wednesday. It was not clear when she would rule.

Padilla and co-defendants Adham Amin Hassoun and Kifah Wael Jayyousi face up to life in prison if convicted of charges they were part of a North American terror support cell that provided recruits, money and supplies to Islamic extremist groups.

Subscribe to Newsday home delivery | Article licensing and reprint options

Brig Officials Offer Look At Padilla's Detention (USAT)

By Laura Parker

USA Today, February 28, 2007

MIAMI — Two officials from the Navy brig where terrorism suspect Jose Padilla spent almost four years in solitary confinement testified in federal court here Tuesday. They provided the first public description by the Defense Department of Padilla's incarceration.

Sandy Seymour, brig technical director, confirmed some details that Padilla's attorneys have alleged in court papers: that he was kept isolated in an 80-square-foot cell that had its windows blackened. He also testified that he saw Padilla in his cell weeping.

Seymour and brig psychologist Craig Noble appeared as reluctant star witnesses in a mental competency hearing that became a fierce tug-of-war between prosecutors and defense attorneys over how much about Padilla's detention will be revealed.

Prosecutor Stephanie Pell objected 36 times as defense attorneys Michael Caruso and Orlando do Campo attempted to pry out small details about Padilla's life in the brig, such as whether he had a clock in his cell or a stool to sit on.

"This is getting into the line of the general conditions at the brig," Pell complained to U.S. District Court Judge Marcia Cooke, who had limited the inquiry to a narrow scope.

Questions about Padilla's years in the brig have become an issue in determining whether Padilla, 36, is mentally fit to stand trial in April. His attorneys say he was tortured, which causes Padilla to shut down mentally whenever they ask for his assistance in preparing his defense.

Two mental health experts hired by the defense testified earlier that Padilla suffers from post-traumatic stress and is unfit for trial.

That was contradicted by Rodolfo Buigas, a Bureau of Prisons psychologist, who testified that Padilla is fit for trial but has chosen not to help his attorneys.

In his report, made public Tuesday, Buigas said his review of "available military information failed to substantiate" any torture, although he did not rule it out.

Padilla, a U.S. citizen, is charged with supporting terrorist activities overseas. If convicted, he faces life in prison.

Prosecutors have fought hard to keep Padilla's time at the brig secret, so the mere presence of brig officials on the witness stand represented a small victory for the defense — even if little was revealed.

Seymour also provided a glimpse into Padilla's paranoia — a condition described in defense court papers. Padilla feared guards had pumped noxious gas into his cell. He also thought he had been injected with truth serum before meeting with his interrogators.

Seymour said that the brig is near a pulp mill, which spews foul odors, and that Padilla received a flu shot. He did not say whether anyone at the brig ever attempted to disabuse Padilla of his misimpressions.

Noble testified he evaluated Padilla's mental health twice, once after Padilla arrived at the brig in June 2002 and again in May 2004. There were "no remarkable changes," he said.

For the second evaluation, Noble said he reviewed brig logs, interviewed guards and spoke with Padilla for two minutes through the opening in his cell known as the "cuff board," a reference to the slot through which inmates stick their hands to be handcuffed.

"He was responsive to me," Noble testified. "He smiled."

Aspects Of Padilla's Treatment Confirmed (LAT)

By Carol J. Williams

The Los Angeles Times, February 28, 2007

MIAMI — With no clock, watch or natural light to guide him, terrorism suspect Jose Padilla was jailed at a Navy brig in timeless isolation while anonymous jailers monitored him around the clock, a brig official testified Tuesday.

The disclosures in a federal courtroom by Sanford Seymour, technical director of the Navy detention facility in Charleston, S.C., confirmed for the first time some of the conditions of Padilla's detention. His defense attorneys contend that Padilla's sensory deprivation and treatment were tantamount to torture.

U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke called Seymour and two other brig officials to testify in a hearing on Padilla's competency to stand trial on charges of conspiracy and material support to terrorism.

Cooke cautioned defense attorneys that they could only question the witnesses about their conversations with a federal Bureau of Prisons psychologist. A separate defense motion to dismiss the charges due to "outrageous government conduct" may open the torture issue at a later hearing.

The forensic psychologist, Rodolfo Buigas, testified Monday that Padilla suffered from anxiety and a personality disorder but was otherwise fit to proceed. But his report referred to the brig officials, so the judge had to allow defense attorneys to cross-examine them.

Padilla had refused to submit to psychological testing by Buigas, claiming to have repeatedly undergone examination since his May 2002 arrest at Chicago's O'Hare International Airport. U.S. officials contend he spent at least six years abroad recruiting, plotting and bankrolling terrorism.

Two competency experts hired by the defense said last week that Padilla, 36, had sustained mental injury and post-traumatic stress disorder from his brig experience, leaving him incompetent to assist in his own defense.

Seymour, a civilian who oversees correctional procedures at the military brig, appeared reluctant to disclose details of the "special care" ordered by the federal government for Padilla.

Prolonged silences by Seymour followed each of federal Public Defender Michael Caruso's questions, as the witness waited for prosecutor Stephanie Pell to object, which she did at least a dozen times. When Cooke said he should answer, Seymour said he had "no specific recollection," asked to hear the question again, or gave a cryptic response.

What emerged from the cross-examination was that Padilla had little human contact during his 3 1/2 -year incarceration in the brig, that both windows in his cell were covered to create a blackout, and that the electric light in his cell could only be activated by jailers and was, like his Koran, unavailable for unspecified reasons or periods of time.

Caruso was prevented from pursuing matters of Padilla's detention other than those that Seymour had discussed with Buigas in an hourlong conversation the witness said occurred "several weeks ago."

Seymour said he neither offered nor was asked about the removal of Padilla's cell mirror, his access to showers or the length and frequency of the prisoner's interrogations. He confirmed that he had on a couple of occasions observed Padilla weeping.

Asked by Buigas about Padilla's claim to have been administered LSD by his interrogators, the corrections chief said he told the psychologist that the prisoner had been given a flu shot.

As to the defendant's general torture allegations, Seymour said he told Buigas: "I know of no physical abuse that occurred."

Brig psychologist Craig Noble also testified, confirming that he told Buigas of his two brief interactions with Padilla. The first was a mental health intake assessment on June 10, 2002, when Padilla arrived; the second was two years later when he interviewed Padilla through the "cuff hole" his cell door.

Noble said he found Padilla's mental health "unremarkable" both times. A defense attorney asked, based on brig records, whether Noble's contact with Padilla had lasted no more than two minutes, but the witness was not allowed to answer the question because Buigas hadn't asked about the duration.

Maj. Andrew Cruz, a brig social worker who had monthly contact with Padilla, was also summoned to testify. But he was recently deployed to Afghanistan, and did not answer a call that had been arranged for him to testify by speakerphone.

Cooke said she would hear final arguments on Padilla's competency today, but gave no indication when she might rule.

If Padilla is judged fit to proceed, his motion for dismissal for outrageous government behavior could prompt a hearing at which the brig abuse allegations would be more thoroughly explored. Padilla's trial is set for April 16.

Jailers Testify About Padilla's Confinement (NYT)

By Deborah Sontag

The New York Times, February 28, 2007

MIAMI, Feb. 27 — As Jose Padilla dropped his head and grew still, a senior official from the naval brig in Charleston, S.C., testified on Tuesday in federal court here that he had twice observed Mr. Padilla weeping in the electronically monitored cell where the military detained him for three years and eight months.

DOJ_NMG_0137631

The brig's technical director, Sanford E. Seymour, also said that Mr. Padilla, an American citizen who was designated an enemy combatant in 2002, sometimes slept on a steel bunk without a mattress, that the windows in his 80-square-foot cell were blackened and that brig employees covered up their nametags around him.

Mr. Seymour said that Mr. Padilla, a Muslim, occasionally visited with an imam and that his Koran was taken from him periodically; that he sometimes went outside to shoot baskets or sunbathe; and that when Mr. Padilla believed he had been administered LSD, it was really a flu shot.

These scattershot revelations, elicited by Mr. Padilla's lawyers in a hearing of sharply limited scope, did not add up to a comprehensive portrait of Mr. Padilla's time in the brig. But they were nonetheless significant, marking the first time Mr. Padilla's military jailers were forced to speak publicly about the conditions of his secretive confinement without charges.

That confinement ended a year ago when Mr. Padilla, 36, was transferred into the civilian law enforcement system to stand trial on terrorism conspiracy charges. But his lawyers argue that the conditions of his military detention and interrogations traumatized him so severely that he is incapable of assisting them in his own defense. In essence, they say, the government rendered him incompetent to stand trial, a position the prosecution vehemently denies.

Three days of testimony in a competency hearing concluded Tuesday with the brief appearance of two brig officials. After both sides make concluding arguments on Wednesday, Judge Marcia G. Cooke of Federal District Court will choose between two starkly contrasting images of Mr. Padilla: the lucid, occasionally jolly defendant with antisocial tendencies portrayed by the government, and the twitching, fearful, damaged man presented by the defense.

In a 16-page report made public Tuesday, Rodolfo A. Buigas, a Bureau of Prisons psychologist who examined Mr. Padilla for the judge, recommended that he be found competent to stand trial. Mr. Padilla refused to submit to psychological testing, so Dr. Buigas evaluated him by talking to him for about five hours, by examining his records and the reports of experts hired by the defense, and by questioning lawyers and brig officials.

It is because Dr. Buigas interviewed brig officials that Judge Cooke allowed them to testify Tuesday despite strong objections from the government. But she allowed defense lawyers to ask the officials only about their conversations with Dr. Buigas, saying that a more general airing about conditions in the brig might be held if she conducted a hearing on a defense motion to dismiss the indictment because of "outrageous government conduct."

Craig S. Noble, a psychologist at the brig, testified that he had screened Mr. Padilla twice. He did an initial "brief evaluation" when Mr. Padilla arrived in June 2002, finding that he was "responsive, made good eye contact and, in fact, smiled periodically." About two years later, Dr. Noble said, he conducted a "cell front visit," in which he spoke to Mr. Padilla through a rectangular slot on his door, and discovered no new signs of "distress or lethality."

During the hearing, two mental health experts who spent over 25 hours evaluating Mr. Padilla for the defense testified that he was disabled by post-traumatic stress disorder caused by his experiences in the brig.

"I'm not sure that any of us know what happened at the brig, but I know that something there put the fear into Mr. Padilla," said Patricia Zapf, a forensic psychologist who examined him. "Mr. Padilla is an anxiety-ridden, broken individual who is incapacitated by that anxiety."

But the Bureau of Prisons psychologist, Dr. Buigas, disagreed with the diagnosis of post-traumatic stress disorder. He said Dr. Zapf's testing was invalidated by the fact that Mr. Padilla was handcuffed during the tests, a condition imposed on Dr. Zapf by prison officials.

Testifying on Monday, Dr. Buigas, whom defense lawyers do not view as a neutral examiner, said that Mr. Padilla possessed the capacity to work with his lawyers, and that any failure to do so was "volitional."

Dr. Buigas added that during his first encounter with Mr. Padilla, "he was actually pretty happy." Dr. Buigas testified that he had even commented to his boss that Mr. Padilla seemed "happier than our department," referring to his colleagues in the mental health unit of the Miami federal detention center.

Mr. Padilla, who sat placidly through much of the testimony, chatted animatedly with his lawyers as Dr. Buigas talked. One of the lawyers, Anthony Natale, rose to his feet for a cross-examination, and what turned into an odd exchange.

"You used the word 'happy,' " Mr. Natale said to Dr. Buigas. "Do you know if that's when he was allowed for the first time to get a radio? Do you know if that's when he was allowed to have a shower with a curtain? ... So you don't know why he was happy?"

Dr. Buigas said he could not recall the conversation clearly, but he said, "In general, he was talking about being Puerto Rican."

Prosecution lawyers scoffed at the idea the Mr. Padilla was mentally incompetent, saying that his jailers had never reported any psychiatric problems and that he had comported himself well during court hearings.

DOJ_NMG_0137632

“Jose Padilla sits quietly,” said Brian K. Frazier, a prosecutor. “He follows the instructions of the marshals. He turns around and waves to Mama.”

Mr. Frazier said that in court Mr. Padilla manifested none of the tics, grimaces and sweating that the defense describes, “despite the fact that we talk about some pretty uncomfortable stuff.”

Prosecutors tried to introduce into evidence what they said was an internal document from Al Qaeda that coached operatives to be obstructionist if captured, to avoid revealing information and to make a claim of torture even if no mistreatment had occurred. This document, which they referred to as the “Manchester manual” because it was found several years ago in Manchester, England, was what guided Mr. Padilla, they said.

“Don’t I have to have some evidence that Mr. Padilla was aware of this document and studied it?” Judge Cooke asked prosecutors.

In declining to admit the manual into evidence, she added that the manual would have converted the competency hearing into a debate over whether the defendant had been tortured in the brig.

Padilla Was Deprived, Not Abused, Court Told (WP)

By Peter Whoriskey

The Washington Post, February 28, 2007

MIAMI, Feb. 27 -- During his 3 1/2 -year detention as an "enemy combatant," accused al-Qaeda operative Jose Padilla was at various times deprived of a clock, windows and a Koran, and forced to sleep on a metal bed frame without a mattress, according to testimony Tuesday from an official at the Navy brig where he was held in Charleston, S.C.

The account of Sanford E. Seymour, the brig's technical director, was narrow in scope and offered only a glimpse of Padilla's incarceration, which Padilla and his attorneys have said included torture that renders him psychologically unfit to stand trial.

Limited by a court ruling to what he had discussed with a psychologist evaluating Padilla's competence for trial, Seymour's testimony was sketchy but ran contrary to some of Padilla's most serious allegations.

"I told him I knew of no physical abuse," Seymour testified.

Seymour's testimony marked the first time any official from the brig had publicly described conditions of Padilla's incarceration.

While Padilla has asserted that he was injected with LSD or a truth serum, Seymour indicated it may have been a flu shot, and while Padilla said he was subject to noxious odors that made his eyes and nose run, Seymour said a nearby paper mill sometimes makes the brig stink.

U.S. District Judge Marcia G. Cooke is expected now to decide whether Padilla is competent to stand trial, as prosecutors assert, or whether, as the defense contends, he is incompetent to stand trial because torture and isolation at the brig have rendered him unable to recall basic details about the case for his attorneys.

Padilla is not expected to take the stand in the competency hearing. At times he has seemed engrossed in the proceedings and engaged in apparently earnest conversations with his attorneys. But during the hour-long appearance of the brig officials, Padilla sat rigidly and did not look up.

A forensic psychiatrist and a forensic psychologist hired by the defense last week testified that when asked for information about the brig or the subjects he may have been interrogated about there, Padilla gets tense, exhibits facial tics and "shuts down."

"He would say, 'Please, please, please don't make me do this,' in a very plaintive manner," Angela Hegarty, the forensic psychiatrist, testified.

One of the lawyers, Andrew Patel, testified that even "softball" questions about the case could elicit pop-eyed revulsion from his client, and that he has been unwilling even to listen to the taped conversations at the core of the case against him.

"We tried everything we could imagine" to get him to help them review the evidence, but Padilla refused, Patel testified.

The window in Padilla's cell to the outside was painted over, Seymour testified, and another window to the interior was covered up in a way that allowed others to look in when they wanted. He was fed through a slot in the door.

Brig workers who interacted with him covered their name tags when dealing with Padilla, Seymour testified, and at various times his clock and Koran were taken away.

While defense lawyers have argued that the isolation and other aspects of his treatment have made Padilla unable to help his attorneys, a brig psychologist who talked to Padilla at the beginning of his detention in June 2002 and then again nearly two years later, noted "no remarkable changes" in his demeanor.

DOJ_NMG_0137633

"He was responsive to me," said Craig S. Noble, a brig psychologist, who spoke with Padilla through openings the cell door. "He smiled."

Shorbagi Sentence – 7 Years, 8 Months (ROMENT)

By Mike Gellatly, Rome News-Tribune staff writer

Rome (GA) News-Tribune, February 28, 2007

The sentence was reduced because of his cooperation.

A Floyd County man who led interfaith relations after 9/11 and educated students on the virtues of many religions was sentenced Tuesday for supporting a foreign terrorist group.

Mohamed Shorbagi, 42, was sentenced in U.S. District Court in Rome to serve seven years and eight months in prison for funneling money to the militant group Hamas during a four-year period.

Judge Harold L. Murphy also ordered Shorbagi to serve three years supervised release and pay $610,454 in restitution to his former employer, Alexandria International Carpets. Shorbagi allegedly defrauded the company.

The charges stem from donations Shorbagi made to the Holy Land Foundation for Relief and Development, an Islamic charity shut down by federal authorities in 2001.

A former member of the Rome-Floyd International Committee and an Imam of a Muslim congregation, he was presented by the defense as an intelligent man much respected by his community.

Several Floyd Countians testified as character witnesses for Shorbagi, including George Pullen, a former Rome City Commission chairman.

Pullen said Shorbagi's imprisonment is a loss for the community. He also said he considers him a friend.

Two Berry College professors, Jeffrey Lipkey and Steve Bell, also spoke on behalf of the native Palestinian.

The last witness to speak was Ezra Shorbagi, the eldest daughter of the defendant. She said she is a proud American, Muslim and Roman and described her father as a humble man leading the Muslim community.

"This is not a bomb-throwing individual," said defense attorney Michael Trost. "He is a calm, peaceful man that has done many things to help his community."

Assistant U.S. Attorney Kim Dammers disagreed with Trost's portrayal of Shorbagi.

"What he did was enable the bomb-throwing individuals to continue their work," said Dammers. "By encouraging his congregation to give money he gave support to a foreign terrorist agency."

Shorbagi could have received a 15-year prison term, however, the government asked U.S. District Court Judge Harold L. Murphy to reduce his sentence.

Prosecutors asked for a lighter sentence, saying he cooperated fully in the investigation.

Murphy described Shorbagi's cooperation as "substantially helpful against terrorist acts" and said that it was given with "considerable threat to personal safety of himself and his family."

In November, Shorbagi testified in a Chicago case against Mohammed Salah, identified by authorities as one of these high-level Hamas operatives.

Rome Imam Sentenced In Terror Case Palestinian Native Gave Money To Islamic Militant Group Hamas (AJC)

By Bill Torpy, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, February 28, 2007

A 42-year-old Palestinian native who confessed to aiding the Islamic militant group Hamas was sentenced by a federal judge today to more than seven years in prison.

Mohamed Shorbagi, the imam of a small mosque in Rome, could have been sentenced to 15 years but received a lighter sentence for helping federal authorities in another prosecution.

Court documents said Shorbagi provided donations between 1997 to 2001 to the Holy Land Foundation for Relief and Development, knowing the money would go to Hamas, which has been designated by the United States as a terrorist organization. Federal prosecutors said Shorbagi has hosted high-ranking Hamas members at the Rome mosque.

Shorbagi, who has been in the United States for 22 years, testified in a Chicago trial last year against Mohammed Salah, who was later acquitted of charges of aiding Hamas.

Because of his cooperation in the case, Shorbagi is eligible to get a visa to stay in the U.S and enter the witness protection program, according to court papers.

DOJ_NMG_0137634

First Terrorism Sentence In Georgia (WXIA)

WXIA-TV, February 28, 2007

For the first time in the history of the state of Georgia, a defendant has been sentenced for an international terrorism-related crime. Mohamed Shorbagi, the Imam of a Mosque in Rome, was sentenced to serve over seven years in prison. Shorbagi plead guilty last October to providing financial support to a terrorist organization.

Shorbagi was not only the leader of the Rome Mosque; he was a leader in the Rome community. Several people, including one Rome city official, testified to his character in federal court Tuesday morning. His family was in the courtroom for sentencing. United States District Judge Harold Murphy sentenced Shorbagi to seven-years and eight-months in prison.

Unites States Attorney David Nahmias said, "The people who financially support terrorism are not the people who are personally building bombs or setting off bombs." Nahmias added, "But, they're the people who make that kind of activity possible."

Shorbagi plead guilty to providing financial support to Hamas through donations to an organization called The Holy Land Foundation for Relief and Development. Nahmias says Shorbagi was the Georgia representative for the group, and hosted high-level Hamas officials at his Rome Mosque. In 1997, Hamas was designated as a foreign terrorist organization by the United States.

Michael Trost, Shorbagi's attorney, says his client was aware the money could end up funding violence.

"He understood that once the money left his hands, he had very little control and knew that that was a possibility. Whether that was his intent is another matter," Trost said.

Despite the support from family and community, it was Shorbagi's cooperation with the Government that helped him get a reduced sentence from the maximum 15-years for his crime.

"He testified in a trial in Chicago in which there were some terrorism charges brought against several individuals," his attorney said.

Both the U.S. Attorney and his defense attorney said Shorbagi could reduce his sentence further if he continues to cooperate with the Government.

Mohamed Shorbagi is a citizen of the Palestine territories. He has been in the United States legally for 22 years. In court, he said his family is all United States citizens.

Georgia Man Sent To Jail For Aiding Hamas (ATLBIZ)

Atlanta Business Journal, February 28, 2007

A Georgia representative of the Holy Land Foundation for Relief and Development (HLF) has been sent to federal prison for raising money for foreign terrorist organization Hamas.

Mohamed Shorbagi, 42, of the Rome, Ga., area was sentenced Tuesday to seven years and eight months in federal prison by U.S. District Judge Harold L. Murphy, on a charge of providing material support to Hamas. He also got three years of supervised release and was ordered to pay restitution of $610,454. Shorbagi's sentence was reduced from 15 years in prison because of substantial cooperation he provided in other terrorism-related investigations and prosecutions.

Hamas is a terrorist organization operating primarily in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, which has engaged in numerous terrorist attacks aimed at Israeli military personnel, police officers, and civilians. Hamas attacks have murdered numerous innocent people, including American citizens, and have undermined the Israeli-Palestinian peace process. Federal law makes it a serious felony to provide any material support or resources to a designated foreign terrorist organization.

On Oct. 8, 1997, the United States formally designated Hamas as a foreign terrorist organization. After that date, and continuing until Dec. 4, 2001, Shorbagi provided financial support to Hamas and conspired with unnamed others to provide such material support. He did so knowing that Hamas had been designated as a foreign terrorist organization and that Hamas engaged in terrorist activity. Shorbagi provided the support through donations to the HLF, knowing that some or all of the money was in fact destined for Hamas.

Shorbagi knew that money provided to HLF was actually funneled to Hamas in part because he was a Georgia representative for HLF and he had attended HLF meetings at which high-level Hamas officials made presentations condemning Israel. Shorbagi also had hosted high-level Hamas officials at the Rome mosque at which he served as imam.

"There are three important points to make about this case," said U.S. Attorney David E. Nahmias. "First, this case illustrates that people who illegally support foreign terrorist organizations may be found anywhere in the United States, even in quiet and pleasant places like Rome, Ga. Second, we will use every lawful tool to ferret out terrorism and those who provide material support to it, regardless of where they live or how they try to hide their criminal activities. Finally, defendants who are willing to cooperate fully and truthfully in our efforts to protect national security and bring other criminals to justice may earn substantial sentence reductions from federal courts."

DOJ_NMG_0137635

Ga. Imam Sentenced For Aiding Hamas (AP)

By Daniel Yee, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 28, 2007

ROME, Ga. -- The imam of a Georgia mosque who pleaded guilty to providing support to the militant group Hamas was sentenced Tuesday to more than seven years in prison.

Mohamed Shorbagi, 42, could have faced up to 15 years in prison.

Shorbagi pleaded guilty in August to providing material support to the militant group Hamas in a case in which the agreement, charges and even the plea hearing were handled in secret. U.S. District Judge Harold Murphy sentenced him Tuesday to seven years and eight months in prison.

At the sentencing, Shorbagi said he realized that some of his actions were wrong.

He pleaded guilty in August to a charge of providing material support to Hamas and also testified in a Chicago case against a man identified by authorities as a Hamas operative.

Prosecutors have said that between 1997 and 2001, Shorbagi provided financial support to Hamas, a group designated by the United States as a foreign terrorist organization. He also was accused of conspiring to provide material support to Hamas. The donations were through a charity called the Holy Land Foundation for Relief and Development, prosecutors said.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Kim Dammers suggested that his sentence be less than 15 years because of Shorbagi's help in testifying for the government in other terrorism-related trials.

After the sentencing, Shorbagi shook hands with about a dozen friends and family members who were gathered at the court before he was taken away.

He has said under oath that in return for his testimony, prosecutors agreed to seek a reduction in his sentence, give him a special residency visa, place him in the federal witness protection program and not indict him in an unrelated fraud case.

Shorbagi said Tuesday that he continues to cooperate with the government because of his belief in America.

"I came to this country when I was 18 and I believe in this country," said Shorbagi, a citizen of the Palestinian territory but in the United States legally. He said he has been in America for more than two decades.

"I realize that some of the things that I did was wrong and were never supposed to be done," he said. "That's why I took the responsibility of cooperating with the government."

False Quotes Shake Up Terror Trial (LAT)

By Greg Krikorian, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 28, 2007

Prosecutors say they'll look into a botched wiretap summary that included anti-Semitic remarks.

The mystery of how and why a government wiretap summary falsely attributed anti-Jewish slurs to officials of a Muslim charity remained unanswered Tuesday as federal prosecutors pledged to look into the matter.

In court papers filed late Monday, the U.S. attorney's office in Dallas said it was trying to determine how the recently declassified summary of a 1996 FBI wiretap of the Holy Land Foundation for Relief and Development included vitriolic language that was not found in a verbatim transcript of a recorded conversation.

"The government is attempting to determine the reason for the discrepancy between the summary and the transcript," prosecutors said, adding that officials wanted to locate the language specialist who prepared the summary.

Meanwhile, the unexplained discrepancies have brought potential controversy to the government's biggest terrorism funding case to date.

According to the discredited summary, Holy Land officials referred to Israel as "the government of the demons" and to Jews as trying "to rob as much money as possible from the American taxpayers for the illegitimate excuse of protecting and preserving the chosen people of God."

One Muslim charity official supposedly told a colleague: "Even Jesus Christ had called the Jews and their high priests … the sons of snakes and scorpions."

None of those comments was contained in a 13-page verbatim transcript of the conversation recorded April 15, 1996, by the FBI. In response, defense lawyers demanded declassification of large portions of the government's documents in the case.

On Monday, federal prosecutors argued that the discrepancies were not serious enough to justify such sweeping declassifications.

DOJ_NMG_0137636

Five years ago, authorities shut down what was then the nation's largest Muslim charity on grounds that it was a fundraising front for the Palestinian group Hamas, which the U.S. considers a terrorist organization. In 2004, federal prosecutors charged seven former Holy Land officials, six of them U.S. citizens, with sending money to overseas charities controlled by Hamas, an accusation they deny.

Defense attorneys asked U.S. District Judge A. Joe Fish to declassify 10 years worth of wiretapped conversations and faxes after discovering the faulty summary among the first batch they reviewed.

Without declassifying the government's evidence in the case, defense attorneys argued, they would have no way of knowing whether other documents had discrepancies or inaccuracies because the classified originals of documents could not be shared with their clients.

In response, government prosecutors said it was "an overreaction" to extrapolate that all of the government summaries were useless on the basis of discrepancies found in one set of documents.

Prosecutors also said the contested summary, while including some language not found in the transcript, "does not otherwise misrepresent the substance of the conversation" among the Holy Land officials.

Defense attorneys, who declined to comment Tuesday, have argued that the government summary "fundamentally distorted" the conversation by attributing "an anti-Semitic diatribe" to the foundation officials.

The lead prosecutor in the case said there would be no comment beyond court filings.

In the meantime, defense attorneys filed a new request with the judge to gain access to government documents they contend will show the U.S. Agency for International Development has funded or worked with organizations that are linked to the same overseas' charities allegedly controlled by Hamas and named in the indictment.

Details Of Men Held In CIA Jails Demanded (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, February 28, 2007

The Bush administration was urged on Tuesday to reveal the whereabouts of 16 men who were allegedly detained in secret Central Intelligence Agency prisons.

President George W. Bush last September said the secret prisons had been emptied with the transfer of 14 detainees, including Khaled Sheikh Mohammed, the alleged mastermind of the September 11 2001 attacks, to Guantánamo Bay, Cuba.

Rights groups welcomed the prison closures but were concerned the administration would not provide information about the dozens of other suspected terrorists who had been subjected to the US “renditions” programme – where they are sent to other countries for interrogation – or held in secret US facilities.

In a letter to Mr Bush, Human Rights Watch named 16 men it said were held in CIA prisons and another 22 who it said might have been in the secret facilities. The whereabouts of all the individuals concerned was unknown, the group said.

“The CIA’s detention programme has inflicted great harm on the reputation, moral standing and integrity of the United States,” Joanne Mariner, director of the organisation’s terrorism programme, wrote.

“By revealing information about the fate and whereabouts of people formerly held in CIA custody, you could begin to repair the damage this abusive programme has caused,” she said.

The group also criticised the role of other countries, particularly Pakistan, in rounding up suspects. The report details the case of Marwan Jabour, allegedly arrested in Pakistan before being sent to what he believed was a secret CIA jail in Afghanistan.

“Like an unknown number of Arab men arrested in Pakistan since 2001, he was ‘disappeared’ into US custody: held in unacknowledged detention outside the protection of the law.”

New Light Shed On CIA's 'Black Site' Prisons (WP)

By Dafna Linzer And Julie Tate

The Washington Post, February 28, 2007

On his last day in CIA custody, Marwan Jabour, an accused al-Qaeda paymaster, was stripped naked, seated in a chair and videotaped by agency officers. Afterward, he was shackled and blindfolded, headphones were put over his ears, and he was given an injection that made him groggy. Jabour, 30, was laid down in the back of a van, driven to an airstrip and put on a plane with at least one other prisoner.

His release from a secret facility in Afghanistan on June 30, 2006, was a surprise to Jabour -- and came just after the Supreme Court rejected the Bush administration's assertion that the Geneva Conventions do not apply to prisoners like him.

Jabour had spent two years in "black sites" -- a network of secret internment facilities the CIA operated around the world. His account of life in that system, which he described in three interviews with The Washington Post, offers an inside view of a clandestine world that held far more prisoners than the 14 men President Bush acknowledged and had transferred out of CIA custody in September.

DOJ_NMG_0137637

"There are now no terrorists in the CIA program," the president said, adding that after the prisoners held were determined to have "little or no additional intelligence value, many of them have been returned to their home countries for prosecution or detention by their governments."

But Jabour's experience -- also chronicled by Human Rights Watch, which yesterday issued a report on the fate of former "black site" detainees -- often does not accord with the portrait the administration has offered of the CIA system, such as the number of people it held and the threat detainees posed. Although 14 detainees were publicly moved from CIA custody to the detention facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, scores more have not been publicly identified by the U.S. government, and their whereabouts remain secret. Nor has the administration acknowledged that detainees such as Jabour, considered so dangerous and valuable that their detentions were kept secret, were freed.

After 28 months of incarceration, Jabour -- who was described by a counterterrorism official in the U.S. government as "a committed jihadist and a hard-core terrorist who was intent on doing harm to innocent people, including Americans" -- was released eight months ago. U.S. intelligence and counterterrorism officials confirmed his incarceration and that he was held in Pakistan and Afghanistan. They would not discuss conditions inside black sites or the treatment of any detainee.A House in Islamabad

By Jabour's account, and that of U.S. intelligence officials, his entrance into the black-sites program began in May 2004. In interviews, he said he was muscled out of a car as it pulled inside the gates of a secluded villa in the Pakistani capital of Islamabad.

In the week before his arrival, Jabour said, Pakistani intelligence officers had beaten, abused and burned him at a jailhouse in Lahore, where he was arrested. There two female American interrogators also questioned him and told him he would be rich if he cooperated and would vanish for life if he refused. He said he was later blindfolded and driven four hours north to the villa in a wealthy residential neighborhood.

The house in Islamabad, which U.S. intelligence officials say was jointly run by the CIA and Pakistani intelligence, had been outfitted with jail cells. When Jabour arrived, he saw as many as 20 other detainees, including the 16-year-old son of an Egyptian sheik, who had been captured in Pakistan. Dozens of al-Qaeda suspects swept up in the years after Sept. 11, 2001, have been through the house, according to accounts by former prisoners and U.S. intelligence officials with knowledge of the facility.

Jabour spent five weeks there, chained to a wall and prevented from sleeping more than a few hours at a time. He said he was beaten nightly by Pakistani guards after hours of questions from U.S. interrogators. Then he and others were whisked off to CIA-run sites. Some sites were in Eastern Europe; Jabour went to one in Afghanistan. Interrogators -- whom he described as Americans in their late 20s and early 30s -- told Jabour he would never see his three children again.

Human Rights Watch has identified 38 people who may have been held by the CIA and remain unaccounted for. Intelligence officials told The Post that the number of detainees held in such facilities over nearly five years remains classified but is higher than 60. Their whereabouts have not been publicly disclosed.

"The practice of disappearing people -- keeping them in secret detention without any legal process -- is fundamentally illegal under international law," said Joanne Mariner, director of the terrorism program at Human Rights Watch in New York. "The kind of physical mistreatment Jabour described is also illegal." Mariner interviewed Jabour separately as part of the organization's investigation.

The CIA said it would not comment directly on Jabour. "The agency does not, as a rule, publicly discuss specific rendition cases from the war on terror," said Paul Gimigliano, a spokesman for the CIA. But, he said, renditions "are a key, lawful tool in the fight against terror, and have helped save lives by taking terrorists off the street. They are conducted with care, they are closely reviewed, and they have produced valuable intelligence that has allowed the United States and other nations to foil terrorist plots."

John D. Rockefeller IV (D-W.Va.), chairman of the Senate intelligence committee, plans to investigate the fate of the missing detainees as part of a larger examination into the CIA's operation of secret prisons and its rendition program.Aiding Al-Qaeda Fighters

In interviews with The Post from his parents' home in the Gaza Strip, Jabour acknowledged helping al-Qaeda and Taliban fighters who fled Afghanistan as the U.S. military hunted for the perpetrators of the Sept. 11 attacks.

Jabour was born to Palestinian parents in Jordan, raised in Saudi Arabia and educated in Pakistan. In 1998, he said, he became drawn to the plight of Muslims in Chechnya living under Russian rule. He crossed the border into Afghanistan so he could train in jihadist camps, then planned to join up with Chechen separatists.

DOJ_NMG_0137638

"In Afghanistan, I met other people who believed in the Islamic state, where it was safe to practice Islam the way they wanted," Jabour said in a recent conversation. "I became friends with other Arabs who felt like me, Palestinians and Jordanians, but after three months of training I was told there was no chance to go to Chechnya."

Jabour returned to Pakistan in 1999. Two years later, after the U.S. military offensive in Afghanistan, those he lived and trained with came calling for help.

"Some of their children were injured, some of their women were wounded. From that moment, they came to our home and we helped them," he said.

Using funds from al-Qaeda financiers, Jabour said, he arranged for food, medical treatment and travel documents for several dozen people and arranged for others, including two African men who fought for al-Qaeda, to slip out of Pakistan. He did not return to Afghanistan to fight, and he said he had no interest in attacking Americans.

The U.S. counterterrorism official who discussed aspects of Jabour's classified file did not call him a member of al-Qaeda. But the official said that in Pakistan, Jabour "was in direct touch with top al-Qaeda operations figures," including Hamza Rabia, who briefly served as one of Osama bin Laden's lieutenants before a missile from a CIA predator drone killed him in December 2005. In interviews, Jabour said he met with Rabia on two occasions.

The official said Jabour "provided the money and means for other jihadists to move from Afghanistan to Pakistan" and provided funds that went to an al-Qaeda bioweapons lab. "He's an all-around bad guy," the official said. No charges were brought against Jabour, however, and the official would not say why he is free today.Taken to Afghanistan

On June 16, 2004, after weeks in the villa, Jabour was drugged, blindfolded and put on a plane. Counterterrorism officials did not dispute that he was taken to a black site in Afghanistan. Jabour said the facility was run by Americans in civilian clothes and guarded by masked men who wore black uniforms and gloves.

He said he does not know where the facility is located, and counterterrorism officials would not say whether Jabour was held at two known detention sites in Afghanistan -- one run by the U.S. military at Bagram air base, the other operated by the CIA outside Kabul.

Jabour said he was often naked during his first three months at the Afghan site, which he spent in a concrete cell furnished with two blankets and a bucket. The lights were kept on 24 hours a day, as were two cameras and a microphone inside the cell. Sometimes loud music blasted through speakers in the cells. The rest of the time, the low buzz of white noise whizzed in the background, possibly to muffle any communication by prisoners through cell walls.

Daily interrogations were conducted by a variety of Americans. Over two years, Jabour said he encountered about 45 interrogators, plus medical staff and psychologists. He was threatened with physical abuse but was never beaten.

Once, he was shown a small wooden crate his interrogators called a "dog box" and was told he would be put in it if he didn't cooperate. He was told that Khalid Sheik Mohammed, the suspected architect of the Sept. 11 attacks who was among the 14 moved to Guantanamo Bay last year, became cooperative after he had been put in the box. But Jabour said he was not subjected to the crate.

He was, however, chained up and left for hours in painful positions more than 20 times and deprived of sleep for long periods. Sometimes he would have one hand chained to a section of his cell wall, making it impossible to stand or sit.

About six weeks into his stay, he was issued a pair of pants. Later he was given a T-shirt, then shoes, a Koran and finally a mattress. Jabour said prison conditions slowly improved: Air conditioning was installed; a library was built and stocked with books in Arabic, Urdu and English. Well-behaved detainees were rewarded with movie nights, in which such Hollywood blockbusters as "Titanic" were screened. A deputy director of the facility taught Jabour how to play chess and gave him pencils and paper. Jabour used to draw pictures of trees and grass, which he hung in his windowless cell.

Jabour recalled with fondness the prison director, a man named Charlie. "He told me, 'Marwan, we need information -- if you cooperate, that is good.' I told him I wasn't hiding anything and was not a dangerous man. He told me that they didn't want to use force but would if they had to. I told him I wouldn't lie to him."

Jabour began to receive better food, including pizza and Snickers and Kit-Kat bars.Transferred and Released

On Dec. 18, 2004, six months after his arrival, Jabour was transferred to a larger cell. Under the sink he found a small inscription that read: "Majid Khan, 15 December, 2004, American-Pakistani." Khan, whose family lives outside Baltimore, was arrested in March 2003 in Karachi, Pakistan, and was among the group transferred to Guantanamo five months ago. The U.S. government has not divulged where Khan was held during his first 3 1/2 years of incarceration.

Jabour met only one other prisoner during his time there. That was an Algerian named Yassir al-Jazeeri, a suspected high-level al-Qaeda operative who was arrested in Pakistan in March 2003. Their visits were arranged by the facility director, who told Jabour they were rewards for good behavior.

DOJ_NMG_0137639

During interrogations, Jabour was often shown hundreds of photographs of wanted or captured suspects. One photo appears to have been that of Muhammad Naeem Noor Khan, a British-Pakistani who was arrested in Pakistan in July 2004.

Noor Khan, a suspected al-Qaeda operative, was thought to be involved in the planning of a disrupted 2004 attack on U.S. and British financial institutions. Babar Awan, a Pakistani lawyer hired by Noor Khan's family, said he has "heard nothing from the government authorities or any other authorities about where Noor Khan is."

There is no public U.S. government record available that states the CIA ever held Jabour, al-Jazeeri or Noor Khan.

Last April, John D. Negroponte, who was then director of national intelligence, told Time magazine that he did not know what would be the "endgame for the three dozen or so high-value detainees" in CIA custody at that time.

Jabour's odyssey ended with a secret flight to Amman, Jordan, where he woke to find himself in an office staring at government wall portraits of King Abdullah and his dead father, King Hussein. "I don't know why they released me, but I told them everything I knew . . .," Jabour said. "You have to tell them the truth and that was no problem for me. They are smart people," he said of his American captors.

The Jordanians called the International Committee for the Red Cross, which sent a representative to interview Jabour and to contact his family. He remained in Jordanian custody for six weeks, was interrogated and was then handed over to Israel's security services.

The Israelis treated him better than his other captors, he said. They got Jabour his first lawyer, an Israeli Arab named Nizar Mahajna, who said in an interview that the Israelis had held Jabour in a prison near Haifa for two months. He was not mistreated, blindfolded or shackled, the lawyer said.

Israeli authorities had considered charging Jabour with fighting for an enemy of the Jewish state. But, Mahajna said, Jabour's training in Afghanistan had occurred more than eight years earlier, he was not a member of al-Qaeda and he had never lived in the Palestinian territories.

"The Israelis were given secret information on Marwan, which they got from the Americans. It wasn't shared with me but whatever it says, the central fact remained that the Pakistanis and the Americans had let him go. Why should Israel keep him?" Mahajna said.

The Israeli government dropped the case and transferred Jabour to Gaza. Prison guards drove him to the Erez border crossing between Israel and the Gaza Strip. "Good luck," one of them said to Jabour as he crossed into Gaza, where his parents awaited.

Europe's Runaway Prosecutions (WP)

By David B. Rivkin Jr. And Lee A. Casey

The Washington Post, February 28, 2007

An Italian court announced this month that it is moving forward with the indictment and trial of 25 CIA agents charged with kidnapping a radical Muslim cleric. These proceedings may well violate international law, but the case serves as a wake-up call to the United States. Overseas opponents of American foreign policy are increasingly turning to judicial proceedings against individual American officials as a means of reformulating or frustrating U.S. aims, and action to arrest this development is needed.

The Italian case involves a 2003 CIA mission to apprehend an Egyptian cleric named Osama Mustafa Hassan Nasr. Suspected of terrorist ties, Nasr was seized in Milan and transported to Egypt, where he claims he was tortured. This was, of course, an "extraordinary rendition" -- a long-standing and legal practice that generally involves the cooperation of two or more governments in the capture and transportation of a criminal suspect outside of normal extradition proceedings. It was through such a rendition that the terrorist "Carlos the Jackal" was delivered for trial to France from Sudan in 1994.

The United States has used extraordinary renditions as part of the war on terrorism, but the continuing value of this tactic, particularly in Europe, is questionable. One of the primary European objections to the concept of a "war" on terrorism is the fear that U.S. forces will treat Europe as a battlefield. Although this fear is specious -- international law has long provided that, even in wartime, a nation cannot pursue its enemies into the territory of friendly countries without their express permission -- extraordinary rendition gets uncomfortably close to U.S. military operations on European streets. Moreover, unlike many other aspects of U.S. policy, extraordinary rendition can probably be abandoned without severely undercutting the war effort. That being the case, and given the obvious and increasing hard feelings the policy has prompted in Europe, extraordinary renditions should end.

Yet the United States must still vigorously resist the prosecution of its indicted agents. If they acted with the knowledge and consent of the Italian government (as The Post's Dana Priest reported in 2005), they are immune from criminal prosecution in that country. Although foreign nationals traveling abroad are ordinarily subject to local judicial authority, international law has long recognized an exception for government agents entering another country with its government's permission. As Chief Justice John Marshall explained in The Schooner Exchange v. McFaddon (1812), an early Supreme Court case involving the immunity of a French warship in American waters, "[o]ne sovereign being in no respect amendable to another . . . can be supposed to enter a foreign territory only under an express license, or in the confidence that the immunities belonging to his independent sovereign nation, though not expressly stipulated, are reserved by implication."

DOJ_NMG_0137640

Because of this general rule, elaborate Status of Forces Agreements are negotiated before the troops of one state are stationed in another. These agreements usually narrow the jurisdictional immunities to be enjoyed by American troops stationed abroad, although under the NATO Status of Forces Agreements, to which Italy and the United States are both parties, America retains primary jurisdiction over offenses committed by individuals on duty -- as would have been the case here. If the Status of Forces Agreement does not apply -- as it might not, because intelligence agents are involved -- then the general rule applies. In either case, it is up to American, not Italian, authorities to determine whether any offense was committed in the capture and rendition of Nasr.

Unfortunately, the effort to prosecute these American agents is only one instance of a growing problem. Efforts to use domestic and international legal systems to intimidate U.S. officials are proliferating, especially in Europe. Cases are pending in Germany against other CIA agents and former defense secretary Donald Rumsfeld -- all because of controversial aspects of the war on terrorism. These follow Belgium's misguided effort to pursue "universal jurisdiction" claims for alleged violations of international law, which also resulted in complaints against American officials including Vice President Cheney and former secretary of state Colin Powell. That law was amended, but the overall problem is unlikely to go away. The initiation of judicial proceedings against individual Americans is too attractive a means of striking at the United States -- and one often not subject to control by the relevant foreign government.

Accordingly, Congress should make it a crime to initiate or maintain a prosecution against American officials if the proceeding itself otherwise violates accepted international legal norms. Thus, in instances where there is a clear case of immunity, U.S. prosecutors could answer proceedings such as the Italian indictments with criminal proceedings in U.S. courts. By responding in kind, even if few overreaching foreign officials are ever actually tried, such a law would create a powerful disincentive for these kinds of legal antics.

The authors served in the Justice Department under Presidents Ronald Reagan and George H.W. Bush, and have been expert members of the U.N. Subcommission on the Promotion and Protection of Human Rights.

Canadian Parliament Decides To Let 2 Measures Passed After 9/11 Expire (NYT)

By Ian Austen

The New York Times, February 28, 2007

OTTAWA, Feb. 27 — Canada's Parliament voted Tuesday not to extend two measures that were passed as part of a sweeping package of antiterrorism laws weeks after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on the United States.

The measures will expire Thursday. One allows the police to arrest people suspected of preparing to commit an act of terrorism and hold them for 72 hours without charges, and the other enables courts to compel witnesses to testify at special hearings similar to grand jury proceedings in the United States.

Neither has ever been used.

The vote took place just days after the Supreme Court struck down a law allowing the government to detain foreign-born terrorism suspects indefinitely using secret evidence and without charges while their deportations were being considered.

But the debate reflected the fractious politics of Canada's Parliament, which is not controlled by any single party, as much as a national reassessment of antiterrorism measures.

The Liberal Party was in power when the legislation was passed. But on Tuesday, with the Conservative Party in power and pushing to extend the two measures, all but two of the Liberal members present voted against the extension, as instructed by their new leader, Stéphane Dion. That, combined with the no votes of two smaller opposition parties, ensured the overwhelming defeat of the Conservatives' hopes.

After the vote, the Conservatives portrayed their opponents as unwilling to protect national security.

"Any party that doesn't take the national security of Canadians seriously will never be chosen by Canadians to form the government of Canada," Prime Minister Stephen Harper said.

The harsh words began long before the vote. In the House of Commons last week, Mr. Harper suggested that the Liberal opposition to the measures stemmed from the possibility that they could be used to compel a relative of a Liberal Party member of Parliament to testify at a special hearing to look into the bombing of an Air India flight in 1985.

DOJ_NMG_0137641

A prolonged criminal trial in the deaths of 329 people as a result of that bombing ended in two acquittals in 2005. Mr. Harper was jeered down before he could finish his remarks.

Canadians who lost relatives in the 9/11 attacks held a news conference in Ottawa on Tuesday morning, before the vote, to urge that the provisions be extended. The laws, said one widow, Cindy Barkway, "allow law enforcement officials to prevent terrorism from turning people like you into victims like us."

There was some disappointment that the issue of public safety had become politicized by Liberals and Conservatives alike.

Errol Mendes, who teaches human rights law at the University of Ottawa, said that without the preventive arrest provision there could be circumstances when the police would be unable to stop an attack in progress. He said judicial oversight of the arrests and the investigative court hearings would prevent human rights abuses.

"It has been incredibly destructive of national security in Canada to make this area into a partisan issue," Professor Mendes said.

Canada has a long history of allowing preventive detention. In 1970, under the now defunct War Measures Act of 1914, 453 people were jailed without charges after the kidnapping and killing of a Quebec cabinet minister and the abduction of a British diplomat. That episode remains controversial throughout the country, especially in Quebec.

Amnesty International and other human rights groups urged Parliament let the measures expire. Amnesty argued that conventional criminal laws allowed the police and courts to stop imminent terrorist acts without jeopardizing civil liberties, a position largely shared by Mr. Dion.

After the vote, Alex Neve, Amnesty International's Canadian secretary general, said: "This by no means should be interpreted or misunderstood that Canada is somehow going soft on terrorism. What I think this is an affirmation of is that Canada is increasingly concerned that its approach to terrorism is fully grounded in respect to fundamental human rights."

PATRIOT ACT:

DoJ Sued For Release Of FISA Court Rules On Spy Program (INFOWEEK)

By K.C. Jones, InformationWeek

InformationWeek, February 28, 2007

The Electronic Frontier Foundation has sued the Department of Justice, demanding the release of records related to court orders authorizing electronic surveillance.

The EFF filed a lawsuit Tuesday seeking information on changes to the National Security Agency's surveillance program. The program, which the federal government maintains targets communications involving at least one suspected terrorist, was secret until the New York Times reported on it in December 2005.

The government acknowledged that it was conducting surveillance without warrants from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court and argued that presidential powers and recent legislation authorized the practice. After defending against allegations that the practice was illegal, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced last month that the government changed its practices and would seek court approval to monitor communications.

EFF used the Freedom of Information Act in an attempt to obtain records showing the court's approval, but the Department of Justice didn't respond to a written request. EFF is seeking immediate release of orders allowing the government to monitor communications and any rules or guidelines associated with the orders. White House Press Secretary Tony Snow has made public comments that indicate the court issued guidelines or parameters that have allowed the government to continue surveillance with court approval.

EFF refers to those statements in its filing. It's not alone in seeking details about the guidelines. News reporters who have been covering the issue have also pressed to find out the parameters of ongoing surveillance.

The White House, Gonzales, and federal agencies have maintained that terrorists could learn too much about the government's capabilities if the government's methods were disclosed. They have argued that national security would be compromised if information about the surveillance program were released.

Although several groups and individuals have sued the government over the secret surveillance, EFF's suit is different since it seeks information about the program since the administration has claimed court approval.

In a statement announcing the lawsuit, EFF senior counsel David Sobel said that Americans have the right to know the government's basic guidelines for electronic surveillance of their personal communications. The government has claimed that ordinary Americans haven't been targeted and that only communications involving suspected terrorists have been intercepted.

DOJ_NMG_0137642

Sobel said during a brief interview Tuesday that he's optimistic EFF will obtain the records because the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act requires modifications to its rules and procedures to be declassified and made available to congressional committees. Even if the government successfully argues that the material is highly classified, the lawsuit is likely to make officials account for the documents they have, which would make public more information than has been released up to this point, he said.

The lawsuit is one of dozens filed by EFF as part of a campaign to "hold government accountable."

EFF Files Suit Against DoJ (TND)

Technology News Daily, February 28, 2007

The Electronic Frontier Foundation (EFF) filed suit against the Department of Justice today, demanding records about secret new court orders that supposedly authorize the government's highly controversial electronic surveillance program that intercepts and analyzes millions of Americans' communications.

When press reports forced the White House to acknowledge the program in December of 2005, the administration claimed that the massive program could be conducted without warrants or judicial authorization of any kind. However, in January of this year, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced that the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court (FISC) had authorized collection of some communications and that the surveillance program would now operate under its approval. EFF's suit comes after the Department of Justice failed to respond to a Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) request for records concerning the purported changes in the program.

"While national security and law enforcement demand a limited amount of secrecy, Americans have the right to know the government's basic guidelines for this kind of invasive electronic surveillance of their personal communications," said EFF Senior Counsel David Sobel. "The burden is on the Justice Department to justify its failure to disclose the information we've requested."

EFF's suit demands the immediate release of the FISC orders regarding the surveillance program and any FISC rules and guidelines associated with such orders.

Today's FOIA action is separate from EFF's lawsuit against AT&T for illegally collaborating with the government's surveillance program. That suit, Hepting v. AT&T, is proceeding in U.S. District Court in San Francisco despite the government's ongoing attempts to have the case dismissed.

For the FOIA complaint filed against the Justice Department:
http://www.eff.org/flag/oipr/oipr_complaint.pdf
For more on EFF's FOIA Litigation for Accountable Government Project:
http://www.eff.org/flag/

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Bush Will Veto Union Rights For Federal Airport Screeners (WT)

By Shaun Waterman
The Washington Times, February 28, 2007

President Bush will veto a proposed bill to implement measures recommended by the September 11 commission if the bill is passed with language granting collective-bargaining rights to airport passenger and baggage screeners employed by the Transportation Security Administration, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff told Republican senators yesterday.

Mr. Chertoff's comments at a private luncheon were reported by Sen. Jim DeMint, South Carolina Republican, and confirmed by the Department of Homeland Security and a senior administration official authorized to speak to the press.

Mr. Chertoff "did make very clear that if the bill goes to the White House with the current provision related to TSA personnel authorities, his recommendation, and that of other senior administration officials, would be to veto it," department spokesman Russ Knocke said.

A letter sent yesterday to Mr. Bush from 36 Republican senators shows that the votes are there to sustain a veto, according to Republican aides.

One of the provision's strongest backers, Sen. Daniel K. Akaka, Hawaii Democrat, said a veto would also kill numerous other provisions of the law.

"I hope that the president would consider all the improvements made by this legislation to protect the nation before making veto threats," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0137643

Mr. Knocke said the administration's view is that "the issues relating to the TSA are so extraordinarily problematic that there should be no doubt in anyone's mind" about the need for a veto.

The Senate is slated to begin today debating the bill, which includes measures addressing rail and aviation security, emergency communications, cargo security, nuclear proliferation and national standards for drivers' licenses. The House has passed its version of the bill, which includes the labor rights language, along with dozens of other provisions and authorization for billions of dollars of homeland-security spending.

The provision at issue was introduced as an amendment to the bill while it was in committee and passed on a party-line vote. It repeals a footnote in the 2001 law setting up the TSA, which gave the agency's director wide discretion to decide issues of union and other labor rights for the 40,000-plus passenger and baggage screeners it employs.

Labor Language Threatens Antiterror Bill (AP)

By Laurie Kellman

AP, February 28, 2007

President Bush and his Senate allies will kill a Sept. 11 antiterror bill if Congress sends it to the White House with a provision to let airport screeners unionize, the White House and 36 Republicans said Tuesday.

"As the legislation currently stands, the president's senior advisers would recommend that he veto the bill," said White House spokesman Scott Stanzel.

Senate Republicans swiftly backed up the threat with a pledge by more than enough senators to block any veto override attempt.

"If the final bill contains such a provision, forcing you to veto it, we pledge to sustain your veto," they wrote to the president. Sen. Jim DeMint, R-S.C., planned to offer an amendment to strip the provision from the bill.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said that allowing screeners to unionize would impede the department's quick response to possible threats. Fast redeployment of screeners, such as in response to Hurricane Rita and the failed London plot to blow up airliners, cannot wait for negotiations, he said.

Chertoff said screeners are as much on the front lines in the war against terror as military troops.

"Marines don't collectively bargain over whether they're going to wind up, you know, being deployed in Anbar province or in Baghdad," Chertoff told reporters after a briefing with senators. "We can't negotiate over terms and conditions of work that goes to the heart of our ability to move rapidly in order to deal with the threats that are emerging."

Other federal employees have collective bargaining and whistle-blower protection rights.

Chertoff's reasoning, according to the American Federation of Government Employees, is "an insult to the hundreds of thousands of dedicated public safety officers with collective bargaining rights — from border patrol agents to firefighters to the Capitol Hill police," said John Gage, president of the federation.

The White House made its displeasure with the union provision clear before the House passed it as part of its Homeland Security bill. Sen. Susan Collins said Chertoff told her that a statement Thursday would include an explicit veto threat.

Casting the provision as a deal-killer would flex Bush's political muscle with the new, Democratic-led Congress on the old battleground of labor rights. It also could throw an obstacle into talks over how to debate and pass the recommendations of the Sept. 11 Commission.

For now, senators are eager to follow the House and pass a bill enacting the commission's recommendations to tighten the nation's security. The House bill also includes a provision that would let TSA screeners bargain collectively.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada and Republican leader Mitch McConnell of Kentucky had reached a tentative agreement Tuesday to conduct the debate over the next 10 days without the distraction of Iraq.

The sense of urgency on the 9/11 recommendations was conveyed to both leaders in a letter Tuesday from families of those killed in the terrorist attacks on that day in 2001.

"This legislation is far too important to be politicized by ... controversial amendments and debate, particularly those relating to Iraq," wrote Carol Ashley and Mary Fetchet of the Voices of September 11th.

Reid and McConnell said the Iraq debate would wait for next month, after passage of the 9/11 bill. The arrangement would allow the Senate to debate legislation bolstering anti-terrorism security measures on railroads and airlines without being distracted by the furor over President Bush's buildup of troops in Iraq.

"We have got to finish this bill," Reid, D-Nev., said as he opened the Senate session. He read parts of a letter from relatives of people killed in the Sept. 11, 2001 terrorist attacks asking the Senate to consider the legislation "without complications regarding Iraq."

Even minus an Iraq debate, provisions in the anti-terrorism bill or planned amendments make the legislation contentious.

DOJ_NMG_0137644

In addition to its opposition to the TSA provision, the White House also opposes an amendment that would let states delay adopting standardized drivers' licenses.

Collins said Chertoff delivered a staunch defense of the administration's position during the GOP caucus' weekly policy lunch Tuesday. She said she nonetheless plans to try to attach an amendment that would delay requirements for states to adopt national drivers license standards.

Many states have complained about the cost of the program, and civil libertarians are concerned about privacy issues.

Other measures in the bill would improve rail and aviation security, provide funds for state and local emergency communications systems, improve intelligence sharing between federal, state and local officials, and expand a visa waiver benefit for favored countries.

FEDERAL DIARY: Interior Report Finds 'Wall' Between Field Staff, Leaders (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Washington Post, February 28, 2007

Communication. Trust. Leadership.

A report by the Interior Department inspector general, released this month, provides a glimpse of how these issues can arise in agencies that have to manage a workforce spread across the country.

The report, by Earl E. Devaney, Interior's inspector general, focused on the law enforcement office at the Fish and Wildlife Service. Devaney praised the office for "significant progress" in overhauling its operations since 2002, when the secretary of the interior called for improvements.

But Devaney also found some problems in the law enforcement office, such as a "general mistrust of senior management" and a lack of communication between the headquarters and the field, "which has created a perception that there is a 'wall' between management and field personnel."

For the review, Devaney's staff conducted more than 110 interviews, traveled to field offices and hired a consultant to survey the law enforcement staff. Of 369 employees asked to participate in the survey, 88 percent responded -- an indication, the report said, that the employees are highly committed to the Fish and Wildlife Service.

The agency's law enforcement office enforces federal laws, such as protections for endangered species and migratory birds. The office's work includes breaking up animal-smuggling rings, safeguarding habitat for endangered species, enforcing bird-hunting regulations and inspecting wildlife shipments to detect illegal trade.

The IG review suggested that the agency's law enforcement program is at risk of being undermined because of leadership and communication problems -- issues that hinder operations in many parts of the government.

The report pointed out that the lack of communication between senior leaders and the field "has significantly impacted morale and trust." Field employees said their bosses at headquarters never visited their offices, and many field agents said they rarely got an office visit from their superiors -- the special agents in charge.

Field employees also said they were frustrated by management practices. The IG found that an "unwritten requirement" for promotions is two years of experience working at Fish and Wildlife's law enforcement headquarters and that field employees think promotions often go to agents with little or no supervisory experience.

Bonuses and time-off awards also were distributed on an inconsistent basis, the IG found.

In 2005, about half of the law enforcement employees who received a performance rating of "exceptional" were in one region, while the remaining six regions and headquarters shared the remaining half. In three regions, employees rated as "superior," a step below exceptional, received bigger bonuses than those employees rated exceptional, the report said.

Disciplinary action proved to be another sensitive topic, the IG found. In one case, an employee received the mandated 30-day suspension for misusing a government vehicle, while another employee in a different region received a 14-day suspension for a more serious offense -- driving while intoxicated in a government vehicle and while carrying a firearm.

"Inconsistencies such as these have caused resentment and frustration," the report said.

Benito Perez, acting chief of law enforcement for Fish and Wildlife, said the law enforcement office has started work on 12 recommendations made in the IG report to improve operations.

"We don't disagree with the validity of the recommendations, and we are working toward meeting those recommendations," said Perez, a 19-year Fish and Wildlife law enforcement officer.Unions for TSA Screeners

Senior advisers to President Bush would recommend that he veto anti-terrorism legislation that included a provision to permit federal airport screeners to engage in collective bargaining, a White House spokesman said yesterday.

Legislation to implement the unfinished recommendations from the 9/11 commission would permit Transportation Security Administration screeners to be represented by unions. The provision was added to the bill by Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.).

DOJ_NMG_0137645

Scott Stanzel, the White House spokesman, said, "We vigorously disagree with the provisions of the Senate legislation that would eliminate the flexibility given to TSA to perform its transportation security missions."

The TSA needs the ability to quickly reassign and move screeners to respond to threats, he said.

Lieberman has contended that the screeners should have employee protections similar to those provided to Border Patrol agents and customs and immigration officers.

Call To Expand Union Rights Could Derail Antiterror Bill (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, February 28, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 27 — Democrats in Congress are pushing to extend union protection to 43,000 federal airport security workers, reviving a debate that stalled the creation of the Department of Homeland Security and could now derail broad antiterrorism legislation.

The proposal has provoked opposition from Senate Republicans and the Bush administration. It is the latest in a series of labor-related fights in Washington as Democrats try to use their new majority to push long-delayed proposals that benefit rank-and-file workers, like increasing the minimum wage.

White House officials made clear on Tuesday that President Bush was prepared to veto a bill that enacted recommendations of the Sept. 11 Commission if the provision granting Transportation Security Administration workers collective bargaining rights was not removed.

“Existing authority permits T.S.A. the flexibility to manage and deploy their work force,” Scott Stanzel, the White House deputy press secretary, said. “We do think that it is important that T.S.A. maintain that flexibility for personnel performing key homeland security roles.”

In a letter sent Tuesday to the White House, Senator Jim DeMint, Republican of South Carolina, and 35 other Senate Republicans said they were prepared, if necessary, to sustain a veto.

Security administration officers are already allowed to join a union. But few do, as current federal law does not permit the union to bargain on their behalf to contest workplace assignments, file grievances or represent them in disciplinary matters. Backers of the measure say giving the T.S.A. workers broader rights does not create security problems.

“There’s no good reason to deny these rights to these people,” Senator Joseph I. Lieberman, independent of Connecticut, said Tuesday, as the Senate took up the matter.

What collective bargaining rights Department of Homeland Security employees should have has been under dispute since shortly after the 2001 attacks.

The disagreement so divided Congress in 2002 that for months it prevented passage of the bill to create the department. Republicans successfully used the delay, for which they blamed Democrats, to help defeat Senator Max Cleland, the incumbent Democrat of Georgia, that year, openly questioning his commitment to fight terrorism.

Republicans ultimately prevailed, both with T.S.A., which initially was part of the Department of Transportation, and with Homeland Security, which has since taken over.

But union leaders have been pushing ever since to reassert bargaining rights for department employees.

Union leaders say airport screeners are frequently required to work unscheduled overtime, suffer high injury and illness rates — nearly 30 percent compared with 5 percent for all federal employees — and have an attrition rate 10 times as high as the federal average.

“How safe is the public if officers who see security breaches that result from mismanagement cannot disclose that because they fear they could be fired?” said Mark D. Roth of the American Federation of Government Employees.

Under the proposal, the security officers would not have the right to strike, and the union would not have the power to negotiate wages. But it would be authorized to bargain on their behalf to establish work rules to govern overtime and temporary transfers, and to protect them if they file a grievance.

Union officials said that T.S.A., under the proposal, would still have the power, in emergencies, to change work assignments. But Kip Hawley, the security agency’s administrator, said such shifts were necessary not just in emergencies but when routine events like weather delays required work reassignments or overtime.

“We require an infinitely flexible security regime that allows us to change what we do and where we do it,” Mr. Hawley said, adding that hiring staff members to handle union relations would cost $160 million.

The debate over the collective bargaining rights is just one of several points of contention expected to surface as the Senate takes up its version of the Sept. 11 Commission bill. House Democrats passed their own version in January.

DOJ_NMG_0137646

House Democrats, who also included a provision granting collective bargaining rights to airport screeners, have language in their bill that would mandate inspection of all ship containers headed to the United States from overseas, a provision that the Bush administration and many Republicans oppose. A push by Democrats is expected in the coming week to add such language to the Senate bill.

The Senate bill is also likely to include measures intended to increase rail and transit security. And there may be an effort, also opposed by the Bush administration, to delay a 2008 mandate that the states begin to issue a standardized, tamper-proof driver's license.

Officials in many states have said they will not be ready in time and that the federal government should cover the cost of issuing the new licenses.

New Profiling Program Raises Privacy Concerns (WP)

By Ellen Nakashima And Alec Klein

The Washington Post, February 28, 2007

The Department of Homeland Security is testing a data-mining program that would attempt to spot terrorists by combing vast amounts of information about average Americans, such as flight and hotel reservations. Similar to a Pentagon program killed by Congress in 2003 over concerns about civil liberties, the new program could take effect as soon as next year.

But researchers testing the system are likely to already have violated privacy laws by reviewing real information, instead of fake data, according to a source familiar with a congressional investigation into the $42.5 million program.

Bearing the unwieldy name Analysis, Dissemination, Visualization, Insight and Semantic Enhancement (ADVISE), the program is on the cutting edge of analytical technology that applies mathematical algorithms to uncover hidden relationships in data. The idea is to troll a vast sea of information, including audio and visual, and extract suspicious people, places and other elements based on their links and behavioral patterns.

The privacy violation, described in a Government Accountability Office report that is due out soon, was one of three by separate government data mining programs, according to the GAO. "Undoubtedly there are likely to be more," GAO Comptroller David M. Walker said in a recent congressional hearing.

The violations involved the government's use of citizens' private information without proper notification to the public and using the data for a purpose different than originally envisioned, said the source, who declined to be identified because the report is not yet public.

The issue lies at the heart of the debate over whether pattern-based data mining -- or searching for bad guys without a known suspect -- can succeed without invading people's privacy and violating their civil liberties.

DHS spokesman Larry Orluskie said officials had not yet read the GAO report and could not comment.

Another DHS official who helped develop ADVISE said that the program was tested on only "synthetic" data, which he described as "real data" made anonymous so it could not be traced back to people.

The system has been tested in four DHS pilot programs, including one at the Office of Intelligence and Analysis, to help analysts more effectively sift through mounds of intelligence reports and documents. In another pilot at a government laboratory in Livermore, Calif., that assessed foreign and domestic terror groups' ability to develop weapons of mass destruction, ADVISE tools were found "worthy of further development," DHS spokesman Christopher Kelly said.

The DHS is completing reports on the privacy implications of all four pilot programs. Such assessments are required on any government technology program that collects people's personally identifiable information, according to DHS guidelines.

The DHS official who worked on ADVISE said it can be used for a range of purposes. An analyst might want, say, to study the patterns of behavior of the Washington area sniper and look for similar patterns elsewhere, he said. The bottom line is to help make analysts more effective at detecting terrorist intent.

ADVISE has progressed further than the program killed by Congress in 2003, Total Information Awareness, which was being developed at the Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency (DARPA). Yet it was partly ADVISE's resemblance to Total Information Awareness that led lawmakers last year to request that the GAO review the program. Though Total Information Awareness never got beyond an early research phase, unspecified subcomponents of the program were allowed to be funded under the Pentagon's classified budget, which deal largely with foreigners' data.

The Disruptive Technology Office, a research arm of the intelligence community, is working on another program that would sift through massive amounts of data, such as intelligence reports and communications records, to detect hidden patterns. The program focuses on foreigners. Officials declined to elaborate because it is classified.

Officials at the office of the director of national intelligence stressed that pattern analysis research remains largely theoretical. They said the more effective approach is link analysis, or looking for bad guys based on associations with known suspects. They said that they seek to guard Americans' privacy, focusing on synthetic and foreigners' data. Information on Americans must be relevant to the mission, they said.

DOJ_NMG_0137647

Still, privacy advocates raise concerns about programs based on sheer statistical analysis because of the potential that people can be wrongly accused. "They will turn up hundreds of soccer teams, family reunions and civil war re-enactors whose patterns of behavior happen to be the same as the terrorist network," said Jim Harper, director of information policy studies at the Cato Institute.

But Robert Popp, former DARPA deputy office director who founded National Security Innovations, a Boston firm working on technologies for intelligence agencies, said that research anecdotally shows that pattern analysis has merit. In 2003, he said, DARPA researchers using the technique helped interrogators at the U.S. prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, assess which detainees posed the biggest threats. Popp said that analysts told him that "detainees classified as 'likely a terrorist' were in fact terrorists, and in no cases were detainees who were not terrorists classified as 'likely a terrorist.' "

Some lawmakers are demanding greater program disclosure. A bipartisan bill co-sponsored by Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) would require the Bush administration to report to Congress the extent of its data-mining programs.

Under The Gantry (WP)

The Washington Post, February 28, 2007

THE DEPARTMENT of Homeland Security recently announced a plan to do what many scientists had once thought impossible: effectively inspect large numbers of vehicles entering a major metropolitan area for radioactive materials without bringing life to a standstill. In the 1950s, a still-classified report on the possibility of scanning for nuclear materials found that detectors could be easily defeated, one of its authors recently told US News & World Report. Experts today say that the nuclear weapons are heavily shielded, making detection tricky, and that current front-line scanners have difficulty in reliably detecting even those nuclear materials not encased in a bomb.

Nevertheless, DHS is pushing forward with a pilot program to test the feasibility of scanning large numbers of cars and trucks entering Manhattan for radioactivity.

The goal is to set up a system of both fixed and mobile scanners on roads leading into Manhattan. The system would require little or no slowdown in traffic to operate. Fixed detectors might be placed at tollbooths and other traffic choke points. Mobile scanners might be used to conduct random checks. Ideally, this program would add another layer of security to the nuclear detection regimes at border crossings and seaports. If successful, it would require little or no effort from those being inspected, so it wouldn't snarl traffic in the tri-state area. Another point in its favor is that the pilot program is not very expensive, as Homeland Security projects go, and that even if the resulting system is not perfect, it will foster development of newer and better technologies that will make Americans safer.

Even given all that, however, we are glad Homeland Security is not breaking the bank on its latest experiment. Based on the available information on the inconsistency of nuclear detection technology, it is fair to wonder whether this is the right time to conduct such a large-scale test and whether such a program may be an inefficient use of government resources.

It's A Hard Sell For Some, Big Easy For Others (USAT)

By Anne Rochell Konigsmark

USA Today, February 28, 2007

NEW ORLEANS — Of all the places they could live, Brad Pitt and Angelina Jolie chose New Orleans. They bought a $3.5 million mansion in the French Quarter, enrolled two of their three children in a local private school and became symbols of the effort to reinvigorate the city.

Pitt has promoted the construction of environmentally friendly buildings here, and the celebrities' investment in New Orleans made headlines around the world. But each day, in much smaller ways, other people are coming and buying stakes in a city that still has less than half the population it had before Hurricane Katrina.

People continue to move out, some after returning here and becoming overwhelmed by the neighborhoods of empty houses, a crime wave and a general uncertainty about the future. Despite all that, New Orleans is finding a way to hold steady. The population, now at about 191,000, hasn't changed significantly in months.

Amid the comings and goings, New Orleans is evolving, trying to find its footing in a post-Katrina world. The blank-canvas feel of the city has attracted a wave of newcomers who will help shape its future: entrepreneurs, young idealists, urban planners and longtime lovers of New Orleans' unique charms.

DOJ_NMG_0137648

"People have forgotten what a great city this is," says Danielle Sutton, 34, who moved here in June from London with her husband and their baby son to open a gourmet cheese shop. "It's just nice living in such a beautiful place."

All around, there are signs that New Orleans is coming back, but not quite as the city it used to be. A U.S. government survey reveals a whiter populace: New Orleans was two-thirds black before Katrina hit in August 2005; today it's 47% black and 42% white.

It's also more Hispanic, thanks mostly to an influx of workers coming here for plentiful construction jobs. The survey indicates New Orleans is almost 10% Hispanic, up from about 3% in the 2000 Census.

Willing to brave infrastructure problems, the reduced population and many other challenges, businesses are opening. A Tulane University survey in January found 56 new businesses had opened since Katrina on three main commercial streets.

There are concerns, however, that New Orleans is losing some of its cultural flavor.

Demographer William Frey of the Brookings Institution in Washington predicts that New Orleans "will become more of a normal American city, and that may not be what the locals think is the right direction to go. The people who are leaving — many are those who made New Orleans what it was — and in a way the sense of place in New Orleans will change dramatically."

In a survey done in October by the University of New Orleans, one-third of the respondents in Orleans Parish and neighboring Jefferson Parish said it was "likely" or "somewhat likely" they would leave the area. The main reason: crime. Other reasons include the slow pace of recovery and concern about the safety of the city in future storms.

Neilan Tyree, a once-devoted New Orleanian, moved to Atlanta last spring after trying to live in post-Katrina New Orleans for more than six months. "I couldn't stand it and couldn't fix it, so I had to rearrange my dreams," says Tyree, 47.

Most of the residents who have not returned since the storm came from lower-income neighborhoods and are black, Frey says. The UNO study found that among those who say they probably will leave, most are educated people under 60, says Susan Howell, director of the university's Survey Research Center.

Meanwhile, Richard Campanella, a Tulane geographer, says well-educated people are moving in.

"I have my ear out for folks who have moved here since the storm," he says. "Many are urban planners, urban designers and architects. They see this as an incredible frontier where they can provide their professional skills in an environment that really needs them."

Newcomers are flocking to areas that had little damage in the storm. The French Quarter looks and feels much as it always has. The same can be said for many historic neighborhoods along the Mississippi River that had little or no flooding.

"We're in a bit of a bubble," Sutton says of the life she and her husband, Rich, have created. Their shop, the St. James Cheese Company, is in the Uptown neighborhood, an upscale area that did not flood and teems with activity. They live in an apartment four blocks away.

Rich Sutton, 35, says they have friends and relatives who called them "crazy" to start a business and bring up a family in such an unstable environment.

"People think, 'That's the place that got destroyed,' or 'That's the place with all the crime,' " he says.

Campanella has studied new business owners like the Suttons and tracked businesses along three commercial corridors — Magazine Street, Carrollton Avenue and St. Claude Avenue. Of the 651 businesses on those streets pre-Katrina, 411 have reopened and stayed open. Nineteen reopened and then closed, he says, and 56 new businesses have opened.

The openings and closings reflect the ongoing tale of two cities. Along Magazine Street, which did not flood, 95% of businesses are open, while on the other two streets, which did flood, less than half the businesses are open.

For many New Orleanians who were here before Katrina, getting back to normal is nothing short of a battle. And for some, even those whose homes did not flood, it's a battle not worth fighting.

Several large corporations have moved most, if not all, of their operations out of the city since Katrina. These include Chevron, which is moving about 500 New Orleans workers across Lake Pontchartrain to the North Shore, and Entergy, New Orleans' only Fortune 500 company, which has relocated many of its operations to Jackson, Miss.

Many off-shore oil service industry businesses have followed their customers to Houston, says Eric Smith, associate director of the Entergy-Tulane Energy Institute.

Tyree, a freelance business development specialist who attended Tulane in the 1970s, moved to New Orleans in 2004 and intended to stay. His St. Charles Avenue apartment did not flood, so he returned soon after Katrina. "I wanted to be a part of the rebuilding," he says. "I was very much the optimist."

Then his landlord raised the rent. And Tyree, who is HIV-positive, began to worry about the city's diminished health care system. He got frustrated with damaged streets and broken traffic lights.

Tyree landed a job with MacDuff, a publishing company in Atlanta. He found an apartment there and says he is happy. "I'm having to relearn how to live in a world where things can and do work, and I love it."

DOJ_NMG_0137649

New Orleans struggled with crime problems before Katrina. Authorities' continued difficulty in getting a handle on violent crime has helped make the issue the main reason people want to leave the area, the UNO survey indicates.

New Orleans had the nation's highest murder rate per capita in 2006 and began 2007 with a rash of killings that led the U.S. government to send personnel and equipment to help local authorities.

Olivia Watkins, 22, says a fear of crime drove her from New Orleans. Watkins, who lived near Audubon Park, says she was a frequent "stoop sitter" who gave up evenings outside because of muggings in her area.

There were other problems post-Katrina for Watkins. While she was living in North Carolina just after Katrina, her landlord in New Orleans evicted her because he needed a place to stay. She returned to New Orleans in early 2006 and found an apartment. A few weeks ago, however, Watkins lost her job as an editor at a local magazine.

"I feel like New Orleans stabbed me in the back," she says. "And I was all set on getting married in a church on St. Charles Avenue and sending my kids to the bilingual school on Audubon Park."

Watkins left New Orleans in January to live in Orlando with family. This spring, she plans to move to Baton Rouge, where she found a job as a copywriter.

Meanwhile, some who came here seeking opportunities are thriving. Antan Wilson, 24, who arrived from North Carolina just after the storm and initially lived in his car, says this is home now.

"I kind of fell in love with it," he says. He worked as a janitor and in a strip club before getting hired as an account manager for EBONetworks, a local marketing firm that helps companies target minority customers.

"There's energy here, and I think it holds a good future," Wilson says.

Last winter, Bobbi and Kevin Krause sold their home in Phoenix intending to go on an extended road trip, which included a stop in New Orleans to do volunteer work. Once here, they became friends with residents on a stretch of Palmyra Street where they were working on damaged homes. A flooded Victorian cottage caught their eye, and after finding the owner, they bought it for $48,000.

"It was the way the community welcomed us," says Kevin, 40. "We go over to their houses for dinner or coffee. In Phoenix, we hardly knew our neighbors. This was new, and we fell in love with it."

Much of the New Orleans that Christine Williams knew before Katrina has ceased to exist, and she's reconsidering her decision to return.

A New Orleans native, she says most of her evacuated family members now live in Iowa. Her home in Lakeview stayed dry, but her neighborhood is still devastated and mostly empty.

"There's no supermarket," says Williams, 35. "And it's just still so abandoned."

She fled to Washington, D.C., before Katrina and enrolled her daughter, now 9, in a Catholic school. She found a job at a hair salon and they lived in a D.C. suburb. "It was a very, very nice experience," she says. "Washington is very progressive. It is movin' and shakin' but not too fast."

Williams moved back to New Orleans last spring because her boyfriend and her daughter wanted to, she says. Now Williams, who is black, says she may leave again.

"I didn't feel separated by race in Washington," she says. "It's such a melting pot."

Bobbi Krause, 32, says she understands why people who were here before Katrina might want to leave. She and Kevin have learned how difficult it is to build a life here. Their home is gutted and unfinished because they have been unable to find anyone to do the work.

But the Krauses didn't lose anything in the storm, and for them, this is an adventure.

"The people that are back in their homes have fought a battle to be here. It is a tough decision to stay," Bobbi says.

"We're creating our New Orleans right now."

WAR NEWS:

War Bill Divides Democrats (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey And Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, February 28, 2007

WASHINGTON — Democratic lawmakers, who earlier this month nearly unanimously backed resolutions condemning President Bush's plans to boost troop levels in Iraq, are struggling to agree on what to do next in their drive to bring the war to an end.

DOJ_NMG_0137650

In the Senate, party leaders who faced dissent in their own caucus have decided to postpone consideration of a binding resolution that would set limits on what U.S. forces could do in the conflict.

And in the House, Democrats are wrestling with even deeper divisions as they try to agree on a way to use a supplemental war funding bill to slow the deployment of more troops in Iraq amid accusations by Republicans that the move would deprive troops of the help they need.

At a closed-door caucus meeting Tuesday, three senior House Democrats — including the chairmen of the Appropriations and Armed Services committees — urged their colleagues to support the funding strategy, the details of which are being worked out.

But the apparent deceleration of the legislative drive to end the war is dismaying antiwar activists.

"There seems to be a new world land-speed record set in back-peddling," said Tom Andrews, a former Democratic congressman from Maine who heads Win Without War, a coalition of antiwar groups.

Just a few weeks ago, Win Without War was targeting Republicans for standing in the way of the resolutions. Now, Andrews said, antiwar groups are encouraging their members to pressure Democratic lawmakers.

Senior Democrats defended their management of the war issue, insisting there has been no slowdown in their campaign.

"We've been in the majority for six weeks," said Sen. Patty Murray of Washington. "We've had 38 hearings on the Iraq war…. We've already had two votes on the war…. That's a lot better than they've done in the last 3 1/2 or 4 years."

But Democrats are under intense pressure to act. Several recent polls have shown that public support continues to build for congressional action to limit the war.

Less than two weeks ago, the party appeared comfortably in control of the political battle over the war, while Republicans flailed.

House Democrats pushed through a resolution repudiating the White House plan to add 21,500 troops in Baghdad and Al Anbar province, picking up support from a handful of Republicans.

And in the Senate, Democrats twice succeeded in portraying Republicans as obstacles to a debate on the president's strategy. GOP lawmakers blocked consideration of nonbinding resolutions, complaining they were being denied the opportunity to bring forward alternatives.

But as debate has shifted to what Congress will do next, substantial cracks appear to be emerging in the Democratic camp.

In the House, several moderate Democrats have spoken out against a proposal by Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.) to attach conditions to a $93-billion supplemental defense spending bill that could limit the Pentagon's ability to send more troops to Iraq. Murtha, who chairs the appropriations subcommittee that is considering the spending request, is a close friend and ally of House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco). She has indicated some qualified support for his proposal.

House Democrats are exploring setting equipment and training standards for troops before their deployment, shifting more money to fighting terrorism in Afghanistan and setting benchmarks for the Iraqi government to meet for continued U.S. funding.

"We're listening to our colleagues about what form they want that supplemental to take," Pelosi said. But, sensitive to the GOP attacks, the speaker said: "We will fund the troops as long as they are in harm's way."

In an interview with CNN's Larry King on Tuesday, Pelosi said that Bush's judgment on the Iraq war was "a little impaired."

Murtha's proposal has come under withering attack from Republicans who say it would deprive troops of the reinforcements they need.

And Tuesday, Marine Gen. Peter Pace, Joint Chiefs of Staff chairman, warned the Senate Appropriations Committee that Murtha's proposal would mean fewer troops fighting in Iraq.

"The effect is damaging on the battlefield," Pace said, noting that instead of the 20 brigades that the military says it needs, there would be about 14 to 19.

Democratic leaders in the Senate have never been enthusiastic about using congressional authority over funding the military to tie up the deployment. But their strategy of rewriting the resolution that authorized the 2003 invasion of Iraq to limit the U.S. mission there also has run into trouble.

Leaders have been circulating a draft by Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), the Foreign Relations Committee chairman, and Carl Levin (D-Mich.), the Armed Services Committee chairman. But several senators sounded uncomfortable with language specifying that U.S. troops could engage in some activities, such as counterinsurgency, but not others.

"I think it's very difficult to start changing things after the fact and still avoid micromanaging," said Sen. Ben Nelson (D-Neb.), a moderate lawmaker who helped lead efforts to pass a nonbinding resolution opposing the deployment of additional troops.

At the same time, Sen. Russell D. Feingold (D-Wis.), a leading antiwar lawmaker, said the proposal did not go far enough.

"The people of this country did not ask us to reshape the mission in Iraq," he said. "They asked us to end it."

DOJ_NMG_0137651

The Democratic disagreements brought smiles to the faces of some Republicans on Tuesday. Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas), who for weeks has been laboring to blunt the Democratic assault on Bush's plan, said: "It seems like they have to have a debate within their own caucus."

Democrats Struggle To Reach Consensus On Iraq (MCT)

By Margaret Talev

McClatchy Newspapers, February 28, 2007

WASHINGTON - Back from a weeklong recess, top Democrats in the House of Representatives and the Senate acknowledged Tuesday that they still don't have a game plan for how to force President Bush to change policy in Iraq.

"There has not yet been a determination made by the Democratic caucus as to how we will finalize our legislative approach to this," said Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev. He said it would be another week or two before Senate debate on Iraq resumed.

House Democrats are not much closer to decisive action, although they did pass a nonbinding resolution earlier this month opposing Bush's troop buildup in Iraq.

"We are in the process of choosing the least dangerous, the least negative alternative," said House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer, D-Md. "We're not there; there's not a consensus."

The division and confusion over how to proceed could anger voters who put Democrats in control of Congress largely in frustration over the war. But Democrats are nervous about cutting off money in a way that could undermine soldiers who already are in Iraq - or expose Democrats to Republican charges that they're doing that.

House Democrats huddled for a closed-door caucus Tuesday evening to discuss alternatives. They are trying to modify a controversial plan by the Democrats' top defense appropriator, Rep. John Murtha of Pennsylvania, to prevent the Bush administration from sending troops that aren't fully rested or equipped.

Murtha was poised to tie troop readiness to funding in a $93.4 billion war-spending bill requested by the White House. But many Democrats are wary of going that far; even Murtha's ally, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., has said she won't hamstring war money in a way that hurts troops.

Pelosi said Tuesday evening she intends to bring a supplemental war bill that contains some version of Murtha's plan before the full House by mid-March.

But several Democrats who attended the caucus said the legislation ultimately may allow Bush to waive troop restrictions so long as he explains his reasoning.

In a brief interview after the caucus, Pelosi said that if Democrats do allow the president to sign waivers, it still would put Bush under more pressure.

"If I were the president of the United States I would not welcome having to confirm why he would send troops who are not trained . . . into a war zone," Pelosi said.

"But we haven't made our final decisions about this," she emphasized.

Even if House Democrats agree to a modified version of Murtha's plan, there's little prospect for bipartisan support, partly because Republicans don't want to help Democrats build a case for de-funding the war in months to come.

In addition, House Democrats could have trouble getting enough Senate Democrats to go along with anything that ties up troops.

Said freshman Sen. Jon Tester, D-Mont., "This is a Catch-22. At some point in time we've got to get the president's attention. But I'm not going to take away what's necessary for the troops in the field. That's not acceptable."

Reid said he planned to put the Iraq debate on hold until the Senate completed action on homeland security legislation that enacts recommendations of the 9-11 commission. That's likely to continue into next week.

That would give Senate Democrats more time to build consensus on how to proceed on Iraq. One option being discussed is rescinding the 2002 vote that authorized the use of force in Iraq. Another, Reid said, is legislation that changes the mission in Iraq.

Asked what his preference is, Reid said, "I have a preference of making sure that I have my arms around the entire caucus before I put my name on an amendment."

Senate Democrats Backtrack, Opt Not To Tackle Iraq In 9/11 Commission Bill (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, February 28, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0137652

Senate Democrats reversed course yesterday and vowed to keep the Iraq war out of the ongoing 9/11 Commission bill debate, but the lack of a consensus approach exposed by the new majority's move risks alienating anti-war allies and giving political momentum to Republicans.

Democrats first began eyeing the 9/11 Commission measure as a vehicle for binding checks on President Bush's war strategy during debate on the non-binding resolution billed as their first step in repudiating the White House. Yet Democrats held off on their second step amid GOP insistence on a symbolic vote on troop funding and calls for a clean bill from Sen. Joe Lieberman (D-Conn.), who helps maintain their narrow hold on the Senate.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) reiterated yesterday that his members have not settled on an approach to reining in the raging conflict in Iraq, despite Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph Biden (D-Del.) and Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin (D-Mich.) openly pursuing a plan to replace the 2002 congressional authorization of force with a narrower mission.

"A lot of senators are working on this," Reid told reporters. "Nothing has been finalized."

The only certainty yesterday was that the 9/11 Commission bill would stay Iraq-free, for now. Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) echoed Democrats' intentions, but hinted that whether the 9/11 measure would stay scrubbed of war amendments depends on both leaderships reaching a deal on Iraq votes.

"Senator Reid and I have not yet reached an agreement about how and when to have the Iraq debate, but I think both sides are going to start the 9/11 debate with amendments that are more or less related to the 9/11 bill," McConnell told reporters.

Backing away from what early reports had implied was a caucus-wide plan to narrow the authorization, however, hampers Senate Democrats as they seek to stress their unity of opposition to the war.

"No one should be concerned about Democrats not sticking together," Reid said, even as Biden touted his and Levin's plan in a Boston Globe op-ed that earned a hammering from the Republican National Committee.

One of Reid's most independent anti-war members strongly defended him: "The majority leader did not do this because the caucus was divided," Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.) said. "That is factually false."

Yet Feingold stopped short of endorsing a retooled Iraq authorization, indicating that he would support a revocation of Bush's authority in Iraq with exceptions but not a "new mission" that would allow the administration to claim a new mandate.

Meanwhile, Rep. John Murtha's (D-Pa.) plan to place readiness conditions on Iraq deployments to tie the president's hands seeped across the Capitol and into the Senate's Iraq deliberations. Republican Conference Chairman Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.) referred to the Murtha plan, dubbed "slow-bleed" by House Republicans, during his criticism of Democrats yesterday, and one influential anti-war activist suggested that Democratic leaders were abandoning Murtha at their peril.

"There has been at best a tepid response from Democrats," said former Rep. Tom Andrews (D-Maine), president of Win Without War. "It's dangerous … you can't disregard someone as thoughtful and experienced as Jack Murtha, particularly when the American people are behind him."

House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) came to his leadership rival's defense yesterday, reiterating his support for Murtha's readiness strategy while acknowledging that he has not yet seen specific language. Hoyer said Rep. Ike Skelton (D-Mo.), the House Armed Services Committee chairman, will examine Biden's and Levin's proposal to narrow the war authorization.

Of the four Senate GOP incumbents considered most vulnerable in 2008 by Democratic campaign chief Charles Schumer (N.Y.), two have already ruled out supporting a reworked war authorization: John Sununu (N.H.) and Norm Coleman (Minn.).

"They are looking for an alternative to cutting off funding. … It's not going to play," Coleman said yesterday.

Iraq Bill Vexes Democrats (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, February 28, 2007

House Democratic leaders offered a full-throated defense last night of their plans to link Iraq war spending with rigorous standards for resting, training and equipping combat troops, saying that they would hold President Bush accountable for failing to meet those readiness tests.

But after a fractious meeting of the House Democratic caucus, Speaker Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) said Democratic members still have not united around the proposal.

More than a week after Rep. John P. Murtha (Pa.) detailed plans that he said would curtail deployments to Iraq, Pelosi and other Democratic leaders said the coming debate on war funding would be about forcing the administration to live up to existing military requirements. War funds would be redirected toward equipment, such as night-vision goggles, that some troops lack.

DOJ_NMG_0137653

Democrats would insist on giving combat troops a year off between deployments, and they could impose restrictions on Pentagon policies that extend combat tours.

They would also condition some war funding on benchmarks for the government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, said House Democratic Caucus Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.).

But some Democrats, especially those from conservative districts, remain wary. Rep. James P. Moran Jr. (Va.), who supports the plan, said many Democrats "want to make sure this is still President Bush's war. It's his war to manage, and it's his war to end."

Members of Congress are not "the only ones conflicted," said Rep. John Tanner (Tenn.). "The country's conflicted. We don't want to do the same thing we've been doing for 3 1/2 years that hasn't worked, but we don't want to pull the plug."

In the Senate, the Iraq debate may be on hold for a week or longer while Democrats address concerns about a new effort to limit Bush's war authority.

Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.) had said that Iraq-related amendments may be considered on a homeland-security bill now before the Senate. But families of Sept. 11 victims fanned out across the Capitol yesterday, saying that a war debate could slow progress on the legislation, which would enact security recommendations by the bipartisan commission that studied the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

"We're going to do our utmost to finish the 9/11 [bill] before we move to Iraq again," Reid said.

Meanwhile, Democrats who have opposed the war from the start are protesting the language of the new Senate Iraq measure, which would repeal the 2002 resolution granting Bush the authority to invade, while limiting future military action and setting a March 31, 2008, goal for withdrawing combat troops. Its cosponsors are Foreign Relations Chairman Joseph R. Biden Jr. (Del.) and Armed Services Chairman Carl M. Levin (Mich.).

Sen. Russell Feingold (Wis.), a prominent war opponent, said he rejected a draft of the new resolution because it appeared to grant Bush too much leeway to continue the conflict. In effect, he said, Democrats would be reauthorizing a war while trying to end it. He was particularly bothered by a provision that suggested an open-ended U.S. commitment to providing border security.

"It's crazy to create a new military mission in Iraq when we should be getting out of there," Feingold said. "I didn't vote for it in the first place. I'll be darned if I'm going to vote for it now."

Senate Democratic leaders said Feingold's concerns are not insurmountable. To the greatest extent possible, they are seeking to maintain public unity on Iraq, despite a wide range of views within the party.

Iraq Moves Unclear (RC)

By Jennifer Yachnin And John Stanton

Roll Call, February 28, 2007

Even as House Democrats said Tuesday they will continue to emphasize troop preparedness in the upcoming supplemental spending bill to fund the Iraq War, Democratic leaders appeared to be backing away from efforts that would drastically reduce troop deployments.

And in the Senate on Tuesday, leaders of both parties called a temporary truce in their increasingly bitter fight over the Iraq War, providing Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) an opportunity to refocus the Democratic Caucus' messaging efforts as well as to build some sort of consensus on how to proceed.

House Appropriations Chairman David Obey (D-Wis.), Armed Services Chairman Ike Skelton (D-Mo.) and Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.) late Tuesday afternoon tried to address their Democratic colleagues' concerns about how they intend to handle the expected $100 billion Iraq War spending bill, including putting the onus on President Bush to ensure troops are prepared and equipped before being deployed.

"We have to raise the standard of accountability," Democratic Caucus Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) said following a meeting of House Democrats, adding that the criteria would be applied to both Bush and the Iraqi government under the Democratic proposal.

Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) said additional funds could be dedicated to training and equipment for those troops, including National Guard personnel, who are assigned to the war.

"We're talking about focusing more of the funding on readiness," Pelosi said. The Speaker did not indicate whether those funds would be shifted from other areas in the spending bill or if overall spending would be increased.

While the proposal echoes a plan unveiled by Murtha last week via an anti-war Web site — that plan would use Congressional control over federal funds to require readiness guidelines are closely followed, and make it more difficult for Bush to execute his current war strategy, including an increase in troop levels — Democratic leaders insisted the strategy does not include more stringent rules.

DOJ_NMG_0137654

"All we're saying is follow the policy that's in place," Pelosi said.

But Democrats did not indicate how they plan to enforce those guidelines — stating only that they will not cut off funding for troops in Iraq — asserting that the majority will continue to discuss those possibilities. The spending bill is expected in full committee next week and on the House floor the week of March 12.

"You'll see that as the language becomes apparent," Emanuel said. However, an aide to the Speaker suggested that the bill could include provisions requiring the president to sign off each time existing guidelines for readiness are waived, something the commander in chief is not currently required to do.

"We would like to see the war ended, but it's the president's war," Pelosi spokesman Brendan Daly said.

Democratic leaders also stressed a desire to refocus efforts on fighting the broader war on terror in Afghanistan. "If we are truly going to defeat terrorism, we have to refocus on Afghanistan," Pelosi said.

Aides said the House Democratic Caucus may hold a second meeting this week to further discuss the proposed spending bill.

Following the Tuesday meeting several Democratic lawmakers said they approved of the presentation by Murtha, but were careful to stress that they had yet to see a written copy of any proposal.

"I'm impressed with what I heard," Rep. Ellen Tauscher (Calif.), chairwoman of the centrist New Democrat Coalition. While declining to discuss details, Tauscher said the plan would establish "significant metrics" for the president to meet.

"I'm definitely open to Mr. Murtha's proposal," echoed Rep. Mike Michaud (D-Maine). Michaud acknowledged several of his colleagues in the fiscally conservative Blue Dog Coalition have opposed the plan, adding that he believes it is unlikely the group will take an official position. "We'll wait to see the details. This is the first chance we've really had to talk about it as a Caucus."

Despite polls showing continued public support for Congress forcing Bush's hand on his prosecution of the Iraq War, Democrats entered the week divided over how strongly to oppose the White House and without a clear plan for pursuing that opposition.

Senior Senate Democratic aides said they hope the truce with Senate Republicans will give Reid and other leaders time to bring their Caucus together and to develop a consensus proposal on how to move forward.

Under pressure from the families of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attack victims as well as members of their own parties, Reid and Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) agreed Tuesday to move a pending Sept. 11 security bill free of Iraq amendments.

"Both sides are starting the 9/11 bill with the feeling that it will not be a repository for Iraq amendments," McConnell said Tuesday following the Republican Conference's weekly luncheon. Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff urged Republicans at the luncheon to focus their efforts on passing a clean bill.

The decision likely pushes off a resumption of hostilities over Iraq until the end of next week at the earliest, but Reid told reporters Tuesday that he expects to make another attempt at passing some sort of legislation relating to Iraq. "I hope in the near future to be able to offer [legislation] on behalf of the Democratic Caucus" addressing Iraq, Reid said.

Senate Democratic leadership aides said Tuesday that it remains unclear when, or how, Democrats will take up Iraq again. According to these sources, during their weekly luncheon Democrats discussed a plan championed by Armed Services Chairman Carl Levin (D-Mich.) and presidential hopeful Sen. Joseph Biden (D-Del.) to move a new, narrower war authorization. But members emerged from the meeting with no final decision on whether the Caucus would back such a plan, and several lawmakers — most notably conservative Democratic Sen. Ben Nelson (Neb.) — said they would remain noncommittal until they have a chance to review the specifics of the proposal.

Despite the continuing uncertainty over the reauthorization strategy within their own party, Democratic leaders appear intent on moving forward with at least some sort of restrictions on how the White House conducts the war and already have begun ramping up their political machine to pressure wavering Republicans.

Specifically, as Democrats were heading into their luncheon, the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee sent an e-mail penned by Levin to its supporters on his proposal to rework the 2002 war authorization. Although the e-mail did not include a fundraising pitch, it did ask recipients to sign a petition the DSCC is circulating calling on lawmakers to take up the proposal.

While Reid was able to peel off several Republicans during the fight over a nonbinding resolution, it is unclear whether he will be able to convince any of his GOP colleagues to back a binding bill that limits Bush's authority. Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.) — who has twice broken with his party over Iraq this year — said Tuesday he would oppose any effort to rewrite the war authorization. "It certainly doesn't have my support. I'm not interested in looking back," Coleman said, adding that "I doubt it's going to get very much support from many of my [GOP] colleagues."

Sen. Gordon Smith (R-Ore.), who, like Coleman, is expecting a strong challenge to his re-election in 2008, declined to discuss the issue, telling reporters Tuesday morning that he would withhold judgment until he saw an actual proposal from Levin.

DOJ_NMG_0137655

Democrats Back Away From War Fund Plan (AP)

By Anne Flaherty

AP, February 28, 2007

House Democratic leaders are backing away from a plan to scale back U.S. involvement in the Iraq war by using Congress' most powerful tool — withholding money in the budget.

Instead, party officials said Tuesday, leaders are weighing a proposal that would attempt to embarrass Bush into abandoning his war strategy. Under a plan discussed behind closed doors, Democrats probably would fund President Bush's entire $93.4 billion request for war spending this year but require that any troops sent into battle that don't meet certain standards receive a presidential waiver and that Congress be notified of the shortcoming.

The compromise is an attempt to please members who want to end the war immediately by cutting funding and others who do not want to appear as though Democrats are turning their back on troops.

"I think it's a responsible approach," said Rep. Chet Edwards, D-Texas.

Democratic leaders also were considering adding money to help wounded troops, improve health care for veterans and speed funding assistance for hurricane-damaged communities.

The draft proposal, pitched to party members in a private caucus meeting, is considered by Democrats to be the next step in challenging the president's Iraq war policy. Emboldened by the Nov. 7 elections, House Democrats this month pushed through a nonbinding resolution denouncing Bush's decision to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq in addition to the some 130,000 already there.

But the next step has been a difficult one for a party divided on how far to go to end the war. Many Democrats favor the initial proposal by Rep. John Murtha to withhold money for war missions unless troops meet certain standards.

For example, Murtha, D-Pa., wants the military to adhere to its own goal of not extending a unit's combat tour beyond a year and allowing troops one full year before going back. Murtha, a Vietnam War veteran, also wanted the military to enforce its own traditional training and readiness requirements, such as training with the same equipment they would use in combat.

With the war reaching its fourth anniversary this spring, military officials have said these goals have become unrealistic and the force stretched thin by repeated deployments.

The latest proposal is intended to put the pressure on Bush; if troops are sent into battle without meeting the military's prewar standards for battle, he would have to sign a waiver and notify Congress.

Democrats disagree on whether the latest proposal goes far enough. Murtha briefed party members, along with Reps. Ike Skelton, D-Mo., and David Obey, D-Wis.

If "we vote for the supplemental, I believe we own the war," said Rep. Lynn Woolsey, D-Calif., one of a group of liberal Democrats pushing for an immediate end to the war.

Bush "hasn't to date done anything we've asked him to do, so why we would think he would do anything in the future is beyond me," Woolsey said of the reporting requirements.

Rep. Elijah Cummings, D-Md., called the new plan "a weakened version of what it was" that could still allow troops to be sent into combat without the training and equipment they need.

Cummings suggested that Democrats had botched the issue by trumpeting Murtha's original plan to place strict deployment conditions on funding.

"I think that really kind of played into the Republicans' hands," Cummings said.

Whether the Senate would support the latest plan is unclear. Several key Democrats, including Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., are cool to the idea of restricting funds for the war but have said they want binding legislation to force a drawdown of troops.

A group of senior Senate Democrats are pushing to repeal the 2002 measure authorizing the war and pass a new resolution restricting the mission and ordering troop withdrawals to begin by this summer.

Reid, D-Nev., announced Tuesday he wants to put off votes on Iraq until the Senate passes a measure enacting the recommendations of the bipartisan 9/11 commission.

"Iraq is going to be there — it's just a question of when we get back to it," Reid said, predicting it would be "days, not weeks" before the Senate returned to the issue.

Divided Congress Prepares To Debate Financing And Strategy For Iraq War (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny And Robin Toner

The New York Times, February 28, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0137656

WASHINGTON, Feb. 27 — The Democratic-controlled Congress on Tuesday entered a critical five-week struggle over the financing of the war in Iraq and the overall mission there, divided over strategy, stymied by ideological divisions, but still hoping to escalate pressure on the White House to change the course of the war.

In the Senate, a proposal to repeal the 2002 Congressional war authorization faced skepticism on two fronts. Some liberal Democrats expressed unease at the prospect of approving a new military mission, even a narrower one, while moderate Republicans said they preferred to look ahead rather than revisit the past.

In the House, Democrats debated what conditions should be attached to the nearly $100 billion spending bill for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan, scheduled for a floor vote in March. Democratic leaders convened a spirited meeting of their caucus to begin sorting out the lawmakers' varying views, hoping to defend against Republican charges that they were planning a cutoff in troop financing.

As members of Congress returned to Capitol Hill after a weeklong break at home, Democrats searched for a way to translate a tide of public sentiment against the war into legislation that makes practical — and political — sense.

"Personally, I don't believe there are any good alternatives in Iraq," said Representative Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, the Democratic majority leader. Speaker Nancy Pelosi of California, Mr. Hoyer and other leaders met with their fellow Democrats for about an hour in a closed session on Tuesday evening. They emerged to say that the military spending bill would place a new emphasis on the war on terrorism and provide additional financing for the American effort in Afghanistan.

They also sought to rebut the Republican charge that the troops would suffer from their efforts to change the administration's troop buildup in Iraq.

"Let me be clear," Ms. Pelosi told reporters. "We will fund the troops."

While Democrats have yet to settle on a final spending plan, Ms. Pelosi spoke favorably of a proposal put forward by Representative John P. Murtha, Democrat of Pennsylvania, that would establish strict standards for the training, readiness and equipment of troops about to be deployed to Iraq. Mr. Murtha has said his legislation would protect American forces, yet make Mr. Bush's troop buildup impossible to sustain.

The new Democratic proposal would allow those standards to be waived, although they would require the president to do it. "He will have to have his name on that," said Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, the Democratic conference chairman.

The Murtha proposal had come under heavy fire from Republicans, who asserted that it would amount to a crippling financial drain if the Pentagon would fail to meet the standards. Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, the Republican leader, scoffed at the new Democratic approach Tuesday night, saying, "Sounds like retreat to me."

Democratic leaders said their plan would set new benchmarks for the Iraqi government and force the president to be accountable for the condition of the troops. Still, some Democrats pledged not to be silenced in their efforts to reduce military spending.

In the Senate, Democratic leaders temporarily set aside Iraq deliberations to consider a debate on implementing recommendations from the 9/11 Commission. Families of the victims persuaded Senate leaders not to bog down the debate with Iraq amendments.

New Lawmakers Seek War Debate (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, February 28, 2007

Congressional Democrats -- especially new members -- are clamoring for action on the Iraq war, citing polls showing that American voters want to change course, but leaders have delayed significant action.

Senate Democratic leaders announced yesterday that they will postpone for at least another week a debate on war policy, despite efforts by several senators pushing to hold a vote to repeal the 2002 war authorization.

"I would have liked to have done Iraq three weeks ago," said Sen. Jon Tester, Montana Democrat and one of the freshmen calling for a substantive Iraq debate.

During last week's recess, Mr. Tester found that people in his home state are irritated that nothing had been done yet on Iraq.

"My guess is [my constituents] are probably as frustrated as I am that we ought to quit debating about whether we are going to debate and let's debate the issue," he said. "I wanted to debate the escalation because that's what the president put on the floor to debate and that was not done. I don't know why."

Freshman Sen. Bernard Sanders said Mr. Tester -- and other Democrats who grumbled about the lack of debate as they left the Democratic Party's weekly luncheon yesterday -- are not alone in their frustration.

DOJ_NMG_0137657

"The American people want us to debate it," said the Vermont independent, who caucuses with the Democrats. "We've got to bring our troops home as soon as we possibly can."

This week, the Senate instead will consider recommendations of the September 11 commission, a bill that passed the House last month. The White House said it will veto the measure if it allows airport screeners to unionize -- a move the administration says could delay the agency's ability to respond quickly to threats.

Republicans said they will try to strip that provision from the bill and, if their efforts fail, then they will support a Bush veto.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada said he is working with Republican leaders to find the proper time to debate the war. Instead of attaching the 2002 revote to the pending September 11 bill, as several prominent party members wanted, Democrats are still in talks over the best way forward.

Mr. Reid said yesterday that he was persuaded by families of the victims of the September 11 terrorist attacks, who urged quick Senate action on a bill that was not complicated by Iraq amendments.

"There are a number of different ways we can go," Mr. Reid said. "The deauthorization [is] certainly one. The other is to change the mission, legislatively, of what's going on there. And we're working our way through that."

Mr. Reid would not say what he prefers but noted that the October 2002 resolution authorizing the war did not spell out what is happening in Iraq today.

"We never authorized fighting in a civil war," he said.

Senate Republicans, who have filibustered Democratic efforts to debate Mr. Bush's Iraq strategy, said they will fight for a vote on a measure promising continued funding for the troops.

Republican Conference Chairman Sen. Jon Kyl of Arizona said yesterday that he spoke with military leaders on his recent visit to Iraq and that they think Mr. Bush's new plan "is showing some early signs of success and can work if it is given an opportunity to work."

"That's why I say it's important that we not allow any kind of congressional action that would tie the hands of General Petraeus and our other commanders in carrying out this mission," Mr. Kyl said, referring to Gen. David Petraeus.

The House, which passed a nonbinding resolution disapproving of Mr. Bush's plan to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq earlier this month, also will take no action on Iraq this week.

Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer said he is working with his fellow leaders "to determine what we believe is appropriate to offer."

"We are currently working on suggesting alternatives," and building a consensus, the Maryland Democrat said early yesterday. "We're not there. We're working on that."

He criticized Republicans who accuse the Democrats of secret plans to cut funding for troops, saying: "That is not going to happen, period."

After huddling last night for a strategy session on the war, Democratic leaders told reporters what to expect next week when the Appropriations Committee considers Mr. Bush's supplemental spending request for Iraq. The leaders said they will include language in the supplemental bill attaching conditions to the billions in war spending. The conditions would include ensuring that U.S. troops deployed to Iraq are ready and have the needed equipment and training. The spending bill also would attach benchmarks for the Iraqi government.

Meanwhile, the Senate's floor time will be dominated by the September 11 commission bill.

The measure aims to beef up intelligence programs, improve security at the nation's airports and railways, and fund local emergency communications.

The bill would allow Transportation Security Administration screeners at airports to bargain collectively. Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff yesterday briefed Republican senators and said a unionized screening force would slow down response times to terrorist threats.

"Marines don't collectively bargain over whether they're going to wind up, you know, being deployed in Anbar province or in Baghdad," he said, according to the Associated Press. "We can't negotiate over terms and conditions of work that goes to the heart of our ability to move rapidly in order to deal with the threats that are emerging."

Democrats Snipe At Senate Leaders Over Handling Of Iraq Issue (POL)

By John Bresnahan

The Politico, February 28, 2007

Senate Democrats are accusing their leaders of mismanaging the twin efforts to block President Bush's troop surge in Iraq and force a quicker end to the war.

DOJ_NMG_0137658

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) on Tuesday postponed for at least a week action on a Democratic plan to rewrite the 2002 congressional resolution authorizing the war, imposing new wartime restrictions on the administration.

Reid is facing criticism from both flanks of his party.

Sen. Ben Nelson, a conservative Democrat from Nebraska, said the new Democratic strategy could unfairly hamstring the president and military commanders. "I think it is very difficult to start changing things after the fact and still avoid micromanaging the war."

And Sen. Russ Feingold, a liberal Democrat from Wisconsin, criticized the latest Democratic strategy as too timid and toothless in stopping the war. Approving a new authorization resolution would be the same "as voting for a new Iraq war and that I am not going to do."

Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph R. Biden Jr., a Delaware Democrat seeking the presidency, and Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin (D-Mich.) wrote the new plan. Senate insiders faulted Biden and, to a lesser extent, Levin, for telegraphing their plans to Republicans prematurely -- before most members were fully briefed on it.

"It was clearly a mistake," said a top Senate Democratic aide. "Presidential candidate Joe Biden wanted headlines and got them."

In the House, Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) is confronting a similar problem -- a caucus deeply divided over a plan, masterminded by anti-war Rep. Jack Murtha (D-Pa.), to limit Bush's options by placing new restrictions on troop deployments.

Compounding problems for Democrats, Pelosi and Reid have yet to agree on an overall strategy for ending the war without undermining the troops.

Senate Republicans blasted the Biden-Levin proposal as unworkable and dangerous for U.S. forces in Iraq. If Reid tried to bring the proposal up for debate, the GOP leaders vowed to offer their own resolution stating that Congress would never cut funds for troops engaged in combat.

Reid, who has been lobbied by families of 9/11 victims to avoid that particular legislative fight during consideration of a bill to implement the recommendations of the 9/11 Commission, backed down and, instead, promised Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) that the Biden-Levin resolution will not be brought up for at least a week, possibly longer.

Reid and McConnell are now trying to work out the ground rules for an open debate on Iraq, one not tied to any other legislative matter, according to Democratic and GOP aides, although it's not clear if the two sides can work out such an agreement.

"We expect a freewheeling Senate-style debate on the 9/11 bill," McConnell said.

Republican senators and aides said that Democrats had overreached by focusing on enacting a new authorization resolution. "This is one of the most dangerous things that Democrats could do," said Sen. Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah).

While Hatch, a former chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, acknowledged that there was no constitutional prohibition to such a move, he said it "would infringe on inherently presidential powers" and jeopardize the safety of troops in the field by altering their mission while still engaged in combat.

Feingold, on the other hand, wants to cut off funding for the war, not an "intermediate step" such as adopting a new authorization resolution. Feingold promised to seek a vote on a funding cutoff soon, possibly when the Senate begins work on a $93 billion wartime supplemental in a few weeks.

"The next step is to start using our real power, which is the power of the purse," he said.

Feingold's comments show how difficult it will be for Reid to execute his preferred strategy of forcing Republicans to take votes on interim measures to limit, or scale back, the war before moving toward an up-or-down vote on cutting off funds.

Faced with these competing pressures, Reid admitted he was unsure of what his next step would be, but he was clearly not ready to throw his full weight behind the Biden-Levin plan.

"There has not been a determination by the Democratic Caucus as to how we finalize our legislative approach to this," Reid told reporters Tuesday. "There are a number of different ways we could go. You suggested the deauthorization (of the Iraq war) -- that is certainly one. The other is to change the mission legislatively, what's going on there. And we're working our way through that."

Asked his preference, Reid said, "I have a preference of making sure that I have my arms around the entire caucus before I put my name on an amendment."

Across the Capitol, Pelosi faced similar problems as she weighed whether to allow Murtha a vote on his proposal to restrict the flow of fresh troops to Iraq by imposing restrictions on their training and equipment. Republicans have dubbed it the "slow-bleed" policy, a phrase that has infuriated Democrats. But its constant repetition by GOP spinmeisters and their political allies has definitely weakened support for the plan.

DOJ_NMG_0137659

Murtha, who oversees the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee, has planned to insert his proposed restrictions into the upcoming wartime spending bill. But The Wall Street Journal reported on Tuesday that Rep. Dave Obey (D-Wis.), chairman of the full committee, may now add waivers to the bill, which would allow the Pentagon to essentially ignore the Murtha language.

Murtha has been heavily criticized for unveiling his proposal weeks before he was readily to formally introduce it. And even though Pelosi issued a statement reiterating her call to make sure U.S. troops are properly equipped and trained before being sent to Iraq, the Murtha plan may have suffered too much damage to be politically viable anymore.

Top Democrats tried to play down the problems they face over the Murtha proposal, noting that House Democrats were divided leading up to the recent floor debate over Iraq but ended up backing Pelosi's lead.

"We didn't have that coalescence on the nonbinding resolution," said Rep. Michael E. Capuano (D-Mass.), a top Pelosi lieutenant. "We were all over the ballpark. It came together in two days. We tried to find language that was first of all clear, second of all brings people together. Jack's job is getting something out there. A few people being vocal about it is not a real problem."

Republican strategists, though, for the first time since their big loss in November, looked at the problems facing Reid and Pelosi and gloated, although only for a minute.

"We're at the best we've been since the election," said one senior Senate GOP aide. "It may not last, but this is definitely the best we've been in a while."

An Editor's Confession: I'm The Source Of 'Slow Bleed' (POL)

By John Harris

The Politico, February 28, 2007

With a mixture of pride and remorse, I have a confession: I am the author of the Democratic Party's "slow-bleed strategy" for ending the war in Iraq.

I had nothing to do with the details of the plan that Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.) floated two weeks ago. His plan was crafted to use the appropriations process to limit President Bush's options for mobilizing more forces in Iraq, while trying to protect Democrats from the accusation that they were abandoning troops in the field. As it happens, Murtha's idea is itself bleeding support, hit by a barrage of denunciations from people who say it does indeed amount to abandoning the troops.

In retrospect, it probably has already occurred to Murtha and his supporters that from a public relations perspective, "slow-bleed" was not the most winning description. How could they have been so stupid?

That's where I come in. "Slow bleed" is my phrase. Murtha had nothing to do with it. Neither did John Bresnahan, the reporter whose name was on the Politico story in which the "slow-bleed strategy" made its debut.

You can understand my pride of authorship. Editors labor in obscurity. Our job is to keep reporters from looking bad, and to let them take the credit when they look good. Rarely is there tangible evidence that we are having any impact. But in 20-plus years in the business, I can scarcely recall an instance when words typed on my keyboard have had such a loud and immediate echo.

For Continuing Coverage of Iraq Visit

If you Google "slow bleed" and "Murtha," you get nearly 200,000 hits. Nexis recorded more than a hundred stories in the days after Bresnahan's article that used the phrase "slow bleed."

"Slow bleed" was featured on CNN and on the editorial page of The Wall Street Journal. My former newspaper, The Washington Post, used the phrase the other day as if it were an established part of Washington lexicon, needing neither attribution nor explanation. "Slow bleed" also played a starring role in a parade of House floor speeches by Republicans denouncing Democrats, and in a fundraising letter from Republican National Committee Chairman Mike Duncan. "Slow-bleed is exactly the right name for this incredibly irresponsible and dangerous strategy," he wrote.

Like many others who weighed in, Duncan incorrectly stated that "slow-bleed" was the name that Democrats were using to describe their strategy.

Here is where remorse kicks in. As happens all the time in journalism, this was a decision -- made on the fly and under deadline -- that I would have taken back in the morning. It is Murtha's job to defend his own policies. But I'd prefer not to hand his opponents ammunition in the form of evocative but loaded language.

When my colleague Jim VandeHei and I started The Politico, we said we hoped to make the work of political journalists more transparent. So, in the name of transparency (and self-abasement), here is what happened.

Bresnahan, who has unparalleled sources and understanding of how Congress works, wrote an article that was the first to detail the emerging Democratic strategy of challenging Bush on Iraq. Here was the lead paragraph of the draft he submitted:

DOJ_NMG_0137660

"Even as the House begins debate on a resolution opposing President Bush's plan to send 21,500 more U.S. combat troops to Iraq, leading anti-war groups are preparing a multi-million dollar TV ad campaign and grassroots lobbying blitz designed to pressure vulnerable incumbent lawmakers to end their support for the war."

VandeHei and I read the article and were impressed by the detail of Bresnahan's reporting. But, as editors always do, we had our quibbles. Like the lead paragraph: Too bulky, and too bland. The story was a good bit better than the introduction.

We rushed the patient to the operating table for emergency surgery. With VandeHei hovering over my shoulder, this is what I came up with:

"Top House Democrats, working in concert with anti-war groups, have decided against using congressional power to force a quick end to U.S. involvement in Iraq, and instead will pursue a slow-bleed strategy designed to gradually limit the administration's options."

That is not exactly prize-winning prose, but it seemed a little snappier to us -- and more on point. Please note the context: What is slowly bleeding away is the administration's political support to keep fighting the war. Republicans pounced on the phrase because of the ease with which that context could be shorn away, to give the impression that what Democrats were slow-bleeding were the bodies of troops in Iraq.

That willingness to wrest words from context -- and to attribute the phrase to Democrats even though it was not theirs -- was demagogic on the part of Republican operatives. But it was never my plan to make their work so easy.

A journalist's job is to clarify political debate, not further muddy it. In the two weeks since his original article, Bresnahan's reporting has continued to clarify the unfolding Iraq argument, even as his editors made life more difficult for him.

So there you have it -- how the sausage gets made in a newsroom. Not always the most appetizing sight.

Service Members Sign Appeal Calling For Troop Withdrawal (NYT)

By Lizette Alvarez

The New York Times, February 28, 2007

In a small but growing sign of dissent, a group of active-duty military personnel and reservists, including many who have served in Iraq, is denouncing the war and asking Congress for the prompt withdrawal of troops.

The service members, who number more than 1,600, have sent an Appeal for Redress to their Congressional representatives, a form of protest permitted by military rules. Most of those who signed the appeal, at www.appealforredress.org, are enlisted soldiers in the Army, from the lowest to the highest ranks.

“There is a sense of betrayal,” said Specialist Linsay Burnett, 26, who recently returned from Iraq with the First Brigade combat team of the 101st Airborne Division, based at Fort Campbell, on the border of Kentucky and Tennessee. The division is readying for its third deployment.

“These soldiers stand up to fight, to protect their country, but we are now on the fifth reason as to why it is we are in Iraq,” added Specialist Burnett, who has served as a public affairs specialist and as a military journalist focusing primarily on the infantry. “How many reasons are we going to come up with for keeping us over there?”

The Appeal for Redress reads: “As a patriotic American proud to serve the nation in uniform, I respectfully urge my political leaders in Congress to support the prompt withdrawal of all American military forces and bases from Iraq. Staying in Iraq will not work and is not worth the price. It is time for U.S. troops to come home.”

The protest, which was started in October by two active-duty service members and is sponsored by three antiwar groups, initially drew 65 signatures, growing to more than 1,300 by February. This week, after the CBS News program “60 Minutes” reported on the appeal, about 300 more active-duty soldiers joined the campaign, said Petty Officer Third Class Jonathan Hutto of the Navy, a co-founder of the group behind the appeal.

While the 1,600 make up a tiny part of the armed services, the appeal is one of the first official signs of protest from people within the military. An estimated 70 percent of those who have signed it are on active duty; the rest are members of the Reserves or the National Guard, and about 100 officers have signed it.

Describing themselves as supporters of the military but critics of the Iraq war, leaders of the appeal say they believe it is their right and duty under the Constitution to question the war and its mission, a position not widely voiced in the military.

Their decision to speak out and take their opposition outside the chain of command has been criticized by some veterans’ groups that argue that soldiers are obligated to follow orders, not change policy. Critics also say that while service members cannot choose where they will be deployed, they can choose to join the military or not.

When the group sent its first letter in October, the White House spokesman, Tony Snow, said it was “not unusual for soldiers in a time of war to have some misgivings,” adding that the group constituted a small minority of service members.

DOJ_NMG_0137661

In a phone call yesterday with three signatories, including Petty Officer Hutto, the service members said their decision to appeal had not been taken lightly. The military does not allow service members to organize and frowns on dissent.

"The Army has many ways to make your life very difficult," Specialist Burnett said, adding that she had come forward largely because "there are not many voices out there for the men on the ground."

Jeff Slocum, a chief master sergeant of the Air Force who is scheduled to deploy to Iraq next year, said his high rank was one reason he had signed the appeal. "I'm not antiwar, I'm not antimilitary," said Chief Master Sergeant Slocum, who added that the troops were feeling "used and abused."

That 1,600 service members have signed the appeal "shows just how much we are willing to risk," he said. "We are trying to raise awareness that we need people to be sticking up for us, because nobody else is."

Spy Chief Uses 'Civil War' To Describe Iraq (USAT)

By Jim Michaels

USA Today, February 28, 2007

WASHINGTON — The nation's spy chief said Tuesday that the violence in Iraq resembles a civil war and the Iraqi government has the "close to impossible" job of trying to end the violence.

The "term 'civil war' accurately describes key elements of the Iraqi conflict," Mike McConnell, the new director of national intelligence, said in a statement to the Senate Armed Services Committee.

Ethnic-sectarian violence has polarized politics and hardened the position of combatants, McConnell said, particularly since an attack by Sunni militants on a Shiite mosque in Samarra a year ago.

The Bush administration has avoided using the term civil war to describe the violence in Iraq. McConnell is the highest-ranking administration official to use the term to describe events in Iraq.

McConnell, a retired vice admiral who was confirmed as the top spy earlier this month, and Lt. Gen. Michael Maples, director of the Defense Intelligence Agency, described a worsening situation in Iraq in testimony at a hearing on global security threats.

If the trends in Iraq aren't reversed "we assess that the security situation will continue to deteriorate at a rate comparable to the latter half of 2006," McConnell said.

Maples said insurgent attacks reached an average of 180 per day last month, equal to the previous high in October 2006.

"I think the Iraqi political leaders have close to impossible tasks: one, the sectarian violence on the one hand; and, two, pressure to have progress," McConnell said.

Later, in response to a question, he revised the statement to say the Iraqi leaders face a "very difficult task."

McConnell cited achievements in Iraq, including efforts by Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to bridge sectarian divisions and an increase in the number and quality of Iraqi security forces.

He said a rapid withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq would lead to an increase in sectarian violence and intensify Sunni resistance to the Shiite-dominated government.

Bush Administration To Join Iraqi-led Talks Attended By Iran, Syria (MCT)

By Warren P. Strobel, Jonathan S. Landay And Renee Schoof

McClatchy Newspapers, February 28, 2007

WASHINGTON - In a softening of its refusal to pursue direct diplomacy with two Middle East adversaries, the Bush administration announced Tuesday that it will participate in a series of international meetings on Iraq that will include representatives of Iran and Syria.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice announced the talks with Iraq and its neighbors as a "a new diplomatic offensive." She said she hoped that Iran and Syria would "seize the opportunity to improve their relations with Iraq - and to work for peace and stability in the region."

But her announcement at a hearing of the Senate Appropriations Committee - amid signs that the Iraqi army has failed to send the troops it promised to Baghdad - appeared to fall short of calls from Congress and the bipartisan Iraq Study Group to open direct negotiations with Tehran and Damascus.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., called the talks a "first step," but said, "It is not enough on its own."

The White House has accused Tehran of developing nuclear weapons, Damascus of trying to undermine Lebanon's government, and both governments of aiding anti-American forces in Iraq. Until now, it had refused high-level talks with either country.

DOJ_NMG_0137662

The first meeting is due to take place during the first half of March in Baghdad, hosted by the Iraqi government, and a second, in which Rice herself might participate, is tentatively set for April.

Meanwhile, top U.S. intelligence officials disclosed that the deployment of Iraqi forces into Baghdad under President Bush's new plan to stabilize Iraq is running behind schedule and that all of the units sent so far have arrived under strength, some by more than half.

Top military officials, speaking at the same hearing with Rice, gave a mixed review on the early implementation of the plan, which is aimed at ending carnage in the capital between Shiites and Sunni Muslims.

Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said the Iraqi military was "good for the most part," but uneven. "The Iraqi military is coming on very well," he said, adding that the soldiers should be able to replace U.S. troops by late 2007. "We should have significant turnover this year," he said.

Defense Secretary Robert Gates testified that the Pentagon would send Congress a confidential report on the Iraqi military later this week. "I am watching to see how the Iraqis perform," he said. "So far, so good."

The plan, which Bush announced last month, calls for the deployment of an extra 17,500 American troops to Baghdad, along with thousands of additional Iraqi security forces. The Iraqis are to play the leading role in suppressing the violence and ending forced evictions, most of which are against minority Sunnis by militias linked to Shiite parties in the U.S.-backed coalition government.

But retired Vice Adm. John McConnell, the director of national intelligence, and Army Lt. Gen. Michael Maples, the head of the Defense Intelligence Agency, told the Senate Armed Services Committee in a separate hearing that the Iraqi army sent to Baghdad only two of the three additional brigades that were to have been in place by Feb. 15.

An Iraqi brigade is supposed to have 3,200 men.

"One of the problems was having fully manned units when they arrived in Baghdad," McConnell said. "A work in progress is how best to describe it. It's not there yet."

It was McConnell's first time testifying before a congressional committee since he became the nation's top intelligence officer on Feb. 13.

Maples, the military's top intelligence official, said that the strength of the Iraqi battalions that comprise the two brigades range from 43 percent to 82 percent.

The numbers were the most concise manpower figures that the U.S. military has given for the additional Iraqi units sent to Baghdad.

McConnell said one reason for the Iraqi shortfalls is that typically 25 percent of an Iraqi army unit is away on leave or on some other assignment. But U.S. and Iraqi officials also have cited high desertion rates as a serious problem.

On the positive side, McConnell said that Iraqi forces have begun taking leading roles in some parts of Baghdad, although he didn't specify which areas.

Several lawmakers expressed deep concern over the prospects for success for Bush's plan, including Sen. John Warner, R-Va.

"I do not see evidence, strong evidence, that the Iraqi forces are measuring up in any amount to what the president laid down," he said.

The new diplomatic steps evoked skepticism from both sides of the aisle as well. Reid said in a statement that the decision to begin talks with Iran and Syria "should have been made long ago."

"Today's announcement is a first step, but it is not enough on its own. Our national security requires a robust diplomatic effort in the Middle East, and the Bush administration cannot again settle for mere half measures," he said.

Sen. Lamar Alexander, R-Tenn., said Bush shouldn't have taken so long to organize a diplomatic push.

"I think he missed an opportunity ... to increase popular support for a long-term U.S. interest in Iraq."

Car Bomb Near Soccer Field Kills 16 Children, 2 Women In Ramadi (WP)

By Ernesto Londoño

The Washington Post, February 28, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 27 -- Sixteen children playing soccer and two women were killed Monday in a car bombing in the western Iraqi city of Ramadi, an Iraqi official said Tuesday, in an attack that Iraqi leaders decried as horrific.

The bomb, hidden under wood panels loaded on a Kia pickup truck, exploded in a residential area near a soccer field where the children were playing, according to Col. Tariq al-Alwani, the security supervisor in Anbar province.

"It's a tragedy that the kids are targeted," the colonel said. "The kids we consider as a message to the world." He said news of the bombing had emerged a day late because most reporters have left Ramadi out of concern for their safety.

DOJ_NMG_0137663

The offices of President Jalal Talabani, who is hospitalized in Amman, Jordan, and Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, condemned the bombing. Maliki blamed "criminal gangs" for the "crime against children in their innocent playgrounds," the Los Angeles Times reported.

Ramadi, capital of Anbar province, is a stronghold of the Sunni insurgent group Al-Qaeda in Iraq. More than a quarter of the U.S. troops killed in Iraq have died in Anbar, where President Bush is sending 4,000 additional Marines as part of a temporary increase of U.S. forces in the country.

Nearly 24 hours after the car bombing, another explosion shook the city when U.S. troops sought to destroy 15 bags of seized explosives. U.S. military officials said they misjudged the strength of the explosives, which they detonated Tuesday evening inside the courtyard of an empty building, and the resulting blast injured at least 30 civilians, among them nine children and seven women.

None of the injuries were life-threatening, said Lt. Col. Josslyn Aberle, a military spokeswoman. Eight people were taken to medical facilities and the rest were treated at the scene, she said.

In Baghdad, U.S. and Iraqi forces continued implementing a security plan to pacify the capital, the second such effort in half a year. In a pre-dawn raid in the sprawling Shiite district of Sadr City, U.S. and Iraqi soldiers detained 16 leaders of the Mahdi Army, a powerful Shiite militia controlled by anti-American cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, the U.S. military said in a statement.

The military said the detained militia leaders "direct and perpetrate sectarian murder, torture and kidnapping."

Abdul Razzaq al-Nedawi, a Sadr aide, said that the detentions were unjustified and that the operation appeared to be an attempt to provoke the Mahdi Army, which has lain low since stricter security measures went into effect in Baghdad this month.

"The occupation forces want to drag Sadr [supporters] into war," Nedawi said.

Sadr criticized the plan in a statement on Sunday. "The security plan will not be good if it is controlled and ruled by our enemies, the occupiers," the statement said. The Shiite-led government of Prime Minister Maliki, whom Sadr has supported, has been criticized for failing to crack down on Shiite militias.

Lt. Gen. Raymond T. Odierno, the second-ranking U.S. general in Iraq, provided a cautiously optimistic assessment Tuesday of the first two weeks of the security plan, citing what he described as a decline in sectarian killings.

"Although we see some initial progress, we know the enemies we face will continue to attempt to disrupt the goals of the government by conducting attacks against innocent civilians," he said.

Odierno also said all the 21,500 additional troops who are part of the Bush administration's temporary increase will be in Iraq by May.

Also Tuesday, the U.S. military reported that four service members had been killed in two incidents. Three soldiers were killed by a roadside bomb Tuesday while conducting a route clearance mission southwest of Baghdad.

The fourth soldier was killed Monday night near the city of Diwaniyah, south of Baghdad. The soldier's Humvee struck an improvised explosive device.

The U.S. military also announced that a specialist has been convicted of negligent homicide for killing a soldier in June while cleaning his weapon. Spec. Daniel E. Turner was sentenced to 15 months' confinement and a bad conduct discharge.

Iraq Bombers Target Ice Cream Shop, Restaurants (LAT)

By Tina Susman

The Los Angeles Times, February 28, 2007

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- Two weeks after a new U.S.-Iraqi security crackdown was launched here, bombers struck popular public gathering spots ranging from an ice cream parlor to a kebab shop Tuesday, causing at least eight deaths.

Police in the capital also reported discovering the bodies of 31 men who had been shot to death, apparent victims of Shiite death squads. And the U.S. military reported the deaths of five more American troops.

Rage and frustration in Baghdad over the continuing bloodshed was accompanied by a sense of confusion over an afternoon incident in Ramadi, where officials said a bomb explosion at a soccer field killed 18 children ranging in age from about 6 to 12 years old.

The reports, which could not be independently verified, led quickly to angry statements by officials including Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who denounced the "crime against children in their innocent playgrounds" and blamed "criminal gangs."

Other reports, however, raised questions over whether anyone was killed in the Sunni-dominated city in Anbar province on Tuesday.

The U.S. military said it set off a controlled explosion in Ramadi in the afternoon that went awry, sending shrapnel and glass flying and injuring 31 people, including several children.

None of the injuries was life-threatening, said Lt. Col. Josslyn Aberle, a military spokeswoman.

DOJ_NMG_0137664

"I know there are reports children were killed out there. Those are incorrect," Aberle said, adding that the military had no reports of any other blasts in Ramadi.

Whatever the case in Ramadi, attacks continue relentlessly across Iraq despite the launching Feb. 13 of the new security plan, with the deadliest striking benign civilian targets and bearing the hallmark of Sunni insurgents.

In the past week, bombers have hit a college campus, a Sunni mosque whose imam had spoken out against the insurgency, and a government building where the Shiite vice president, Adel Abdul-Mahdi, was due to speak.

The vice president escaped with minor injuries Monday, but the attacks, in addition to the slew of bombings Tuesday, have left some Iraqis despairing of the government's ability to provide adequate security.

Iraqi officials are portraying the bloodshed as a last gasp by militants trying to derail the plan, which aims to put thousands more troops on the streets of Baghdad and in neighboring Anbar province.

"It is expected that they would try to intensify their activities to abort the plan and make people say the plan is a failure," said Sami Askari, a Shiite lawmaker, who blamed the violence on Sunni radicals. "It is unrealistic to achieve a goal like controlling Baghdad over a short period of time. The terrorist groups will try with all their arsenal of weapons and explosives to make the plan fail."

Those words, however, were no comfort to Iraqis caught up in the bloodshed.

"Every place is now becoming dangerous," said Muaataz Jawad, a Shiite college student who survived a bombing at his university Sunday and who worked with the Iraqi commission that helped organize national elections in 2005.

"It was dangerous and we were the target of snipers, but I was enthusiastic at that time. I regret it now," he said Tuesday of his election work. "I am not seeing any achievements, only traffic jams and more explosions."

Haidar Muhamed, a Shiite shopkeeper who works near the scene of one of Tuesday's attacks in Baghdad, was not as pessimistic but said he did not expect to see much change anytime soon.

"I still have faith in the government, but many times they give promises that they cannot fulfill," he said. "The plan has some deficiencies, but I think it will succeed eventually."

The attacks in Baghdad began at about 1 p.m. when a bomb exploded outside the Faris chicken restaurant in Karada, a mainly Shiite neighborhood. At least two people died, four were injured, and several cars parked nearby were damaged.

In the next couple of hours, six more people died in bomb blasts targeting crowded public spots, including the Abu Ali restaurant in downtown Baghdad. Police said the bomber came into the restaurant to eat lunch and left behind a plastic sack containing the deadly explosives. Three people died there, and 13 were injured.

Three more people were killed when a suicide car bomber struck near an ice cream shop in the Karada neighborhood, and two people died when mortar shells landed in a mixed Sunni-Shiite neighborhood south of Baghdad.

In Mosul, north of Baghdad, a car bomb exploded outside a police station, killing six police officers. In Khaldiya, about 50 miles west of Baghdad in Anbar province, a mortar attack in a market killed eight people.

The 31 bodies found in Baghdad shot execution-style was the highest number in the past two weeks, according to a tally kept by the Los Angeles Times and based on police and morgue reports. The toll suggested a possible resurgence of death squad activity as Sunni Arab bombing attacks persist.

Sunnis accuse the al-Maliki government of not doing enough to control Shiite militias and say the new security plan is focusing on Sunni neighborhoods while Shiite strongholds such as Sadr City are largely left alone. Iraqi police, backed by U.S. troops, apparently sought to counter that accusation with a predawn raid in Sadr City that brought angry protests from residents whose homes were searched.

Also Tuesday, police in Diwaniya, south of Baghdad, announced the arrests of 157 more suspected members of a Shiite cult whose followers had planned to attack the country's leading Shiite clergy last month in the belief it would hasten the dawn of a new age.

According to authorities, at least 263 members of the group, known as Heaven's Army or the Soldiers of Heaven, were killed in a fierce firefight with U.S. and Iraqi forces who got wind of the plot to attack religious leaders on Ashura, one of the holiest days on the Shiite calendar. This year, Ashura fell on Jan. 29, and the battle occurred over a period of about 24 hours in the firefight between the holy city of Najaf and Diwaniya.

Iraqi officials say the group's leader claimed to be a revered Shiite saint who would usher in a better world. He was killed in the fighting. Since then, police have continued to round up dozens of his alleged followers.

Times staff writers Saif Hameed and Raheem Salman, special correspondent Saad Fakhrildeen in Najaf, and special correspondents in Ramadi, Baghdad and Hillah contributed to this report.

Coming Soon, Maybe: An Iraqi Oil Law (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0137665

New York Times, February 28, 2007

It would be a big step forward if Iraq actually approved and carried out long-promised and never-delivered legislation equitably sharing the nation's oil revenues among all Iraqis. Unfortunately, the draft oil agreement approved by Iraq's cabinet on Monday is still a long way from that.

There are a host of political hurdles that must be overcome and no assurance that Iraq's Shiites and Kurds — who dominate the Parliament and happen to sit on most of Iraq's known reserves — are suddenly willing to share the wealth equitably with Iraq's Sunnis.

There's little surprise that the White House is trying to claim the draft oil law as progress. There is no other good news to report: no security from the security sweep in Baghdad, no visible movement to purge the Iraqi police of sectarian death squads and no effort by Washington to impose benchmarks on Iraq's leaders for achieving national unity. Washington is also not about to point to the bombing of a government office in Baghdad on Monday that wounded an Iraqi vice president and a cabinet minister, or the truck bombing outside a mosque in Falluja that killed 36 people on Saturday.

In a bow to the reality of a splintering Iraq, the administration says it is now ready to sit down with Iraq's neighbors, including Iran and Syria. That, too, is a long overdue step. We hope that American officials will use the meeting to explore ways of containing this mushrooming sectarian violence, not to engage in more accusations and posturing.

But the most important steps need to be taken by the Iraqi government itself. Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki and his cabinet need to take responsibility for unifying a nation torn apart by decades of dictatorship and insurgency, rather than further inflaming those divisions by exacting vengeance on the formerly dominant Sunni Arab minority. The security forces have to be purged of sectarian fighters bent on revenge and transformed into national forces committed to protecting all Iraqis.

And oil, Iraq's principal resource, must be equitably shared without regard to geography, religion or ethnic group. An oil law should be one of the benchmarks Washington insists on as a condition of continued support. Cabinet agreement on a preliminary draft may be the only good news out of Iraq this week. But it isn't nearly enough.

Iran, Syria May Join Baghdad Talks (AP)

By Brian Murphy

AP, February 28, 2007

Envoys from the West and Islamic nations — including Iran, Syria and the United States — are expected to attend a conference next month on efforts to stabilize Iraq, a diplomatic adviser said Tuesday.

The meeting, planned for mid-March in the Iraqi capital, is an attempt by the U.S.-backed government to seek greater regional assistance in fighting insurgents and addressing tensions between Iraq's majority Shiite Muslims and Sunnis.

Some nations had expressed reservations about taking part in the conference because of security worries and political sensitivities. Some of Iraq's Sunni neighbors are wary about being seen as lending too much support to the Shiite-led government.

But Labed Abbawi, an adviser to Iraqi Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari, said "there has been positive responses" from nearly all the nations and groups invited, which include Iraq's neighbors, the Arab League and the five permanent U.N. Security Council members.

"We believe all will attend," he said. No date has been set.

In Washington, White House deputy press secretary Dana Perino said the U.S. "would attend" a regional conference if invited. Abbawi said that the United States was among those asked to take part.

Perino said Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice would be "a logical attendee," but said she could not announce anything on Rice's behalf.

"Everyone in the region and interested parties has an interest and a stake in making sure that Iraq can become a thriving democracy," said Perino.

The gathering could offer a forum for Washington to amplify its concerns about Iranian involvement in Iraq. U.S. officials claim Shiite militia receive a steady flow of arms and aid from Iran, including parts for lethal roadside bombs used against U.S. troops. Iran denies the charges.

The United States also has complained that Syria is not doing enough to block aid routes for Sunni insurgents, including the group al-Qaida in Iraq.

U.S. Joins Regional Talks To Secure Iraq (AP)

By Robert Burns

AP, February 28, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0137666

In a diplomatic turnabout, the Bush administration will join an Iraq-sponsored "neighbors meeting" with Iran and Syria, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Tuesday.

It marked a change of approach by the United States, which has resisted calls by members of Congress and by a bipartisan Iraq review group to include Iran and Syria in talks designed to stabilize Iraq.

The move came amid growing discontent over the war, even as President Bush rushes an additional 21,500 U.S. troops to Iraq and congressional Democrats struggle to settle on their next steps to end U.S. participation.

The administration said its decision to take part in the Iraq conference did not represent a change of heart, although the White House has accused both Iran and Syria of deadly meddling in the war. "We've always been inclined to participate in an Iraqi-led conference," White House counselor Dan Bartlett said.

The administration in recent weeks has increased its criticism of Iran's role in Iraq, charging it with supplying advanced technologies for the most lethal form of roadside bombs. The administration has accused Syria of harboring anti-Iraqi government forces and allowing weapons to cross its border.

Rice announced U.S. support for the Iraq meeting, to be held in Baghdad next month, at a Senate hearing in which Democrats pressed her and Defense Secretary Robert Gates to explain what progress is being made in the Baghdad security crackdown and how soon U.S. troops will be coming home.

"There is no end, I say, no end in sight," exclaimed Sen. Robert Byrd, D-W.Va., the Appropriations Committee chairman. He decried the spending of $10 billion a month in Iraq and Afghanistan amid raging sectarian and insurgent violence.

Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., asked Gates to predict how soon Iraq would be stabilized.

"The honest answer to your question is: 'I don't know,'" Gates replied. He noted that Gen. David Petraeus had arrived in Baghdad as the new commander of U.S. forces and that Petraeus believes by early summer he will have a good idea of how the new Baghdad security plan, now getting under way, will work out.

Noting recent speculation about U.S. military action to destroy neighboring Iran's nuclear facilities, Byrd asked Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, whether it was true that the Pentagon was planning airstrikes against Iran.

"It is not true," Pace replied.

"Categorically?" Byrd pressed.

"Categorically, sir," Pace said.

Separately, Democrats' plans to limit Bush's war authority and force a change of course in Iraq were faltering amid party divisions over how quickly and aggressively they should act.

Officials said Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., and other anti-war Democrats balked Tuesday at a draft measure that had circulated in recent days with the blessing of the leadership. The proposal would have repealed the 2002 law that authorized Bush to invade Iraq, and given the White House a goal of March 2008 to remove all combat troops from the country except for those carrying out limited missions.

"I will not vote for anything that the president could read as an authorization for continuing with a large military campaign in Iraq," Feingold said in a statement after a closed-door meeting. "Deauthorizing the president's failed Iraq policy may be an appropriate next step if done right, but the ultimate goal needs to be using our constitutionally granted power of the purse to bring this catastrophe to an end."

Other Democrats said there was general agreement among the rank and file on legislation that would limit the mission of troops remaining in Iraq, but there was no consensus on a means for accomplishing that goal.

Meanwhile, House Democratic leaders are backing away from a proposal to scale back U.S. involvement in Iraq by withholding money for the war effort.

Rice, in announcing the "neighbors meeting" on Iraq, said a wide range of interested countries were being invited. She said it was the Iraqi government's initiative to ask Iran and Syria.

"We hope that all governments will seize this opportunity to improve their relations with Iraq and to work for peace and stability in the region," Rice said.

Her announcement was welcomed by Democrats and Republicans alike.

"Today's announcement is a first step, but it is not enough on its own," said Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid. "Our national security requires a robust diplomatic effort in the Middle East, and the Bush administration cannot again settle for mere half measures."

The bipartisan Iraq Study Group in December recommended U.S. dialogue with Iran and Syria, but until now the administration has resisted that course. Former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, Republican co-chairman of the panel, welcomed the shift in a speech Tuesday night. But he went further, urging the administration to include Syria in Mideast peacemaking with Israel and the Palestinians.

DOJ_NMG_0137667

At the State Department, spokesman Sean McCormack said the agenda of the meeting would be set by the Iraqis.

"Security is clearly an important issue for the Iraqis. It's going to be at the top of the agenda," he said. "There are clearly issues that we have with respect to security in Iraq." He said roadside bombs, which are the leading killer of American troops and are in some cases linked to Iran, are "certainly at the top of our list."

McCormack said the Iraq meeting would not include any formal U.S.-Iran negotiations on Iran's nuclear program, but he did not rule out informal discussions. The Bush administration says Iran's nuclear program is aimed at developing nuclear weapons, but Tehran says it is for new sources of energy.

A U.N. Security Council deadline for Tehran to suspend uranium enrichment has just expired, and in response the U.S. wants the council to expand the limited sanctions the world body has imposed on Iran.

The Iraqi government announced in Baghdad that it was preparing the meeting for mid-March, and that invitees include members of the Arab League and the five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council — the U.S., Britain, France, China and Russia.

A second meeting involving the countries' foreign ministers — which administration officials said Rice would attend — would also be held, perhaps as soon as early April.

U.S. To Sit Down With Syria, Iran For Regional Conference On Iraq (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, February 28, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration said Tuesday that it will join Iran and Syria at a meeting of Iraq's "neighbors" next month — and it did not rule out one-on-one talks with either country.

The meeting, organized by the Iraqi government and aimed at finding ways to stabilize Iraq, would put the United States at the table with countries President Bush has sought to isolate.

"The Iraqi government has invited Syria and Iran to attend. … We hope these governments seize this opportunity to improve their relations with Iraq — and to work for peace and stability in the region," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told the Senate Appropriations Committee.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said the move was consistent with the administration's position that it would talk with Iran and Syria if discussions were confined to Iraq. Critics of the administration's policies called it a change of course.

The move comes as the administration is pushing for tougher United Nations sanctions on Iran for refusing to halt its nuclear program.

The administration has resisted calls for broader dialogue with Iran and Syria, which it says are prime sponsors of terrorism and are feeding instability in Iraq.

In December, a bipartisan panel reviewing U.S. options in Iraq urged the administration to open discussions with the two countries as part of an Iraq "support group " and also one-to-one.

James Baker, the former secretary of State who headed the commission, said that the administration's announcement was "a move in the right direction."

In a Dec. 11 interview with Agence France-Presse, Rice suggested the United States was willing to talk about Iraq. "In the context of Iraq's neighbors and the international community, if Syria and Iran come to the table responsibly, ready to support Iraqi efforts with their neighbors, we have no problem with that," she said.

McCormack said administration officials wanted Iraq to take the lead organizing a regional conference but saw inviting Iran and Syria as "an interesting and good idea."

Zalmay Khalilzad, the departing U.S. ambassador to Iraq, will represent the United States.

McCormack said he could not "exclude the possibility" of conversations between U.S. and Iranian officials on the sidelines.

Critics of Bush's handling of Iraq said the move represents a new direction. Democratic Sen. Joseph Biden, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said in a statement, "The administration is right to reverse itself."

Ray Takeyh, an Iran expert at the Council on Foreign Relations, said, "I think the Americans are looking to cave" and begin talks without insisting that Iran give up its uranium enrichment program.

The United States and Iran have had no diplomatic relations since 1980 but held secret discussions about Afghanistan, al-Qaeda and Iraq from 2001 to 2003.

The Iraq conference "is one way some kind of engagement can take place without either side losing face," said Trita Parsi, president of the National Iranian American Council, a group advocating U.S. dialogue with Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0137668

Earlier this month, the administration softened its stance toward North Korea, agreeing to provide oil and other aid if that country freezes its nuclear program.

U.S. Will Join Talks With Iran And Syria (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, February 28, 2007

The United States agreed yesterday to join high-level talks with Iran and Syria on the future of Iraq, an abrupt shift in policy that opens the door to diplomatic dealings the White House had shunned in recent months despite mounting criticism.

The move was announced by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice in testimony on Capitol Hill, after Iraq said it had invited neighboring states, the United States and other nations to a pair of regional conferences.

"I would note that the Iraqi government has invited all of its neighbors, including Syria and Iran, to attend both of these regional meetings," Rice told the Senate Appropriations Committee. "We hope that all governments will seize this opportunity to improve the relations with Iraq and to work for peace and stability in the region."

The first meeting, at the ambassadorial level, will be held next month. Then Rice herself will sit down at the table with the foreign ministers from Damascus and Tehran at a second meeting in April elsewhere in the region, possibly in Istanbul.

The Iraq Study Group, the bipartisan panel whose recommendations were largely ignored by the administration, had recommended such a regional meeting in its December report. Rice and other administration officials emphasized, however, that these conferences would be led and organized by the Iraqi government and not, as the study group suggested, the United States. Still, Democrats seized on the announcement as a long-overdue change in direction by the administration.

"Better late than never," said Leon E. Panetta, a onetime White House chief of staff who served on the panel, headed by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former congressman Lee H. Hamilton. He said that the announcement was "an important step in trying to bring stability to Iraq" and that, combined with the recent nuclear agreement with North Korea and renewed efforts by Rice to promote Israeli-Palestinian peace, "the administration is finally recognizing that part of its arsenal is strong diplomacy."

In a statement, Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, said: "The administration is right to reverse itself and engage Iran and Syria on Iraq. Right now they're a big part of the problem, but they have an interest in becoming part of the solution to prevent chaos in Iraq."

Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has long advocated a regional conference, though originally it was meant to include only Iraq's neighbors. The administration decided in recent weeks to attend the conference, but in an effort to avoid the spotlight it ensured that it will be joined at the table in March by other permanent members of the U.N. Security Council, U.S. officials said. The foreign ministers meeting in April will be further expanded to include representatives of the Group of Eight industrialized countries.

It was decided "relatively recently" to include the permanent Security Council members, and the G-8 was invited "as of last night," a senior administration official said. Rice's announcement appeared intended to assuage congressional concerns about the administration's Iraq policy, which have threatened to derail passage of a nearly $100 billion supplemental spending request for Iraq.

Administration officials noted that former secretary of state Colin L. Powell attended a regional conference on Iraq in 2004, where at one point he found himself seated next to the Iranian foreign minister and made idle chitchat. But that meeting took place in a different context, before Iran had started uranium enrichment and before Syria was implicated in the killing of a Lebanese political figure -- two reasons frequently cited by the administration for limited diplomatic engagement with Tehran and Damascus.

"The only reason to talk to us would be to extract a price, and that's not diplomacy, that's extortion," Rice told Der Spiegel, a German magazine, when asked last month about the international conference promoted by the Iraq Study Group.

Since the start of the year, in fact, Rice has rhetorically divided the region between "mainstream" actors, such as Saudi Arabia and Egypt, and "extremists" such as Iran and Syria. She suggested that rather than draw out Iran and Syria through diplomacy, the United States would seek to isolate them unless they changed their behavior on their own.

"We do have a regional approach," Rice told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in January. "It is to work with those governments that share our view of where the Middle East should be going." She argued at the time that "the problem here is not a lack of engagement with Syrians but a lack of action by Syria. . . . If the government in Tehran wants to help stabilize the region -- as it now claims -- then it should end its support for violent extremists."

Yesterday, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack repeatedly declined to rule out the possibility of bilateral discussions between Rice and her Iranian and Syrian counterparts, except to note that the dispute over Iran's nuclear program is already being handled on a separate diplomatic track. "I'm not going to exclude any particular interaction at this point . . . on issues that are important to us, but the focus will be on Iraq," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0137669

"Security is clearly an important issue for the Iraqis. It's going to be at the top of the agenda," McCormack added. Roadside bombs "are certainly at the top of our list," he said. "This isn't, however, our meeting." U.S. officials have charged that Iranian agents are suspected of supplying the devices -- aimed at armored vehicles -- to militias in Iraq.

Retired Vice Adm. John M. McConnell, the new director of national intelligence, appearing before the Senate Armed Services Committee, said yesterday that while Iran is contributing weapons to Iraqi militias that "raises the cost to the United States" of its fighting in Iraq, he did not see "any direct linkage from Iran dictating events inside Iraq."

Iraq Calls For Two Regional Summits (FT)

By Steve Negus

Financial Times, February 28, 2007

Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state, on Tuesday welcomed a diplomatic initiative by the Iraqi government to call at least two international conferences on its future that would provide an opportunity for the US to tackle its disputes with Iran and Syria over the Iraqi insurgency.

“We hope that all governments will seize this opportunity to improve the relations with Iraq and to work for peace and stability in the region,” Ms Rice told a Senate hearing.

US officials did not exclude the possibility of bilateral discussions with Iran on the subject of Iraq, but would refuse to discuss the nuclear issue, where the US insists that Iran first suspend its nuclear fuel programme. At previous conferences called by the international community on Iraq, Ms Rice and Colin Powell, her predecessor, avoided direct meetings with their Iranian counterparts in Brussels and Egypt.

“In the conduct of diplomacy, you need to have a certain amount of flexibility if you are going to achieve the goals that you want to achieve,” Sean McCormack, State Department spokesman, told reporters.

The first conference is planned to be held in Baghdad at the level of ambassadors in mid-March, bringing together Iraq and its neighbours and the five permanent members of the United Nations Security Council.

A second meeting, to be attended by foreign ministers is scheduled for April outside Iraq. The Bush administration accuses Iran’s Revolutionary Guards of supplying weapons and explosives to Iraqi Shia militia. Syria has also been accused of destabilising Iraq by allowing Sunni insurgents to cross its border. Robert Gates, defence secretary, yesterday said it was “categorically” untrue that the US was preparing to launch air strikes against Iran.

U.S. Set To Join Iran And Syria In Talks On Iraq (NYT)

By Helene Cooper And Kirk Semple

The New York Times, February 28, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 27 — American officials said Tuesday that they had agreed to hold the highest-level contact with the Iranian authorities in more than two years as part of an international meeting on Iraq.

The discussions, scheduled for the next two months, are expected to include Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and her Iranian and Syrian counterparts.

The announcement, first made in Baghdad and confirmed by Ms. Rice, that the United States would take part in two sets of meetings among Iraq and its neighbors, including Syria and Iran, is a shift in President Bush’s avoidance of high-level contacts with the governments in Damascus and, especially, Tehran.

Critics of the administration have long said that it should do more to engage its regional rivals on a host of issues, including the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and Lebanon. That was the position of the Iraq Study Group, the high level commission that last year urged direct, unconditional talks that would include Iran and Syria.

While the newly scheduled meetings may not include direct negotiations between the United States and Iran, and are to focus strictly on stabilizing Iraq rather than other disputes, they could crack open a door to a diplomatic channel.

Iraqi officials had been pushing for such a meeting for several months, but Bush administration officials refused until the Iraqi government reached agreement on pressing domestic matters, including guidelines for nationwide distribution of oil revenue and foreign investment in the country’s immense oil industry, administration officials said. The new government of Iraq maintains regular ties with Iran.

“I would note that the Iraqi government has invited Syria and Iran to attend both of these regional meetings,” Ms. Rice told a Senate panel on Tuesday, in discussing the talks, which will include Britain, Russia, and a host of international organizations and Middle Eastern countries.

DOJ_NMG_0137670

The first meeting — which will include senior Bush administration officials like the State Department Iraq envoy David Satterfield, will be in Baghdad in the first half of March, administration officials said. In early April, Ms. Rice will attend a ministerial level conference, presumably with her Iranian and Syrian counterparts, which will likely be somewhere else in the region, administration officials said.

A year ago, Iranian and American officials announced a planned meeting between the American ambassador to Baghdad and Iranian officials to help stabilize Iraq but the meeting never occurred.

The Iraqi foreign minister, Hoshyar Zebari, called America's anticipated face-to-face contact with Iran and Syria — two countries that the Bush administration has accused of destabilizing Iraq — "very significant."

"Iraq is becoming a divisive issue in the region," Mr. Zebari said in a telephone interview from Denmark, where he is traveling on business. But, he continued, "Iraq can be helpful to its neighbors also. It can provide a platform for them to work out their differences."

The United States has accused Iran of meddling in Iraq, including shipping lethal weapons to Shiite militias in Iraq which the Bush administration says have been used in attacks against American troops.

The new United States intelligence chief, Mike McConnell, told a Senate committee on Tuesday that Iran was training anti-American Iraqi Shiites at sites in Lebanon and Iran to use armor-piercing weapons against American troops. Mr. McConnell said it was "probable" that top Iranian leaders, including Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, were aware that weapons had been supplied by Iran.

A State Department spokesman, Sean McCormack, said the Iranian-made weapons would be "certainly at the top of our list" in the meetings.

The issue of whether the United States should talk to Iran and Syria has been a steady drumbeat in Washington for several months. When the Iraq Study Group raised it in December, it was quickly brushed off by Mr. Bush, who instead embarked on the more confrontational approach.

In addition to the accusations of Iranian meddling in Iraq, the United States has also been confronting Iran over its nuclear program, which Bush administration officials say is aimed at developing nuclear weapons, a charge that Tehran denies. Vice President Dick Cheney said last week that "all options are still on the table" for Washington to prevent Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons, a comment that has heightened fears that the administration is considering attacking Iran's nuclear sites.

Administration officials characterized the conflicting signals as part of a larger diplomatic strategy for dealing with Iran that verges on a high-level game of chicken. One senior administration official said that while some Bush officials have advocated looking for ways to talk to Iran and Syria, they did not want to appear to be talking to either country from a position of weakness. By ratcheting up the confrontational talk, the administration official said, the United States was in more of a driver's seat. He asked that his name not be used because he was not authorized to speak publicly about the issue.

"We became convinced that the Iranians were not taking us seriously," said Philip D. Zelikow, who until December was the top aide to Ms. Rice. "So we've done some things to get them to take us seriously, so now we can try diplomacy."

Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the majority leader, called the announcement a "first step, but it is not enough on its own."

"Our national security requires a robust diplomatic effort in the Middle East, and the Bush administration cannot again settle for mere half measures," he said.

Still, administration officials made it clear that, at least for now, any engagement would be limited to talks about Iraq, and not larger issues like Iran's nuclear program.

The United States broke off diplomatic relations with Iran after the 1979 Islamist revolution and the storming of the American Embassy in Tehran. America still has diplomatic relations with Syria, including a chargé d'affaires at the American Embassy in Damascus.

Ms. Rice and her deputies have, for several months, pointed to an international conference on Iraq that was established after the American invasion as an available channel to talk to Iran and Syria. Administration officials were working with the United Nations and the Iraqi government last fall to set up the next meeting of the conference, which is sometimes called the International Compact on Iraq. But American officials put off the meeting in part to press the Iraqi government to pass the oil law, administration officials said. The Iraqi government approved a draft of the law on Monday.

As of now, Ms. Rice has announced no plans to hold separate one-on-one talks with her Iranian counterpart, Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki, at the planned April meeting.

In 2004, the first meeting of the International Compact on Iraq, held in the Egyptian resort of Sharm El Sheik, opened with chatter about whether then-Secretary of State Colin L. Powell would hold direct talks with his Iranian counterpart, Kamal Kharrazi.

Mr. Powell and Mr. Kharrazi did not hold a formal session. But the Egyptian hosts of the meeting made the two talk to each other, by seating them side-by-side at dinner. Afterward, an annoyed Mr. Powell said that he and Mr. Kharrazi stuck to polite diplomatic chitchat, discussing subjects like reconstruction after the earthquake in Bam, Iran, and avoiding sensitive topics like the disagreement over Iran's nuclear program.

DOJ_NMG_0137671

U.S. To Enter Iraq Talks With Iran, Syria (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr. And Jay Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, February 28, 2007

WASHINGTON -- As criticism mounts over its Middle East policies, the Bush administration has agreed to join in regional talks with Iran and Syria over Iraq, while leaving to the margins the delicate questions of Iran's nuclear program and Syria's role in Lebanon.

The Bush administration's decision to join in the talks next month, which are being launched by the Iraqi government, shows how U.S. officials are now striving to become more engaged in the region diplomatically, whether in Lebanon or the Palestinian territories. It also represents a growing recognition among administration officials that the U.S. needs regional help to stabilize Iraq, even as the U.S. boosts its troop presence there.

• The Issue: The U.S. agrees to join regional talks on Iraq that will include Iran and Syria, amid growing criticism of the Bush administration's unwillingness to engage Mideast players.

• The Background: The White House has shunned the two Iraqi neighbors, accusing both of supporting insurgents and insisting that Iran retreat from its nuclear ambitions.

• The Bottom Line: The move signals growing recognition by administration officials that the U.S. needs regional help to stabilize Iraq, even as it sends more troops.

Two weeks after helping reach a deal to curb North Korea's nuclear program through regional talks, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and other administration officials are eager to commence a similar process with Iran, to tackle pressing issues like its alleged pursuit of nuclear weapons. But it remains unclear whether broader talks with Iran will take place, as the U.S. and United Nations Security Council insist it first agree to suspend its uranium work. Tehran has rejected such a precondition.

Ms. Rice's announcement came as many Arab leaders say they see some positive trends emerging in the region, despite the continuing carnage in Iraq. In Lebanon, attempts by the Iranian-backed Shiite militia and political party, Hezbollah, to overthrow the government of Prime Minister Fuad Siniora have waned. Last month, Saudi Arabia brokered the creation of a unity government in the Palestinian territories between Iranian-funded Hamas and Fatah, in a bid to avert civil war and kick-start a new round of Arab-Israeli peace talks.

Arab diplomats tie these developments to Saudi Arabia's recent diplomatic offensive, largely aimed at preventing the spread of Iraq's Sunni-Shiite violence across the region. In addition, they said, Tehran is taking a more conciliatory stance toward its Middle East neighbors, in part because of threats by the U.S., Saudi Arabia and other regional allies to try and contain its growing influence in the region.

Ms. Rice hailed the planned regional gathering as "a new diplomatic initiative." She said the administration's willingness to join in the talks shows it has a wide-ranging strategy on Iraq. "So far from just a military campaign, our efforts in Iraq are moving forward on all fronts at the same time: security, political, economic and diplomatic," she told a Senate panel yesterday.

But she and others cautioned that the U.S. didn't envision the session as a pretext to engage directly with Iran or Syria on issues beyond Iraq. State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said the U.S. wasn't excluding "any particular interaction at this point, in that forum, at the regional level, on issues that are important to us, but the focus will be on Iraq." Other U.S. officials said it was possible that U.S. officials could talk with Iranian or Syrian officials at the gathering, but only on ways to bring order to Iraq.

Ms. Rice's announcement before the Senate Appropriations Committee of U.S. participation appeared designed to ease the way for passage this spring of emergency funding for the Iraq war and related State Department operations in Iraq.

Sen. Arlen Specter (R., Pa.), one of seven Republicans who broke with the White House on a recent vote over its Iraq strategy, praised the decision.

He told Ms. Rice that it was "very important" because of the "the widespread sentiment in Congress that a resolution of the Iraq issue will require diplomacy."

The summit will be held initially at a subministerial level in Baghdad. If the first session goes well, the U.S. has agreed to attend a higher-level session, also hosted by Iraq, which would include the foreign ministers of these countries as well as of Japan, Canada, Italy and Germany.

The Iraqi government is eager to win support among neighboring states to help clamp down on insurgent groups and ease the deepening rift between the country's Sunni and Shiite factions. U.S. officials said they hope that the forum will help persuade

DOJ_NMG_0137672

Iran to stem the flow of weapons into Iraq. The U.S. has repeatedly accused Iran in recent weeks of aiding the sectarian violence in Iraq and providing particularly lethal explosive devices to Iraqi militias and militant groups. Iran has denied these allegations.

Washington's decision to join the meeting comes nearly three months after the Iraq Study Group, a bipartisan panel headed by former Secretary of State James Baker and former Rep. Lee Hamilton, recommended just such a session. The administration has ignored many of the panel's recommendations, including, up to now, the suggestion to hold talks with Iran and Syria. Prominent members of Congress from both parties have also urged the administration to sit down with Iran and Syria.

The U.S. and other Security Council members have just begun weighing a new resolution to impose another series of sanctions on Iran over its nuclear program.

Many Arab diplomats would like the U.S. to directly engage Iran in talks, while maintaining financial, military and diplomatic pressure aimed at containing its regional and nuclear ambitions. "Steps need to be taken to prevent the perfect political storm engulfing the Middle East," said one senior Arab diplomat in Washington. "What's needed is a more composite approach" involving diplomacy and coercion, he said.

U.S. To Attend Talks With Iraq, Neighbors (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, February 28, 2007

The United States said yesterday it would attend a pair of Iraqi-sponsored regional conferences in Baghdad over the next two months that will also be attended by archfoes Syria and Iran.

The meetings, called by the government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, would be a sharp break with the Bush administration's past refusal to engage with Syria and Iran over the troubled Iraq conflict and growing regional tensions. The U.S. government accuses both of Iraq's neighbors of fueling insurgent violence against U.S. and Iraqi forces.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, scheduled to attend the second meeting in April with other regional foreign ministers, told a Senate hearing yesterday that Iraq was organizing the meeting and deciding whom to invite.

"We hope [Iran and Syria] seize this opportunity to improve their relations with Iraq -- and to work for peace and stability in the region," she said.

An Iraqi government spokesman said yesterday that Syria has confirmed it will participate in the first meeting, tentatively set for March 10 and 11.

There was no immediate comment from Iran, and U.S. officials insisted yesterday that the diplomatic drive to halt Tehran's nuclear programs would not be on the table in the Iraq meetings.

The meeting was billed as an opportunity to deal exclusively with Iraq's deteriorating security situation. Iraqi officials said they plan a preliminary gathering of lower-level envoys from all of the major Middle East powers, the United States and the four other permanent U.N. Security Council powers, and regional organizations such as the Arab League.

Miss Rice and other foreign ministers would then gather in April for a follow-up meeting, at a place still to be determined. The second meeting would also include the four G-8 countries not invited to the March meeting -- Canada, Italy, Germany and Japan.

Sami al-Askari, a spokesman for Mr. al-Maliki, told reporters in Baghdad, "We will ask all our neighboring countries to stop interfering in Iraqi affairs and to put pressure on armed groups with whom they have links to end the violence."

He singled out Iran and Syria, but also Saudi Arabia, a strong U.S. ally.

U.S. officials stressed yesterday that the meeting was an Iraqi initiative. President Bush in December had rejected a similar proposal from the bipartisan Iraq Study Group headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton, Indiana Democrat.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack would not rule out bilateral meetings between U.S. officials and their Syrian and Iranian counterparts in Baghdad. While Iraq is setting the agenda, he said the United States wants to discuss issues of security for U.S. troops in Iraq, particularly the threat from roadside bombs.

"I'm sure that there are going to be different kinds of discussions, meaning different groupings," Mr. McCormack said. "I'm not going to exclude any particular interaction at this point."

It is expected that outgoing U.S. Ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad or his successor, Ryan Crocker, would represent the United States at the March meeting.

Even if direct contacts are limited, Syria can claim a diplomatic victory in attending the forum as an equal partner with Washington, according to University of Oklahoma Syrian scholar Joshua Landis. The Bush administration has spurned repeated requests by Syria for high-level direct talks.

DOJ_NMG_0137673

The meetings come as U.S. and Iraqi forces have begun a major security push in Baghdad. U.S.-led forces yesterday conducted raids in the largely Shi'ite Sadr City slum, targeting death squads that have been killing Sunnis.

Violence continued to plague the country, with three U.S. soldiers reported killed by a roadside bomb in Baghdad and a fourth U.S. soldier killed in fighting in the town of Diwaniyah, 80 miles south of Baghdad.

And U.S. and Iraqi officials were trying to sort out confusing accounts of an explosion at a popular soccer field in the city of Ramadi, which killed 18 women and children. The U.S. military had conducted a "controlled detonation" of a weapons cache in the area, but U.S. officials said they think the explosion was not linked to the soccer-field bombing.

U.S. To Join Iran, Syria In Iraq Talks (LAT)

By Paul Richter

The Los Angeles Times, February 28, 2007

WASHINGTON — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Tuesday that the United States would join high-level talks on Iraq with the country's neighbors, including Iran and Syria, in a move that may signal a new U.S. willingness to expand diplomacy with two adversaries.

U.S. officials said the negotiations could open the way to a broader dialogue with two nations the Bush administration has refused to meet one-on-one except under limited circumstances, but they also gave carefully couched responses to questions about how far Washington would be willing to go.

Asked about the U.S. refusal to negotiate with Iran about its nuclear program unless Tehran first suspends uranium enrichment, Sean McCormack, the chief State Department spokesman, told reporters, "Those conditions remain."

At the same time, he and others appeared to be trying to leave open the door to talks on other subjects of mutual interest. "I'm not going to try to predict what the course of those diplomatic interactions might be," McCormack said.

Another U.S. official said that though it seemed unlikely that bilateral talks would grow out of the meetings, "we're not going to rule anything out."

"Our diplomats need a certain amount of flexibility to do their work," said the official, who declined to be identified because of the sensitivity of the issues.

Administration officials do not want to cede any diplomatic advantage to Syria and Iran through talks, but they say they believe the two countries are in a position to help the beleaguered Baghdad government. They also may have concluded that appearing more enthusiastic about such diplomacy could ease criticism from the Democrats who control Congress.

Rice announced the U.S. participation in the talks while appearing before a Senate committee, and described it as part of a new "diplomatic offensive." She noted that many lawmakers and the advisory study group headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.) had urged a regional approach to dealing with Iraq's problems.

"This is one of the key findings, of course, of the Iraq Study Group, and it is an important dimension that many in the … Congress have brought to our attention," Rice said. "We've listened, and I want you to know that."

The Iraqi government, which is organizing the event, plans one working-level meeting in Baghdad in March, and a second elsewhere in the region in April, which Rice is expected to attend. All five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council will be invited, as will other world powers, officials said. The meetings will focus on the challenges facing the war-torn country.

Rice's announcement that Washington would take part came as the Bush administration encounters mounting criticism for its hard-line stance toward Iran. President Bush has sent warships near Iran, is deploying the Air Force along the Iran-Iraq border and repeatedly has accused Tehran of supplying Iraqi militias with weapons used against U.S. troops. At the same time, administration officials have denied that they are preparing to attack Iran, although congressional critics are demanding to know more about White House plans.

U.S. officials, starting with Bush, have long argued that direct one-on-one negotiations with Iran and Syria would be unproductive, and could benefit only Tehran and Damascus unless those two governments changed their behavior. That stance has brought the administration criticism from both political parties, foreign governments and Washington's foreign policy establishment.

The issue has also produced splits within the administration. Some officials, including many in the State Department, have contended that the United States, even while holding a firm line, should talk to Syria and Iran. Others, in the Pentagon and White House, have argued that bilateral negotiations would hand the diplomatic advantage to the adversary.

But officials have also said for years that they were willing to meet with Iran and Syria as part of a group to work out the security, economic and political problems facing Iraq. Indeed, they have met repeatedly with representatives of the two governments in different forums since the invasion of Iraq nearly four years ago.

DOJ_NMG_0137674

They met with representatives of Iran and Syria in New York in September, for example, to discuss aid to Iraq. In November 2004, then-Secretary of State Colin L. Powell sat next to Iran's foreign minister at a regional meeting in Egypt.

Rice's announcement brought positive reaction from lawmakers who have been trying to push the administration toward more dialogue.

"I hope this means that clearer heads in the administration are beginning to prevail," said Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

The first, working-level session of the new talks will include "envoys," such as U.S. Ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad and Rice's senior Iraq advisor, David Satterfield. The second meeting is to include foreign ministers of all the countries present for the first session, plus those of the G-8 group of largest industrial nations. That meeting probably will be held outside of Iraq because of the dangerous environment in Baghdad, officials said.

The agenda has not yet been set, but the Iraqi government has been pressing its neighbors to try to cut off the flow of arms, militants and money across its borders; as a result, the discussion could lead to an exchange of views on U.S. claims that Iran has been sending sophisticated explosive devices to Iraq.

Iraq has also been pushing its neighbors to provide more economic aid, and to fulfill pledges of aid that have been ignored for years. By including world powers in the discussion, the Iraqis may hope to bring in more aid as well as expertise from new sources.

Baghdad has also been eager for increased political and diplomatic support from its neighbors. Several do not have embassies or ambassadors in the country. Some Sunni Arab governments believe that Iraq has been captured by a Shiite bloc and seek to limit contacts with it, Iraqi officials complain.

Though some U.S. officials have high hopes for the meeting, they acknowledge that the Iranians and Syrians may not participate vigorously, as has been the case at several meetings the Iraqis have organized, a U.S. official said.

Iraqi leaders face a delicate task in handling neighboring Iran, at various times a cultural, political and military patron to many of the former exile groups running Iraq. Isolated from the rest of the Middle East, Iraqis have come to depend on Iran for trade and energy. Iran's non-energy exports to Iraq totaled $1.3 billion since last March, the Iran-Iraq Chamber of Commerce announced this week.

Iraq is eager to convince other neighbors, such as Syria, Saudi Arabia and Jordan, that they have a stake in the country's future.

Shiite and Kurdish leaders of Iraq long have advocated a regional conference to bolster diplomatic support for the fledgling government. Many Iraqi officials have suggested that all the tools that have been used to bring about an end to recent civil wars in various nations should be brought to bear to halt Iraq's sectarian violence. That includes international conferences such as the 1995 talks in Dayton, Ohio, that brought about an end to the civil war in the former Yugoslavia.

Al-Qaeda Will Come Back To Haunt US If It Fails In Iraq: Rice (AFP)

AFP, February 28, 2007

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice warned a doubting US Congress Tuesday that Al-Qaeda will "come back to haunt us" if the United States does not pursue its effort to stabilize Iraq.

"I believe that everyday -- and I don't want to be hyperbolic but frankly every hour of every day -- there are Al-Qaeda forces ... that are trying to figure out how to attack us," Rice told a Senate panel.

"If they have a safe haven, a sophisticated and central place like Iraq, I believe strongly that that's going to enhance their capability to do so," she said.

Rice and Defense Secretary Robert Gates underwent a grilling Tuesday before the Senate Appropriations Committee which is considering Bush's request for an additional 99.6 billion dollars for the "global war on terrorism" -- including in Iraq and Afghanistan -- for the next six months.

The opposition-controlled Congress is considering several pieces of legislation designed to hasten a US pullout from Iraq nearly four years after President George W. Bush ordered the invasion of that country to topple Saddam Hussein.

At Tuesday's hearing, Senators repeatedly questioned the government's rationale for remaining in Iraq amid sectarian violence that borders on civil war.

Rice responded that a "premature" US withdrawal from Iraq would allow Al-Qaeda elements active in the country to take advantage of the violent chaos that would ensue.

"If you were to get the kind of instability in the region that might come from an Iraq that was unstable and unable to control its borders, unable to control its relationships with its neighbors," she said, it would create "a kind of breeding ground for the kind of terrorism that would come back to haunt us here at home".

DOJ_NMG_0137675

"I think the link between the maturation of of Al-Qaeda in the center of the Middle East and our own security is clear, because Al-Qaeda is obviously the greatest threat to our homeland," she said.

Making Nice With Iraq's Neighbors (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 28, 2007

IN WHAT AMOUNTS TO a welcome about-face for the Bush administration, the United States will sit down next month to discuss Iraqi security with Iran and Syria. The discussions, called by the Iraqi government and to be held in Baghdad, also will include Britain, Russia and other Middle Eastern countries. They will mark the first time U.S. diplomats have engaged their Syrian or Iranian counterparts in three years.

President Bush has been under increasing pressure to drop his refusal to talk to these adversaries, pressure that mounted with the release of the Iraq Study Group report in December. As group Co-Chairman James A. Baker III and others have repeatedly noted, Washington engaged the Soviet "evil empire" during the Cold War and these negotiations were no sign of U.S. weakness.

The Baghdad talks will hardly amount to high-powered summitry, though Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will be attending a subsequent ministerial gathering elsewhere in the region. The Bush administration has been arguing that Iran is sending weapons and agents into Iraq, so it makes sense to have a forum in which to raise and resolve these concerns. It's fair to assume that the discussions with Tehran, much like the ongoing low-grade hostility between U.S. troops and Iranian agents, will initially be confined to Iraq. That is not necessarily a bad thing, especially if some basic understandings, and a reservoir of trust, can be established.

The administration clearly has little choice but to engage Iraq's neighbors on security. Especially now that the U.S. military is recommitting troops to the battle for Baghdad and U.S. allies are pulling out of the country, there are insufficient coalition forces to protect the Iraqi border. And regardless of how the "surge" strategy plays out, any future reduction in U.S. forces in Iraq will be more palatable if the nation's borders are secure and its neighbors feel invested in Iraq's stability.

Bush and Rice also may have felt that this was a good time to announce talks without appearing weak, given broader developments in the Persian Gulf region. Events within Iraq may not be going well, but the U.S. Navy has been flexing its muscles in the region. Moreover, U.S. diplomacy has helped to win a U.N. Security Council resolution denouncing Iran's nuclear program, and Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad appears to be in some political trouble with the ruling mullahs in Tehran, partly because of his perceived recklessness.

This would seem, then, a good time to explore whether Tehran might become a more constructive partner in bringing about stability in neighboring Iraq — a stability that would be in its own self-interest, after all. And such a development could lead to a constructive dialogue on other issues. There would be no harm in finding out.

Taliban Say Attack Aimed At Cheney (FT)

By Aunohita Mojumdar, Farhan Bokhari And Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, February 28, 2007

Dick Cheney, the US vice-president, was on Tuesday rushed to a bomb shelter in Afghanistan after a suicide attack on the Bagram air force base where he was staying killed more than 20 people.

The Taliban claimed responsibility for the bombing outside Bagram base about 60km from the capital, Kabul, which claimed the lives of one US soldier, a South Korean soldier and a number of Afghans.

Mullah Hayat Khan, a -Taliban spokesman, told [a news agency] the attack was aimed at Mr Cheney. While his arrival on Monday was shrouded in secrecy, some experts questioned whether a one-day delay in meeting Hamid Karzai, the Afghan president, because of inclement weather had provoked a security breach. The White House said it could not confirm whether the Taliban had targeted Mr Cheney.

“I think it was about 10am this morning, I heard a loud boom,” Mr Cheney told reporters travelling with him to Afghanistan.

“They clearly try to find ways to question the authority of the central government,” said Mr Cheney. “Striking at Bagram with a suicide bomber, I suppose, is one way to do that. But it shouldn’t affect our behaviour at all.”

Mr Cheney was visiting Afghanistan to discuss the declining security situation in the country with Mr Karzai. The attack on the heavily fortified base underscored the growing strength of the Taliban, who are expected to wage a tough campaign against the US and Nato allies this spring.

Military officials stressed that a high level of security had been maintained and that Mr Cheney, who was inside the military compound when the attack happened, was never in danger.

DOJ_NMG_0137676

“Our security measures were in place and the killer never had access to the base,” said Lieutenant Colonel James Bonner, the Bagram base commander.

Mr Cheney came to Afghanistan from Pakistan where he met General Pervez Musharraf, the president. Mr Cheney went ahead with meeting Mr Karzai on Tuesday despite the attack but no details were released of their discussions.

In Pakistan, Mr Cheney told Gen Musharraf that the US wanted him to do more to combat the growing havens for Taliban and al-Qaeda operatives in the tribal areas of Waziristan in north-west Pakistan, bordering Afghanistan. US officials have raised concerns that an agreement with tribal leaders, under which the Pakistani military pulled back, has let extremists regroup.

A US official said Washington realised Gen Musharraf was hampered in his ability to clamp down on extremism in the tribal areas, which have been ungoverned for several -decades.

But he said the recent number of US visitors to Pakistan, including Robert Gates, the defence secretary, were aimed at impressing on Gen Musharraf US concerns about a resurgent Taliban and al-Qaeda.

Michael McConnell, the new US director for national intelligence, on Tuesday told Congress that while Pakistan was co-operating in the “war on terror”, al-Qaeda had established a haven in the country. “Al-Qaeda...continue to maintain active connections and relationships that radiate outward from their leaders’ hideout in Pakistan to affiliates throughout the Middle East, northern Africa and Europe,” said Mr McConnell.

The US has increased its focus on Afghanistan as concerns grow that the coalition has started to lose ground. The US and UK have increased troop levels and are calling on other Nato allies to both step up involvement and ease their rules of engagement to provide greater combat ability.

Meanwhile, analysts said Gen Musharraf faced an increasing challenge as he braved the fall-out from the toughest message delivered by the US this week, urging him to intensify his hunt for members of al-Qaeda.

Pakistani officials acknowledged that Mr Cheney had delivered a firm message.

Cheney Escapes Harm In Blast (WT/AP)

By Alisa Tang

The Washington Times, February 28, 2007

BAGRAM, Afghanistan -- A suicide bomber attacked the entrance to the main U.S. military base in Afghanistan yesterday during a visit by Vice President Dick Cheney, killing up to 23 persons and wounding 20.

Mr. Cheney was not hurt in the attack, but was close enough to hear the explosion. Reporters covering his visit saw the resulting plume of smoke.

The Taliban claimed responsibility and said it was attempting to kill the vice president.

It was the closest that militants have come to a top U.S. official visiting Afghanistan. At least one U.S. soldier, an American contractor and a South Korean soldier were among the dead, NATO said.

Mr. Cheney said the attackers were trying "to find ways to question the authority of the central government."

About two hours after the blast, Mr. Cheney left on a military flight for Kabul to meet with President Hamid Karzai and other officials, then left Afghanistan.

The vice president had spent the night at the sprawling Bagram air base, ate breakfast with the troops, and met with Army Maj. Gen. David Rodriguez, the commander of U.S. troops in Afghanistan.

He was preparing to leave for a meeting with Mr. Karzai when the suicide bomber struck about 10 a.m. U.S. military officials declared a Red Alert at the base.

"I heard a loud boom," Mr. Cheney told reporters. "The Secret Service came in and told me there had been an attack on the main gate."

He said he was moved "for a brief period of time" to a bomb shelter on the base near his quarters. "As the situation settled down and they had a better sense of what was going on, I went back to my room," Mr. Cheney added.

Asked whether the Taliban were trying to send a message with the attack, Mr. Cheney said: "I think they clearly try to find ways to question the authority of the central government.

"Striking at Bagram with a suicide bomber, I suppose, is one way to do that," he said. "But it shouldn't affect our behavior at all."

Maj. William Mitchell said the explosion did not appear to be intended as a threat to Mr. Cheney. "He wasn't near the site of the explosion," Maj. Mitchell said. "He was safely within the base at the time of the explosion."

Death toll reports were conflicting. Mr. Karzai's office said 23 persons were killed, including 20 Afghan workers at the base. Another 20 persons were injured, it said.

DOJ_NMG_0137677

NATO's International Security Assistance Force said initial reports were that three persons were killed, including a U.S. soldier, an American contractor and a South Korean soldier. U.S. officials indicated that they planned to update that death toll.

Associated Press reporters at the scene saw 12 bodies being carried in black body bags and wooden coffins from the base entrance into a market area where hundreds of Afghans had gathered to mourn.

Friends and relatives cried and moaned as they took the bodies away from the base. Two men came to the base entrance crying and wringing their hands, one of them screaming, "My brother."

A message posted on a Web site used by militants said "a mujahid ... carried out a suicide attack in front of the second gate of the Bagram Air Base. ... The target was Bush's vice president, Dick Cheney."

A purported Taliban spokesman, Qari Yousef Ahmadi, said Mr. Cheney was the target of the attack, which Mr. Ahmadi said was carried out by an Afghan called Mullah Abdul Rahim, of Logar province.

"We knew that Dick Cheney would be staying inside the base," Mr. Ahmadi told AP by telephone from an undisclosed location. "The attacker was trying to reach Cheney."

Cheney, Karzai Discuss 'Problems From Pakistan' (USAT)

By Paul Wiseman

USA Today, February 28, 2007

KABUL, Afghanistan — Vice President Cheney left Afghanistan on Tuesday after talks on how to crush the threat posed by Islamic militants, a danger dramatized by a suicide bombing outside the U.S. air base Cheney was visiting.

Cheney met with President Hamid Karzai in Kabul before heading back to the USA via the Persian Gulf state of Oman.

During their private, hour-long meeting, Cheney and Karzai spoke about the "problems coming from Pakistan," according to an Afghan government official who spoke to the Associated Press on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the matter. The United States has accused Pakistan of not doing enough to stop militants from crossing its border into Afghanistan.

On Monday, Cheney had a four-hour discussion with Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf about beefing up border security.

Musharraf's office said Cheney called for Pakistan to crack down on al-Qaeda forces regrouping in tribal areas along the border with Afghanistan. It said he also asked for help combating a possible offensive this spring by the Taliban, the radical Islamic group that was removed from power by a U.S.-led invasion in 2001.

The Taliban said it carried out the suicide attack outside the main gate of Bagram Air Base to target Cheney. The Afghan government said 23 people were killed, including 20 Afghan workers at the base. NATO put the deaths at nine, including a U.S. soldier, a U.S. contractor and a South Korean soldier.

VIDEO: Taliban calls it an assassination attempt

Cheney was about a mile from the blast. "I heard a loud boom," he told reporters accompanying him.

The U.S. military doubted the target was Cheney. The bomber walked into a group of Afghans outside the base and did not approach U.S.-manned checkpoints.

"To characterize this as a direct attempt on the life of the vice president is absurd," said Lt. Col. David Accetta, a U.S. military spokesman.

Taliban attacks have increased during the past year as the U.S.-led coalition has been moving closer to the militants' safe zones in southern Afghanistan.

Although the advances have resulted in the death or capture of hundreds of Taliban fighters, the Pentagon has said it expects a major attempt in the spring to damage the Karzai regime.

The United States wants Pakistan to help undercut the possible Taliban spring offensive.

"Cheney is believed to have delivered a tougher message to Musharraf than ever before," said former Pakistani diplomat Husain Haqqani, now director of Boston University's Center for International Relations. "The Bush administration is beginning to recognize that it has to combine some public pressure with its previous private remonstrations in dealing with Musharraf."

Seth Jones, a counterinsurgency specialist with the RAND Corp. think tank who recently visited Afghanistan, said the pressure has been growing in recent weeks as top U.S. officials — including Defense Secretary Robert Gates — have visited the region to assess the Taliban threat and its sanctuaries in Pakistan. "In my view, the failure to get a handle on the Taliban and al-Qaeda's sanctuary in Pakistan will cripple long-term efforts to stabilize and rebuild Afghanistan," Jones said.

A Mile From Cheney, Afghan Bomber Kills At Least 23 (NYT)

By Abdul Waheed Wafa And Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, February 28, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0137678

KABUL, Afghanistan, Feb. 27 — A suicide bomber blew himself up on Tuesday morning outside the gate of the United States air base near Kabul where Vice President Dick Cheney was staying, killing at least 23 people. The vice president heard the blast from a mile away.

The dead included two Americans, a soldier and a contractor; a South Korean soldier with the American-led coalition forces; a 12-year-old Afghan boy; and a group of Afghan laborers waiting to enter at the security gate, Afghan officials said. Twenty-three people were also wounded in the explosion.

A Taliban spokesman claimed responsibility, and said in a telephone call to [a] news agency that the attack had been aimed at Mr. Cheney.

But while the attack laid bare the rising insecurity in Afghanistan as American and NATO forces battle a growing Taliban insurgency, Afghan and American officials said it fell well short of a serious assassination attempt.

At the time of the blast, the vice president was in his room at the Bagram Air Base, where heavy snow had forced him to stay overnight after arriving from Pakistan, postponing a visit to the capital, Kabul, about 40 miles away.

Though Mr. Cheney's schedule has been tightly guarded, his arrival and delay at Bagram were well reported.

The attack — one of more than 100 suicide attacks in Afghanistan over the past year — could have been coincidental, or just as likely arranged quickly, for its propaganda value.

"At 10 a.m. I heard a loud boom," Mr. Cheney told reporters aboard Air Force Two en route to Oman, according to The Associated Press. "The Secret Service came in and told me there had been an attack on the main gate." Mr. Cheney was immediately moved to a bunker.

"I think they clearly try to find ways to question the authority of the central government," Mr. Cheney added. "Striking at Bagram with a suicide bomber, I suppose, is one way to do that. But it shouldn't affect our behavior at all."

A United States military spokesman Lt. Col. David Accetta, said the bomber did not try to get past any United States-staffed security checkpoints and instead walked into a group of Afghans outside the base and detonated himself.

"To characterize this as a direct attempt on the life of the vice president is absurd," he said, according to The A.P.

Bashir Salangi, the deputy governor of Parwan Province, who visited the scene, said that the bomber was carrying the explosives on his body and that at least 20 people were killed.

He said that 23 others were wounded, but that the exact number remained uncertain because of the extent of the carnage and because some of those wounded were taken into the base and some to nearby hospitals.

"I think the aim was just the crowd of people who were gathered for checking," Mr. Salangi said.

Most of the Afghan casualties were truck drivers and workers lining up to get into the base. American soldiers guard the gate and search the workers and vehicles before allowing them to enter. Scores of people are usually milling around the parking lot outside the main gate, where fuel and gravel trucks park as they wait to unload their cargo.

Hundreds of day workers pass through on foot to go to work on the base. The bomber is thought to have passed through Afghan security with them or aboard a fuel truck. The Bagram area, which suffered under Taliban rule, is not generally sympathetic to the Taliban, but there have been attacks there, and Afghan intelligence broke a cell of bombers from the area last year, suggesting that the Taliban and its allies have sought to infiltrate the area.

After the explosion, Mr. Cheney flew to Kabul by helicopter to meet with President Hamid Karzai at midday Tuesday. The two men met alone for an hour before joining a larger gathering for lunch.

Mr. Cheney arrived in Afghanistan after meeting on Monday with Gen. Pervez Musharraf, the president of Pakistan. He pressed the Pakistani leader to do more to prevent Al Qaeda from regrouping in Pakistani's tribal areas and to prevent the Taliban from using the border areas as a sanctuary to carry out attacks in Afghanistan.

In Afghanistan, he praised the nation's progress, and voiced continued support for Mr. Karzai's government and specifically for its help in fighting terrorism and strengthening security and reconstruction in the country, according to an Afghan government statement.

"His visit showed that the United States is being more serious and demanding of Pakistan to put an end to terrorist resources and sanctuaries and to stop border crossing," said an Afghan government official, who asked not to be identified because of the critical nature of his remarks. "This is what the Afghan government has been repeatedly asking and demanding from Pakistan."

He added: "His visit was very important. Now the United States realizes that peace will not come to Afghanistan unless Pakistan starts the real fight against terrorists."

Bombing Near Cheney Displays Boldness Of Resurgent Taliban (WP)

By Griff Witte

DOJ_NMG_0137679

The Washington Post, February 28, 2007

Vice President Cheney was inside the main U.S. air base in Afghanistan yesterday when a suicide bomber detonated his explosives just outside the gates, killing as many as 23 people and showcasing insurgents' growing capabilities in advance of a widely expected spring offensive.

Within hours, a purported Taliban spokesman asserted responsibility for the attack -- which killed a U.S. soldier and an American civilian contractor -- and said it was an attempt to assassinate Cheney. U.S. officials disputed the assertion that Cheney was the target, noting that his overnight stay at the sprawling Bagram air base had been unplanned and that he was well away from the blast.

"I heard a loud boom," Cheney told reporters later. "The Secret Service came in and told me there had been an attack on the main gate."

The attack prompted military officials to issue a "red alert" at the base. Cheney was briefly moved to a bomb shelter, before being allowed to continue with his schedule.

Regardless of the intent, the attack demonstrated that insurgents in Afghanistan are becoming increasingly bold, willing to attack a heavily fortified U.S. target in the face of unusually tight security. Additionally, the assault was carried out in a part of the country where the Taliban has relatively little support. The Islamic militia's traditional stronghold has been in the south; Bagram is in the country's central region, about an hour's drive north of Kabul.

"It's pretty striking that they're capable of planning and executing an attack on Bagram on fairly short notice and under changing circumstances. We haven't seen anything like this before," said Daniel Markey, a senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations who until last month worked on South Asia policy at the State Department. "Psychologically, this has to be seen as a serious blow."

Markey said the attack is also an ominous sign with the approach of spring, which is usually accompanied by a heavy escalation in violence as conditions for fighting improve. "Everyone agrees on both sides that this is going to be a bad spring," he said.

Until 18 months ago, suicide bombings had been a rarity in Afghanistan, despite more than two decades of war. Recently, however, they have become a favored tactic of insurgents who are trying to undermine the weak pro-Western government in Kabul and force NATO troops to leave.

Last year, there were 139 suicide attacks in Afghanistan, five times as many as in 2005. The shift in tactics has prompted concern that the Taliban, which lost power after a U.S.-led invasion in 2001, is adopting the methods of insurgents in Iraq.

"This attack is a reflection of their new capabilities, which they've developed in the last year or two through their connections with the transnational extremists," said Ali Ahmad Jalali, former interior minister of Afghanistan. "This will boost morale and will help them to recruit more fighters. This is the kind of violence that can have a major psychological impact."

Asked whether Taliban fighters were sending a message, Cheney indicated they were. "I think they clearly try to find ways to question the authority of the central government," he said. "Striking at Bagram with a suicide bomber, I suppose, is one way to do that. But it shouldn't affect our behavior at all."

The Bush administration has become increasingly concerned by the violence in Afghanistan, and Cheney's previously unannounced stops in Pakistan and Afghanistan during a trip to Asia were intended to signal the White House's commitment to countering insurgents there.

Meeting with Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, in Islamabad on Monday, Cheney pushed the leader to do more to crack down on Taliban and al-Qaeda activity in semiautonomous frontier region. Afghan officials have blamed Pakistan for allowing the Taliban a haven to plan and train for attacks in Afghanistan. U.S. officials had long defended Pakistan as a valuable ally, but intelligence reports that al-Qaeda is reconstituting itself in Pakistan have prompted U.S. officials in recent months to publicly question whether Musharraf is doing all he can.

Following the meeting with Musharraf, Cheney flew to Bagram late Monday. He stayed at the base overnight because a storm delayed his meeting in Kabul with Afghan President Hamid Karzai until yesterday morning. The delay was reported publicly Monday night.

Just before 10 a.m. yesterday, a suicide bomber driving a Toyota Corolla made it through a gate at the air base manned by Afghan police officers, according to Gen. Salem Ihsas, the police chief in Parwan province, where Bagram is located.

The assailant detonated his explosives before he was able to make it through a second gate, which is manned by U.S. personnel. Ihsas said that 19 people were killed in the blast and that 15 were wounded, mostly Afghan laborers who had reported for work at the base. Other estimates from Afghan officials put the death toll slightly higher, while U.S. authorities said nine people had been killed and 21 injured.

U.S. military officials said the bomber was on foot and did not get as close to the base as Ihsas suggested.

DOJ_NMG_0137680

Ihsas said preliminary reports indicated the bomber was not Afghan but declined to say where he was from. "Once we are done with the investigation, we will know exactly," he said.

The dead in yesterday's blast included a South Korean soldier. South Korea is part of the 37-nation NATO-led International Security Assistance Force, which is responsible for security throughout Afghanistan.

The United States and Britain -- the two largest contributors of troops in Afghanistan -- both recently announced they would be increasing their force levels, with the U.S. total climbing to 27,000.

About 5,100 U.S. troops, plus 4,000 other coalition personnel and contractors, are stationed at the air base at Bagram.

Afghan Bombing Sends A Danger Signal To U.S. (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, February 28, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 27 — The audacity of a suicide-bomb attack on Tuesday at the gates of the main American base in Afghanistan during a visit by Vice President Dick Cheney underscores why President Bush sent him there — a deepening American concern that the Taliban and Al Qaeda are resurgent.

American officials insisted that the importance of the attack, by a single suicide bomber who blew himself up a mile away from where the vice president was staying, was primarily symbolic. It was more successful at grabbing headlines and filling television screens with a scene of carnage than at getting anywhere near Mr. Cheney.

But the strike nonetheless demonstrated that Al Qaeda and the Taliban appear stronger and more emboldened in the region than at any time since the American invasion of the country five years ago, and since the Bush administration claimed to have decimated much of their middle management. And it fed directly into the debate over who is to blame.

The leaders with whom Mr. Cheney met on his mission to Pakistan and Afghanistan have appeared increasingly incapable of controlling the chaos, and have pointed fingers at one another.

Mr. Cheney said the attack was a reminder that terrorists seek “to question the authority of the central government,” and argued that it underscored the need for a renewed American effort.

His critics, on the other hand, said the strike was another reminder of how Iraq had diverted the Bush administration from finishing the job in Afghanistan.

The blast Mr. Cheney said he heard from his quarters deep inside Bagram Air Base took a terrible toll. At least 23 people were killed, including an American soldier and an American contractor, along with a South Korean soldier. [Page A9.]

About 20 Afghans died, including a 12-year-old boy. An additional two dozen or so were wounded.

By Tuesday evening, long after Mr. Cheney wrapped up his visit and headed home to the United States, it remained unclear whether the suicide bomber had known that Mr. Cheney was on the base at the time of the attack. One military official at United States Central Command, which oversees operations in Afghanistan, said he strongly believed that the bomber was unaware of Mr. Cheney’s presence.

In Washington, American officials said their intelligence had detected no specific threat against Mr. Cheney, whose entry into Afghanistan had been kept secret after an equally clandestine visit to Pakistan on Monday.

But word of his presence in Afghanistan leaked out on Monday after a snowstorm delayed his meeting with President Hamid Karzai, and Mr. Cheney decided to stay at Bagram Air Base overnight. That fact was widely reported on Internet sites and on radio programs that have significant audiences in Afghanistan. It was possible that the attack outside the gate at Bagram was arranged quickly, or redirected to the air base from another target.

The attack, which occurred between the perimeter of the base and the first American checkpoint, occurred at 10 a.m. Tuesday. An administration official said an initial American review had found that the attack “doesn’t look, at first pass, like something that was carefully planned out.”

The bomber appeared to have made his way past an Afghan-guarded gate. But American military officials in Afghanistan said the suicide bomber detonated his weapon before he got to the first United States checkpoint, at a point where fuel trucks and vehicles carrying other goods park outside the gates to await inspection before being sent in.

Master Sergeant Chris Fletcher, a spokesman for the military operation in Afghanistan, said in a telephone interview that the bomber “did not penetrate the outer ring of security.”

That account suggested that the security around the base had kept the bloodshed of an Afghanistan under attack by both Taliban and Qaeda forces outside the high walls of the base, the hub of American military activity in the country.

But it also suggested a widening spiral of insecurity in Afghanistan, which had nearly 140 suicide bombings last year, including in Kabul, making the conflict and tactics here increasingly reminiscent of the chaotic struggle in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0137681

Critics have charged that the Iraq war has precluded the United States from sending sufficient forces to Afghanistan. Concerned about a spring Taliban offensive, the United States has increased its force in Afghanistan to about 26,000. More than 20,000 troops from other NATO nations are also deployed there.

The scenes that Mr. Cheney flew over on his way in and out of Bagram — the devastation outside the gate and the bombed-out landscape of Kabul — was a reminder of how far the reality of Afghanistan is from the goals that President Bush set just short of five years ago, in a speech at the Virginia Military Institute. At the time, Mr. Bush repeatedly invoked the memory of Gen. George C. Marshall, the man behind the reconstruction that followed World War II, in expressing confidence that a "stable government" and a "national army" would help to achieve peace in Afghanistan.

But in testimony on Tuesday in front of the Senate armed services committee, the new director of national intelligence, Mike McConnell, painted a grim picture of what he called a "pivotal year for Afghanistan," in which the country's leaders would have to "confront pervasive drug cultivation and trafficking, and, with NATO and the United States, arrest the resurgence of the Taliban."

Mr. Cheney's mission was to figure out how to bolster the Afghan president, Hamid Karzai, and the NATO force, and to try to ease an openly hostile relationship between Mr. Karzai and another American ally, Gen. Pervez Musharraf of Pakistan. Mr. Karzai has argued that many of the attacks in Afghanistan have been launched from Pakistan. Mr. Musharraf has said Mr. Karzai is looking for a scapegoat.

Mr. McConnell's assessment was grim: "Long-term prospects for eliminating the Taliban threat appear dim, so long as the sanctuary remains in Pakistan, and there are no encouraging signs that Pakistan is eliminating it. ''

Cheney OK After Afghan Suicide Bombing (CHIT)

By Mark Silva And Bay Fang

Chicago Tribune, February 27, 2007

KABUL, Afghanistan -- A suicide bombing within earshot of Vice President Dick Cheney at the gate of Bagram Air Base underscored concerns Tuesday about the resurgence of Taliban militants and other Islamic radicals in Afghanistan—the very reason for Cheney's visit.

U.S. officials dismissed a Web site claim by the Taliban that Cheney was the target of the bombing, which killed a U.S. soldier, an American contractor and as many as 21 others. The explosion occurred about a mile across the base from the vice president, who was unhurt after briefly being escorted to a bomb shelter.

But the fact that the bomber could get so close to the base while the vice president was present raised questions about the Afghan government's control of the security situation and whether the insurgency has improved its ability to stage such attacks on the verge of its expected "spring offensive."

Cheney, in Afghanistan to reassure the government of President Hamid Karzai of U.S. support, said the attack was part of the insurgents' efforts to challenge Karzai. And he asserted that talk in the U.S. of withdrawing American forces from Iraq only emboldens terrorists in the region.

"I think they [the Taliban] clearly try to find ways to question the authority of the central government," Cheney said during a brief interview in a luxury cabin mounted in the cargo bay of his C-17 military transport.

"Striking at the Bagram base with a suicide bomber, I suppose, is one way to do that," Cheney said. "It shouldn't affect our behavior."

Terrorism experts said if it is true that the Taliban sent the suicide bomber to target the base while Cheney was there, it could mark a worrisome expansion of their capabilities. It also raised a question of how insurgents might have known about Cheney's visit, which was not announced in advance.

"They must have only had a few hours' notice, since the trip was kept secret. This implies a pool of willing suicide bombers available at a moment's notice," said Peter Bergen, terrorism analyst and author of "The Osama bin Laden I Know: An Oral History of Al Qaeda's Leader."

The Taliban, a radical Islamic movement that was driven from power by a U.S.-led coalition after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, are becoming tactically more like the Al Qaeda terrorists they once sheltered, analysts said.

There were no suicide bombings in Afghanistan before 2001, when bombers disguised as Arab journalists assassinated a prominent anti-Taliban rebel, Ahmad Shah Massoud, leader of the so-called Northern Alliance. There were 27 suicide attacks in 2005 and 139 in 2006.

Seth Jones of the RAND Corp. said what amazes him is the speed with which the bombing was carried out. "It shows a very strong and well-developed infrastructure, that they could grab somebody, hand him to the handlers and carry it out in the time Cheney was there," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0137682

The new concerns dovetailed with testimony Tuesday in Washington about the resurgent threat from Islamic radicals in the rugged and largely lawless borderlands between Afghanistan and Pakistan. Both the U.S. and Britain plan to increase their troops in the region in anticipation of a Taliban offensive in coming weeks.

In comments before the Senate Armed Services Committee, Director of National Intelligence Michael McConnell said Pakistan "remains a major source of Islamic extremism and the home for some top terrorist leaders."

McConnell said that while U.S. forces have killed or captured about three-quarters of Al Qaeda's leadership, equally determined militants have replaced them. He said that U.S. officials believe top Al Qaeda leaders, including Osama bin Laden and Ayman al-Zawahiri, are trying to set up an operational base for training in northwestern Pakistan, in an area outside the control of the current government.

Another intelligence official said the Taliban resurgence is being fueled in part by increased opium production—something that the Taliban cracked down on when they controlled the country.

"They now are enmeshed with opium producers with … local power brokers," said Thomas Fingar, the deputy director of National Intelligence for Analysis. "The production and the sale of opium is a major source of revenue."

The suicide bombing occurred as Cheney awoke at the vast air base nestled in the mountains outside Kabul, where he had unexpectedly spent the night because poor weather extended his planned one-day visit to Afghanistan by another day. The overnight made him the most senior member of the Bush administration to spend a night in either the Iraq or Afghanistan war zones.

At the time of the attack, the vice president was secure and deep inside the base. But the bombing sent a plume of smoke rising beyond where his military cargo jet was parked and prepared to take him to a meeting with Karzai in Kabul later Tuesday before returning to the U.S.

Cheney said he heard a "loud boom" sitting in his room at the base. The Secret Service moved him to a nearby bomb shelter, he said, but returned him to his room when "the situation settled down."

A Web site used by Islamic militants posted a message Tuesday saying that a "holy warrior" carried out a suicide attack at Bagram. "The target was [President] Bush's vice president, Dick Cheney," the message said. Separately, a purported Taliban spokesman told The Associated Press that Cheney was the target.

But U.S. military officials in Afghanistan rejected the claims and said the vice president's life was never in danger. The base has 5,100 troops, and its security perimeter includes land mines, gun turrets and razor wire.

The bomber did not attempt to get through one of the base's security checkpoints, which are manned by U.S. troops. Instead, he appeared to walk into a group of truck drivers and other Afghans who worked at the base.

"To characterize this as a direct attempt on the life of the vice president is absurd," Lt. Col. David Accetta, a spokesman for U.S. forces, told AP.

A senior administration official traveling with Cheney said the Afghan president was "upbeat" in his hourlong meeting with the vice president at the fortified presidential palace in Kabul. Cheney arrived there in an armored motorcade that weaved through the concrete-and-sandbag barriers erected in slalom fashion leading toward the palace.

The official also dismissed reports that Cheney had been dispatched to Pakistan before coming to Afghanistan in order to "beat up" on Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf for not doing more to prevent the resurgence of the militants along the border.

"Not so," he said. The idea that Cheney would "go in and threaten someone is not valid."

Tribune correspondent Aamer Madhani contributed from Washington, and Bay Fang reported from Washington.

Taliban Says It Targeted Cheney (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes, Josh Meyer And Laura King

The Los Angeles Times, February 28, 2007

WASHINGTON — U.S. and Afghan officials are investigating whether Taliban fighters who have claimed responsibility for a suicide bombing Tuesday at Bagram air base were tipped off that Vice President Dick Cheney was visiting there.

Cheney, who was staying a mile from where the bomb exploded, was not injured in the attack at the gate of the sprawling base.

A U.S. soldier and a South Korean soldier were among those killed. Reports of the death toll varied, with the U.S. military saying nine people died and the Afghan government reporting 23 dead and 24 injured. An American contractor also was reported killed.

The attack came as concern is growing about the increasing ability of the resurgent Taliban and the tenuous stability of the U.S.-backed government in Afghanistan. The possibility that insurgents knew of a secret visit by a top U.S. official and were able to launch an attack would cast the conflict with the militant movement in a troubling new light.

DOJ_NMG_0137683

The Taliban claimed responsibility for the bombing. Mullah Hayat Khan, a Taliban commander, told [a] news agency that Cheney was the target.

Government and congressional officials expressed doubt that the Taliban could have learned of the vice president's presence on the base and devised an attack so quickly.

"At this point, it simply isn't clear that it was known that Cheney was there," said a U.S. intelligence official, who, like others, spoke on condition of anonymity in discussing the investigation.

American officials also suggested that the Taliban would have attempted a more aggressive attack had it known Cheney would be at Bagram, about 25 miles north of Kabul, the Afghan capital.

"If you were in the Taliban's sandals or shoes, wouldn't you have used rockets and mortars?" asked a second U.S. intelligence official. "If you knew that this thing was happening, that the vice president was going to be there at that time, couldn't you have just brought up 30 or 40 guys and a truck?"

Cheney told reporters traveling with him that he heard a "loud boom." After the explosion, he was briefly moved to a bomb shelter before returning to his quarters.

Cheney said he was not aware of the Taliban's claim of responsibility but said such attacks were aimed at undermining the Afghan government.

"I think they clearly try to find ways to question the authority of the central government," Cheney said. "Striking at Bagram with a suicide bomber, I suppose, is one way to do that, but it shouldn't affect our behavior at all."

Cheney, traveling with the CIA's No. 2 official, arrived at Bagram late Monday afternoon after talks with Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf in Islamabad.

Deputy CIA Director Stephen Kappes accompanied Cheney to Pakistan to ensure that the vice president "had all the current information" as he pressed Musharraf for greater cooperation in fighting Al Qaeda, Director of National Intelligence J. Michael McConnell said in Senate testimony Tuesday.

The stops in Islamabad and Kabul were unannounced for security reasons, and Cheney made no public statement or appearance in either capital. The suicide bombing occurred as the vice president was preparing for a meeting with Afghan President Hamid Karzai, which had been rescheduled because of weather.

The security situation in Afghanistan has been deteriorating over the last year. The number of suicide blasts nationwide rose to 140 in 2006 from 30 in 2005, and the number of roadside bombings grew to 1,600 from 780, military officials say.

Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman acknowledged that the Bagram blast was an "aggressive attack" and said military officials had not determined whether security had been breached.

The last time militants attacked Bagram's entrance was in July, when a roadside bomb exploded just outside the gate, said Sgt. James E. Wilt, a military spokesman in Afghanistan.

Security problems have arisen at the base before. Last year, The Times was able to purchase computer drives containing classified military information at local markets nearby. The drives had been stolen from the base.

White House Press Secretary Tony Snow said there were too few facts to be able speculate on what happened or how the attacker was able to get so close to the base.

Inside Politics (WT)

By Grep Pierce

The Washington Times, February 28, 2007

Gore's utility bills

Back home in Tennessee, safely ensconced in his suburban Nashville home, former Vice President Al Gore is no doubt basking in the Oscar awarded to "An Inconvenient Truth," the documentary he inspired and in which he starred. But a local free-market think tank is trying to make that very home emblematic of what it deems Mr. Gore's environmental hypocrisy, ABC News reports.

Armed with Mr. Gore's utility bills for the past two years, the Tennessee Center for Policy Research charged Monday that the gas and electric bills for the former vice president's 20-room home and pool house devoured nearly 221,000 kilowatt-hours last year, more than 20 times the national average of 10,656 kilowatt-hours.

"If this were any other person with $30,000-a-year in utility bills, I wouldn't care," says the center's 27-year-old president, Drew Johnson. "But he tells other people how to live, and he's not following his own rules."

Kalee Kreider, a spokeswoman for the Gores, did not dispute the center's figures, taken as they were from public records. But she pointed out that both Al and Tipper Gore work out of their home, and she argued that "the bottom line is that every family has a different carbon footprint. And what Vice President Gore has asked is for families to calculate that footprint and take steps to reduce and offset it."

DOJ_NMG_0137684

Bush's example

In contrast to Al Gore's profligate use of energy at his Tennessee mansion, President Bush's 4,000-square-foot house in Crawford, Texas, is "a model of environmental rectitude," according to a 2001 article by Rob Sullivan in the Chicago Tribune.

"Geothermal heat pumps located in a central closet circulate water through pipes buried 300 feet deep in the ground where the temperature is a constant 67 degrees; the water heats the house in the winter and cools it in the summer. Systems such as the one in this 'eco-friendly' dwelling use about 25 percent of the electricity that traditional heating and cooling systems utilize," the writer said.

"A 25,000-gallon underground cistern collects rainwater gathered from roof runs; wastewater from sinks, toilets and showers goes into underground purifying tanks and is also funneled into the cistern. The water from the cistern is used to irrigate the landscaping surrounding the four-bedroom home. Plants and flowers native to the high prairie area blend the structure into the surrounding ecosystem.

"No, this is not the home of some eccentrically wealthy eco-freak trying to shame his fellow citizens into following the pristineness of his self-righteous example. And no, it is not the wilderness retreat of the Sierra Club or the Natural Resources Defense Council, a haven where tree-huggers plot political strategy.

"This is President George W. Bush's 'Texas White House' outside the small town of Crawford."

Marc Morano, an aide to Senate Environment and Public Works Committee ranking member Sen. James M. Inhofe, Oklahoma Republican, posted the Tribune article yesterday at www.epw.senate.gov.

'A dead loser'

Newt Gingrich says Republicans must avoid bland centrism and Hillary-bashing if they are to win in 2008.

"There are two big facts about the 2008 election," the former House speaker said in an e-mail inviting conservatives to the Conservative Political Action Conference, which begins tomorrow at the Omni Shoreham Hotel in Washington. "Fact No. 1: Running as a bland, business-as-usual Republican will be a dead loser. In 2006, the American people repudiated the GOP because the idea of Republicans' trying to manage the liberal welfare state they inherited from the Democrats was a dead loser. I am not sure many Republican consultants have come to understand this. ...

"Fact No. 2: Focusing on an anti-Hillary campaign will also be a dead loser," Mr. Gingrich said, referring to Democratic presidential front-runner Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York. "The Clintons are the most determined and intense politicians of our lifetime. ...

"If a campaign is going to degenerate into a mud-slinging contest, the Clintons will always win because they are vastly more ready to jump into the pit. The recent attacks over David Geffen and Barack Obama are just a sample of how quickly and fiercely the Clintons will attack if the campaign is simply about who can 'out negative' whom."

Al and Strom

The biracial daughter of the late Sen. Strom Thurmond defended the former segregationist yesterday and said the Rev. Al Sharpton "overreacted" when Mr. Sharpton learned he is a descendent of a slave owned by the senator's forebears.

"In spite of the fact he was a segregationist, he did many wonderful things for black people. ... I'm not sure that Reverend Sharpton is aware of all the things he did," said Essie Mae Washington-Williams, who was in Columbia, S.C., for a speech. "I kind of feel that there was an overreaction."

Professional genealogists working for Ancestry.com found that Mr. Sharpton's great-grandfather Coleman Sharpton was a slave owned by Julia Thurmond, whose grandfather was Strom Thurmond's great-great-grandfather. Coleman Sharpton was later freed, the Associated Press reports.

When Mr. Sharpton learned of the link, he said: "It was probably the most shocking thing in my life."

Mr. Thurmond's children have acknowledged that he fathered a biracial daughter. Mrs. Williams' mother was a housekeeper in the home of Mr. Thurmond's parents.

No 'wave' in '08

In an early preview of House races in 2008, election forecaster Stuart Rothenberg says "a huge political wave favoring one party is not very likely" next year.

Mr. Rothenberg still thinks Democrats will have "plenty of opportunities again next year, including almost a dozen districts they narrowly lost and a handful of districts where they unwisely failed to field a strong challenger."

But with the White House held by Republicans and Democrats in charge of Congress, "voters aren't going to blame one party entirely for whatever problems exist," he says in his Rothenberg Political Report newsletter.

DOJ_NMG_0137685

Even so, "many observers are expecting more than a couple of senior House Republicans to retire. That could create more opportunities for Democrats."

Hate speech

The liberal Huffington Post Web site (www.huffingtonpost.com) ran a wire story yesterday about the apparent attempt to assassinate Vice President Dick Cheney in Afghanistan. A number of its readers proceeded to make postings in which they expressed regret that the attack had not succeeded.

Radio talk-show host Rush Limbaugh read about a half-dozen of the foul postings on the air yesterday, and linked to the Huffington Post from his own Web site (www.rushlimbaugh.com). Not long afterward, the Huffington Post removed the most offensive of the missives.

The Reliable Source (WP)

By Amy Argetsinger And Roxanne Roberts

The Washington Post, February 28, 2007

Talk About Your Serious Roles

We always said foreign policy was sexy, and now here's proof: Angelina Jolie is on the shortlist to join the power wonks at the Council on Foreign Relations, the exclusive New York think tank. The actress was nominated by council member Trevor Neilson, her pal and adviser on political and global matters. "There is no better way for someone who is involved in international relations to build a deep understanding of these issues," he told us yesterday.

Jolie's bid, which required two other letters of recommendation, was approved by the membership committee last week and is now "under consideration," said council spokeswoman Anya Schmemann. If she's voted in at the June board meeting, the 31-year-old Jolie will receive a five-year "term" membership (typical for younger applicants) and join 4,000 deep thinkers such as Bill Clinton, Dick Cheney, Condi Rice, Colin Powell, Madeleine Albright, Henry Kissinger, Alan Greenspan , George Soros, Barbara Walters and Lisa Ling.

You're asking yourself: Why? Jolie, currently a U.N. goodwill ambassador, can already meet with just about anyone on the planet. (And she's influential enough to have a piece about Darfur published today on The Post's op-ed page.) But at the council, she'll get a crash course in global policy from the experts. "She takes learning about these issues very seriously," said Neilson. And the wonks get a worldwide sex symbol who draws cameras every time she breathes.

We're guessing she gets in.

So Much Hobnobbing, So Little Time

So Vanessa Williams had your typical D.C. day -- you know, dropping by to see Barack Obama, then bumping into Rudy Giuliani at Charlie Palmer's.

"I live down the street from Hillary" in Chappaqua, N.Y., said the actress-singer-mom-of-four, "so I'm just a politician magnet." But no, she's not ready to endorse. "I'm impressed by so many," she demurred in that gracious VIP way.

Williams wrapped up her D.C. day in big style as well, mobbed by fans and friends at a premiere hosted by the Special Olympics (she sits on its board) for her new indie film, "My Brother." She plays the low-income mom of a disabled boy -- a part written just for her, she said. Quite a departure from her comically villainous turn on "Ugly Betty." So, what's harder -- comedy or drama? "What's harder is making bad material work." Alas, ever gracious, she didn't name names.

THIS JUST IN . . .

Â· Amanda Coluccio says that her best friend, "American Idol" contestant and Catholic U student Antonella Barba, posed for some of the PG-13 pictures flying around the Internet (as a present for a boyfriend) -- but not the X-rated shots. "It's not her nose," Coluccio told the Newark Star-Ledger after examining the naughty pix. "She's never had [acrylic nail] tips in her life. She's the least slutty person I know."

Â· James Brown is still not buried, but his trustees and partner agreed yesterday to collect DNA samples for a pending paternity battle. Brown, who died on Christmas Day, is sealed in a gold casket at an undisclosed location.

Â· The White House has named Coast Guard Adm. Stephen Rochon as chief usher -- apt, since the position requires keeping the executive mansion shipshape. He's the eighth person and first African American to hold the job.

Â· To evade detection by terrorists, Dick Cheney parked Air Force Two and flew to Pakistan and Afghanistan in a military cargo plane, the "Spirit of Strom Thurmond." (Make up your own joke. We're busy.)

HEY, ISN'T THAT . . . ?

Â· Bill Clinton wandering around Georgetown Park mall yesterday with an army of security folk, wearing a nice navy suit. Stepped into a watch store and shook hands with a bunch of people. Just browsing? Unclear, but it was Chelsea's 27th birthday yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0137686

Â· Teddy Kennedy continuing Birthday Week festivities at Teatro Goldoni Monday night -- though this time it was apparently wife Vicki's big day. They chowed down on the lobster carpaccio, lobster risotto, foie gras -- and the just-turned-75 senator ordered an extra slice of chocolate cake.

Â· Larry King dining and drinking grappa Monday night with AOL rich guy Jim Kimsey at the new downtown restaurant Il Mulino. The CNN talker was apparently seeking world-traveler Kimsey's help in getting an interview with Cuba's Fidel Castro. Better move fast!

Qaeda Rebuilding In Pakistan, Intelligence Chief Tells Panel (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, February 28, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 27 — The new director of national intelligence told members of Congress on Tuesday that senior leaders of Al Qaeda were steadily rebuilding the network's bases inside Pakistan and that future attacks against the United States could be planned from Pakistan's remote western mountains.

In his first testimony since taking office last month, Mike McConnell said Osama bin Laden and his deputy, Ayman al-Zawahri, were supervising the establishment of Qaeda camps in Pakistan similar to those that existed in Afghanistan before the Sept. 11 attacks, although he said the camps were not as fully developed as the former Afghan bases.

Mr. McConnell's appearance before the Senate Armed Services Committee followed a succession of meetings between top American officials and Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, who officials in Washington have said was not doing enough to root out Islamist militants in Pakistan's tribal areas.

"It's something we're very worried about and very concerned about," Mr. McConnell said.

Intelligence and counterterrorism officials, speaking anonymously, have spoken in the past several weeks about the new camps in Pakistan and the gradual rebuilding of Al Qaeda's command and control apparatus, but Mr. McConnell is the most senior official in Washington to describe in public what he called a growing problem.

A day earlier, the White House spokesman, Tony Snow, sidestepped questions about whether the White House was unhappy with General Musharraf's government and reaffirmed President Bush's confidence in the Pakistani president.

The top intelligence officials assembled before the Senate panel on Tuesday issued a blunter assessment.

"We believe they could do more," said Mr. McConnell, who suggested that General Musharraf could have had his eye on elections later this year when he pledged to keep Pakistani troops from carrying out military operations in the tribal areas.

Sitting beside Mr. McConnell, Lt. Gen. Michael D. Maples, director of the Defense Intelligence Agency, described the border region as a "haven for Al Qaeda's leadership." It is from that area, Mr. McConnell said, that any future attacks against the United States by Al Qaeda would most likely be planned.

General Musharraf has said repeatedly that he has done everything in his power to root out Taliban and Qaeda militants, but lawmakers were skeptical.

"Long-term prospects for eliminating the Taliban threat appear dim so long as the sanctuary remains in Pakistan, and there are no encouraging signs that Pakistan is eliminating it," said the committee's chairman, Senator Carl Levin, Democrat of Michigan.

The rebuilding of the Qaeda infrastructure in Pakistan has forced a debate within the Bush administration about how hard to press General Musharraf, and some officials have even advocated direct American airstrikes against the camps.

Administration officials said that for now the White House had ruled out any unilateral American military actions in Pakistan. Vice President Dick Cheney was said to have warned the Pakistani president during their meeting on Monday in Islamabad that Democratic members of Congress could move to cut military aid to Pakistan unless its government took stronger action against Islamist militants in the tribal areas.

The testimony before the Senate panel was intended to give lawmakers American intelligence officials' assessment of global threats. Speaking about Iraq, the officials were cautiously optimistic that the current plan to crack down on militants in Baghdad could succeed, but added that much of the plan's success would depend on the performance of the Iraqi troops.

General Maples said that two of the three Iraqi brigades designated to support the security plan had moved into Baghdad, but he said that estimates he had seen indicated that the brigades were at only 43 percent to 82 percent of their intended troop strength.

Discussing the state of Iran's nuclear program, Mr. McConnell reaffirmed the assessment of American intelligence agencies that Iran could produce a nuclear weapon by the beginning of the next decade, but that the country more likely would not have such a weapon until 2015.

DOJ_NMG_0137687

But Mr. McConnell said tough economic sanctions against Tehran could have a “dramatic” impact in getting Iran to abandon its nuclear program.

U.S. Sees New Al-Qaeda Threat (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, February 28, 2007

The new director of national intelligence said yesterday that the United States is "very concerned" that Osama bin Laden and the al-Qaeda leadership are attempting to rebuild their terrorist network and establish training camps in a region of northwest Pakistan "that has never been governed by any power."

"We inflicted a major blow, they retreated to another area, and they are going through a process to reestablish and rebuild, adapting to the seams or the weak spots as they might perceive them," retired Vice Adm. John M. McConnell told the Senate Armed Services Committee as he delivered his first global threat assessment to Capitol Hill.

While describing new al-Qaeda volunteers as "very committed individuals," McConnell also said they lack the experience of the old leadership, nearly three-quarters of which has been killed or captured. Without giving details, he said, "a number of [terrorist] plans and activities have been shut down or disrupted."

Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.) asked McConnell about the probability that al-Qaeda members in Pakistan or Iraq are organizing an attack on the United States -- a scenario that President Bush recently hinted at should U.S. forces withdraw from Iraq. The intelligence chief replied that an attack would "most likely" emerge from Pakistan, though he described Iraq as "a cause celebre for the jihadists in creating forces," and warned that al-Qaeda elements in Iraq, Syria and Europe are planning attacks.

McConnell also outlined some obstacles to a settlement in Iraq. The majority Shiites, he said, "are not confident of their position and . . . are worried that the Sunnis may come back and dominate the country." The Sunnis, he said, are unwilling "to admit that they are no longer in charge," and the Kurds are "biding their time to protect Kurdish interests." Overall, he said, "I think the Iraqi political leaders have close to impossible tasks."

Lt. Gen. Michael D. Maples, director of the Defense Intelligence Agency, confirmed for the committee that weapons training for Iraqi militia members is being provided in Iran as well as in Hezbollah camps in Lebanon. Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.) called the Iranian training "a very serious act and one that we ought to consider taking steps to stop in defense of our soldiers."

Sen. Evan Bayh (Ind.) was one of several Democrats who questioned the decision to include an assessment of a "rapid withdrawal" of coalition forces from Iraq as part of the recent National Intelligence Estimate. The NIE judgment was that such a withdrawal would increase violence and hasten deterioration of the situation in Iraq -- a finding that has since been cited by Bush and others who support a troop increase and oppose withdrawal.

National Intelligence Council Chairman Thomas Fingar, who supervised production of the NIE, told the Senate panel that "unquestionably and categorically" there had been no political pressure to shape the estimate.

"I'm not criticizing your bona fides," Bayh told Fingar, "but I do care about the credibility of your work product . . . and when you start down that slippery slope, you just get into these kinds of arguments."

Lawmakers praised McConnell and his colleagues for their candid testimony. At one point, when asked about recent reports that Shiite leader Moqtada al-Sadr appeared to be both for and against the increase in troops in Baghdad, the president's chief intelligence adviser said, "I don't know what Sadr's position is. . . . I'd be guessing."

Spy Chief Pushes For Action In Pakistan (AP)

By Katherine Shrader

AP, February 28, 2007

More must be done to go after al-Qaida, which is trying to establish training camps and other operations in some of Pakistan's most ungoverned territory, the new U.S. spy chief said Tuesday.

"It's something we're very worried about and very concerned about," Mike McConnell told the Senate Armed Services Committee in a hearing on global threats.

McConnell said the U.S. believes al-Qaida's top two leaders — Osama bin Laden and Ayman al-Zawahri — are hiding in the rugged frontiers of northwestern Pakistan and are attempting to establish an operational base there. He noted that al-Qaida's camps are in an area that has never been governed by any state or outside power.

McConnell's push for action along the Afghan-Pakistani border echoed concerns raised by Vice President Dick Cheney during a face-to-face meeting Monday with Pakistani President Gen. Pervez Musharraf. Cheney was accompanied by Deputy CIA Director Stephen Kappes — a sign that intelligence played a strong role in the case made to Musharraf.

DOJ_NMG_0137688

Musharraf has insisted his forces have already "done the maximum" possible against extremists in their territory, and he said other allies also shoulder responsibility in the U.S.-led war on terrorism.

But U.S. officials have grown increasingly concerned about intelligence suggesting the Taliban and al-Qaida plan a spring offensive against allied forces in neighboring Afghanistan.

They are also worried about the autonomy of al-Qaida and Taliban operatives in Pakistan after the government signed a peace deal with the tribal leaders of the region, North Waziristan, in September.

In that agreement, tribal elders promised to respect the supremacy of the Pakistani government and curtail attacks in Afghanistan. In return, Musharraf gave back some of the tribes' weapons, released some prisoners and withdrew from posts inside North Waziristan.

At Tuesday's hearing, Lt. Gen. Michael Maples, head of the Defense Intelligence Agency, said the tribes have not abided by most of the agreement's terms. And McConnell said U.S. intelligence believes al-Qaida's training and related capabilities increased as a result of the deal.

Lawmakers were skeptical, too.

"Long-term prospects for eliminating the Taliban threat appear dim so long as the sanctuary remains in Pakistan, and there are no encouraging signs that Pakistan is eliminating it," said Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin, D-Mich.

In his first month as national intelligence director, McConnell said he's been briefed about al-Qaida's efforts to reconstitute itself in Pakistan's northwest frontier.

He said the group does not have the thousands of fighters, training in multiple camps, as they did in Afghanistan before the 2001 U.S.-led invasion. "That's gone," he said.

But McConnell said U.S. intelligence believes al-Qaida still has volunteers committed to carrying out "heinous attacks" akin to Sept. 11, 2001. And while three-quarters of al-Qaida's leaders have been taken out, they have been replaced by equally committed jihadists. The upside: McConnell said the new generation doesn't have as much experience.

Pressuring al-Qaida is not without its risks for Musharraf, who faces an election this fall. McConnell acknowledged that efforts to pursue the terror group must be balanced with the desire to keep Musharraf — a moderate and a U.S. ally — in charge of Pakistan and its nuclear arsenal.

The testimony from Maples and McConnell was part of the Senate panel's annual review of global threats, including the latest assessments on Iran, Iraq and North Korea. Touching on those hot spots, they said:

_Iraqi troops are taking the lead in securing parts of their country, but much work remains to improve the number and quality of those forces. "They are better today than they were a year ago, but they are still not where we need them to be," McConnell said.

Maples said two of the three brigades promised by Iraq have moved into Baghdad as part of the new security plan, but he acknowledged that those units have only 43 percent to 82 percent of their intended troops, according to ranges he has seen.

_On Iran, McConnell said that the regime could develop a nuclear weapon early in the next decade, but it will more likely take the country's scientists until 2015. But it's not clear whether the country will have a delivery system at the same time.

_Maples said the United States is seeing North Korea take initial steps to comply with the Feb. 13 agreement on its nuclear program, including inspection of its plutonium-producing Yongbyon nuclear facility. But there are other steps to which the U.S. will have to pay close attention, he said.

McConnell's top adviser on North Korea, Joseph DeTrani, said the U.S. continues to insist that North Korea declare all of its nuclear programs. But he backtracked a bit from a previous U.S. view of analysts, who had "high confidence" that North Korea was buying material for a uranium production program.

Now, he said, the U.S. believes the program exists "at the midconfidence level."

US Ramps Up Taliban Fight (CSM)

By Mark Sappenfield

The Christian Science Monitor, February 28, 2007

KABUL, AFGHANISTAN

Vice President Dick Cheney came to Afghanistan on an unannounced visit Tuesday to remind Americans of the importance of the first, and often forgotten, front in the war on terror. A Taliban suicide bomber who failed in an attempt to assassinate Mr. Cheney here helped to make a compelling case for him.

Since last summer, when the Taliban seized entire districts in the southernmost provinces and attempted to encircle Kabul, the United States has refocused its attention on Afghanistan.

DOJ_NMG_0137689

Recently, the Bush administration proposed $10.6 billion in aid, announced the overhaul of its diplomatic mission here, and increased the number of American troops to 27,000 – the highest level since the 2001 invasion.

It is, in part, an attempt to save what has been promoted as the administration's great overseas achievement, even as Iraq slips further into chaos. But Tuesday's events are indicative of the Taliban's eagerness to escalate the fight, and analysts question whether America's increased commitment to Afghanistan will be sufficient to make the country's democratic experiment successful.

"For so long, Afghanistan was held up as the success story," says Paul Fishstein, director of the Afghanistan Research and Evaluation Unit, an independent analysis organization. "Now it seems that much of what has been touted as building a pluralistic, open democracy is at risk."

Tuesday's attack comes at a time of relative peace around Kabul, which has not seen a suicide attack for months.

Mr. Cheney was staying at Bagram Air Base, about 40 miles north of the capital. When the bomber was unable to get beyond the front gate because of security, he blew himself up, according to coalition officials. At press time, casualty figures were uncertain, but at least 23 were killed. NATO reported that at least one US soldier, an American contractor, and a South Korean solder were among the dead. President Hamid Karzai's office said that some 20 Afghan workers at the base lost their lives.

Cheney said that the attackers were trying "to find ways to question the authority of the central government." The Taliban, who have claimed responsibility for the attack through a spokesman, say that Cheney was the intended target.

It is not yet clear whether this attack heralds an expansion of the Taliban offensive into the relatively stable north. The Taliban are strongest in Afghanistan's southern provinces, where they are widely believed to receive haven and support in neighboring Pakistan.

Their offensive in the region last year created lawless enclaves – with much of the area still controlled by neither the government nor the insurgents. The situation has jolted the West – and the US in particular – into action. "Last year seemed to wake the international community to the fact that this war was not a complete success," says a Western diplomat, who would discuss the issue only on condition of anonymity. "In fact, it was a potential failure."

The US has responded with the $10.6 billion aid package, with some $8 billion of that earmarked for the Afghan Army and police. The White House and Congress alike have increased pressure on Pakistan to control its borders. And a month ago, the US gave the Afghan Army 800 military vehicles and 12,000 guns, in hopes of gradually making it more self-sufficient.

In some respects, Afghanistan might benefit from America's mounting weariness with the Iraq war. Just after becoming Speaker of the House, Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D) of California traveled to Afghanistan and commented that the country needs "much more of an effort" from the US and NATO – in contrast to her position that the US should withdraw from Iraq.

While Mr. Bush has not shown any signs of lessening his commitment to Iraq, he has clearly made more room for Afghanistan on his foreign-policy platform. When the issue of the Iraq troop surge was recently before Congress, Bush took the opportunity to deliver a speech solely about Afghanistan.

It was more than just a diversion. Frustrated by most NATO nations' unwillingness to commit troops to the volatile south, the US this month decided to send a brigade to Afghanistan that was scheduled to go to Iraq. Britain has increased its troop levels in Afghanistan by 1,400 to 7,700 – meaning it will soon have more troops in Afghanistan than Iraq.

But in Italy, Prime Minister Romano Prodi resigned after dissension over Italy's involvement in Afghanistan, something he continued to defend as he opened a Senate debate ahead of a confidence vote on his government scheduled for Wednesday. Italy has about 1,800 troops in the country.

And in Canada, which has some 2,500 soldiers in Afghanistan, a fourth probe was opened Tuesday into whether soldiers knew about possible torture of detainees after they were handed over to Afghan authorities.

Most government officials and nongovernmental organizations welcome US help. But some analysts worry that the US will continue to throw money and manpower at effects, while ignoring the causes of Afghanistan's problems.

Top among those they say, is reforming the Afghan government, which is increasingly controlled by warlords and drug money from the illegal poppy trade.

As in Iraq, the United States rushed to install a democratic government in a place not prepared for it, they add, ignoring what were, perhaps, larger problems.

After the Taliban, "Afghans were not jumping up and down, saying, 'We want to vote for a president,' " says an aid expert who has worked in the region for decades but requested anonymity because he was not cleared to speak with the media. "They wanted jobs. They wanted services."

In the end, many say, it not only let in criminals and warlords but created unrealistic expectations, as both Afghans and the international community believed Afghanistan was further along than it was.

"The excessive focus on the elections as an indictor for success was misleading," says Mr. Fishstein.

DOJ_NMG_0137690

Even now, the notion of giving $10.6 billion to a government with neither the means nor the expertise to spend it strikes some as well-intentioned, but fruitless.

Regarding the Afghan government's ability to act, the aid expert says, "You're navigating glaciers here because they are so slow."

Advance warning?

While the attack on Bagram Air Base during Vice President Dick Cheney's Afghanistan visit could be a coincidence, analysts say, it's more likely that the attackers had advance notice that Mr. Cheney would be there.

The first wire-service report mentioning that the Vice President was at Bagram came an hour before the attack. But such assaults usually require more lead time. "They had to have many hours, or days, to plan this," says Rita Katz of the Site Institute in Washington, which tracks statements by jihad groups, including the Taliban claim that they were seeking to kill Cheney.

Ms. Katz says that it's likely the Taliban carried out the attack and that they had inside information.

The US military disagrees. Maj. William Mitchell told the Associated Press that speculation they were after Cheney is "far-fetched," noting that his travel plans changed at the last minute.

While suicide attacks more than quadrupled throughout Afghanistan last year, to 139, at Bagram they are rare. This was the first suicide attack at Bagram since last July.

Warning To Pakistan (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 28, 2007

On Monday, Vice President Dick Cheney met with Pakistan President Pervez Musharraf on what was billed as an "unannounced" visit to Islamabad. Yesterday, during what was also supposed to be a secret trip to Afghanistan, a suicide bomber killed himself and up to 23 others outside of Bagram Air Base, where Mr. Cheney was staying at the time.

There's no need to accuse Pakistani intelligence of tipping off the Taliban about Mr. Cheney's whereabouts to see a connection between decisions in Islamabad and terrorism in Bagram. Mr. Cheney reportedly delivered a stiff message to Mr. Musharraf about the need for Pakistan to deny the Taliban sanctuary along its frontier with Afghanistan. That's a message Islamabad needs to hear, even if an Islamabad spokeswoman did insist after Mr. Cheney's visit that "Pakistan does not accept dictation."

This is not to say the Musharraf government has done nothing in the fight against terror. Hundreds of Pakistani soldiers have died fighting Taliban elements, and Pakistani cooperation was essential in the killing or capture of such al Qaeda ringleaders as Khalid Sheikh Mohammed. General Musharraf has twice been the target of Islamist assassination attempts. But his government has been suspected of cutting deals of convenience with Islamist political groups, and it has formed alliances with pro-Taliban forces in Pakistan's parliament, in a common front against secular democrats who might come to power if the General allowed a truly free election.

Still worse, from the U.S. perspective, was the agreement Islamabad signed in September with the Taliban, tribal elders and "local mujahadeen" from North Waziristan. That agreement allowed the Taliban to operate unfettered in the province in exchange for a promise not to launch raids into Afghanistan. The number of raids has since more than doubled, say Afghan and U.S. military sources.

One immediate result is that Congressional Democrats, including House Foreign Affairs Chairman Tom Lantos, are floating measures to curb U.S. arms sales to Pakistan, an echo of the Pressler Amendment that took effect when the first Bush Administration de-certified Pakistan as a non-nuclear state.

Nobody should want to reprise that chapter of U.S.-Pakistan relations, which did nothing to stop Pakistan's nuclear ambitions (or, later, its support for the Taliban) while denying the U.S. the diplomatic leverage it previously had with Pakistan governments. But sanctions will only become more likely if the American public sees Pakistan as an enabler of the Taliban in its campaign to destabilize the Karzai government in Kabul and kill Americans, including the Vice President.

Policing its long and mountainous border with Afghanistan has exacted a high price in Pakistani lives and treasure. Failing to police it may exact a higher one.

DOJ:

Inside Bush's Prosecutor Purge (SALON)

By Mark Follman

Salon.com, February 28, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0137691

Why has the administration fired U.S. attorneys with sterling track records? To make room for its political loyalists, critics say, and exert its last shred of control.

Ever since the Bush administration shocked the legal community by dismissing eight U.S. attorneys in December, Justice Department leaders have vigorously denied that the firings were politically motivated. "I would never, ever make a change in the United States attorney position for political reasons," Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said in Senate testimony in early January. In a Feb. 6 hearing, Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty told lawmakers, "When I hear you talk about the politicizing of the Department of Justice, it's like a knife in my heart."

But at least three of the eight fired attorneys were told by a superior they were being forced to resign to make jobs available for other Bush appointees, according to a former senior Justice Department official knowledgeable about their cases. That stands in contradiction to administration claims that the firings were related either to job performance or policy differences. A fourth U.S. attorney was told by a top Justice Department official that the dismissal in that attorney's case was not necessarily related to job performance. Meanwhile, U.S. Attorney David Iglesias in New Mexico -- who officially steps down from his post on Wednesday, and who says he was never told by superiors about any problems with his work -- plans to go public with documentation of the achievements of his office.

"I never received any indication at all of a problem" regarding performance or policy differences, Iglesias told Salon on Monday. "That only leaves a third option: politics."

Iglesias acknowledged that U.S. attorneys serve at the pleasure of the president and can be dismissed without cause. "But it's really been maddening," he said, that the administration is using job-performance issues to defend the firings. Iglesias, who took the job in 2001, noted that his office got a "very positive" evaluation in the Justice Department's own internal ratings system as recently as last fall and that he received a letter from the Executive Office of U.S. Attorneys in January 2006 commending him for his "exemplary leadership in the Department's priority programs," including antiterrorism, community crime prevention and law enforcement coordination.

"I was shocked by the call on Dec. 7" telling him to resign, Iglesias said. He added, "I think Americans need to have full confidence that their federal prosecutors are above politics."

Suspicions about the unusual purge of eight U.S. attorneys in December burst into the open within the legal community and on Capitol Hill after McNulty conceded in Senate testimony on Feb. 6 that the U.S. attorney in Arkansas, Bud Cummins, was pushed out for no reason other than to give someone else a shot at the job. Using a little-noticed provision in the Patriot Act allowing interim appointments, Gonzales gave the post to Timothy Griffin -- who had been both an operative for the Republican National Committee and a deputy to senior White House advisor Karl Rove -- in what many believe was a maneuver to sidestep the traditional Senate confirmation process for U.S. attorneys.

More recently, U.S. attorney Carole Lam, who is best known for nailing corrupt Republican Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham and his partners in crime, was replaced on Feb. 15 by Karen P. Hewitt, who according to a Justice Department press release, "will serve on an interim basis until a United States Attorney is nominated by the president and confirmed by the Senate." According to an Op-Ed in Monday's New York Times, Hewitt has a résumé with "almost no criminal law experience" and is a member of the Federalist Society, a conservative legal group.

While Cummins was first informed of his dismissal last June, it wasn't until Dec. 7 that Michael Battle, a top Justice Department official, informed the rest of the group of U.S. attorneys in phone calls that they would be required to step down. That group included Daniel Bogden in Nevada, Paul Charlton in Arizona, John McKay in Seattle, Carole Lam in San Diego, and David Iglesias in New Mexico -- all of whom had received positive job reviews before they were dismissed and some of whom are viewed by colleagues and law enforcement officials as exceptional leaders. Most of them have said publicly that they were never told of any management or policy problems by their superiors.

According to the former senior Justice Department official, one of the U.S. attorneys in the group was told by Battle on Dec. 7: "It's hard not to think you did something wrong when you get a call like this, but that's not always the case." Two other U.S. attorneys in the group, upon seeking clarification from superiors in Washington, were told by a different top Justice Department official that they were being pushed out to give other Bush appointees their posts. A current senior Justice Department official confirmed that one of those two was Bogden in Nevada. Bryan Roehrkasse, a public affairs spokesman for the Justice Department, declined to comment about "specific personnel matters."

Former officials, legal scholars and U.S. lawmakers from both parties have publicly questioned the administration's stated rationale for the firings and have suggested troubling theories about the real reasons for the housecleaning, which experts say is without precedent. Some former Justice Department officials say they believe the administration's moves are a politically driven power grab -- aimed not only at a tighter grip on policy from Washington, but also at creating openings with which to reward their friends and build up a bench of conservative loyalists positioned to serve in powerful posts in future administrations.

DOJ_NMG_0137692

"It's really remarkable to have a wholesale removal of an administration's own U.S. attorneys, particularly this deep into the term," said John Kroger, a federal prosecutor under Clinton and Bush who now teaches at Lewis & Clark Law School in Portland, Ore. "Clearly there was a concerted decision made to ask a bunch of them to leave. It suggests a desire to more tightly control policy. With the Democrats in control of Congress, perhaps it's because this is one of the few levers of government they have left."

Many point to the Cummins firing as proof that the administration is lying. "It is simply not believable that these were all performance-based dismissals, and everyone knows it," said a veteran prosecutor who served for a decade in the Justice Department until 2005. He also noted that he found it interesting that half of the posts cleared out are in the Southwest, where immigration is a key issue.

Kroger added that a stint as U.S. attorney is often a springboard to federal judgeships or other prestigious appointments. "Being a U.S. attorney is a huge credential, one a lot of people would like to have," he said. "It certainly looks like they're clearing out spots to reward loyalists in the last two years of the administration."

To support their claim that the dismissals were performance related, Bush officials have pointed to one among the fired U.S. attorneys, Kevin Ryan in San Francisco, who has been widely reported to be a focus of management complaints. The firing of Margaret Chiara in Michigan, the eighth U.S. attorney caught up in the December purge, was not made public until last Friday. To date, no explanation for her dismissal has been provided by Chiara or administration officials, but the former senior Justice Department official confirmed she was asked to resign in December and was in negotiations to stay in her post.

Realistically, federal appointments are never apolitical. But while U.S. attorneys serve at the pleasure of the president, they are traditionally recommended by federal judges and senators from the regions they serve, and are ultimately confirmed by the Senate. But thanks to a change put into the Patriot Act by Pennsylvania Republican Arlen Specter when it was reauthorized in late 2005, Gonzales and the White House gained the power to fill vacancies with interim appointees who can hold office for indefinite terms. Earlier this month, the Senate Judiciary Committee put forth legislation to restore limits for those terms (and thereby congressional vetting for long-term hires), but a full Senate vote on the bill was blocked by Republicans.

Incoming presidents are known to overhaul the corps of U.S. attorneys installed by prior administrations. Upon taking office, both Presidents Clinton and Bush replaced nearly all of the head prosecutors serving in the Justice Department's 94 districts nationwide. But it is rare for even one U.S. attorney to otherwise be dismissed during a president's term -- and in this case, all those dismissed by Bush were his own appointees.

Experts see a continuing pattern that began long ago: A Bush White House seizing greater executive power to the detriment of democratic principle.

"No doubt this is a threat to the independent stature that the Justice Department as an institution has enjoyed over the years," said Sam Buell, an associate professor at Washington University School of Law in St. Louis and a former federal prosecutor under the current President Bush. "It goes against the 'hands off' tradition, which has insulated U.S. attorneys from criticisms of politics influencing their choices and handling of cases. This doesn't look like a decision that's been made in the best interest of law enforcement."

Indeed, several of the fired attorneys had stellar track records. Like Iglesias in New Mexico, Daniel Bogden steps down Wednesday from the helm of a U.S. attorney's office in Nevada that saw unsurpassed achievements in law enforcement during his tenure. In a phone interview Monday, Bogden cited a record number of cases targeting guns, drugs, identity theft and sexual exploitation, among other criminal issues.

"To this day, I've never been told of any deficiencies in my performance or that of my office," he said. "I've never been called by anyone suggesting that I should do something differently on policy, or that I was going against their policy."

In Seattle, John McKay's record as U.S. attorney has left many observers baffled by his dismissal. The raison d'être of the Bush White House is supposed to be the war on terrorism -- and McKay, by many measures, was an invaluable lieutenant in that battle.

McKay was appointed by Bush shortly after terrorists struck the United States on Sept. 11, 2001. Over the next five years, in a major port city and a border region critical for antiterrorist operations, he personally handled high-profile prosecutions, including that of Ahmed Ressam, who had driven across the Canada-U.S. border with plans to bomb Los Angeles International Airport at the turn of the millennium. In 2004, at a time when poor coordination among law enforcement agencies had been judged at least partly to blame for the 9/11 attacks, McKay developed an innovative data-sharing system that continues to be rolled out today in law enforcement offices nationwide.

Just over five months ago, on Sept. 22, 2006, the Justice Department completed a comprehensive evaluation of McKay's office, filled with high marks on both criminal and counterterrorism matters, including McKay's efforts to build greater cooperation among law enforcement agencies in both the United States and Canada. McKay "has been responsible for major advances in a cooperative cross-border effort," the report said. "All involved in these efforts pointed to U.S. Attorney McKay as the individual most responsible for the dramatic increase in cooperation."

DOJ_NMG_0137693

"The report says nothing about me with regard to management or policy differences," McKay said in an interview last week. "Counterterrorism was our No. 1 priority, and I put an enormous amount of my personal time into it." He added, "If there were performance issues of any kind, they didn't tell me about it, and to this day I'm unaware of any."

"This is a huge loss," said Gil Kerlikowske, Seattle's chief of police. "I've worked with a lot of U.S. attorneys in my time and John is absolutely at the top of the ladder, not only on issues of terrorism but on law enforcement in general. I can tell you that if they're saying John's dismissal was performance related ... I find that almost inconceivable." Kerlikowske noted that McKay had invaluable perspective, having served as a White House fellow at the FBI. "He knew how tough the barriers could be between law enforcement agencies, and he really helped break down those walls with information sharing."

"He was a champion with all the federal law enforcement agencies, but especially with ATF," said Kelvin Crenshaw, a 19-year veteran of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms and the special agent in charge of the Seattle field office. "He's one of the best U.S. attorneys I've ever worked with."

Administration officials have declined to provide further explanation for any of the attorneys' dismissals, including McKay's. On Feb. 14, McNulty, the deputy attorney general, gave a private briefing to the Senate Judiciary Committee, but afterward, Patty Murray, D-Wash., said, "I heard nothing from Department of Justice officials that changed my mind about John McKay's performance." Other senators who were present concurred with that view, according to a Democratic congressional aide briefed on the closed-door session.

Questions remain about how the Bush administration will seek to fill the newly vacant posts. Some former Justice Department officials say they believe that the Bush administration has since revised its plans to reward political loyalists with the jobs, due to the backlash against the decision to push out Cummins and hand his post to Griffin in Arkansas. Earlier this month, the administration withdrew Griffin's name from consideration for a permanent appointment, though he remains in office indefinitely.

If other recent appointees are an indication, the administration may be intent on installing conservatives with close ties to the White House. According to a Jan. 26 report by McClatchy Newspapers, since last March the administration has named at least nine U.S. attorneys who fit that profile, most of them hand-picked by Gonzales under the little-noticed provision of the Patriot Act that has since become law. They include Jeff Taylor, previously an aide to both Gonzales and former Attorney General John Ashcroft; Alexander Acosta, a protégé of conservative Supreme Court Justice Samuel Alito; and Edward McNally, a former senior associate counsel to President Bush.

And some critics expect that, despite the recent uproar over Cummins and the other attorneys' firings, the Bush White House will continue to find ways to erode the independence of the Justice Department.

"This is an administration that has not hesitated to discard conventional wisdom just because people say it's wrong," said Buell, the former federal prosecutor under Bush. "This is an administration that looks at the landscape and isn't afraid to rewrite the rules and say, 'We're going to do it our own way.'"

Justice Pilots Federated ID Broker (GCN)

By Joab Jackson, GCN Staff

Government Computer News, February 28, 2007

The Justice Department is piloting a federated identity management system that could be used to verify government online identities across different agencies.

The Law Enforcement Information Sharing Program, run by Justice's Office of the Chief Information Officer, could offer validated user credentials to multiple applications across multiple agencies, noted Boris Shur, a Justice IT manager who is working on the pilot. Shur outlined the project at the Collaborative Expedition Workshop, held today in Arlington, Va.

The system works by establishing a trust broker to act as a liaison between applications and providers of user credentials. With a trust broker in place, a user can request access to an application outside his or her own agency, and that application can request credentials from that broker, which has gathered such credentials from the identity providers.

Such a federated approach could cut the complexity that would ensue as more applications are opened to outside agencies. The trust broker could eliminate the need to establish individual handshakes between applications and identity providers. It could also cut down on the format headaches, as both applications and identity providers can communicate with the trusted broker in its own native format and protocol. It is up to the trusted broker to provide all the relevant protocols and formats, Shur said. At present, the LEISP system communicates credentials using the Public Key Infrastructure, the Security Assertion

DOJ_NMG_0137694

Markup Language and the Web Services Federation Language. It interacts with a number of applications as well as with a number of identity servers, such as the Sun One Identity Server and the Hewlett-Packard OpenView Select Federation.

The pilot will run until July, and the program managers plan to issue a report afterwards that assesses this federated approach.

"If [the pilot] is good enough, it is our intention to establish a trusted-broker infrastructure, within at least DOJ," Shur said.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Former McAfee GC Indicted Over Stock Options (LAW)

By Justin Scheck, The Recorder

California Recorder, February 28, 2007

Kent Roberts, the former chief counsel at McAfee Inc., on Tuesday became the first Silicon Valley lawyer charged in the stock options backdating debacle.

Roberts faces six counts of mail fraud, wire fraud and filing false SEC documents in connection with options grants given to himself and ex-McAfee CEO George Samenuk in 2000 and 2002.

The 11-page charging document (.pdf) tracks what Justice Department officials have repeatedly said they're looking for in deciding to charge in options cases: evidence of intentional fraud -- most importantly, concealing options manipulation.

The indictment says that in 2000, Roberts, who joined the company then called Network Associates in 1998, changed the grant date -- and thus lowered the price by nearly $10 a share -- on 20,000 options given to him by the board.

According to the charging document, Roberts was concerned that the original price of the options would not have benefited him since McAfee's share price was dropping at the time.

Months later, the indictment said, Roberts "caused the grant date to be changed to April 14, 2000, and he caused the exercise price to be changed to $19.75, which was the closing price of Network Associates' stock on the new, fabricated grant date," the indictment says.

While that may have been problematic, the indictment says Roberts exacerbated the situation in 2002, the year he became one of the three company officials on the "Ethics First Committee," which the company formed to root out internal problems that had resulted in past legal messes.

In that capacity, Roberts investigated the former controller, the indictment says, looking at allegations that the controller had manipulated options grant prices for employees of the company.

"As a result of the investigation, Roberts recommended, and Network Associates' management agreed, to remove the then-controller from his position in the finance department," the indictment says. It also accuses Roberts of covering up his own problematic grant during a subsequent audit.

The indictment's remaining charges involve a 2002 grant to then-CEO Samenuk, and the subsequent SEC filings relating to options awards.

Stephen Neal, the Cooley Godward Kronish partner representing Roberts, was traveling Tuesday and couldn't be reached for comment.

Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati partner Robert Feldman, whose firm represents McAfee, declined to comment.

HERE COMES TROUBLE

Roberts' problems first became clear in May when he was fired after an internal company probe determined that he was involved in troubling practices. Samenuk retired around the same time, and the SEC and San Francisco U.S. Attorney's Office began investigating.

In December, prosecutors were close to indicting Roberts when Assistant U.S. Attorney Christopher Steskal, the head of the investigation, announced he was leaving the office for Fenwick & West.

Assistant U.S. attorneys Eumi Choi and Timothy Lucey took over the probe, and earlier this month, the prosecutors decided to seek an indictment. But it was again delayed, this time by coordination problems with the Washington SEC lawyers also working on the case.

In the end, the U.S. Attorney's Office filed charges on its own without a corresponding SEC complaint.

Roberts is the first Silicon Valley general counsel to be accused of criminal fraud in connection with backdating, but he's not the first top legal officer indicted or forced to resign.

Last year, William Sorin, the GC of Comverse, was charged with securities fraud in New York; he later pleaded guilty.

DOJ_NMG_0137695

Roberts is the third former executive in the past two weeks to be accused of illegally rigging stock options, joining the former CEO of video game maker Take-Two Interactive Software Inc. and a former senior vice president for Monster Worldwide. Both companies are based in New York.

Last summer, Northern California prosecutors charged several former executives at San Jose, Calif.'s Brocade Communications Systems Inc. Brooklyn prosecutors indicted several Comverse Technology Inc. executives, including a general counsel, with felonies around the same time.

Other stock options cases appear to be looming. Prosecutors are looking closely at former executives at dozens of companies, including Apple Inc., KLA-Tencor and Broadcom Corp.

McAfee is well-known to federal prosecutors and SEC lawyers. In 2004, the company's former CFO was charged with falsely inflating revenues; he'll stand trial beginning next month. And last year, the company agreed to pay a $50 million fine for cooking its books.

Sources familiar with the case said the McAfee investigation will continue to look at options conduct.

Reporter Jessie Seyfer and The Associated Press contributed to this report.

Ex-McAfee Counsel Charged With Fraud (FT)

By Kevin Allison In San Francisco And Brooke Masters In New York

Financial Times, February 28, 2007

Federal prosecutors on Tuesday charged McAfee's former top lawyer with fraud for his role in a stock options backdating scheme at the anti-virus software group.

Kent Roberts, 50, stands accused of granting himself extra compensation by manipulating the grant dates of stock options awarded to himself and to other McAfee employees.

If found guilty, he could face up to 20 years in jail and a fine of up to $250,000.

Mr Roberts's lawyer could not be reached for comment on Tuesday.

The indictment marked the latest sign that federal prosecutors and the SEC are pressing forward quickly with their cases against individuals involved with stock options backdating.

Earlier this month, the former general counsel of Monster Worldwide, the online jobs site, pleaded guitly to separate backdating charges.

Federal authorities are probing options granting practices at dozens of other companies, including Apple and Broadcom.

In many cases, investigators may be running up against statutory deadlines which require prosecutors to bring securities fraud cases within five years. Much of the options backdating appears to have ceased after the SEC changed disclosure rules for options grants in 2002.

The progress on the cases against individuals stands in contrast to a growing logjam of corporate options cases. SEC commissioners have been unable to agree on how harshly to penalize companies involved in backdating.

The justice department said on Tuesday that Mr Roberts "fraudulently concealed and failed to disclose" changes to a 2000 options grant. The changes inflated the value of the grant by making it appear as if it was made on a date when the company's share price was lower.

Prosecutors also accused Mr Roberts of making a false entry in the minutes from a 2002 board meeting. The minutes concerned an options grant to McAfee's then-chief executive and chairman.

McAfee's Ex-Lawyer Indicted (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, February 28, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO, Feb. 27 (AP) — The former top lawyer of McAfee Inc. was charged on Tuesday with stock options tampering that muddied the finances of the computer security software maker.

A federal grand jury indicted the lawyer, Kent Roberts, nine months after McAfee fired him as its general counsel for "improper" handling of stock options issued in 2000.

The lawyer for Mr. Roberts, Stephen Neal, was not available for comment.

The indictment includes seven criminal counts of fraud, accusing Mr. Roberts of deceiving investors by filing false statements with the Securities and Exchange Commission and falsifying McAfee's books.

Besides shedding more light on the apparent misconduct of Mr. Roberts, the case provides the latest indication that the government crackdown on corporate America's widespread stock option abuses is progressing beyond the evidence-gathering stage.

Mr. Roberts became the third former executive in the last two weeks to be accused of illegally rigging stock options, joining the former chief executive of the video game maker Take-Two Interactive Software Inc. and a former senior vice president for the company that owns the online job search site Monster.com.

The government's investigation, spanning more than 100 companies nationwide, is primarily focused on the practice of backdating stock options.

Backdating is not necessarily illegal, as long as it is properly disclosed and recorded on the books.

McAfee's Ex-general Counsel Indicted In Stock-option Backdating Case (USAT)

By Edward Iwata

USA Today, February 28, 2007

The former general counsel of security software giant McAfee in Silicon Valley was indicted Tuesday by a federal grand jury in San Francisco on charges of fraudulent dating of stock-option grants for himself and others.

The indictment alleges that Kent Roberts, 50, of Dallas caused a former controller at McAfee — then called Network Associates — to change the grant date and exercise price on Roberts' option of 20,000 shares of company stock so his grant would be "in the money."

Since the backdating scandal arose last year, criminal charges have been brought against former executives at Brocade Communications Systems, Comverse Technology and Take-Two Interactive Software. About 200 companies have disclosed internal or federal investigations of their options grants.

Several corporate general counsels have resigned or been fired as a result of those investigations.

General counsels are expected to monitor a company's legal and financial doings, so the spate of in-house attorneys involved in backdating cases is especially alarming to corporate-governance experts.

In the McAfee case, Roberts allegedly hid the fraudulent change from auditors, executives and directors at Network Associates even as he led an internal investigation into backdating at the company in 2002, the indictment says. The same year, Roberts made a false entry in board meeting minutes to backdate an option on 420,000 shares of Network Associates stock for former CEO and chairman George Samenuk, the indictment says. McAfee last fall announced Samenuk's retirement and also said former president Kevin Weiss had been fired. The company could record a charge of up to $150 million.

Roberts, who joined Network Associates in 1998, was fired in May after the company's finance department found the fraudulent change, according to prosecutors. He was charged with seven counts of mail and wire fraud, making false filings to the Securities and Exchange Commission and falsifying records. He could face up to 20 years in prison for each count, plus millions in fines. Roberts' attorney, Stephen Neal, said, "We intend to vigorously defend Mr. Roberts."

Last year, McAfee disclosed that the SEC was investigating its stock-option backdating practices.

In recent years, the SEC has filed four lawsuits alleging fraudulent accounting issues at McAfee. Last year, the SEC charged the company with a financial fraud from 1998 to 2000 that led to overstating revenue by $622 million.

Fired McAfee Executive Is Charged With Options Fraud (WP/AP)

By Michael Liedtke, Associated Press

The Washington Post, February 28, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO -- McAfee's former top lawyer was charged Tuesday with stock options tampering that muddied the finances of the computer security software maker.

A federal grand jury indicted Kent Roberts nine months after McAfee, based in Santa Clara, Calif., fired him as its general counsel for what it called "improper" handling of stock options issued in 2000.

Roberts's attorney, Stephen Neal, was traveling Tuesday and was unavailable for immediate comment.

The indictment includes seven criminal counts of fraud, alleging that Roberts deceived investors by filing false statements with the Securities and Exchange Commission and falsifying McAfee's books.

Roberts's indictment comes less than two weeks after two other former executives, Ryan Brant of Take-Two Interactive Software and Myron Olesnyckyj of Monster International, pleaded guilty to illegally rigging options in unrelated cases.

The government's investigation, spanning more than 100 companies nationwide, is primarily focused on the practice of backdating stock options, when company insiders retroactively pick an ebb in the stock price to determine an option's value, maximizing the potential windfall for the award's recipient.

Backdating isn't necessarily illegal, as long as it's properly disclosed and accounted for. As they sift through the backdating morass, the Justice Department, the SEC and state prosecutors in New York are trying to separate the instances of ignorant bungling from those involving calculated malfeasance.

DOJ_NMG_0137697

MBC Managers Plead Guilty In $830 Million Securities Fraud (AP)

AP, February 28, 2007

MIAMI - Two managers at Mutual Benefits Corp. pleaded guilty to securities fraud and agreed to pay about $830 million in restitution to investors, authorities said Tuesday.

Carol Traina and Bari Wiggins each pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to commit securities fraud in connection with Mutual Benefits' billion dollar securities offering, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Southern District of Florida. Both face up to five years in prison.

Mutual Benefits, which was closed by federal regulators in May 2004, sold investment interests in life settlements. Investors would buy interest in life insurance policies at a discount from terminally ill or elderly people in need of cash. The investors collect the benefit when the insured person dies.

Traina, an office manager, misrepresented the safety and security of the investments and admitted to helping distribute false and misleading life expectancy, the U.S. Attorney's Office said in a statement.

Wiggins, who managed the policy services department, admitted that she acquired the insurance policies, knowing that sales agents were misleading investors, authorities said.

Telephone message left for Traina's attorney, Melvin Sidney Black, and Wiggins' attorney, Jane Serene Raskin, were not immediately returned Tuesday.

A sentencing was scheduled for May 8.

Former FDA Official Gets Three Years Probation, Fine (FLSUNSEN)

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, February 28, 2007

Former Food and Drug Administration Commissioner Lester Crawford was sentenced to three years probation and fined more than $89,000 for failing to disclose he owned shares in companies the agency regulated.

Crawford, 69, pleaded guilty in October to two misdemeanor charges of making false filings and violating federal conflict-of-interest laws.

Feds To List Witnesses In Nacchio Trial (DENP)

By Andy Vuong, Denver Post Staff Writer

Denver Post, February 28, 2007

Ex-Qwest execs Szeliga and Mohebbi could be key to the government case against their former boss.

Federal prosecutors will produce for the first time Thursday a list of witnesses they plan to call during the criminal insider-trading trial of former Qwest chief executive Joe Nacchio.

U.S. District Judge Edward Nottingham has ordered the government to compile the list for the defense. It's unclear whether it will be made public. The defense has to submit its witness list by March 16.

James Payne, former senior vice president of Qwest's Government Systems Division, said Tuesday that he expects to be called to testify during the trial, which is set to begin March 19 in federal court in Denver.

"I'm involved on both sides of the case," Payne told The Denver Post in a phone interview from Washington, D.C. "I'll be subpoenaed by one side or the other, and perhaps both."

Payne joined Qwest in August 1999 and worked directly with Nacchio on government contracts, including those with clandestine agencies that may play a key role in Nacchio's defense.

Former Qwest chief financial officer Robin Szeliga, former Qwest president Afshin Mohebbi and former board member Tom Stephens could be key witnesses for the government.

Payne is the first former Qwest official to publicly disclose that he expects to be involved during the trial. Payne said he has been contacted by prosecutors and defense attorneys a number of times. Court filings suggest he may be more helpful to the defense.

Asked whether he expects to play a big role in the case, Payne said: "I don't think I have a choice."

Nacchio is accused of selling $100.8 million in Qwest stock in early 2001 while he knew the company's finances were deteriorating. He has pleaded not guilty to 42 charges of illegal insider trading.

Nacchio's attorneys have said he had a positive outlook on Qwest during that time because he alone, among his inner circle of top executives, in Denver knew the company was in line to receive large top-secret government contracts.

Payne has verified Nacchio's contention that potential classified contracts were not included in Qwest's public statements about its prospects, according to court filings by Nacchio's attorneys. Specifically, in a November 2005 interview with the government, Payne said he did not include the contracts in his financial reports until they came to fruition because he saw them as speculative.

According to a separate court filing, Qwest received $200 million in 2000 and $322 million in 2001 in federal contracts, which represented about 1.5 percent of its overall revenue.

Payne left Qwest in May 2005 and now works for Bechtel, a government contractor based in San Francisco.

Although the Department of Justice hasn't disclosed its witnesses, it has compiled a list of people who are not allowed to be interviewed by attorneys in a separate Securities and Exchange Commission civil case that's pending against Nacchio and several former Qwest officials.

The government doesn't want these people interviewed in the civil case because they could be called as witnesses in the criminal case.

The list has 28 names, including Szeliga, Mohebbi and Stephens. The list hasn't changed since it was disclosed in court filings last year, said Forrest Lewis, attorney for former Qwest accountant Frank Noyes, a defendant in the civil case.

The SEC alleges in the civil suit that former Qwest officials fraudulently boosted revenues by $3 billion from 1999 to 2002. Qwest later restated much of that revenue.

Staff writer Andy Vuong can be reached at 303-954-1209 or avuong@denverpost.com.

Fine And Probation For Former F.D.A. Chief (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, February 28, 2007

The former commissioner of the Food and Drug Administration was ordered to pay about $90,000 in fines for lying about stock he owned in companies regulated by the agency. At his sentencing in federal court, the former official, Lester M. Crawford, was also given three years' supervised probation and ordered to perform 50 hours of community service. Dr. Crawford pleaded guilty last October to having a conflict of interest and false reporting of information about stock he and his wife owned.

CRIMINAL LAW:

House Leaders Reach Deal On Subpoenas (HILL)

By Susan Crabtree

The Hill, February 28, 2007

House leaders will not fight subpoenas for information from the U.S. Attorney's Office in San Diego stemming from a criminal investigation into activities related to the bribery case against Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.), according to a release by Speaker Nancy Pelosi's (D-Calif.) office yesterday.

The chairmen of three committees involved, working with the House General Counsel's office, have been negotiating for the last two months about how to respond to subpoenas for documents the U.S. Attorney sent the House Appropriations, Armed Services and Intelligence panels late last year.

It was unclear at press time how much GOP ranking members of the committees were consulted about which documents to hand over.

A Democratic leadership aide insisted that Republicans were consulted because it involved "their documents."

But Brian Kennedy, spokesman for Minority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio), said his boss was not kept in the loop during any part of the negotiation process.

"We were not party to or made aware of any of the agreements," he said.

That is a distinct departure to what happened last year after the FBI raided the office of Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.), when the leadership of both parties invoked the Speech Debate Clause of the Constitution.

"… Because all of the information being provided to the U.S. Attorney is privileged under the Speech and Debate Clause of the Constitution, the committees have agreed to decline to assert the privilege with respect to that information," the statement from Pelosi's office said.

"The agreements permit the committees to cooperate with the investigation in a manner that respects the constitutional prerogatives of the House and does not impair the committees' functioning or compromise their legislative and oversight responsibilities," the release said.

The negotiations went so smoothly that the U.S. attorney's office withdrew the subpoenas and the committees have already handed over some of the documents requested.

DOJ_NMG_0137699

Elizabeth Phillips, an Appropriations staffer, and Rebecca Kuhn, who formerly worked as Cunningham's executive assistant, were also subpoenaed to testify. They are scheduled to testify tomorrow before a grand jury, according to the statement.

"Under the agreements, the five outstanding subpoenas – one to each of the three committees for documents, one to a current committee staffer for testimony, and one to a former committee staffer for testimony — have been withdrawn," said the statement. "The committee have agreed to voluntarily provide the Department [of Justice] with copies of some documents immediately (which has already happened), and to voluntarily provide the Department with access to other documents over the next several weeks."

Pelosi also said although she was aware of the negotiations, she was not actively involved in them and that "all decisions were made by the committee themselves."

"The current committee chairmen took the same cooperative approach toward the Office of the U.S. Attorney as did the committee chairmen in the last Congress," she said.

Deal Reached On Cunningham Subpeonas (AP)

AP, February 28, 2007

Three House committees subpoenaed in connection with the bribery investigation into imprisoned former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham and his associates reached an agreement with prosecutors Tuesday allowing the subpoenas to be withdrawn.

Under the agreement, five outstanding subpoenas will be withdrawn and the committees will voluntarily hand over documents in addition to material already provided, according to a statement released by Brendan Daly, a spokesman for House Speaker Nancy Pelosi.

Two committee staffers will appear March 1 before the federal grand jury in San Diego that has been considering evidence stemming from the Cunningham case, Daly said.

The subpoenas were sent in December and January to the Appropriations, Armed Services and Intelligence committees and the two staffers.

A spokeswoman for the U.S. attorney's office in San Diego did not immediately return a call for comment.

Cunningham, a San Diego-area Republican, was sentenced in March to more than eight years in prison for accepting $2.4 million in bribes in exchange for steering government business to defense contractors.

Earlier this month, the grand jury indicted a former top CIA official and a San Diego defense contractor on fraud and money laundering charges in an investigation that spun off from the Cunningham probe. The defense contractor, Brent Wilkes, was also charged in a separate indictment along with a New York mortgage banker on charges of bribing Cunningham.

The subpoena deal comes after nearly a year of negotiations over the documents that began while the House was still under Republican control.

"The agreements permit the committees to cooperate with the investigation in a manner that respects the constitutional prerogatives of the House and does not impair the committees' functioning or compromise their legislative and oversight responsibilities," Daly said.

The Justice Department has clashed with Congress in the past over its investigations of lawmakers. Republicans and Democrats alike were furious when the FBI raided the office of Democratic Rep. William Jefferson of Louisiana in May for evidence in a corruption investigation.

Group Asks Gonzales To Review Small's Conduct (WP)

By Jacqueline Trescott, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 28, 2007

A Washington watchdog group yesterday asked the attorney general to investigate whether Smithsonian Secretary Lawrence M. Small violated the law by using federal money to pay for travel and other expenses.

The group also asked the Justice Department to determine whether the Smithsonian Board of Regents, which is chaired by John G. Roberts Jr., chief justice of the Supreme Court, broke the law by approving Small's expenses.

In a letter to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington said the $90,000 in unauthorized expenses that Small accumulated between 2000 and 2005 was "troubling." Questions raised by Smithsonian's inspector general about Small's expenses were first reported by The Washington Post on Sunday.

"Mr. Small's conduct not only diminishes the stature of the Smithsonian Institution, it smacks of self-dealing and self-enrichment at the expense of the general public. The Board of Regents failure to take action against Mr. Small -- incomprehensibly choosing to endorse his conduct instead -- is similarly distressing," said the letter, signed by Melanie Sloan, CREW's executive director, a former federal prosecutor. The group describes itself as nonpartisan; it has received funding from liberal Democratic sources.

DOJ_NMG_0137700

Sen. Charles Grassley (R-Iowa), ranking member of the Senate Finance Committee, has asked Roberts, chancellor of the Smithsonian Regents, to review what Grassley has called "lavish expenditures" by Small. Grassley said the board appeared to be "rubber-stamping the actions of Secretary Small and turning a blind eye to very serious issues raised by the inspector general." The senator suggested this week that the Smithsonian's budget be cut because of excessive spending and proposed changing the composition of the Board of Regents.

"One idea is whether the upcoming federal budget resolution should limit or redirect Smithsonian funding," Grassley said. "Another idea is introducing legislation to improve governance from the Board of Regents, similar to my legislation on the Red Cross. As far as I can tell, Congress hasn't taken a serious look at the Smithsonian's governing statute in a hundred years."

The Smithsonian, the largest complex of museums in the world, receives 70 percent of its budget from the federal government.

Acting Smithsonian Inspector General A. Sprightley Ryan reviewed Small's expenses last month and in a confidential memo to the Regents said that "overall we saw no evidence of fraud or abuse associated with the expense transactions reviewed." However, she added, a number of transactions were "not properly documented or were not in accordance with Smithsonian policies."

After some of Small's expenditures were questioned, the Regents rewrote some of the rules governing him to make sure there were no violations.

Small said last night that he was proud to work with the Regents. "They have obviously come to their conclusions about the various reports that have come out. And I am perfectly comfortable with their conclusions," said Small, after attending a reception Tuesday evening on Capitol Hill for the 10th anniversary of the Smithsonian Latino Center. He said he didn't have any knowledge of the letter to Gonzales.

Deputy Sheriff Charged With Child Pornography (RMN)

Rocky Mountain News, February 28, 2007

A 53-year-old Arapahoe County sheriff's deputy has been indicted by a federal grand jury on child pornography charges.

Douglas Morrill Peek of Centennial is charged with transportation, possession, distribution and receipt of child pornography.

He was arrested by the FBI this morning without incident and made his initial appearance in U.S. District Court in Denver this afternoon.

Count one of the indictment alleges that Peek transported, via the Internet, a movie containing child pornography.

Count two charges Peek with possession of a desktop computer containing numerous images of child pornography, including images of toddlers being forced to engage in sexual activity.

Count three alleges that Peek used his computer to distribute an image containing child pornography via the Internet.

Count four charges that Peek knowingly received an e-mail containing child pornography.

If convicted he faces up to 20 years in a federal prison and up to a $250,000 fine.

"The Department of Justice will pursue and prosecute those who commit crimes involving the exploitation of children, no matter who they are, or what position they hold," said United States Attorney Troy Eid.

"This case is being brought as part of Project Safe Childhood.

More Jail Time For IC Man (ICPC)

By Mike McWilliams, Iowa City Press-Citizen

The Iowa City Press-Citizen, February 28, 2007

An Iowa City man already serving 10 years in prison for lascivious acts with a child received an additional seven-plus years behind bars for storing child pornography on his home computer.

Jackie Dean Burtlow, 40, pleaded guilty to receipt of child pornography. A federal judge initially sentenced Burtlow to 10 years and two months in prison but gave him credit for 33 months previously served for related state charges, which leaves seven years and five months.

According to a news release from the U.S Department of Justice:

The FBI started investigating Burtlow in May 2004 when agents in Cleveland found an e-mail that was later determined to have been sent from Burtlow's computer. Police searched Burtlow's Iowa City residence and seized a computer that contained numerous images, including video clips of children engaged in sexually explicit conduct.

When questioned, Burtlow admitted that he had child pornography stored on his computer and also said he had chatted and sent e-mails to other people about child pornography, according to the release.

Judge James Gritzner told Burtlow, “This is a very serious offense,” according to the release. Gritzner also referred to Burtlow as having acted on his criminal desires by sexually assaulting a child and to the high degree of recidivism associated with the crime, the release states.

In May 2004, a 13-year-old girl told interviewers that Burtlow had engaged in inappropriate sexual contact with her, and police arrested Burtlow for third-degree sexual abuse. He pleaded guilty to two counts of lascivious acts with a child, and a Johnson County judge sentenced him to 10 years in prison in November 2004.

FIU Couple Heading To Jail (MIH)

By Jay Weaver

Miami Herald, February 28, 2007

A federal judge slammed two former FIU employees with maximum prison sentences for their roles in an intelligence-gathering network for the Cuban government.

Convicted ex-Florida International University academics Carlos and Elsa Alvarez apologized Tuesday as a pair of tearful defendants, expressing regret for a secret life of informing on Miami's exile community for Cuba.

"Please accept my heartfelt apologies for all the wounds and pain caused by my actions," Carlos Alvarez, 62, said to a packed federal courtroom in Miami.

"I broke the law," said his wife, Elsa, 56. ``I take full responsibility. I'm very sorry."

The judge didn't buy any of it.

U.S. District Judge K. Michael Moore slammed Carlos Alvarez with the maximum five-year prison sentence for conspiring to act as an unregistered Cuban agent and Elsa Alvarez with the maximum three years' imprisonment for harboring her husband's illicit intelligence work and failing to report it to authorities.

The harsh sentences marked the closing chapter to the Alvarezes' life as once-accomplished Cuban exiles who are now viewed by many as "spies" for Cuban leader Fidel Castro.

The case shook Miami's exile community to its foundation because the couple's targets included their former boss, FIU president Modesto "Mitch" Maidique, and other Cuban-American leaders.

The Alvarezes entered guilty pleas to lesser charges in December, when the U.S. attorney's office agreed to drop allegations that the couple were unregistered Cuban agents -- offenses that could have carried up to 10 years in prison had they been convicted at trial. On Tuesday, prosecutors had recommended five years for Carlos Alvarez but only 21 months for Elsa Alvarez.

`FAMILY DEVASTATED'

"The family is absolutely devastated," attorney Steven Chaykin, who represented Carlos Alvarez, told reporters outside the courthouse. Elsa's lawyer, Jane Moscowitz, said their sentences were ``all too high."

The couple's five children, including a 13-year-old, told the judge how much the family has "suffered" since the Alvarezes' arrests early last year.

In sentencing them, Moore acknowledged the couple's supporters who testified about their honesty, integrity and spirituality as Catholics, but he condemned them for breaking federal law with their ``personal foreign policy."

"For all these years, they were in a sense leading a double life," Moore said, calling their crime a "deceit and betrayal" of the exile community.

He ordered the Alvarezes to surrender on April 27. Carlos Alvarez, a longtime FIU professor who resigned last year, has been in custody at the Federal Detention Center in downtown Miami since his arrest in January 2006. Elsa Alvarez, an FIU counselor on unpaid leave, was in custody through June, when the judge released her on a $400,000 bond.

During Tuesday's hearing, their attorneys tried to portray them as sympathetic exile figures who tried to bridge the Cold War chasm between Cuba and the United States through a dialogue of educational and cultural exchanges involving the Cuban Intelligence Service.

But the Alvarezes and their lawyers kept insisting the information passed along to Cuban agents was "innocuous" and "harmless gossip," causing "no harm" to the United States or the exile community.

"I reached out to people with power or who had access to power," Carlos Alvarez said in court Tuesday. ``It would require innocuous information . . . The method that I used was unfortunately wrong."

Elsa Alvarez said her husband's goal was to "help Cubans to become unified" on both sides of the Florida Straits. "I believe Carlos acted in good faith at all times," she added.

DOJ_NMG_0137702

TALE OF BETRAYAL

Chaykin said Carlos Alvarez was betrayed by Cuban agents and FBI agents who coaxed a confession from him during three interviews in 2005. That was the basis for the indictment against him and his wife.

But prosecutors portrayed the couple's work as ``classic intelligence-gathering activity."

"They worked for the directorate of the Cuban Intelligence Services and provided ``sensitive information on the exile community's leaders," said U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta. ``That is far from innocuous."

At sentencing, prosecutor Matthew Axelrod said Carlos Alvarez began gathering intelligence for Cuba in 1977 and that Elsa Alvarez became aware of it in 1982, making some contacts with Cuban agents herself.

He said they both relied on shortwave radios, computers and encrypted information to correspond with their Cuban intelligence handlers and also traveled to Cuba and other countries to meet them.

Axelrod noted that Alvarezes' home computer contained files on:

• FIU president Modesto Maidique's personal finances and private business ventures.

• A "redacted" U.S. government study on the ``status of telecommunications in Cuba."

• Brothers to the Rescue leader José Basulto, including that "an investigation should continue" into ``the ties he has to the CIA, the Cuban American [National] Foundation and financial interests such as Bacardi."

• A personal contact who had met with Richard Nuccio, then-President Bill Clinton's special advisor for Cuba, who "was very depressed" by Cuba's shootdown of two Brothers to the Rescue planes killing three Cuban-American men and a Cuban exile and the subsequent Helms Burton law toughening the U.S. embargo against Cuba.

• Lula Rodriguez, a Miami-Dade Democrat who later became personal assistant to then-Attorney General Janet Reno and eventually deputy assistant secretary of state for public affairs in the Clinton administration.

ANOTHER REVELATION

Axelrod also revealed that Carlos Alvarez had informed two academic colleagues, Fordham University professor Orlando Rodriguez and Spaniard Miguel Escotet.

He had asked both men to write letters of support for leniency.

"He knows he's betrayed them, yet he's calling on them to support him," Axelrod said, adding that such a betrayal was ``astounding."

A moment later, Chaykin questioned Rodriguez in the courtroom, asking him if he wanted to withdraw his supportive letter as well his live statement to the court. "Nothing at all," Rodriguez said.

Hollywood Chief Defends Exposing Probe (AP)

By Wanda J. Demarzo

AP, February 28, 2007

Hollywood Police Chief James Scarberry, who admitted he leaked information about an ongoing federal probe of his department, defended his decision Tuesday, saying the FBI told him he could use his "discretion" in discussing the probe with others.

Scarberry told as many as eight city officials about the two-year undercover investigation, but insists that he did not tip off the targets of the probe.

Scarberry said he "has his suspicions" who leaked the information to those involved, but doesn't believe it came from within his department or City Hall.

On Thursday, three veteran Hollywood cops -- Kevin Companion, Stephen Harrison and Jeff Courtney -- were arrested, accused of a wide range of crimes, including extortion, bribe-taking, dealing in stolen property, protecting a rigged, high-stakes card game, cargo theft and transporting a big shipment of heroin.

A fourth officer, Thomas Simcox, 50, who is cooperating with authorities, is expected to appear for arraignment Wednesday in federal court in Fort Lauderdale.

FBI STING

The group was caught in a FBI sting in which agents posed as members of a New York mob family who wanted protection for its South Florida operations. Companion, who was the alleged ringleader, recruited the other three officers, authorities said.

But before the feds could identify whether other officers were involved, they were forced to shut down the probe because Courtney and Companion were tipped off.

Simcox is reputed to have approached a number of veteran officers hoping to hire them to work for the crime family, but the officers turned him down.

DOJ_NMG_0137703

The department has launched an internal investigation into whether other officers knew about the corruption and failed to report it.

CASES AT RISK

The arrests could jeopardize more than 60 criminal cases handled by the four detectives. Prosecutors began sending letters to defense attorneys representing clients involved in the cases, advising them of the situation.

Among the more high-profile cases that could be affected is that of former state legislator Barry Kutun, who is accused of hiring an underage girl for sex. Simcox was the lead investigator in the case.

But prosecutors say it's too early to say whether the arrests will taint pending criminal cases. In a recent scandal involving BSO sheriff's deputies, the state attorney's office sent out a list of 61 deputies -- some of them suspects -- whose cases were tied to falsification.

But in October, about 50 of the deputies received letters from the state attorney's office clearing them. Very few criminal cases handled by the deputies led to acquittals as a result of the scandal.

But Public Defender Howard Finklestein insists that criminal cases involving the Hollywood cops will be impacted.

"Those indictments will be very powerful and persuasive to a jury. I think if any of those detectives are the one who saw the person with the drugs or commit the crime, the case is lost," Finklestein said.

He added that his office is not only reviewing pending cases handled by the accused officers, but also older cases in which someone entered a plea or was convicted.

"I think we're going to see the prosecution dropping cases," Finklestein said.

Former Officer Pleads Guilty To Possessing Stolen Firearms (AP)

By Sue Lindsey, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 28, 2007

ROANOKE, Va. (AP) — A former officer charged in a federal investigation of corruption in a rural sheriff's department pleaded guilty Tuesday to one count of possessing stolen firearms.

Patrick Martin, who was a sergeant in the vice unit of the Henry County Sheriff's Department, faces a maximum sentence of 10 years in prison and a fine of $250,000. In exchange for his plea in U.S. District Court, prosecutors dropped two other weapons counts.

Martin was among 13 members of the department, including former sheriff H. Franklin Cassell, and seven civilians indicted last fall in a scheme to sell drugs and other evidence seized from criminals.

Thirteen other defendants named in the indictment have entered guilty pleas to charges that include racketeering conspiracy, narcotics distribution, weapons counts and obstruction of justice. Guilty pleas from two others are expected by next week, Assistant U.S. Attorney Thomas Bondurant said.

A trial for Cassell, who is charged with impeding federal officers' investigation and money laundering, is set for June.

Martin's case had been set for a jury trial but he decided Tuesday morning to plead guilty instead, his attorney, Art Strickland, said.

"His family was under so much stress," Strickland said.

During the court hearing, Bondurant played a recording from portions of a three-hour interview that an FBI agent and a state police officer conducted with Martin in which he said he was not aware of any drugs or guns stolen from the sheriff's department by officers.

"At the start of the interview, Martin flatly denied any knowledge of law enforcement misconduct," the prosecutor said.

He later acknowledged having "maybe three or four" guns at home, according to the recording.

Strickland said outside of court that the sheriff's department had limited storage space, and at one point officers were told to take weapons and other evidence home for safekeeping.

"He never used any of the guns," he said.

One shotgun that Martin returned to the department as the federal investigation of the department intensified last year was manufactured in 1904 and was considered a collector's item worth between $800 and $2,000, Bondurant said.

Ex-councilman's Conviction Tossed (MACOMBD)

By Jameson Cook, Macomb Daily Staff Writer

Macomb Daily, February 28, 2007

Secret communications between judge, government attorneys result in order for third trial

A federal appeals court reversed the conviction of a former Warren city councilman on fraud charges because of a federal judge's secret communication with government lawyers during jury deliberations in his first trial.

Advertisement

William Barnwell's convictions for theft, embezzlement and conspiracy were dismissed and the case was remanded back to the U.S. District Court, a Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals panel ruled Tuesday.

"I've said all along I'm innocent," an elated Barnwell said from his Warren home Tuesday afternoon shortly after the ruling was made public. "I believe in this country and I believe in the justice system. ... Now I can get my life back. My name is clear and I can get back to work."

Barnwell, 60, a city councilman from 1999 to 2003 and former director of the Michigan Regional Council of Carpenters, was convicted by a federal jury in 2004, along with co-defendants Sandra and David Williamson, for inducing union staffers to help build a house for the Williamsons in St. Clair County in the late 1990s. Sandra Williamson was the administrative assistant for the top official at the union.

An initial trial -- which included two other defendants who were later removed from the case -- ended in a hung jury in fall 2003. But Barnwell and the Williamsons were convicted in May 2004 in a second trial.

In a 2-1 decision, the appeals panel said that Barnwell's constitutional rights to due process and effective defense counsel were violated because Judge Bernard Friedman communicated with lawyers from the U.S. District Attorney's Office during jury deliberations for the first trial.

Assistant U.S. attorney Keith Corbett went to the judge after the FBI was conducting a telephone wiretap in an unrelated case and heard a reference to the Barnwell case -- the results of an informal jury vote, which is supposed to be done in secret. An FBI agent said that a juror was the sister of a subject in the unrelated case, and the judge and government lawyers discussed the potentially contaminated juror. The judge also met with the jury foreman.

The discussions were kept from the defense attorneys in the case, a move that the appeals court determined tainted the case not only for the first trial but also the second trial in which a new jury found Barnwell guilty.

The communications finally were revealed in March 2005, long after the second trial was over, by U.S. Attorney Walter Kozar.

The ruling revealed few details of the separate criminal investigation by the FBI.

"The defendants in the case were from Macomb County like the individuals captured by the wiretap," the ruling says. The investigation, according to oral arguments, involved illegal gambling, extortion and racketeering, and "public corruption," the panel says.

Judges Damon J. Keith and Gilbert S. Mettitt note that Friedman kept the discussions secret to protect the integrity of the FBI investigation, which FBI officials told the judge had been ongoing for 15 years. However, they noted that is not good enough reason to do so. They say that the only instances in which such a case should be kept out of an open courtroom is for a "compelling state interest" or in matters of "national security."

The appeals court decision is especially unusual not only because it could result in a third trial but that it overturns the conviction in the second trial for issues in the first trial, noted Larry Dubin, a law professor at University of Detroit Mercy.

The appeals judges do not specifically indicate how the secret communications in the first trial affected the second trial, only suggesting that the mere "appearance of impropriety" affected justice in the case.

"The effort by the trial judge and the prosecution to save a wiretap, which the same trial judge had authorized, at the expense of a fair trial, reeks of the type of impropriety we need to avoid," says the opinion, authored by Keith. "When we fail to protect a defendant's fundamental rights, we fail in our calling as judges.

"What strikes us as the most disconcerting is that the government and trial judge kept the communications from the defense counsel during the entire second trial."

Dubin said he understood Friedman's reasoning.

"The judge's motive was trying to balance two powerful competing interests," Dubin said. "I have sympathy for a judge who gets involved in a web of conflict that were not of his own doing."

In her dissenting opinion, Judge Martha Craig Daughtrey says there is no "controversy" to decide or "remedy" to issue regarding the constitutional arguments because the second trial cured any potential violations in the first trial.

A new trial "is exactly what the defendant received in this case, and there is no challenge whatever to the fairness of his second trial," Daughtrey says. "Hence, the majority should ask itself: What is to be gained by providing the defendant with a second fair trial?"

Barnwell's attorney, Arthur Weiss, said Tuesday afternoon he was pleased with the ruling but could not comment on the ruling because he had not read it.

Weiss commended U.S. attorney Kozar, despite being his adversary in the case, for "doing the ethical thing" and revealing the communications during the appeal process.

Weiss also would not criticize Friedman, saying he is an "outstanding judge" whom "I hold in the highest regard."

Gina Balay, spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in Detroit, said officials were reviewing the case and could not comment on whether attorneys would seek a third trial against Barnwell.

During the trial, the defendants maintained their innocence. They said the actions by the union agents were charitable work after a company that the Williamsons hired to work on their home failed to complete the job and went out of business.

Defense attorneys also claimed it was a government attempt to target MRCC secretary-treasurer Ralph Mabry, Sandra Williamson's boss, through her.

Mabry was convicted last year of illegally obtaining discounts from vendors to build his home in Grosse Pointe Park, according to a published report.

Barnwell was sentenced to two years probation, with the first six months to be served in home confinement. He also was ordered to pay a $10,000 fine and $9,188 in restitution, and serve 350 hours of community service.

Barnwell's conviction had no connection to his service as a councilman. He decided against running for re-election in 2003. He said Tuesday he may run for the council again.

Barnwell, who is married and has three adult sons, also said Tuesday that he and his family were enjoying the ruling.

"She stood by me like a soldier," he said of his wife, Sandra.

He said his status as a convicted felon has been difficult to deal with as he has felt ostracized.

"I feel like a convicted murderer," he said of society's view of him.

Mom Taught Children To Fake Retardation (AP)

AP, February 28, 2007

(AP) - TACOMA, Wash.-A woman admitted Monday that she coached her two children to fake retardation starting when they were 4 and 8 years old so she could collect Social Security benefits on their behalf.

Rosie Costello, 46, admitted in U.S. District Court that she collected more than $280,000 in benefits, beginning in the mid-1980s. Most was from Social Security, but the state social services agency paid $53,000.

Costello pleaded guilty to conspiracy to defraud the government and Social Security fraud. Her son, Pete, 26, pleaded guilty earlier this month. Federal prosecutors in Seattle said Monday authorities had not yet located her daughter, Marie.

According to the plea agreement, Costello began coaching her daughter at age 4, and later used the same ruse with her son. He feigned retardation into his mid-20s - picking at his face, slouching and appearing uncommunicative in meetings with Social Security officials.

Social Security workers became suspicious and uncovered a video of Pete Costello ably contesting a traffic ticket in a Vancouver courtroom.

Pete Costello is scheduled to be sentenced May 11 and faces from six months to a year in prison, as well as $59,000 in restitution.

Rosie Costello is scheduled for sentencing May 17. Her standard sentencing range was not immediately available, but in the plea agreement she agreed to repay the government.

Two Indianapolis Men Received Prison Terms Friday For Mortgage Scams. (INDYSTAR)

The Indianapolis Star, February 28, 2007

Federal judges sentenced John Wagner, 46, to 37 months in prison and Frankie Lamont Howard, 38, to 24 months.

Since a federal fraud task force was formed in 2002 to look into the area's rash of mortgage crimes, 58 people have been convicted, including Wagner and Howard, who each had pleaded guilty to charges of mail fraud and money laundering.

Wagner conspired with Promise Land Mortgage owner Romero Brice, who was sentenced Tuesday to 87 months in prison.

Wagner secured investors whom Brice used to defraud Michigan lender ABN Amro of $2.73 million by falsifying 53 loan applications, U.S. Attorney Susan Brooks reported.

Wagner also was ordered to make restitution of $1.8 million.

Real estate investor Howard rigged 31 loan applications and resold the houses at inflated prices to straw buyers he recruited, Brooks reported.

According to Brooks, Howard bought properties primarily in low-income neighborhoods in Indianapolis.

From April to October 2002, Howard obtained loans of about $1.7 million on properties worth about $439,300 by submitting fraudulent loan documents and inflated appraisals, the U.S. Attorney's Office said.

First Bank lost about $1.2 million in the scam.

The longest prison term in Central Indiana for mortgage fraud was a 170-month sentence received in 2003 by mortgage banker Jeffrey Neely, who authorities said was the mastermind of a $2.5 million scam.

3rd Person Charged In $4.2 Million Mortgage Fraud (AP)

AP, February 28, 2007

INDIANAPOLIS - Two men who authorities said lined up properties or investors in a multimillion dollar mortgage-fraud scheme were sentenced to prison.

Federal judges on Friday sentenced John Wagner, 46, to three years and a month in prison and Frankie Lamont Howard, 38, to two years. Both pleaded guilty to charges of money laundering and conspiracy to commit mail fraud, prosecutors said.

Wagner and Howard were involved a scheme that obtained more than $4 million in fraudulent mortgage loans on houses in low-income neighborhoods of Indianapolis.

Authorities said Wagner recruited investors for Romero Brice, the owner of Promise Land Mortgage in Indianapolis. Brice obtained houses at fair market values and then used the investors to buy back the houses at three to four times the price, authorities said.

Brice was sentenced on Tuesday to seven years in prison.

Prosecutors said Brice obtained at least 83 loans between late 2000 and early 2002 based upon false documents, with Wagner involved in 53 of the loans valued at about $2.65 million. Howard was charged with engaging in 31 fraudulent transactions for about $1.65 million.

The judges also ordered Wagner and Howard, both of Indianapolis, each to pay more than $1 million in restitution.

Ex-trooper Gets 5 Years For Soliciting Sex (BOS)

By Brian R. Ballou,

The Boston Globe, February 28, 2007

Boy he met via the Internet was actually an agent

A federal judge gave the minimum sentence to a former Massachusetts state trooper and decorated Army war veteran who admitted trying to solicit sex over the Internet from someone he thought was a 14-year-old boy.

Brian O'Hare, 46, of Lancaster was sentenced to the mandatory minimum of five years in prison yesterday in federal court in Boston after he pleaded guilty.

"The Internet has brought many wonderful things to the world, but it has also brought many vile things," US District Court Judge George A. O'Toole Jr. said moments before issuing the sentence to O'Hare, who had faced a maximum of 30 years in prison.

O'Hare, dressed in a black suit, walked into the courtroom with his brother, sister, and sister-in-law. Standing next to his lawyer, Richard Egbert, he gave a brief statement before the sentencing.

"I take full responsibility for my actions, and I want to apologize to my family for the embarrassment and shame I've caused." He also apologized to the Army National Guard and the Massachusetts State Police.

O'Hare told the judge he wanted to get this episode of his life behind him.

"I want to be a father again," he said. As he was led out of the courtroom, O'Hare waved to his relatives. His sister, tears running down her face, waved back.

The sentencing capped a dramatic fall from grace for O'Hare. He joined the Massachusetts National Guard in 1990 and rose to the rank of lieutenant colonel, leading the 211th Military Police Battalion, according to a Guard spokesman. He was the Battalion's executive officer at Bagram Air Force Base in Afghanistan from August 2002 to February 2003 and also served in Iraq, overseeing training of Iraqi police in Balad from April to September 2003.

O'Hare received two Bronze Stars for his service in Iraq and Afghanistan, as well as medals for good conduct, meritorious service, and achievement. He led military security at Logan International Airport after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks and during the 2004 Democratic National Convention. He was a member of the Massachusetts State Police for 20 years, last assigned to the Holden barracks.

A State Police spokewoman said officials would not comment on the case, because O'Hare is no longer a trooper. O'Hare must now submit a DNA sample to a state database and register as a sex offender upon his release.

Prosecutors alleged that O'Hare, using the name Ranger 1777, struck up a conversation in August 2005 with someone he thought was a 14-year-old boy in an America Online chatroom titled "SCHOOLBOIS SHOWERSM4." But the person he was chatting with was actually FBI agent Jeremy Morrissey, working in an Internet sting operation.

DOJ_NMG_0137707

O'Hare was arrested last February when he drove to Meadow Glen Mall on Route 16 in Medford for what he thought was a meeting with the boy.

Former State Trooper Sentenced To 5 Years In Prison In Internet Sex Case (BOS)

The Boston Globe, February 28, 2007

BOSTON --A former Massachusetts state trooper and Army war veteran who admitted to trying to solicit someone he thought was a teenage boy over the Internet for sex has been sentenced to five years in prison.

Brian O'Hare, 46, was given the mandatory minimum sentence Tuesday in U.S. District Court after pleading guilty. He faced up to 30 years in prison.

"The Internet has brought many wonderful things to the world, but it has also brought many vile things," Judge George A. O'Toole Jr. said at the sentencing.

O'Hare allegedly had several sexually explicit chats with an FBI agent who was posing as a 14-year-old high school boy, and the two arranged to meet at the Medford Mall, authorities said. O'Hare was arrested by FBI agents in February 2006 after he showed up.

O'Hare lived in Lancaster and was assigned to the Holden barracks. He served in the Massachusetts National Guard in Afghanistan and Iraq from August 2002 until December 2003.

"I take full responsibility for my actions, and I want to apologize to my family for the embarrassment and shame I've caused," said O'Hare, who also apologized to the Army and the Massachusetts State Police.

Police Probe Death In Organ Donation Case (LAT)

By Charles Ornstein And Tracy Weber

The Los Angeles Times, February 27, 2007

Police are investigating whether a Kaiser Permanente transplant surgeon attempted to hasten the death last February of a 26-year-old San Luis Obispo man on life support in order to harvest his organs more quickly.

The allegations, if true, would constitute a grave breach of the nation's organ transplant rules, as well as a public relations setback for those promoting organ donation, experts in transplantation said.

San Luis Obispo police and the Medical Board of California are looking into the conduct of Dr. Hootan Roozrokh, who was a surgeon at Kaiser's now-defunct kidney transplant program in San Francisco.

At issue is whether he ordered excessive doses of powerful pain medication to speed the death of Ruben Navarro, according to several sources familiar with the case who spoke on condition of anonymity because investigations are ongoing.

Roozrokh could not be reached for comment. His attorney, M. Gerald Schwartzbach, acknowledged that his client may have made some mistakes but said that "he certainly wasn't the only one."

"I just don't think that Dr. Roozrokh ought to be crucified as a result of this incident or his career destroyed," said Schwartzbach, who declined to address specific allegations.

Medical board spokeswoman Candis Cohen said her agency is also investigating the conduct of a second physician present during the incident. That person, Kaiser officials confirmed, is Dr. Arturo Martinez, who at the time was the surgical director of Kaiser's transplant program. Martinez declined to comment Tuesday.

Neither surgeon was attempting to recover the organs on behalf of Kaiser; rather, they were working on behalf of the group that procures and distributes organs in much of Northern and Central California. Transplant surgeons commonly perform such duties.

Dr. Timothy Pruett, president-elect of the United Network for Organ Sharing, called the allegations "horrific."

He worried that they could scare people away from donating organs to help the 95,000 people awaiting life-saving transplants nationwide. UNOS is the federal contractor charged with ensuring the safety and equity of the nation's transplant system.

"We have to guarantee to the public that we're not going to go out and kill people to get their organs," said Pruett, chief of transplant surgery at the University of Virginia. "That's the worst of those cheap sci-fi books: 'The ghoulish docs are out pulling the plugs on these poor defenseless people, trying to snatch their organs.' "

According to San Luis Obispo police, Navarro was near death after being found unresponsive at Casa de Vida, a long-term care facility. He was taken to nearby Sierra Vista Regional Medical Center and placed on life support. When it became clear he would not live, his family agreed to allow his organs to be harvested, and transplant surgeons were summoned Feb. 3, 2006.

State law specifies that transplant doctors cannot direct the treatment of potential organ donors before they are declared dead. This restriction is designed, in large part, to assuage concerns that organ retrieval might take priority over patient care.

In this case, however, Roozrokh entered the operating room at Sierra Vista and was directing the administration of drugs to Navarro, the sources said.

When the patient didn't die, Roozrokh allegedly told nurses: "Let's just give him some more candy," according to a person who was briefed on what took place but spoke on condition of anonymity because of the ongoing investigations.

Navarro was still alive about 30 minutes after being taken off life support — the time limit set to ensure the viability of the organs.

He was then returned to the intensive care unit, where he died early the following morning. His organs were not retrieved, police said in a statement.

Within days, nurses at the hospital — alarmed about what had taken place — alerted their superiors, Sierra Vista spokesman Ron Yukelson said. An investigation was immediately launched, and regulators and the coroner were notified.

Yukelson said that outside physicians are not authorized to treat patients at the 165-bed hospital. In this case, "the transplant surgeon began to direct care in the operating room," he said.

Schwartzbach said Navarro's treating physician was also in the operating room at the time, along with a coordinator from the organ procurement group. Both could have asked Roozrokh and Martinez to leave, he said.

Doctors' Hospital Owner's Sentencing Rescheduled (SHRVTIMES)

By Michelle Mahfoufi

Shreveport (LA) Times, February 28, 2007

The same day Doctors' Hospital filed for bankruptcy last week, owner David LeBlanc's attorneys asked a federal judge to reschedule his sentencing on a charge of illegal campaign contributions.

It will be the third time LeBlanc, who is facing jail time and/or a fine, will have had his sentencing postponed.

"The defendant is cooperating in an ongoing criminal investigation, and the government cannot make an informed recommendation as to the defendant's sentence until the defendant completes his cooperation," the trial attorneys with the U.S. Department of Justice Criminal Division Public Integrity Section wrote in an earlier motion.

There was no reference to the ongoing investigation in the latest request to reschedule LeBlanc's sentencing to March 23.

A Department of Justice spokeswoman said she could not comment on the investigation.

LeBlanc pleaded guilty last March after an internal investigation by LifeCare -- the hospital chain he co-founded 15 years ago with two dozen leased beds within Doctors' Hospital -- found he and then-Government Relations Vice President Donald Boucher made federal political contributions in their and their wives' names.

LifeCare used corporate funds to reimburse LeBlanc and Boucher $50,000 through bonuses, salary increases and expense reimbursements. LeBlanc authorized the payments.

LeBlanc and Boucher, both fired by LifeCare, admitted to knowingly and willfully violating the law. LeBlanc agreed to pay a $100,000 civil penalty and Boucher agreed to pay a $50,000 penalty. Both also entered criminal plea agreements with the Department of Justice.

LeBlanc could receive up to one year in jail and/or a maximum fine of $25,000 or 300 percent of the corporate donations, whichever is greater.

Boucher faces five years in prison and a $250,000 fine. However, the government can recommend a lesser sentence based on a defendant's cooperation.

LifeCare agreed to pay a $50,000 civil penalty, strengthen corporate policies on the illegality of reimbursing political contributions and conduct an employee-training program.

The Federal Election Commission said there was no indication the candidates -- including Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La.; Reps. Jim McCrery, R-Shreveport, and William Jefferson, D-New Orleans; and former Sen. John Breaux, D.-La. -- knew the contributions were illegal.

LeBlanc told The Times in December the contributions were a "silly mistake."

"I didn't understand the law at the time," he said. "The reality is it's a misdemeanor. It's like an expensive traffic ticket at the end of the day."

Last Wednesday, Doctors' Hospital filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy in Texas, claiming it owes more than $10 million to nearly 1,000 creditors.

Three of those creditors filed an involuntary bankruptcy petition in Shreveport in an effort to keep the proceedings local.

No decision has been made in that case.

Roughing It, Senate Style (RC)

DOJ_NMG_0137709

By Emily Heil

Roll Call, February 28, 2007

Members of Congress have been complaining for months that the White House has been keeping them in the dark. But on Monday night, at least one Senator couldn't blame the dim on the nefarious doings of that other branch of government.

An accident at a construction site Monday night caused a power outage in a portion of Northwest D.C. that includes the swanky Ritz-Carlton apartments in the West End neighborhood.

And that, in turn, left many of the building's well-heeled residents, including Sen. Frank Lautenberg (D-N.J.), stumbling around in the darkness. HOH overheard the toe-stubbing Senator admitting that he wasn't much of a Boy Scout (er, that is, he wasn't prepared), since he had only a flashlight and one candle — but nothing to light it with. (Lautenberg is a well-known anti-smoking crusader, so it's understandable that he doesn't keep a lighter around for the occasional stogie.)

In a scene surely out of a Jack London book, our hero tried bravely to use the stove to light the candle. Finally, he gave up in frustration and decamped to a nearby hotel. Where, presumably, he wouldn't have to rough it.

But another of the building's Senatorial residents, Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), showed he was of sterner stuff. A spokesman tells HOH that Reid remained home during the ordeal.

Evil Armies, Beware. We knew our favorite governor/action star was up to something here in Washington more blockbuster-worthy than discussing Medicare (snore) and getting Congressional briefings. Turns out, California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) has much more exciting plans, like possibly destroying an alien force.

At a briefing in the Capitol on Tuesday, a reporter ribbed the governator about his photo, which appeared on the cover of that day's Roll Call. In the picture, Schwarzenegger is gesturing with an outstretched arm, a slightly demonic expression on his face. "Is there a worse picture of you?" the snarky scribe queried.

Schwarzenegger had a better assessment of the pic. "It actually looks more like I'm about to get ready to attack an evil army or something," he joked.

Look out, Democrats.

Co-Stars Unite? And in an odd coincidence, detected only by those with long memories and a taste for cheesy action movies, also in the Capitol on Tuesday was none other than Vanessa Williams, Schwarzenegger's co-star in the 1996 D.C.-themed flick "Eraser." Remember it? Yeah, neither do we.

The striking "Ugly Betty" star was in the Capitol to meet with Members, including House Majority Whip James Clyburn (D-S.C.), Senate Majority Whip Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) and Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) to discuss the Special Olympics. Williams is on the board of the event and was in town for a movie screening.

Volz Meets the Press. Neil Volz, former aide to convicted ex-Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), may have gotten some unwanted headlines when he pleaded guilty in May 2006 to federal conspiracy charges in the ongoing investigation into disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff's dealings on Capitol Hill.

But just a few weeks ago, Volz was mingling — voluntarily — with members of the Fourth Estate. An HOH spy belatedly tipped off HOH that Volz attended the after-party hosted by CQ following the Washington Press Club Foundation's dinner Feb. 6 at the Ritz-Carlton.

According to our fly on the wall, Volz was wearing a newly grown beard and a dark suit, which practically constituted a disguise since many of the aides and reporters in attendance didn't recognize him. An acquaintance jokingly asked what Volz was doing walking "into the lion's den," said the HOH tipster, who added that the disgraced aide who now faces prison time appeared to be in "good spirits."

Unlikely Love Match. Can a Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee gal and a guy backin' Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) for president find love? We hope so, for the sake of the author of this Craigslist.org personal posted in the site's "missed connections" section. He had us at the title: "Pure Cap. Hill magic — meow!" And the message itself was winsome, if a little far-fetched, describing a chance meeting of two party-crossed, would-be lovers. "I saw you coming out of Dirksen. You were carrying your lunch back to the DSCC. You were having the chicken salawich [sic] from Cups ... extra pickles. I love pickles. We made eye contact. It was pure magic. I was wearing the 'Brownback 2008' shirt over my oxford. You had your jeans tucked into your boots and were wearing the most delightful tan sweater. Lambs wool? It looked so soft. Your golden hair glistened in the winter sun. What kind of conditioner do you use? If you find this, would you be up for some bipartisan action this weekend?"

Here's hoping love (or at least love of pickles) conquers all.

CIVIL LAW:

Church-state Question Before Justices (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, February 28, 2007

The Wisconsin-based Freedom From Religion Foundation has sued to get rid of crosses in city parks, to end Good Friday public holidays and, most vigorously, to thwart President Bush's faith-based initiative.

Now, the group that for 30 years has sought a firm divide between church and state will be at the Supreme Court on Wednesday in a case that could affect taxpayers' ability to challenge — and government's ability to defend — a multitude of public programs that involve groups with a religious affiliation.

The White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives was set up in 2001 to help religious groups compete with secular organizations for federal grants to provide social services.

The case before the justices focuses on regional conferences that promoted the initiative. The Freedom From Religion Foundation likened the conferences to "revival meetings" and said they boosted the grant prospects for religious groups "without similar advocacy for secular community-based organizations."

The legal question is not whether those conferences violated the constitutional separation of church and state, but more fundamentally when a taxpayer may even get into court to challenge such mingling of government and religion.

It's a question that could have national significance. Numerous outside groups have joined both sides of the case. Twelve states, backing the Bush administration, are trying to block the lawsuit. On the other side are atheists and religious organizations such as the American Jewish Congress and the Baptist Joint Committee for Religious Liberty.

"If the Bush administration were to prevail," says Annie Laurie Gaylor, co-president of the Freedom From Religion Foundation, "nobody would be able to challenge these programs. We feel that our litigation and educational efforts have never been more important."

U.S. Solicitor General Paul Clement, representing the administration, counters that if the foundation wins, judges could end up scrutinizing "every government encounter with religion … at the behest of any one of the more than 180 million taxpayers in the United States."

Typically, taxpayers cannot sue over how the government spends money, but in a 1968 case known as Flast v. Cohen the justices carved out an exception for lawsuits based on the separation of church and state. The Constitution's First Amendment says government "shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion."

The Bush administration says the Flast case allows challenges to congressional spending but not to executive branch actions. The Bush faith-based initiative was created by executive orders, not specific congressional appropriations.

A U.S. trial court dismissed the foundation's lawsuit, but the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 7th Circuit reversed it in January 2006. "The line proposed by the government … would be artificial because there is so much that executive officials could do to promote religion in ways forbidden by the establishment clause," that court said.

In the administration's appeal, Clement says Flast and other cases since 1968 connect taxpayers' right to sue with the legislative taxing and spending power.

Washington, D.C., lawyer Andrew Pincus, representing Freedom From Religion, says neither the 1968 case nor American history requires a distinction between legislative and executive actions. "The Framers (of the Constitution) were well aware of the potential for abuse of executive power in the area of religion. … There simply is no basis for concluding that they were less concerned about exercises of executive discretion than about the actions of Congress."

Supreme Court Takes Up Church-state Case (CSM)

By Warren Richey, Staff Writer Of The Christian Science Monitor

The Christian Science Monitor, February 28, 2007

A Wisconsin group says the president's faith-based initiative is illegal. But can taxpayers sue the government over funding?

President Bush's faith-based initiative is a signature program of his administration. But not all Americans share the president's belief that the government should work in close partnership with religious organizations willing to perform nonreligious public services, like running homeless shelters or drug counseling programs.

Wednesday, the US Supreme Court takes up a case that examines to what extent those opponents have legal standing to file federal lawsuits alleging that the White House's faith-based initiative amounts to unconstitutional entanglement of church and state.

The case stems from a 2002 lawsuit filed by a Wisconsin-based group called the Freedom From Religion Foundation. Members of the group filed the suit as taxpayers who objected to having their tax money used to support religion.

DOJ_NMG_0137711

Although the case revolves around the esoteric issue of taxpayer standing to sue, analysts say the case could foreshadow a shift in the Supreme Court's church-state jurisprudence. It marks the first opportunity for the high court to rule in a major religion case since the retirement of key swing voter Sandra Day O'Connor and the addition of Chief Justice John Roberts and Associate Justice Samuel Alito.

"To evaluate the importance of the case you have to look at ... what might come out of it," says Ira Lupu, a professor at George Washington University Law School and church-state scholar.

In opposing the suit in 2002, government lawyers said the Freedom From Religion Foundation had no authority to wage such a legal battle since none of the plaintiffs were able to show that they had suffered a direct and personal injury. It wasn't enough to object as taxpayers.

Sharp divide over wall of separation

Friend-of-the-court briefs filed in the case highlight starkly different visions of religious liberty in America. On one side are those who favor less or no contact between government and religion. On the other side are those who believe that separation between church and state has gone too far, triggering government hostility toward religion and the religious.

In most instances taxpayers lack legal standing to sue the government merely because they object to how the government is spending tax dollars. Instead, the courts require that someone suffer a direct and personal injury that entitles them to sue. This requirement of legal standing helps prevent the courts from becoming a quasi-legislature where policy arguments are debated rather than a forum to decide specific legal disputes.

The same principle applies in most constitutional cases. If the government violates a constitutional right, like the Eighth Amendment's prohibition on cruel and unusual punishment, the injured individual can sue in court to hold the government accountable for its abuses.

But what happens when the alleged constitutional violation involves the First Amendment's establishment clause that prohibits the government from promoting religion?

"The establishment clause is different. It is designed to limit the government from doing things which tend to favor or help people without necessarily hurting anybody in any obvious material way," Professor Lupu says. "Because of that, the rules about who can sue to complain about alleged violations of the clause are unusually important."

If you follow the normal rules that you have to be injured in some direct way before you can complain about what the government has done, the establishment clause would never get enforced in the courts, Lupu says. "The government would put up crèches and crosses and menorahs and would spend money on religion, and nobody could challenge it because nobody is hurt in obvious ways by those kinds of activities."

Exception allows taxpayers to sue Congress

Had the courts consistently enforced the rule on standing, establishment-clause cases filed by ordinary Americans would be rare to nonexistent. But in 1968 the Supreme Court carved out an exception that allows taxpayers to file establishment-clause lawsuits challenging congressional spending that benefits religion.

It is that 1968 exception that is at the center of Hein v. Freedom From Religion Foundation. The Hein in the case is Jay Hein, director of the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives.

The Bush administration is arguing that the 1968 exception only permits taxpayer lawsuits challenging appropriations by Congress that raise church-state concerns. The portion of the faith-based initiative under challenge is an activity of the executive branch that does not involve outlays of government money earmarked to religious groups.

The lawsuit challenges "executive branch activities, not a congressional program and not any financial disbursements to outside entities," writes US Solicitor General Paul Clement in his brief to the court.

"Only Congress can extract and spend 'tax money' in aid of religion, and only challenges to such exercises of congressional power will support taxpayer standing," Mr. Clement writes.

Can the executive branch be sued, too?

Lawyers for the Freedom From Religion Foundation counter that the 1968 exception applies to alleged establishment-clause violations by the government – not just Congress.

"Given their knowledge of English history, the framers [of the Constitution] were well aware of the potential for abuse of executive power in the area of religion, which included coerced payment of funds that were used by the monarch to aid religion," writes Richard Bolton of Madison, Wis., in his brief to the court on behalf of the Wisconsin group. "There simply is no basis for concluding that they were less concerned about exercises of executive discretion than about the actions of Congress."

A more freewheeling debate over the case takes place in friend-of-the-court briefs. Some urge the high court to eliminate the 1968 exception. Others want the court to expand the 1968 exception to foster greater public oversight and involvement in policing the ever-shifting line between church and state.

DOJ_NMG_0137712

Government By Law, Not Faith (NYT)

The New York Times, February 28, 2007

The Supreme Court hears arguments today in a case that could have a broad impact on whether the courthouse door remains open to ordinary Americans who believe that the government is undermining the separation of church and state.

The question before the court is whether a group seeking to preserve the separation of church and state can mount a First Amendment challenge to the Bush administration's "faith based" initiatives. The arguments turn on a technical question of whether taxpayers have standing, or the right to initiate this kind of suit, but the real-world implications are serious. If the court rules that the group does not have standing, it will be much harder to stop government from giving unconstitutional aid to religion.

Soon after taking office, President Bush established the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives, and faith-based offices in departments like Justice and Education. They were intended to increase the federal grant money going to religious organizations, and they seem to have been highly effective. The plaintiffs cited figures showing that from 2003 to 2005, the number of federal grants to religious groups increased 38 percent. The Freedom From Religion Foundation and several of its members sued. They say that because the faith-based initiatives favor religious applicants for grants over secular applicants, they violate the Establishment Clause of the First Amendment, which prohibits government support for religion.

These are profound issues, but because the administration challenged the right of the foundation and its members to sue, the courts must decide whether the plaintiffs have the right to sue in this case before they can consider the constitutionality of the faith-based programs. An appeals court has ruled, correctly, that the plaintiffs have standing.

In many cases, taxpayers are not in fact allowed to sue to challenge government actions, but the Supreme Court has long held that they have standing to allege violations of the Establishment Clause. Without this sort of broad standing, many entanglements between church and state would never make it to court.

The Bush administration is pushing an incorrect view of standing as it tries to stop the courts from reaching the First Amendment issue. Taxpayers can challenge the financing of religious activity, the administration claims, only when a Congressional statute expressly authorizes the spending. There is no statute behind the faith-based initiative.

In his decision for the appeals court, Judge Richard Posner of the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit, in Chicago, convincingly explained why this argument is inconsistent with the Supreme Court's precedents on the Establishment Clause.

Procedural issues like standing can have an enormous impact on the administration of justice if they close the courthouse door on people with valid legal claims. The Supreme Court has made it clear that taxpayers may challenge government assistance to religion. The justices should affirm Judge Posner's ruling so the courts can move on to the important question: Do the Bush administration's faith-based policies violate the Constitution?

Lawyer: FBI Knew Convicts Were Innocent (BSH)

By Denise Lavoie

Biloxi Sun Herald, February 28, 2007

BOSTON - The FBI considered the lives of four men who spent decades in prison for a murder they didn't commit "acceptable collateral damage" in the fight against organized crime, a lawyer for the families of the men said Tuesday.

Peter Limone, Joseph Salvati and the families of two other men who died in prison after being convicted in the 1965 gangland killing of Edward "Teddy" Deegan are suing the federal government for malicious prosecution.

Lawyers have not specified the amount they are seeking, but have cited court decisions that show other plaintiffs were awarded $1 million for each year in prison.

In closing arguments Tuesday, attorney Michael Avery said Boston agents knew that FBI informant Joseph "The Animal" Barboza lied when he named the four men as Deegan's killers. Barboza wanted to protect a fellow FBI informant, Vincent "Jimmy" Flemmi, who was involved in Deegan's killing, Avery said.

The men were "acceptable collateral damage" in the FBI's priority at the time - taking down the Mafia through the use of criminal informants, Avery said.

The government has argued federal authorities had no duty to share information with state officials who prosecuted Limone, Salvati, Henry Tameleo and Louis Greco. Justice Department lawyer Bridge Bailey Lipscomb said Tuesday that federal authorities cannot be held responsible for the results of a state prosecution.

Lipscomb said the state investigated the case for eight months and had 10 investigators working on it.

"To the extent that Barboza lied, someone should have gleaned that lie out of all the investigation," she said.

Salvati and Limone were exonerated in 2001 after FBI memos dating back to the Deegan case surfaced, showing the men were framed by Barboza.

DOJ_NMG_0137713

The memos were made public after they were discovered by a Justice Department task force probing the FBI's relationship with gangsters and FBI informants James "Whitey" Bulger and Stephen "The Rifleman" Flemmi.

Wrongly Convicted Say FBI Was At Fault (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, February 28, 2007

Compensation urged in closing arguments

Lawyers for four men wrongly convicted of a 1965 gangland slaying argued yesterday that the FBI was squarely to blame for withholding critical evidence during their trial and urged a federal judge to order the government to compensate them for the decades they spent in prison.

"It was more important for the FBI to protect their informants than to protect innocent people who had families," said Victor Garo, one of the lawyers, during closing arguments in a civil suit seeking more than $100 million in damages from the government on behalf of Joseph Salvati, Peter J. Limone, Henry Tameleo, Louis Greco, and their families. "Shame on our government for doing that."

The discovery of secret FBI files that were never turned over during the men's 1968 trial prompted a state judge six years ago to overturn the murder convictions of Limone, who had served 33 years in prison, and Salvati, who was paroled in 1997 after serving 30 years. Exoneration came too late for Greco, who died in prison in 1995 at age 78, and for Tameleo, who died a decade earlier at age 84.

Yesterday, a Justice Department lawyer argued that the FBI had no duty to share internal documents with state prosecutors and insisted the state was responsible for convicting the men in the slaying of Edward "Teddy" Deegan in Chelsea.

"The United States is not liable to plaintiffs because they were convicted as a result of a state prosecution," Bridget Bailey Lipscomb said. "The FBI did not initiate this prosecution, and there is no duty of the FBI to submit to state or local governments any of its internal files."

She said the FBI had shared some information about Deegan's death with local police.

Three members of Congress who were involved in a two-year investigation of the FBI's mishandling of informants and had condemned the government's handling of the Deegan case were in court yesterday for final arguments, including Dan Burton, an Indiana Republican who spearheaded the probe and formerly chaired the House Committee on Government Reform. Also present were William D. Delahunt, a Quincy Democrat, and Stephen F. Lynch, a South Boston Democrat.

Burton said he believes that all four men were wrongly convicted. "We want to make sure justice is served," he said.

US District Judge Nancy Gertner said she expects to rule by late March or early April on whether the government is liable and, if so, how much it should pay.

The judge challenged Lipscomb's effort to distance the federal government from the state prosecution, saying that state authorities had been unable to solve Deegan's slaying until FBI agents recruited hit man Joseph "The Animal" Barboza as a witness against local Mafia leaders and turned him over to state authorities.

Lipscomb said that the FBI was focusing on Barboza's testimony against Raymond L.S. Patriarca, then the New England Mafia boss, in a federal murder conspiracy case and that there was no evidence they "were even paying attention" to the Deegan case.

Lawyers for Salvati, Limone, Greco, and Tameleo ridiculed the government's assertion, saying that now-retired FBI agent Dennis Condon and his late partner, H. Paul Rico, were aware of internal FBI documents that indicated that Barboza had falsely implicated the four men, yet Condon took the stand during the 1968 trial to vouch for Barboza's credibility.

The FBI didn't disclose that agents listening in on an illegal bug had overheard Barboza and another Boston gangster and FBI informant, Vincent "Jimmy" Flemmi, seeking Patriarca's permission to kill Deegan several days before the March 12, 1965 slaying.

Juliane Balliro, a lawyer for the Limones and the Tameleos, accused Rico and Condon of engaging in "criminal, dishonest, and disgraceful conduct."

Michael Avery, a lawyer who also represents the Limones and the Tameleos, called the government's arguments frivolous.

"They were aware of [Barboza's] perjury, and they delivered him to the state knowing full well what he was going to do," he said.

On his way out of the courthouse, Salvati, 74, of the North End, said: "We waited 42 years, and we're still waiting. But we had our day in court. . . . Now we just rely on the judge."

At What Price The FBI's Treachery? (BOSH)

DOJ_NMG_0137714

By Peter Gelzinis, Boston Herald Columnist

Boston Herald, February 28, 2007

4 families abused by feds await some ju$tice

No one paid much attention 42 years ago when Edward "Teddy" Deegan, a very minor street gremlin, made his graceless exit from this vale of tears.

But then, back on the night of March 12, 1965, who could ever have imagined all who would die when this anonymous hood caught a couple of bullets in a Chelsea alley?

In a twist of fate more bizarre than ironic, the anniversary of Teddy's demise is likely to be memorialized with an epic judgment against the federal government in general - and the FBI in particular - that could exceed $100 million.

The question is not whether U.S. District Court Judge Nancy Gertner will find for the plaintiffs who were framed for the Deegan murder.

It is how much compensation she decides to award to Joseph Salvati and Peter Limone, who survived a total of 64 years in prison, as well as to relatives of Louis Greco and Henry Tameleo, who died behind bars.

So far, they have received the sincere apologies of the governor(s) who vacated their wrongful convictions, along with the condolences of congressmen who gagged on the twisted tale of FBI treachery that left a trail of human wreckage in the wake of Teddy Deegan's innocuous death.

But not a penny for all the lost years, or what has been clinically referred to as the FBI's notion, "acceptable collateral damage."

Yesterday, a fleet of lawyers described that "collateral damage" in searing detail.

Michael Avery began by reminding a packed courtroom - where a trio of congressmen sat in the front row - that Joe Salvati and Peter Limone were not supposed to be there. Our government had intended for them die in prison, Avery said, describing how bolts of electricity were scheduled to burn through the flesh of Limone, Greco and Tameleo.

The story of how a ruthlessly ambitious pair of G-men, H. Paul Rico and Dennis Condon, conspired to protect a psychotic hit man and serial killer named Joe "The Animal" Barboza was laid out in linear fashion, with the FBI's own internal documents as road signs.

"When you hear the story presented like that," Bill Delahunt remarked, "you gain a real appreciation for the culture of treachery that existed." And still exists.

As sinister and sordid as this "liability" presentation was, the most haunting aspect of what occurred in Nancy Gertner's courtroom yesterday was when the "damages" inflicted upon wives, children, grandparents, brothers, sisters, grandchildren - all the so-called "acceptable collateral damage" - was spelled out.

Unlike the families of Joe Salvati and Peter Limone, which were held together by a pair of heroic wives, Louis Greco's family perished when what had been a conventional suburban life fell apart with his imprisonment.

Greco was a hero of Bataan who was awarded 12 medals, survived 10 operations and and was fearless enough to stare down a thug like Barboza in defense of a friend. And when Teddy Deegan was killed in that Chelsea alley, Louis Greco had taken his wife to a movie . . . in Florida.

Government Contractors Must Take Early Compliance Steps (LAW)

By Ronald Schechter, Martha Cochran And Jill Newell, Legal Times

Legal Times, February 28, 2007

As spending on federal contracting reached record levels in recent years -- a reported $400 billion in 2005 alone -- the risks, as well as the rewards, of doing business with the federal government have never been greater.

The U.S. government has vowed to crack down on procurement fraud and other fraud in government programs. Last year's $3.1 billion in settlements and judgments in cases involving fraud against the government was the largest amount ever recovered in a single year. It included $615 million paid by the Boeing Co. to resolve claims relating to its use of confidential competitor information and the hiring of a former Air Force acquisition chief who had responsibility for its contracts; it also included numerous other cases involving defense procurement fraud, health-care fraud and other fraud against the government.

Last fall, the Justice Department launched a National Procurement Fraud Task Force to focus "resources at all levels of government to increase criminal enforcement" in areas of procurement fraud. The stepped-up attention to this area throughout the government may signal that the $3.1 billion record in federal fraud recoveries in 2006 could soon be broken. More than 50 inspectors general from across all government departments and agencies also are actively pursuing thousands of investigations.

In addition, powerful newly installed Democratic committee and subcommittee chairs in Congress are launching dozens of oversight investigations of alleged government and contractor abuses, focusing on the reconstruction effort in Iraq and in the U.S.

Gulf Coast following Hurricane Katrina, numerous areas of military and homeland-security procurement, the pricing of pharmaceuticals and other significant areas of federal contracting. For instance, House Oversight and Government Reform Committee Chairman Henry Waxman, D-Calif., in the first week of February began one set of hearings on alleged waste, fraud and abuse by government contractors in Iraq and another set of hearings on alleged overcharging by drug companies in federal health programs.

BROAD SWEEP

Contractors long have known that the government has a broad range of investigative and enforcement powers that can turn what would be a normal business dispute in a private commercial transaction into allegations of civil or criminal fraud, leading to massive fines and penalties, as well as disqualification from receiving new government contracts. Given the broad sweep of the government's investigative powers and the complexity of procurement rules, companies that are wholly innocent of an intent to fleece the feds may nonetheless find themselves under scrutiny. What is striking about the current environment is the scope and intensity of federal investigative and prosecutorial resources directed at this activity.

The added factor of a Democratic Congress -- with new committee chairs, frustrated in the past by what they viewed as their Republican colleagues' lack of effective oversight of the Bush administration and its perceived coziness with contractors, and eager to use their newly acquired oversight and subpoena powers -- raises the stakes enormously. While no target of a government investigation can be comfortable or secure when dealing with an inspector general, the FBI or other government investigators, managing these investigations while under the spotlight of a high-profile congressional investigation can be even more daunting.

The procurement fraud initiative, created by Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty, was modeled after his 2005 Procurement Fraud Working Group, begun when he served as the U.S. Attorney General for the Eastern District of Virginia and led the prosecution of former Air Force acquisition chief Darleen Druyun and Boeing for contract favoritism in exchange for job offers. The current initiative focuses on virtually all areas of alleged procurement fraud, from pricing irregularities and labor mischarging, to misuse of classified and procurement sensitive information, and ethics and conflict-of-interest violations.

Participants in the task force reflect the significant firepower of federal government investigatory and enforcement agencies. Chaired by Alice Fisher, the head of Justice's Criminal Division, the task force includes the FBI, the inspectors general of major federal agencies -- from the Departments of Defense, Homeland Security and Veterans Affairs, to the General Services Administration and the U.S. Postal Service -- as well as the Defense Criminal Investigative Service and other military criminal investigative organizations.

Perhaps to emphasize the seriousness of the effort, the Justice Department, on the day it announced the creation of the task force, also announced that Oracle Corp. had agreed to pay almost $100 million to settle False Claims Act allegations that a company it acquired had overcharged the government under its GSA Federal Supply Schedule Contract. The task force more recently announced a criminal case in which a former Defense Department contractor was sentenced to serve nine years in prison and ordered to pay a $3.6 million fine for his role in a bribery and fraud scheme flowing from contracts for the reconstruction of Iraq.

Beyond the work of the task force, the Justice Department has pursued numerous False Claims Act cases against pharmaceutical companies alleging mischarging under government drug contracts and benefit programs. Health-care fraud accounted for $2.2 billion in settlements and judgments recovered by the federal government last year -- a $1 billion increase over the prior year.

Agency inspectors general have become more powerful weapons in the government's procurement fraud arsenal in the almost 30 years since the enactment of the Inspector General Act of 1978. According to one report, more than 11,000 auditors, investigators and other professionals populate 57 Offices of Inspectors General throughout the federal government.

Inspector general investigations always present the risk that the matter under investigation will be referred to the Justice Department for criminal or civil prosecution. Each year, inspector general investigations lead to thousands of criminal indictments and successful prosecutions, as well as numerous Justice Department civil fraud claims, with fines and penalties totaling billions of dollars. The recent joining of forces of federal inspectors general with Justice in the Procurement Fraud Task Force signals that the level of inspector general referrals to Justice will only increase.

Moreover, because each inspector general reports semiannually to Congress, the reports have become a rich source for congressional inquiries and will continue to serve as such in the new Congress. For example, last year Congress extended the term of the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction until at least late 2008. By the end of 2006, the SIGIR had issued more than 125 audit and project assessment reports, many of them highly critical of contractor performance. In testimony before Congress in September 2006, the SIGIR said 89 criminal investigation cases were open and 25 cases had been referred to the Justice Department, four of which had resulted in convictions.

DOJ_NMG_0137716

In another area that has received significant attention lately, the Homeland Security Department's Inspector General for Gulf Coast Hurricane Recovery has issued more than 40 reports, many of which deal with the Federal Emergency Management Agency's procurement activity. Several of these audits, as well as other government reports, address the failure and fraudulent actions of contractors responding to the Katrina recovery. The inspector general's Sept. 30, 2006, report to Congress reported 439 indictments related to Katrina and 255 convictions for hurricane-related allegations and crimes.

Although the Republican-led Congress held numerous oversight hearings on some of the same issues now targeted by Democrats, the pace is quickening in the new Congress. Oversight investigations into contractor waste, fraud and abuse have already begun; initial hearings have been launched, and more are on the way. Two major congressional oversight committees -- the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform (which added the word "oversight" to its title in January) and the Senate Committee on Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs -- each took the step of adopting rules authorizing staff deposition authority, giving their large and growing staffs the ability to take testimony on the record and under oath outside the context of a formal congressional hearing. Although the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee's agenda is the broadest of any congressional committee, other House committees, such as Armed Services and Energy and Commerce, also have begun oversight hearings.

Waxman also announced plans to reintroduce legislation he called the Clean Contracting Act to assist in curbing contract abuse. Bills relating to contracting for homeland security, Iraq and private security services already have been introduced in the House. In the Senate, Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., has introduced a bill called the War Profiteering Prevention Act of 2007, which would criminalize war profiteering acts, defined as "materially overvaluing any good or service with the specific intent to excessively profit from war and relief or reconstruction activities."

TAKE THE STEPS NOW

With all of this attention, contractors cannot afford to wait for a call from the Justice Department task force, an inspector general or Congress to take action. Companies must take steps now to prevent and detect improper procurement activity and potential fraud in government programs, to mitigate the damage if any such activity is found and to develop strategies to respond to government inquiries should they arise.

To begin, every contractor must have in place an effective compliance program that includes standards of conduct, as well as mechanisms for investigating potential violations and for taking prompt and appropriate remedial steps if violations are found. Contractors should conduct self-audits in areas of government business that the company believes may be considered high risk. If any information surfaces that suggests an employee or the company has committed wrongdoing, a contractor must thoroughly investigate the event and take appropriate action. The company's goals should be to understand the circumstances surrounding any alleged wrongdoing and to maintain the initiative during any government investigation.

A company must be prepared to respond promptly to inquiries from government investigators regarding its performance of government contracts. Most government contractors understand that Justice and agency inspectors general have far-reaching investigative authority and expect contractors to cooperate with their inquiries.

It is essential that, at the earliest stages of the investigation, the contractor develop an overall response strategy. That strategy will be guided by the contractor's assessment of its vulnerability on the issues being investigated. In some instances, it may make sense to seek a prompt, amicable resolution; in others, it may be better to seek an aggressive defense on the merits.

Counsel, in particular, should focus on key objectives during an investigation: maintaining contact with the investigators; gaining a thorough understanding of all of the facts and the government's key concerns; and presenting the facts in the best light for the company. Counsel should work cooperatively with government investigators, while ensuring that the client's rights are being protected and that its position is being vigorously represented. Counsel should insist that the company be permitted a chance to present its side of the story, as well as to understand the bases for the government's claims, before the government takes formal action. In most instances, Justice Department lawyers and inspectors general staff will agree to this type of exchange.

THE COMMITTEES

Of course, managing these investigations becomes much more complex when a congressional oversight committee takes an interest. Congressional committees have the power to conduct oversight investigations into any matter within their jurisdictions. They have the power to subpoena the testimony of witnesses and virtually all documents that may be relevant to the subject matter of their inquiries. An ongoing criminal or civil investigation generally will not convince a congressional committee to back off of an oversight investigation -- or even to delay issuing a subpoena for the testimony of an individual who is the target of a federal criminal investigation.

In these circumstances, counsel is faced with a delicate balancing act, requiring careful communication with each of the investigative bodies to ensure that the contractor's rights are protected. And in these circumstances, despite the very public nature of a congressional investigation, the overriding concern of counsel must be to assure that the individual's or organization's conduct in the investigation and the witnesses' testimony in a congressional hearing do not adversely impact ongoing criminal or civil investigations by other bodies or lead to further criminal exposure.

DOJ_NMG_0137717

Ronald Schechter, a former Justice Department lawyer, is a partner in Arnold & Porter's government contracts practice group and represents clients in a variety of government investigations. Martha Cochran, also a partner at Arnold & Porter, formerly held senior counsel positions with committees of the House and Senate and for more than a decade in private practice has represented individuals and organizations in government investigations and congressional oversight matters. Jill Newell is an associate at Arnold & Porter, where her practice includes a variety of government contracts matters.

Lawyer: FBI Knew Convicts Were Innocent (AP)

By Denise Lavoie, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 28, 2007

The FBI considered the lives of four men who spent decades in prison for a murder they didn't commit "acceptable collateral damage" in the fight against organized crime, a lawyer for the families of the men said Tuesday.

Peter Limone, Joseph Salvati and the families of two other men who died in prison after being convicted in the 1965 gangland killing of Edward "Teddy" Deegan are suing the federal government for malicious prosecution.

Lawyers have not specified the amount they are seeking, but have cited court decisions that show other plaintiffs were awarded $1 million for each year in prison.

In closing arguments Tuesday, attorney Michael Avery said Boston agents knew that FBI informant Joseph "The Animal" Barboza lied when he named the four men as Deegan's killers. Barboza wanted to protect a fellow FBI informant, Vincent "Jimmy" Flemmi, who was involved in Deegan's killing, Avery said.

The men were "acceptable collateral damage" in the FBI's priority at the time — taking down the Mafia through the use of criminal informants, Avery said.

The government has argued federal authorities had no duty to share information with state officials who prosecuted Limone, Salvati, Henry Tameleo and Louis Greco. Justice Department lawyer Bridge Bailey Lipscomb said Tuesday that federal authorities cannot be held responsible for the results of a state prosecution.

Lipscomb said the state investigated the case for eight months and had 10 investigators working on it.

"To the extent that Barboza lied, someone should have gleaned that lie out of all the investigation," she said.

Salvati and Limone were exonerated in 2001 after FBI memos dating back to the Deegan case surfaced, showing the men were framed by Barboza.

The memos were made public after they were discovered by a Justice Department task force probing the FBI's relationship with gangsters and FBI informants James "Whitey" Bulger and Stephen "The Rifleman" Flemmi.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Justice Dept. Widens FBI Probe Of Deaths During Civil Rights Era (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, February 28, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Justice Department is expanding significantly its review of scores of civil-rights-era homicides that the FBI says may have never been fully investigated by local authorities.

The investigation by FBI agents will focus on about 100 deaths in 14 states allegedly caused by racial violence, FBI Director Robert Mueller said Tuesday.

The announcement came on a day when authorities in Mississippi announced that a grand jury declined to issue an indictment in the 1955 murder of Emmett Till, 14.

Till was visiting relatives in Mississippi from his home in Chicago when he was killed after whistling at a white woman.

The district attorney in Leflore County had recently sought a manslaughter charge against the woman, Carolyn Bryant Donham, who was suspected of pointing out Till to her husband to punish the boy. The grand jury on Friday said it found insufficient evidence, according to documents made public Tuesday.

The FBI had turned over its files on the case to Mississippi in 2006 after the state closed its inquiry, which did not result in an arrest.

DOJ_NMG_0137718

In Washington, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, appearing with Mueller and national civil rights leaders, said the government's expanded review of suspicious deaths would include a nationwide plea for information on other "cold cases" that never have been resolved, were misidentified as accidental deaths or were never previously reported.

"We can't right these wrongs, but we can try to bring some measure of justice," Mueller said.

Mueller did not say which cases are being reviewed. Justice said 12 of the cases being worked on were further along in the investigative process and that some new inquiries are based on information unearthed from existing FBI files. Other cases were identified from information provided by civil rights groups.

Richard Cohen, president of the Southern Poverty Law Center, said the Alabama-based organization this month provided the Justice Department information on 76 people who died between 1952 and 1968. It said the deaths are believed to have been associated with racial violence.

The law center's files included:

•The 1963 death of Sylvester Maxwell in Canton, Miss. Maxwell was castrated and mutilated.

•In 1960, the body of Fred Robinson washed ashore on Edisto Island, S.C. His eyes had been gouged out.

•Marshall Scott Jr., was found dead in a New Orleans jail in 1965. The law center said Scott had not received medical attention before his death.

John Jackson, the NAACP's national policy director, said the government's inquiry and its partial reliance on information provided by civil rights groups "continues the work of our civil rights soldiers."

The attorney general said information provided by the civil rights groups could be very valuable in the effort, but he also sought to temper expectations.

"In some cases, the perpetrators may already be dead," Gonzales said. "In some cases, we may find no federal jurisdiction. But these unsolved crimes remain on our radar, and through these expanded lines of communication we hope we can bring closure to some of these cases."

Justice Dept. To Revisit Civil-Rights-Era Killings (WP)

By Darryl Fears

The Washington Post, February 28, 2007

The Justice Department announced yesterday that it is partnering with civil rights groups to pursue the killers of scores of black men and women slain by white vigilantes in the South decades ago.

At a news conference, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III said the federal government's interest in 40 unsolved murder cases was renewed after several successful prosecutions of civil-rights-era murder suspects in recent years.

Gonzales said that witnesses who had been silent are now prepared to come forward and that technological advances can help authorities link suspects to crimes. Gonzales and Mueller said their agencies will soon open investigations into 12 cases, but they would not name the cases or give their locations.

With so many years gone by, the lawmen said, the task of closing the cases will be daunting as witnesses die and evidence disappears.

Yesterday's announcement came on the heels of news that a grand jury in Leflore County, Miss., declined to indict Carolyn Bryant, the wife of one of two men who admitted to killing teenager Emmett Till in 1955 after an all-white jury acquitted them.

In the Till case, federal authorities could only assist state authorities, because a five-year statue of limitations on federal investigations had expired. Federal officials said the statute does not apply in cases where a criminal enterprise such as the Ku Klux Klan was implicated in a crime and continues to exist.

Gonzales said he could not guarantee that cases would be solved. "In some cases, perpetrators may already be dead," he said. In others, he said, the federal government may have no jurisdiction to investigate.

"Many individuals have quite literally gotten away with murder," Mueller said. But the government has a message to killers who remain alive, he said: "You've not gotten away with anything. We're still on your trail."

The NAACP, the National Urban League and the Southern Poverty Law Center will share information with federal authorities as partners in a new Civil Rights Era Cold Case Initiative, Mueller said. The Southern Poverty Law Center has compiled a list of 76 unsolved cases, mostly in Mississippi, Alabama and Georgia.

Cases cited by the law center include those of Izell Henry, who was beaten to death in Greensburg, La., in 1954, a day after voting; James Brazier, who was beaten to death in front of his wife and children by police officers in Dawson City, Ga., in 1958; Sylvester Maxwell, whose castrated and mutilated body was found on a Canton, Miss., road in 1963; and Maybelle Mahone, who was killed in Molena, Ga., in 1956 by a white man who said Mahone had "sassed" him.

DOJ_NMG_0137719

Similar unsolved lynchings were a Southern tradition well before the civil rights murders. Over a half-century starting in 1882, about 2,500 black people were killed, mostly by white men, for suspicious reasons, according to the book, "Festival of Violence," written by E.M. Beck and Stewart E. Tolnay.

"The history of lynching . . . has left a stain on the fabric of this country," Stephanie Jones, executive director of the National Urban League's Policy Institute, said at the news conference. "Removing that stain means working with law enforcement to bring justice."

Jones said the Urban League and other black civil rights groups had pressed the Justice Department to investigate for decades, with little result.

In recent years, three civil-rights-era murder cases have been solved.

In 2005, Edgar Ray Killen was convicted of manslaughter and sentenced to three 20-year sentences for his role in the deaths of three civil rights workers in Mississippi in 1964.

Ernest Avants was sentenced to life in prison in 2003 for the murder of Ben White, an elderly black farmworker, in 1966.

In 2001, Thomas Blanton Jr. and Bobby Frank Cherry were convicted of murder for the 1963 bombing of the Sixteenth Street Baptist Church in Birmingham, Ala.

Byron De La Beckwith died in prison at age 80 in 2001 after being convicted in 1994 for the 1963 murder of Mississippi civil rights leader Medgar Evers.

The case of Till was reopened in 2004 after the airing of a PBS documentary, "The Murder of Emmett Till." His alleged killers, half brothers Roy Bryant and J.W. Milam, were long dead, but filmmakers found witnesses who say Bryant's wife, Carolyn, was in the truck that took Till away.

The grand jury's refusal to indict Bryant "is basically the end of the road, as far as anything happening," said Alvin Sykes, president of the Emmett Till Justice Campaign. "Most of the cases in the future will rely on second-generation witnesses, people who were told something by other people."

FBI, Justice Department To Reopen Nearly 100 Cases Of Unsolved Civil Rights-era Killings (MINNST)

By Dan Duray, Hearst Newspapers

Minneapolis Star Tribune, February 28, 2007

WASHINGTON - The Justice Department and the FBI announced Tuesday that federal investigators will reopen nearly 100 cases of unsolved civil rights-era deaths.

Of those cases, the FBI is currently investigating 10 to 12 involving slayings or disappearances from before 1969, occurring mostly in southern states, FBI Director Robert Mueller told a news conference.

"In too many instances, the truth has been hidden for too long," he said.

"... We cannot turn back the clock, we cannot right these wrongs, but we can try to bring a measure of justice to those who remain."

The new investigations involve collaboration between the FBI's 56 regional offices and civil rights organizations such as the NAACP and the Southern Poverty Law Center, according to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

Gonzales said at the same news conference that prosecuting the crimes would be tricky because of the passage of time since the crimes, the deaths of potential witnesses and the incorrect classification of some of the deaths as accidental.

"I want to emphasize that these are very, very difficult cases to make," Gonzales said. "We need as much help as we can to prosecute these cases, and that's why it's so significant that these groups have been willing to come forward and share information with us."

The Southern Poverty Law Center has already submitted 74 cases of possible murder to the FBI for examination. Richard Cohen, president and CEO of the center, praised the government's newly invigorated efforts.

"I don't know why it took so long," Cohen said. "Should these cases have been looked at earlier? Absolutely. Is that any reason not to look at them now? Absolutely not."

Cohen said that of the 40 people whose names appear on the Civil Rights Memorial in Montgomery, Ala., because they died in the struggle for equal rights, no arrests have been made in the deaths of 13.

Earlier this month, lawmakers in both the House and the Senate reintroduced legislation that would create an Unsolved Crimes Section within the Justice Department and an Unsolved Civil Rights Crime Investigative Office within the FBI.

Justice Officials Looking To Prosecute Old Civil Rights Murders (GANNETT)

By ANA RADELAT And JERRY MITCHELL, Gannett News Service

DOJ_NMG_0137720

Gannett News Service, February 28, 2007

WASHINGTON - Federal officials plan to announce today they will expand the number of old civil rights murder cases reopened for investigation.

Seventeen FBI field offices are working with local law enforcement officials to determine which cases may be suitable for prosecution. The NAACP and the Southern Poverty Law Center are assisting the effort.

Federal officials already have prosecuted a 71-year-old reputed Ku Klux Klan member, James Seale, in the killings of two black teens in Mississippi almost 43 years ago. Seale has pleaded not guilty to kidnapping and conspiracy to commit kidnapping in connection with the May 2, 1964, abduction, beating and drowning deaths of Henry Dee and Charles Moore, both 19.

Justice Department officials also were helping state officials in Mississippi reopen the Emmett Till case. Till, 14, of Chicago, was killed in 1955 after he reportedly wolf-whistled at a white woman. But a court official in Leflore County, Miss., confirmed Monday that a grand jury decided not to indict anyone in Till's killing.

A bill pending in Congress would create a cold-cases unit inside the Justice Department to re-investigate killings from the civil rights era. FBI field offices have uncovered 51 unresolved killings from that time period, and the Southern Poverty Law Center has a list of 127 race-related killings between 1954 and 1968 - a number it concedes could be much higher.

Since 1989, authorities in Mississippi and six other states have re-examined 29 killings from the civil rights era, leading to 28 arrests and 22 convictions.

FBI, Justice Department To Revisit Civil Rights-Era Killings (BLOOM)

By Robert Schmidt

Bloomberg, February 28, 2007

Feb. 27 (Bloomberg) -- U.S. law enforcement authorities said they have reopened about 100 cases involving civil rights-era killings and are focusing on bringing charges in about a dozen.

FBI Director Robert Mueller and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said the government is working with the NAACP and other civil rights groups to revive the investigations, mostly arising from attacks in the South dating back more than 40 years. It isn't clear how many cases will be brought, Gonzales said, because some may not fall under federal jurisdiction and some suspects and witnesses are dead.

``Much time has passed on these crimes. The wounds they left are deep, and many of them still have not healed," he told a news conference in Washington today. ``We are committed to re- examining these cases and doing all we can to bring justice to the criminals who may have avoided punishment for so long."

Today's announcement is a result of a directive last year by the Federal Bureau of Investigation to its 56 field offices to revisit unsolved civil rights cases and identify hate crimes that occurred prior to 1969.

A number of the unsolved cases were referred to the bureau by the Southern Poverty Law Center, which will assist the government in the investigations, along with the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and the National Urban League, officials said.

Helping Family Members

Leaders of those groups, appearing with Gonzales and Mueller today, said they hoped the revived probes would help provide closure to relatives of the victims. Many of the cases weren't investigated or were dropped or covered up because the victims were black and their killers white.

``There were incredible miscarriages of justice," said Richard Cohen, president of the Montgomery, Alabama-based law center. ``I think it would be wrong to give families false hope, but I think it would be right to say to them that people still care."

Federal and state law enforcement officials have brought several high-profile prosecutions of civil rights-era killings in recent years, winning convictions against Byron de la Beckwith for the 1963 murder of NAACP official Medgar Evers and former Ku Klux Klan leader Edgar Ray Killen for killing three volunteers registering black voters in 1964.

In January, the U.S. unsealed the indictment of James Ford Seale, a 71-year-old former Ku Klux Klan member in Mississippi who allegedly participated in the 1964 murder of two black teenagers. Seale has pleaded not guilty to kidnapping and conspiracy charges in federal court in Jackson, Mississippi.

Attorney General To Civil Rights Era Killers: 'We Are Still On Your Trail' (ABC)

By THERESA COOK And LAUREN GARBER

ABC News, February 28, 2007

Justice Department, FBI and Civil Rights Groups Team to 'Combat an Old Scourge'

DOJ_NMG_0137721

Feb. 27, 2007 — Beatings. Lynchings. Murders. Cold cases still cast a shadow on the struggles of the civil rights era. Richard Cohen, president and CEO of the Southern Poverty Law Center, offers a story from 1959: "Mack Charles Parker — he was taken out of jail and lynched by eight people, including the jailer, a former deputy sheriff, and a preacher. No one was ever arrested for that crime."

"The history of lynchings and racial violence in this country has left a stain on the fabric of our country," says National Urban League Executive Director Stephanie Jones. "And it is up to all of us to work to eradicate that stain." Now, Jones' and Cohen's groups, along with the NAACP, are pooling resources with the Department of Justice and the FBI to cast a wider net for tips to solve some of these decades-old cases.

"And so we have joined together, forming these new partnerships to combat an old scourge," says FBI Director Robert Mueller. "Many trails ran cold, and many cases were effectively closed. But for the victims, and their parents, children, siblings, friends, the wounds are never closed."

The Next Step

This move is part of a broader FBI initiative started in February 2006. At that time, the FBI asked its 56 field offices to take a second look at many of these unsolved cases. During the past year, those offices worked with state and local law enforcement, civil rights organizations and community members to put together information on nearly 100 cases. "New information, sometimes an innocuous small bit of information," notes Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, "can be crucial to breaking these decades-old cases."

This thought, echoed by Cohen, has guided him through his work. "Some of those cold cases turned out to have a few burning embers, and leads were pursued," he continues, "and we hope that some of the cases that are today still considered cold turn out to have some burning embers."

Rekindling Interest in Forgotten Cases

The <ahref="http://www.splcenter.org/index.jsp#http://www.splcenter.org/index.jsp">Southern Poverty Law Center is quite familiar with cold cases. The group started gathering names and cases for a civil rights memorial in the late 1980s. "And I think we realized at the time some names had been forgotten and names where justice had not been achieved," says Cohen, "so what we did was to build the civil rights memorial to try to rekindle interest in some of these cases." The memorial, dedicated in 1989, includes the names of 40 individuals who died during the tumultuous times. Since then, the SPLC has compiled information on 76 additional black men and women who died under suspicious circumstances between 1952 and 1968.

No Indictment In '55 Emmett Till Slaying (BVND)

By Jack Elliott Jr. And Allen G. Breed

The Belleville News Democrat, February 28, 2007

JACKSON, Miss. - All but closing the books on a crime that helped give rise to the civil rights movement, a grand jury has refused to bring any new charges in the 1955 slaying of Emmett Till, a black teenager who was beaten and shot after whistling at a white woman in the Mississippi Delta.

The district attorney in rural Leflore County had sought a manslaughter charge against the white woman, Carolyn Bryant Donham, who was suspected of pointing out Till to her husband to punish the boy for what was a grave offense in the segregated South.

But the grand jury last Friday issued a "no bill," meaning it found insufficient evidence, according to documents made public Tuesday.

Federal authorities decided last year not to prosecute anyone, saying the statute of limitations for federal charges had run out. Mississippi authorities represented the last, best hope of bringing someone to justice. No one has ever been convicted in the slaying.

"You're looking at Mississippi. I guess it's about the same way it was 50 years ago," said a disappointed Simeon Wright, 64, a black man who heard his cousin whistle. "We had overwhelming evidence, and they came back with the same decision. Some of the people haven't changed from 50 years ago. Same attitude. The evidence speaks for itself."

He added: "I don't know how many years I have left on this Earth. We can leave this world and say, `Hey, we tried. We tried to get some justice in this, and we failed.'"

Till, a 14-year-old boy visiting from Chicago, was kidnapped from his uncle's home in the town of Money and killed after he wolf-whistled at Donham, a shopkeeper at the Bryant Grocery & Meat Market.

Three days later, his mutilated body was found in the muddy Tallahatchie River, weighted down with a cotton gin fan. His left eye was missing, and his right eye was dangling on his cheek. The body was identified only by a ring he was wearing.

DOJ_NMG_0137722

His mother, Mamie Till-Mobley, who died in 2003, held an open-casket funeral in Chicago, and a photograph of Till's disfigured face in Jet Magazine had a powerful effect on public opinion, letting the world see what was happening in the South.

Roy Bryant, Donham's husband, and his half brother, J.W. Milam, were acquitted of the crime by an all-white jury in 1955. The two men later confessed in an interview with Look magazine. Both are now dead.

The FBI reopened the case in 2004 but decided in 2006 not to press charges. The case was turned over to local prosecutors, with the FBI suggesting they take a closer look at Donham. Some witnesses said a woman's voice could be heard at the scene of the abduction.

David Beito, a history professor at the University of Alabama who has researched the case extensively, said Tuesday there is probably no one else left to arrest in the case. He said it is hard to underestimate the importance of the Till case, which took place the same year as the Montgomery, Ala., bus boycott.

"It gave a jump-start to the civil rights movement," he said. "It did not create the civil rights movement, but it made it more into a mass movement. It really mobilized people."

Donham, who remarried, is now 73 and has declined interviews. A telephone number for her was disconnected Tuesday.

District Attorney Joyce Chiles, a black woman who grew up near where the killing took place, was in court Tuesday and not immediately available for comment.

Wright said: "J.W. Milam and Roy Bryant died with Emmett Till's blood on their hands. And it looks like everyone else who was involved is going to do the same. They had a chance to come clean. They will die with Emmett Till's blood on their hands."

Horace Harned, 86, a former Mississippi legislator and member of the Sovereignty Commission, a state agency that worked clandestinely to preserve segregation, said he was glad to see no charges filed. He said the suggestions that Donham had a role in the crime are "a bunch of foolishness."

"Of course, I don't believe in murder. That's the wrong thing. It always backfires on you. That shouldn't have happened," he said. But he added: "You can't correct all the ills of the past. If we did, the Southerners were treated much worse than anybody back in the Civil War."

After Inquiry, Grand Jury Refuses To Issue New Indictments In Till Case (NYT)

By Shaila Dewan

The New York Times, February 28, 2007

ATLANTA, Feb. 27 — After a new investigation of the notorious 1955 killing of Emmett Till, a grand jury in Leflore County, Miss., has declined to issue any new indictments, effectively ending any further prosecution of a crime that fueled the civil rights movement.

Two men, now dead, admitted to the killing in 1956 after they were acquitted by an all-white jury in Sumner, Miss. But the Justice Department reopened the case in 2004 in search of others who had participated in the beating and shooting of Emmett, a black 14-year-old. By then, so much time had passed that the country store where the victim was said to have whistled at a white woman, Carolyn Bryant, was in ruins.

The new inquiry was conducted by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, which turned over a report of more than 8,000 pages to the district attorney, Joyce L. Chiles. Ms. Chiles sought a manslaughter charge against Ms. Bryant, 73, the last known living suspect in the case, but the grand jury decided last week not to issue an indictment, a court clerk said. The action was reported Tuesday in The Jackson Clarion-Ledger.

“If Carolyn Bryant is truly not guilty in being involved in the killing of Emmett Till or there is insufficient evidence to indict her, then the grand jury did the right thing,” said Alvin Sykes, the president of the Emmett Till Justice Campaign.

The grand jury’s decision illustrates the difficulty of prosecuting such old cases, even as the Justice Department has begun its first systematic effort to identify them. At a news conference on Tuesday in Washington, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and Robert S. Mueller III, the director of the F.B.I., said about a dozen such cases had been selected, from a list of about 100, for immediate action.

“New information, sometimes an innocuous small bit of information, can be crucial to breaking these decades-old cases,” Mr. Gonzales said. “A secret harbored for many years can be the piece of evidence we need to make our case.”

Last month a federal grand jury in Jackson, Miss., indicted James F. Seale, 71, on kidnapping charges in connection with the 1964 killing of two black men near Meadville, Miss. Mr. Seale is in custody awaiting trial.

The Till case was reopened after Ms. Chiles and Justice Department officials met with Mr. Sykes; Keith Beauchamp, a filmmaker who made a 2005 documentary about the case; and Simeon Wright, the cousin who was sharing a bed with Emmett when white men came to the house and took him away in a pickup truck.

DOJ_NMG_0137723

It is not clear how many people participated in what followed: Emmett was beaten, shot, weighted down and thrown in the Tallahatchie River. Some have speculated, based on a recollection by Mr. Wright's father, Mose, that he heard a "lighter" voice, that Ms. Bryant was in the truck for all or part of the night.

Ms. Chiles declined to comment on the case, and grand jury proceedings are secret.

Mr. Sykes has repeatedly expressed hope that the investigation will ultimately be made subject to public scrutiny.

"We just want the truth," he said, "and that's all we want. As much as the truth can be told and gained."

The FBI Is Reopening 70 Cold Cases From The Civil Rights Era. (WJTV)

WJTV-TV, February 28, 2007

The FBI says it hopes to solve dozens of cases that were racially based crimes.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales syas the suspects have not gotten away with anything, and the government is still on their trail.

With the passage of time, some worry witnesses and evidence may now be unavailable.

Jerry Mitchell of the Clarion-Ledger says there is another concern with these cases, "one of the problem with these cases is they weren't adequately investigated at the time."

Mitchell also says, "these were cases where guys got away with murder and everybody knew they were getting away with murder, so its kind of injustice at its height." Bearly half of these murders happened in Mississippi.

Two Local Civil Rights Era Deaths Will Get FBI Review (WEDF)

WDEF-TV, February 28, 2007

The F-B-I today announced they plan to review around a hundred unsolved deaths from the Civil Rights era in the South.

And that includes two cases here in the Tennessee Valley.

One involves a bombing in Ringgold in 19-60.

Mattie Greene died from the explosion under her house.

And the other is the death of a 15-year old boy in 19-58.

Larry Bolden was shot by a white police officer.

FBI Director Robert Mueller says"As you know all too well, many murders during the Civil Rights era were not fully investigated, were covered up or were mis-identified as an accidental death or disappearance."

The F-B-I will re-open about a dozen cases to begin with.. But they aren't saying which ones yet.

FBI To Reopen Memphis Civil-rights Era Cold Case (WMC)

WMC-TV, February 28, 2007

Nearly 50 years ago, 16-year-old Larry Payne was shot to death at what used to be a housing project.

Tonight, his death is one of dozens of unsolved civil rights cases the FBI will re-open.

The death of Larry Payne was overshadowed by the assassination of Doctor Martin Luther King.

"I remember the articles, I remember how we felt, but there was so much going on. It kind of got lost," said NAACP Executive Director Johnnie Turner, who walked in the sanitation worker march that led to Payne's death.

She's glad to know his is one of 76 civil rights cold cases the FBI has pledged to re-open.

"As long as those who perpetuated that crime are allowed to go free, then justice has not been served," she said.

Memphis historian G. Wayne Dowdy says records show Payne died at the hands of a Memphis Police officer after the officer accused him of looting. "Larry Payne was a high school student, an African American high school student in Memphis who participated in the March 28 demonstration led by Dr. King that eventually turned violent."

He says later that day the officer shot Payne outside his Fowler Holmes Housing Project, now a barren property.

"I pray that Larry Payne's family will get the justice and the closure that they so richly deserve," said Turner.

We spoke with the family's attorney. He says he hasn't been in recent contact with them, but he looks forward to hearing how this case unfolds.

"It's partly an attempt to come to grips with the events of the civil rights movement. Particularly the violence that ensued," said Dowdy.

Turner says it sends the message you can run, but you can't hide.

Local FBI officials say the office has not officially begun the new investigation.

Feds Probe Two Civil Rights Era Deaths Here (WCNC)

WCNC-TV, February 28, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0137724

They are called "the forgotten". They are 76 people who died in from 1952 to 1968. Were their deaths racially motivated? Tuesday the FBI was pulling those case files and taking a second look at the information in them. Two of the cases are local.

Shelby, North Carolina – 1957: Dr. George Washington Singleton practiced medicine in Cleveland County. The story of his death is told by details in his death certificate and a letter from the Charlotte chapter of the NAACP obtained by WCNC.

"It was a predawn explosion," the letter reads. It happened on Hudson Street, "early Tuesday morning April 30, 1957." Dr. Singleton died instantly. The NAACP letter says "he was burned beyond recognition." The cause of the fire was never determined.

While the now 50-year-old letter says the Charlotte chapter of the NAACP did not think his death was civil rights related, Singleton's wife did. She worked for the Cleveland County NAACP chapter at the time of the explosion. She requested an investigation.

From Washington today, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales talked about these cases.

"Much time has passed on these crimes," he said. "The wounds they left are deep and many of them still have not healed."

Now, decades later, what happened to Dr. Singleton will be looked at one more time.

The other case under review is an inmate death from 1960 in Gaston county. A Department of Justice record says Clarence Cloninger suffered a heart attack in jail and was refused medical attention and died. But few records remain to provide much more detail. Still, the Department of Justice says they are determined to at least look at these old case files.

"We are committed to reexamining these cases and doing all we can to bring justice to the criminals who may have avoided punishment for so long," Gonzales said. "Our message is clear: You have not gotten away with anything. We are still on your trail."

No Indictment In '55 Emmett Till Slaying (AP)

By Jack Elliott Jr. And Allen G. Breed, Associated Press Writers

AP, February 28, 2007

All but closing the books on a crime that helped give rise to the civil rights movement, a grand jury has refused to bring any new charges in the 1955 slaying of Emmett Till, a black teenager who was beaten and shot after whistling at a white woman in the Mississippi Delta.

The district attorney in rural Leflore County had sought a manslaughter charge against the white woman, Carolyn Bryant Donham, who was suspected of pointing out Till to her husband to punish the boy for what was a grave offense in the segregated South.

But the grand jury last Friday issued a "no bill," meaning it found insufficient evidence, according to documents made public Tuesday.

Federal authorities decided last year not to prosecute anyone, saying the statute of limitations for federal charges had run out. Mississippi authorities represented the last, best hope of bringing someone to justice. No one has ever been convicted in the slaying.

"You're looking at Mississippi. I guess it's about the same way it was 50 years ago," said a disappointed Simeon Wright, 64, a black man who heard his cousin whistle. "We had overwhelming evidence, and they came back with the same decision. Some of the people haven't changed from 50 years ago. Same attitude. The evidence speaks for itself."

He added: "I don't know how many years I have left on this Earth. We can leave this world and say, `Hey, we tried. We tried to get some justice in this, and we failed.'"

Till, a 14-year-old boy visiting from Chicago, was kidnapped from his uncle's home in the town of Money and killed after he wolf-whistled at Donham, a shopkeeper at the Bryant Grocery & Meat Market.

Three days later, his mutilated body was found in the muddy Tallahatchie River, weighted down with a cotton gin fan. His left eye was missing, and his right eye was dangling on his cheek. The body was identified only by a ring he was wearing.

His mother, Mamie Till-Mobley, who died in 2003, held an open-casket funeral in Chicago, and a photograph of Till's disfigured face in Jet Magazine had a powerful effect on public opinion, letting the world see what was happening in the South.

Roy Bryant, Donham's husband, and his half brother, J.W. Milam, were acquitted of the crime by an all-white jury in 1955. The two men later confessed in an interview with Look magazine. Both are now dead.

The FBI reopened the case in 2004 but decided in 2006 not to press charges. The case was turned over to local prosecutors, with the FBI suggesting they take a closer look at Donham. Some witnesses said a woman's voice could be heard at the scene of the abduction.

DOJ_NMG_0137725

David Beito, a history professor at the University of Alabama who has researched the case extensively, said Tuesday there is probably no one else left to arrest in the case. He said it is hard to underestimate the importance of the Till case, which took place the same year as the Montgomery, Ala., bus boycott.

"It gave a jump-start to the civil rights movement," he said. "It did not create the civil rights movement, but it made it more into a mass movement. It really mobilized people."

Donham, who remarried, is now 73 and has declined interviews. A telephone number for her was disconnected Tuesday.

District Attorney Joyce Chiles, a black woman who grew up near where the killing took place, was in court Tuesday and not immediately available for comment.

Wright said: "J.W. Milam and Roy Bryant died with Emmett Till's blood on their hands. And it looks like everyone else who was involved is going to do the same. They had a chance to come clean. They will die with Emmett Till's blood on their hands."

Horace Harned, 86, a former Mississippi legislator and member of the Sovereignty Commission, a state agency that worked clandestinely to preserve segregation, said he was glad to see no charges filed. He said the suggestions that Donham had a role in the crime are "a bunch of foolishness."

"Of course, I don't believe in murder. That's the wrong thing. It always backfires on you. That shouldn't have happened," he said. But he added: "You can't correct all the ills of the past. If we did, the Southerners were treated much worse than anybody back in the Civil War."

AP National Writer Allen G. Breed contributed to this story from Raleigh, N.C.

No Indictment In Emmett Till Slaying (LAT)

By Jenny Jarvie And Richard Fausset, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, February 28, 2007

A Mississippi grand jury declines to charge a white shopkeeper in the 1955 killing.

ATLANTA — The murder case of Emmett Till — one of the most infamous slayings of the civil rights era — appears to be drawing to a fruitless close 52 years after the black teenager whistled at a white woman, then turned up dead in Mississippi's Tallahatchie River.

It was disclosed Tuesday that a grand jury in Leflore County, Miss., had declined to bring a manslaughter indictment against Carolyn Bryant Donham, the white shopkeeper who witnesses said Till had admired one August afternoon in the rural community of Money, Miss.

Donham, 73, was suspected of pointing out Till to her then-husband, Roy Bryant. He and his half brother, J.W. Milam, were charged in the killing of the 14-year-old but were acquitted by an all-white jury in 1955 after a little more than an hour of deliberations. A year later they admitted in a magazine interview that they had killed Till.

Till's family has watched with hope in recent years as a parade of old and often recalcitrant Southerners have been dragged into court and found guilty of heinous crimes against blacks. But Tuesday, it felt like a door briefly open to the past — and, potentially, to justice — had been shut for good.

"This was our last hope — and it was dashed today," said Simeon Wright, 64, Till's cousin, who was with him at the grocery store and heard him whistle at Donham. "The Emmett Till case started with one person, and that person is still alive. She played a role in identifying Emmett, she participated in his kidnapping, and now she is getting away with murder."

Donham, who is thought to be a resident of Greenwood, Miss., could not be reached for comment. She has long maintained her innocence to the FBI, and chances of new charges, although possible, appear slim.

The Till case horrified and galvanized civil rights activists and reminded the public of the bloody suppression of blacks in the South — even as the old order of segregation and intimidation had begun to crumble.

The slaying took place a year after the Supreme Court handed down the Brown vs. Board of Education ruling and months before Rosa Parks, a 43-year-old seamstress, was arrested for refusing to give up her seat on an Alabama bus.

In August 1955, Till, who was from Chicago, was visiting relatives in the Mississippi Delta when he entered Bryant's grocery store to purchase bubble gum. Inside, he was alone with the shopkeeper's young wife, Carolyn, who later alleged that the boy had spoken lewdly to her. When she stepped out onto the porch, his cousins heard him whistle.

Three days later, Bryant and Milam allegedly forced their way into Till's grand-uncle's house in the middle of the night and snatched Till from his bed. His body was found by fisherman in the Tallahatchie River, with a cotton gin fan wrapped around his neck with barbed wire.

In 1956, in an interview with Look magazine, Bryant and Milam admitted they had repeatedly beaten Till before shooting him and tossing his body in the river.

Milam died in 1980, Bryant in 1990. No one else was indicted.

DOJ_NMG_0137726

Till's mother, Mamie Till Mobley, who died in 2003, held an open-casket funeral for her son in Chicago. Thousands came to see his mutilated remains, and a photo of Till's disfigured face was printed in Jet magazine and seen around the world.

His fate became legend, recounted in songs by Bob Dylan and Kanye West and explored in plays by James Baldwin and Toni Morrison. In recent years, a highway in Mississippi and a school in Chicago have been named in Till's honor.

The Justice Department reopened an investigation into Till's death in 2004, after a documentary filmmaker, Keith Beauchamp, shared footage from his film, "The Untold Story of Emmett Louis Till." Beauchamp claimed as many as 14 people, some still living, were involved in Till's slaying.

But in 2006 the department decided not to bring charges, arguing that the five-year statute of limitation on federal civil rights violations had expired. The department turned its 8,000-page report over to prosecutors in Mississippi, recommending that they investigate Donham.

Some witnesses said a woman's voice was heard during Till's abduction.

Joyce Chiles, the district attorney in Leflore County, could not be reached for comment. In the past, she acknowledged that the case would be difficult to prosecute.

Aaron Condon, a professor emeritus of law at the University of Mississippi, said he was not surprised by the grand jury's rejection of the case.

"It's an extremely old case, and the evidence against Carolyn Bryant, from what I've understood, is extremely weak," he said. "The main people who would have been in a position to identify her are dead."

Cowboy Church Probe Dropped (LYNNA)

By Justin Faulconer

The Lynchburg (VA) News & Advance, February 28, 2007

The U.S. Department of Justice has decided to step out of a zoning dispute between a Moneta “cowboy” church and Bedford County officials.

In letters this month to the Rev. Raymond Bell of the Cowboy Church of Virginia and Bedford’s community development director George Nester, the federal department concluded no further action is warranted in deciding if Bedford zoning laws infringe upon a federal act that protects religious land use.

The Cowboy Church holds services in a large barn off Horseshoe Bend Road in Moneta.

Six months ago, the department began investigating if the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act was violated. Bell has been against the county’s requirement that a special use permit be obtained to hold religious services, claiming it violates the separation of church and state.

Nester said it’s standard procedure that churches obtain a special use permit to hold religious services in newly constructed buildings or new additions to existing buildings.

He said Tuesday he is pleased and relieved that the investigation has been dropped, but some questions still remain. For instance, he doesn’t know if the matter was dropped because the church asked it to be or because there is a violation. The letter doesn’t state whether a violation took place.

“That’s the question mark that was never answered,” said Nester.

A spokesperson for the Department of Justice declined to comment Tuesday about the matter. Bell declined to comment also and said he would have more to say later this week.

The Cowboy Church started meeting about a year ago in the Moneta barn, on a farm owned by Garland Simmons. Since then, it has been involved in zoning red tape with the county.

The county originally said using the barn as a church violated building codes and was unsafe for large gatherings. That matter has since been resolved because it was determined the structure is not predominantly used as a church, Nester said.

The church is still holding services under the Cowboy Church name because of its part-time utilization of the barn, Nester said.

“We have no problem with it operating as it is,” said Nester.

County officials currently are reviewing and amending the Comprehensive Plan. The next step then would be to review the zoning ordinance. Nester said the county should take a closer look at the language regarding religious land use to ensure there are no infringements on the federal act.

“We need to look at the ordinance from the view the act was written to make sure we are not being over restrictive on religious land use rights,” he said. Subscribe to the Newspaper

Man Who Was Shot By Ex-EP Border Agents Is Arrested (EPT)

DOJ_NMG_0137727

El Paso Times, February 28, 2007

The drug smuggler who was shot in the buttocks by two El Paso Border Patrol agents who went to prison for it was involved in another drug smuggling attempt, U.S. Rep. Dana Rohrabacher, R-Calif., said.

Rohrabacher said he would talk today in a news conference in Washington, D.C., about new evidence he said proves that Osvaldo Aldrete Davila was again involved in drug smuggling after the Feb. 17, 2005, shooting.

U.S. Attorney Johnny Sutton had repeatedly denied knowledge of a second arrest but Rohrabacher said Sutton's statements were misleading because Aldrete Davila was not arrested either time.

"Johnny Sutton's play on words to imply the second offense didn't occur or was not relevant to the case is dishonest. Only an unscrupulous lawyer would believe this is an acceptable tactic," Rohrabacher said in a written statement.

Rohrabacher said Sutton was briefed by the Drug Enforcement Administration about Aldrete Davila's "direct involvement" in a second offense. Officials with the U.S. Attorney's office said they can't comment on sealed matters.

Advertisement

Aldrete was talked into coming back to the United States and testifying against the agents with the promise that he wouldn't be arrested for the marijuana found in his abandoned van.

Rohrabacher said Sutton's alleged omission was part of his attempt to "paint a benign picture of the drug smuggler" who was given immunity to testify against former agents Ignacio Ramos and Jose Alonso Compean. Ramos was sentenced to 11 years in prison and Compean to 12 for violating Aldrete Davila's civil rights and for tampering with evidence. Both are appealing.

S.B. Supervisors Back Ex-border Agents (IVDB)

Inland Valley Daily Bulletin, February 28, 2007

President Bush should consider pardoning two former Border Patrol agents convicted of shooting an alleged drug smuggler, according to a unanimous resolution by San Bernardino County's Board of Supervisors.

"This case appears to be a highly unusual situation where law-enforcement agents were not supported or given due process by their own agency or by the courts," said Supervisor Brad Mitzelfelt, who proposed the resolution.

The agents, Ignacio Ramos (far right) and Jose Alonso Compean (left), were convicted last year of shooting Osbaldo Aldrete-Davila, who allegedly brought a van loaded with marijuana across the border from Mexico. The man survived and was granted immunity for his testimony against the agents.

In light of congressional outcry over the agents' convictions and the circumstances of the case, the county's resolution states, President Bush should "act quickly to conduct further investigation of the matter in order to consider a Presidential Pardon at the earliest opportunity possible."

After the meeting, Mitzelfelt conceded the request was unusual.

"Normally, state and federal investigations run their course and usually we don't interject our opinions into those proceedings," he said.

But, he said, "the residents of San Bernardino County have certainly made my office aware of their strong belief that the president should intercede."

Council To Draw New District Maps (FAYOBS)

By Don Worthington, Staff writer

The Fayetteville Observer, February 28, 2007

Residents will get their say March 29 on the boundaries for six Fayetteville City Council districts.

The City Council will hold a public hearing that evening at 7.

The council is drawing new maps in response to the Feb. 6 election. Residents voted in favor of a council with six members representing districts and three members elected at-large. The current council has nine members, all elected from districts.

The change must be approved by the U.S. Department of Justice. The city is trying to have the plan and map approved by April. The city hopes to have federal approval in time for the July filing date for the municipal elections.

City Council members met Tuesday with their redistricting lawyer, Michael Crowell, to discuss options for drawing the six districts.

The Department of Justice will look at the map to make sure it does not affect minority voting. Crowell has said he believes a map that has three districts where minorities constitute the majority of voters will pass federal review.

Councilman Curtis Worthy, said he wants to make sure the districts reflect the racial breakdown of the city — about 48 percent white and 42 percent black.

DOJ_NMG_0137728

He said he didn't want a district where whites are an overwhelming majority.

Worthy, Mayor Pro Tem Robert Massey, and councilmen D.J. Haire and Charles Evans suggested several changes that affect neighborhoods with high black populations. The four councilmen are black.

The council asked Crowell to make minor changes to a proposed map to strengthen the minority representation in some districts and clean up the lines in other districts. The council asked Crowell not to split precincts between districts.

Ideally, each district will have about 29,000 residents.

Crowell will present the revised map to the council at a 5:30 p.m. meeting Tuesday.

Staff writer Don Worthington can be reached at worthingtond@fayobserver.com or 486-3511.

Bill Targets 'Don't Ask, Don't Tell' (USAT)

By Andrea Stone

USA Today, February 28, 2007

Brian Fricke, a former Marine sergeant who served nine months in Iraq's Anbar province, wasn't thrown out of the military for being gay. He left when his enlistment was up because he was tired of pretending he wasn't.

The "don't ask, don't tell" policy allows lesbians and gay men to serve if they keep quiet about their sex lives. Commanders are barred from asking subordinates about their sexual orientation.

"If people were talking about relationships, you'd have to play the pronoun game. 'He' became 'she.' You really just can't be yourself," says Fricke, 25, a government information technology specialist in Washington. "You'll never be able to tabulate" how many gay people have left the military voluntarily because of its "don't ask, don't tell" policy.

Fricke will be on Capitol Hill today when Democratic Rep. Marty Meehan of Massachusetts reintroduces his Military Readiness Enhancement Act.

The bill would repeal the policy President Clinton approved in 1993 as a compromise between ending a ban and gays serving openly. That would leave gays free to serve without limits.

Since the policy began, nearly 11,000 troops, the equivalent of an Army division, have been discharged.

The measure had 122 co-sponsors last year but died in the Republican-controlled Congress. Now that Democrats are in charge, Meehan plans to hold hearings as early as April. He says the bill has more than 100 original co-sponsors and seven freshmen.

Three Republicans have signed on, including Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen of Florida. She says her husband, Dexter, was cared for by a lesbian nurse when he was injured during combat in Vietnam.

Defense Department statistics released at the request of Congress and the Servicemembers Legal Defense Network, a gay advocacy group, show that nearly 7% of the 726 troops discharged under the policy in 2005 were medical personnel. That's the most in one year and brings to 334 the number of health care workers, including doctors, nurses and mental health specialists, dismissed since 1994.

"People in need of medical specialists couldn't care less about the sexual orientation" of those caring for them, Meehan says. "The policy is outdated and discriminatory."

Marine Maj. Stewart Upton, a Pentagon spokesman, says the number of ousted health workers is small given the nearly 11,000 in war zones. "We are enforcing the policy," he says. "We are not experiencing any problems with recruiting and retention."

A Government Accountability Office report in February 2005 found that at least 800 dismissed gay servicemembers had skills deemed "mission critical" by the Pentagon. Among them: 54 Arabic-language specialists.

Congress takes up the issue amid changes in:

•The legal landscape. A federal appeals court in Boston will hear arguments March 7 in the first legal challenge to the policy since the Supreme Court struck down a Texas sodomy law in 2003. The high court said the Constitution's guarantee of liberty bars government from targeting private, consensual sex practices.

•Public opinion. Polls indicate growing acceptance of gay troops. A Harris Poll this month found that 55% supported allowing gays to serve openly, up from 48% in 2000.

A Pew Research Center survey last year found that 60% favored gays serving openly, up from 52% in 1994. Support ran 3-to-1 among those younger than 30. In contrast, Pew found that 39% favored same-sex marriage.

•Military needs. The demand for more troops has led to lower recruiting standards as Congress vows to add 92,000 soldiers and Marines by 2012. "The war makes it easier to think about lifting the ban," says Clyde Wilcox, co-editor of The Politics of Gay Rights.

DOJ_NMG_0137729

•Military thinking. John Shalikashvili, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff under Clinton, once supported the policy but wrote in The New York Times in January that he believes gays should be allowed to serve openly.

Elaine Donnelly, whose Center for Military Readiness favors a ban on gays, calls Shalikashvili's column "very misinformed" and "part of a PR campaign" to overturn the policy.

Shalikashvili and other policy critics are taking a go-slow approach while fighting continues in Iraq.

John Hutson, once the Navy's top lawyer, calls "don't ask, don't tell" a transitional policy. "It bought us some time," he says, "but now I think that time has come and gone."

Defending His Country, But Not Its 'Don't Ask, Don't Tell' Policy (WP)

The Washington Post, February 28, 2007

Once a Marine, always a Marine. That pretty much sums up the life of retired Sgt. Eric Alva, who was sworn into the Marine Corps at 19, stationed in Somalia and Japan and lost his right leg when he stepped on a land mine on March 21, 2003, the first day of Operation Iraqi Freedom.

As the war's first injured soldier, Alva was an instant celebrity. He was on "Oprah." President Bush awarded him the Purple Heart. Donald Rumsfeld visited. And strangers in Alva's native San Antonio still insist on paying for his dinner at Chili's. Last fall Alva, 36, contacted the Human Rights Campaign, the gay rights group, and asked to be involved in its lobbying effort. Today he'll stand alongside Rep. Martin Meehan (D-Mass.) when he introduces a bill to repeal the military's "Don't ask, don't tell" policy on gay, lesbian and bisexual military personnel.

-- Jose Antonio Vargas

Q. Why didn't you come out sooner?

A.Eventually my notoriety -- "the injured soldier" -- will wear off. And I can almost hear it now -- "Oh, yeah, he's that gay Marine." I'm okay with that. The truth is, something's wrong with this ban. I have to say something. I mean, you're asking men and women to lie about their orientation, to keep their personal lives private, so they can defend the rights and freedoms of others in this country, and be told, "Well, oh, yeah, if you ever decide to really meet someone of the same sex and you want the same rights, sorry, buddy, you don't have the right." That's one factor. The other factor is, we're losing probably thousands of men and women that are skilled at certain types of jobs, from air traffic controllers to linguists, because of this broken policy.

You come from a military family?

I come from a family of servicemen. My dad, Fidelis, is a Vietnam vet. My grandfather, also named Fidelis, was a World War II and Korean War veteran. I was named after them. My middle name is Fidelis. Fidelis means "always faithful."

What does sexual orientation -- gay, straight, bisexual -- have to do with being a soldier? A Marine?

First, thanks for recognizing that I am a Marine. Second, to answer your question, I have tons and tons of friends that were in the military at the time who knew I was gay because I confided in them. Everybody had the same reaction: "What's the big deal?" . . . The respect was still there. Your job is what you're doing at its best. Your personal life, your private life, is something you do after work. What's funny is, when I was based in San Diego, Calif., people would go to a gay club and everyone would have a haircut like mine. They had their dog tags on. But come Monday morning, nobody talked about it, nobody dealt with it, everybody was back to work.

So when you were applying to be a Marine in 1990, before "Don't ask, don't tell" was implemented, the application asked for your sexual orientation?

It did.

What did you put down?

I lied, I lied. The lying is what I hated most -- why I had to do it, why I had to keep on doing it, the toll it took on me.

You're wearing a wedding band. What do you tell people when they ask you about your wife?

That happens all the time. It just happened on my way here to Washington, waiting on the plank as I boarded a plane. This very nice woman next to me said she recognized me. She looked at my ring and asked about my wife. I told her I have a partner. His name is Darrell. She paused and said, "Good for you."

Texan Calls For Takeover Of State's Juvenile Schools (NYT)

By Ralph Blumenthal

The New York Times, February 28, 2007

A long-simmering scandal over sexual abuse of juveniles at schools for youthful offenders broke into the open on Tuesday with an outraged state senator calling for a takeover of the troubled Texas Youth Commission.

DOJ_NMG_0137730

At a school in West Texas, a youth commission official acknowledged at a hearing of the State Senate Criminal Justice Committee, the school's superintendent was aware that two supervisors routinely awakened boys for late-night encounters behind closed doors in deserted offices.

The two supervisors — one of whom had been transferred from another state school after pornography was found on his work computer — were allowed to resign in 2005 without charges. One became the principal of a charter school in Midland, Tex., state officials said. The superintendent was promoted to director of juvenile corrections, a post he still holds, the youth commission confirmed.

"It's outrageous," said State Senator John Whitmire, chairman of the Criminal Justice Committee, who accused the commission of a cover-up.

Neil Nichols, the commission's general counsel and new acting executive director, named on Friday after the director, Dwight Harris, retired under pressure, voiced some contrition, saying at one point, "To say I'm disappointed about that is to say the least."

Mr. Whitmore, Democrat of Houston, was not mollified. "Why should this agency not be put in conservatorship and get a whole new management?" he asked.

He excoriated the commission board for not attending the hearing and canceled an appropriations session for the agency that had been scheduled for Wednesday.

Gov. Rick Perry, a Republican, called the revelations "absolutely reprehensible" and would not rule out a takeover, said a spokesman, Ted Royer. "The governor believes any time a very serious issue like this emerges, every option should be on the table," Mr. Royer said.

Accusations that staff members at the West Texas State School in Pyote (pronounced PIE-oht) were sexually preying on youths there were made to the youth commission as early as December 2003, according to a timeline presented at the hearing.

The complaints did not reach the Texas Rangers until February 2005 and remained largely secret until accounts began appearing in recent weeks on the Web site of the Texas Observer and the pages of The Dallas Morning News.

The problems were widespread at the agency, which annually places some 3,000 juveniles ages 10 to 17 at the time of their felonies in 13 secure schools, senators and witnesses said.

State Senator Juan Hinojosa, Democrat of McAllen, who investigated conditions at another school in his South Texas district in 2005, said, "We found out a lot of youths are kept seven or eight months longer than required, and we want to know why."

Mr. Hinojosa added: "If a young person refuses to have sex with a supervisor, they deduct a point and are required to stay longer."

At another state school in Brownwood in Central Texas, he said, "A supervisor was accused of having sex with a 15-year-old juvenile" — a girl, he said later. It was turned over to the Brownwood police, he said, "with no action — it was covered up."

Mr. Nichols, the acting director, said the commission investigated 1,300 cases of reported wrongdoing last year, including 98 cases of reported sexual abuse. In 78 of the cases, he said, staff members were fired or resigned.

"How about prosecuted?" Mr. Hinojosa asked.

Mr. Nichols did not say. But he said a "large number" of the 78 cases involved female staff members of the commission who had improper sexual contact with students, male and female.

Senators questioned Mr. Nichols about the transfer in 2003 of one supervisor, Ray Brookins, to the West Texas State School from another school for juvenile offenders at San Saba, after pornography had been found on his computer. Mr. Brookins later became assistant superintendent at Pyote and was cited by the Texas Rangers for sexual contact with juveniles there, senators said.

Another supervisor at Pyote, John Paul Hernandez, was also reported by the Texas Rangers to have engaged in sexual contact with students, senators said.

Both supervisors left the youth agency and are under investigation, said the Ward County district attorney, Randall Reynolds.

Mr. Brookins was said at the hearing to be working at a bar in Austin.

Mr. Hernandez became principal at a charter school in Midland, the Richard Milburn Academy, said Norman Hall, the school's superintendent. The school did not know of Mr. Hernandez's history when it hired him, Mr. Hall said, and put him on leave several weeks ago.

Mr. Hernandez did not return a call to his mobile phone.

The superintendent at Pyote, Chip Harrison, who knew of the accusations against Mr. Brookins and Mr. Hernandez and kept them on the staff, senators said, is now director of juvenile corrections for the commission, in charge of several schools.

DOJ_NMG_0137731

"That's intolerable; that's unacceptable," Mr. Whitmire said.

Mr. Nichols called him "one of our most experienced superintendents," setting off a gasp from parents.

Mr. Harrison did not return a call.

Randall Chance, a former inspector general at the Pyote school and the author of a self-published book, "Raped by the State," said abuses were often covered up. "They're not a problem at the T.Y.C. unless you bring it up" Mr. Chance said, "and then you're the problem."

ANTITRUST:

House Gets First Crack At XM-Sirius Proposal (WP)

By Charles Babington, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 28, 2007

Congress and federal regulators need to get with the times.

That's the message that Mel Karmazin, chief executive of Sirius Satellite Radio, plans to deliver today at the first public hearing on a proposal to merge the nation's two satellite radio companies, Sirius and XM Satellite Radio Holdings.

Karmazin, who will face skeptical members of the House Judiciary Committee's newly formed antitrust task force, says satellite radio is in stiff competition not only with free, over-the-air radio but also with such newer products as MP3 players, Internet radio and music-downloading cellphones. "What I need to do is lay out the realities of the marketplace as we see it," Karmazin said in a telephone interview yesterday.

He can expect resistance. "What I'm concerned about now is whether we're creating a monopolistic situation," Rep. John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.), who will chair the task force hearing, said in an interview yesterday. "I don't think it will stimulate competition, and it could very well take away from the competition taking place now in the industry."

The Justice Department and Federal Communications Commission, not Congress, will decide whether to allow Washington-based XM and New York-based Sirius to merge. But today's hearing seems certain to introduce the chief arguments for and against the plan, whose outcome may not be decided for nearly a year.

Sharing a witness table with opponents from the broadcast industry and consumer groups, Karmazin said he will remind Congress that XM and Sirius charge customers about $13 a month and struggle to attract enough subscribers to make money. "It's a little hard for me to understand" the argument that a merged company would raise prices or reduce service, he said.

Karmazin and his XM counterpart, Gary Parsons, have already visited with the five FCC members who will vote on the merger, and have combed the files of rival companies to buttress their claims that an array of audio services see the two satellite firms as competition. Consumers would benefit, not suffer, from having Howard Stern, Oprah Winfrey, the NFL and Major League Baseball on one radio network, rather than having them divided between the two satellite companies as they are now, Parsons said yesterday.

In 1997, the FCC granted licenses to XM and Sirius on the condition that no one owner control both. FCC Chairman Kevin J. Martin has said the merger-seekers must clear a high hurdle to persuade the commission to change the rule. Karmazin said yesterday: "Our sneakers are on, to be able to jump high."

With FCC hearings yet to be scheduled, the new Democratic-controlled Congress will get the first public whack at the debate. Conyers, a champion of liberal causes and a 42-year House veteran, called it "a great discussion, because it gets into the whole question of where the consumer comes in when these mergers take place. And too often recently, they've been taking place with too little concern for the people who are paying the freight."

As a sign of how complex the debate could become, Rep. John D. Dingell (D-Mich.), chairman of the Commerce and Energy Committee, yesterday addressed the National Association of Broadcasters, a chief critic of the proposed merger. Dingell made no reference to the XM-Sirius matter in his prepared remarks but nonetheless offered a tidbit that might underscore Karmazin's main point. Referring to rapidly changing technology, Dingell told the broadcasters: "Believe it or not, my favorite Gilbert and Sullivan tunes are delivered to me via iPod."

XM and Sirius have lost millions of dollars, signing multimillion-dollar contracts with Stern, Winfrey, sports leagues and others in their attempts to lure subscribers. Yesterday, Sirius reported a narrower loss for fourth quarter, as revenue rose substantially.

Revenue was $193.4 million, compared with $80 million in the fourth quarter of 2005. Sirius lost $245.6 million (17 cents a share), compared with $311.4 million (23 cents) a year earlier.

DOJ_NMG_0137732

Sirius Radio Chief Urges Merger (NYT)

By Richard Siklos

The New York Times, February 28, 2007

The chief executive of Sirius Satellite Radio, Mel Karmazin, is taking the campaign to sell his company's proposed merger with XM Satellite Radio to Washington.

On Monday, Mr. Karmazin appeared on the often-bawdy Howard Stern show on Sirius. Today, he will speak at a hearing of the newly created House Antitrust Task Force in Washington.

"I absolutely welcome the opportunity because I think there is a lot of misinformation out there about the merger," Mr. Karmazin said of the hearing.

In particular the National Association of Broadcasters, which represents the commercial radio stations and has been an opponent of satellite radio, has warned that the merger announced last week would create a monopoly that would limit consumer choice and lead to higher prices.

Mr. Karmazin said yesterday that he would tell the task force that the opposite was true. Consumers will be more inclined to subscribe to a single service, he said, because XM and Sirius delivered exclusive programming — like Mr. Stern on Sirius and the Major League Baseball on XM — that the other service does not.

And he said he was willing to commit to the Federal Communications Commission that the merger would lower consumer prices below the $12.95 a month both charge, although he did not specify how much.

Mr. Karmazin also conceded that making all programming that was currently available exclusively to one service available on both, like sporting events, would require renegotiating those contracts.

Sirius also posted a fourth-quarter loss of $245.6 million, or 17 cents a share, compared with a loss of $311.4 million, or 23 cents a share, a year earlier. Revenue more than doubled to $193.4 million from $80 million in the quarter. For 2006, the company added 2.7 million subscribers to just over 6 million.

Satellite Radio Chief To Clear Political Air (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessnerin Washington

Financial Times, February 28, 2007

Mel Karmazin, the chief executive of Sirius, is expected to receive a sceptical reception today when he appears before a congressional committee to defend the satellite radio company's proposed $11.4bn merger with rival XM.

John Conyers, the Democratic chairman of the House judiciary committee, like legislators on both sides of the aisle, is suspicious not only about the benefits to the public of yet another mega-media merger. Mr Conyers is also unconvinced - so far - of the merits of the legal argument on which, lawyers agree, the fate of the entire deal rests.

To prove that the merger of the only two satellite radio companies in the US will not lead to a monopoly, Mr Karmazin and a team of antitrust attorneys and lobbyists will have to prove that other devices and media outlets - from terrestrial radio to iPods to mobile phones - will constrain the merged entity enough to prevent it from raising prices.

Ultimately Congress will not have a formal say on whether or not the deal will be approved, but political pressure can influence the two government agencies that will investigate the deal: the Department of Justice, the chief antitrust authority, and the Federal Communications Commission, the media regulator.

Lawyers working on the deal said this week the combined company's prices would also be constrained by the fact it would seek to attract the 90 per cent of the US population that does not subscribe to either group.

Yesterday the image of Sirius as a company that is fighting to be viable was underscored by the group's fourth-quarter results, which showed a net loss of $246m (€186m, £125m).

"You've seen our losses this year and seen what XM's losses were. You're dealing with companies that are losing hundreds of millions of dollars a year," Mr Karmazin said in a refrain he is likely to repeat before lawmakers today.

The biggest question now is whether the argument will resonate with Thomas Barnett, the chief of the antitrust division.

Jim Rill, the former head of the DoJ's antitrust division and a partner at Howrey, the legal firm, says the fact that satellite radio's offering is much broader than traditional radio means it will be "challenging" to prove that a device like the iPod could really compete.

The deal could also be complicated by other political considerations before the FCC, which, under the leadership of its chairman Kevin Martin, has shown a propensity to use merger reviews to press companies on other regulatory issues, including indecency standards.

DOJ_NMG_0137733

Mr Martin would face legal constraints if he sought to enforce terrestrial radio standards on satellite radio as a condition of the deal, but the transaction will nevertheless give the FCC leverage to make programming-related demands on the combined company.

Additional reporting by Daniel Pimlott in New York

Sirius Narrows Loss On Subscriber Gains (WSJ)

By Ellen Sheng

The Wall Street Journal, February 28, 2007

Sirius Satellite Radio Inc., which recently agreed to merge with rival XM Satellite Holdings Inc., posted a narrower fourth-quarter net loss Tuesday as revenue more than doubled and subscriber growth continued.

Sirius, New York, which boasts a programming lineup that includes shock jock Howard Stern and National Football League games, also said it expects to end the year with eight million subscribers, up from its current 6.02 million, and to post total revenue of about $1 billion.

1 REPLY ALL

Is the XM-Sirius deal good for consumers? Should antitrust regulators approve it? Read an online debate2 between consumer advocate Mark Cooper and antitrust lawyer Donald Russell.

The country's second-largest satellite radio company behind XM Satellite, Sirius said the results pointed to its continued strength. Since adding Howard Stern and others to its lineup, the operator has enjoyed stronger retail sales growth than its rival.

Sirius added 905,247 net new subscribers during the quarter, down from 1.14 million a year ago. By contrast, XM Satellite said Monday it added 442,679 net new subscribers during the quarter, down from 898,315 the year earlier. Last year's fourth quarter was the first holiday season before the highly hyped Mr. Stern started airing exclusively on Sirius. The buzz around Mr. Stern last year helped boost subscriber additions at both satellite radio companies to record levels.

For the full year 2006, Sirius said it added 2.7 million, up from 2.17 million the year before. XM said Monday it added 1.7 million net new subscribers in 2006, compared with 2.2 million the year before.

Sirius posted a fourth-quarter loss of $245.6 million, or 17 cents a share, compared with a loss of $311.4 million, or 23 cents a share, in the year-earlier period.

Revenue more than doubled to $193.4 million from $80 million the year before due to steady subscriber growth and higher net advertising and equipment revenue.

SATELLITE SCRAMBLE

The proposed merger between XM and Sirius would bring together two rivals who have long tried to out-do each other in the battle for subscribers. See how the two companies compare3 in terms of financials and programming.

Rival XM Satellite Radio, which features Opie and Anthony and Oprah Winfrey, similarly reported a narrower a fourth-quarter loss Monday. The company said results were helped by a 45% increased in revenue. (See related article4.)

Sirius and XM announced a merger last Monday under which Sirius would distribute 4.6 of its shares for every XM share. The companies expect the $11.4 billion deal to close by the end of the year.

Regulatory approval is the biggest question mark hanging over the deal. There are only two satellite radio companies licensed to operate in the country and, under Federal Communications Commission rules, the two wouldn't be allowed to merge. The companies are arguing that competitive concerns shouldn't be an issue because the market includes Internet radio and MP3 players as well as traditional radio.

XM and Sirius have said the merger would ultimately cut costs by an estimated $5 billion to $6 billion. Executives have also said the merger would help the companies compete more effectively.

Sirius said that in the fourth quarter, subscriber acquisition costs fell to $121 million from $145.2 million a year earlier. Subscriber acquisition cost per gross subscriber fell 9% to $103 million from $113 million in the prior-year quarter.

Average revenue per subscriber, a closely watched measurement in the industry, rose to $10.39 from $9.02 a year earlier during the quarter. Churn, or the rate of monthly customer losses, was 2% compared with 1.5% a year ago. Churn is expected to come between 2.2% and 2.4% in 2007.

--Josee Rose contributed to this story.

Sirius Business (WSJ)

By David R. Henderson

The Wall Street Journal, February 28, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0137734

In expressing its strong reservations about the proposed merger between Sirius and XM, the Federal Communications Commission seems to think that there are only two competitors and that a merger would reduce the number to one. But that's true only if the relevant market is the satellite broadcasting market.

In fact, the market is much larger, including at a minimum all existing radio stations. If you doubt that, ask yourself how you would decide whether or not to subscribe to Sirius or XM. Surely a big part of your decision is the quality and range of programming you can get on "free" radio.

That alone is strong enough evidence for allowing the merger. But there is even stronger evidence, and it has to do with how XM's and Sirius's "free-radio" competitors view the merger. Here we might draw upon the wisdom of MIT economist Morris Adelman, who wrote about 50 years ago: "A useful if not very precise index of the strength of competition . . . is the resentment of unsuccessful competitors."

In other words, if some competitors in an industry resent others and even end up going out of business, competition is alive and well. It's when the competitors get too cozy that we need to worry. It follows that if existing competitors oppose a merger, the merger is likely to be good for consumers.

Look at what the "free" broadcasters are saying about the XM-Sirius merger. As this newspaper recently reported, "The radio industry has loudly opposed the deal since it was announced, and broadcasters cite satellite-radio operators as major competitors in securities filings." Traditional radio broadcasters understand that they are competing with satellite radio. And they oppose the merger. This second fact has been underappreciated.

Suppose you buy regularly from a firm that wants to merge with another firm in the same industry. You might worry that the merged firm would use its increased market power to raise the price you pay. But imagine if you notice that these two firms' other competitors are among those clamoring for the government to prevent the merger.

Would these other competitors oppose the merger if they thought the merger would raise prices for what you bought? Not likely. If that is what they thought would happen, these other competitors would love the merger -- because it would allow them to raise their own prices somewhat, or to keep their prices the same but sell more.

If they oppose the merger, the reason is far more likely to be that they fear the net effect would be to lower the prices of the goods or services they sold -- which means that consumers would be better off with the merger than without.

How can a merger lead to lower prices? A larger firm might have increased market power, allowing it to raise prices; but the larger firm might have economies of scale, leading to reduced costs and lower prices.

Which effect the merger would create is of course uncertain -- but what competing firms think about the proposed merger is a very strong clue, as they typically have more information about the market than do the regulators. When competitors oppose a merger -- as is the case of "free radio" broadcasters with regard to Sirius and XM -- they must be making a judgment that the "economies-of-scale effect" outweighs the "market-power effect." The FCC should take them at their word.

Of course, this is not a foolproof criterion. If competitors began to anticipate that regulators would take into account their opposition to, or support of, a merger, they might try to game the system. If they actually wanted the merger blocked, they would publicly support it. If they thought prices would rise after the merger to their benefit, they might publicly oppose it.

But we can trust that the FCC is not thinking that way, as it is still hung up on a fallaciously narrow definition of the market. This is the bottom line: If the FCC cares about consumers and not about making things cozy for traditional broadcasters, it should allow the XM-Sirius merger.

Mr. Henderson is a research fellow at the Hoover Institution and co-author of "Making Great Decisions in Business and Life" (Chicago Park Press, 2006).

TXU Profit Up 33%; Dynegy Posts Loss (AP)

AP, February 28, 2007

The Dallas-based utility TXU Corporation reported a 33 percent increase in profit yesterday, despite weak revenue caused by mild winter weather, but another Texas utility, Dynegy, swung to a loss of $58 million as revenue fell and it took charges for a revamping.

TXU, which has accepted an offer to be bought for $45 billion in what would be the largest leveraged buyout ever, said it earned $475 million, or $1.03 a share, up from $356 million, or 74 cents a share, in the fourth quarter a year earlier.

Excluding what TXU termed one-time charges, the company said it would have earned $1.20 a share, which matched the forecast of analysts, who usually exclude those items from their estimates.

For all of 2006, TXU said it earned $2.55 billion, or $5.46 a share, up from $1.71 billion, or $2.50 a share, in 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0137735

Dynegy, a power producer based in Houston that flirted with bankruptcy a few years ago, said yesterday that its loss for the fourth quarter was 12 cents a share, in contrast to a profit of $293 million, or 74 cents a share, in the quarter a year ago, when income from discontinued operations lifted results.

Sales fell 36 percent, to $397 million, from $622 million in the year-ago period. For all of 2006, Dynegy said it lost $342 million, or 75 cents a share, as it incurred $343 million in after-tax charges related to its financial revamping.

The company said that it was positioning itself for growth, starting with the $4.1 billion acquisition of the generating power of a rival, the privately held LS Power Group; that deal is to be completed by the end of March.

The two companies also plan to become joint-venture partners in nine power plants under development.

Another utility, the AES Corporation, a power producer based in Arlington, Va., said yesterday that it had completed an agreement to sell its majority stake in La Electricidad de Caracas, a Venezuelan utility, to Petróleos de Venezuela, the state-owned oil company, for $739 million.

AES also announced that it was investigating the company's accounting for stock option grants and planned to restate earnings for the first nine months of 2006 and for the years 2005 and 2004. The company said the restatements were not likely to be material or to affect cash balances.

In California, Bloomberg News reported that an appeals court ruled that AES and Dynegy could not be sued in state court over claims that they manipulated power prices during the state's energy crisis in 2000 and 2001.

The California Court of Appeals in San Diego, upholding a lower court's dismissal of a group of lawsuits brought by California municipalities and consumers, said that the antitrust claims were pre-empted by federal laws regulating the wholesale electricity market and that a state court could not determine reasonable wholesale power rates.

The case was part of a multibillion-dollar fight between California and power companies stemming from brown-outs and a tenfold price increase during the crisis. AES, Dynegy, Sempra Energy and Morgan Stanley Capital Group were the remaining defendants in the case.

Next Step In TXU Deal Is Backdrop Of Conference (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin

New York Times, February 28, 2007

Will anyone dare to mount a rival bid for TXU?

That was the question being whispered yesterday in Frankfurt where many of the world's private equity chiefs were gathered for Super Return, one of the industry's best-attended gatherings.

Speakers included David Bonderman of the Texas Pacific Group, which helped to lead Monday's $45 billion TXU takeover; Todd Fisher of Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Company, the other lead investor in the TXU deal; and Stephen A. Schwarzman of the Blackstone Group, considered one of the most likely candidates to try to crash the TXU sale.

A private equity firm's effort to break up the TXU deal could be a crucial test of the intertwined relationships that so far have limited all-out brawls. Critics contend that the firms, which frequently partner with one another, have a gentleman's agreement not to start bidding wars once a deal is struck.

As an illustration of the clubbiness of the private equity business, no private equity firm to date has publicly tried to top an offer from one its rivals. The Justice Department started an informal inquiry into the possibility of collusion at at least four of the big firms — Kohlberg Kravis Roberts; the Carlyle Group; Silver Lake Partners; and Clayton, Dubilier & Rice — last fall.

It is an issue, among many, that has the buyout kings worried. Mr. Bonderman said during his keynote speech that the industry's image was "something that's probably on everybody's mind."

The industry may have begun to change that with its "green" deal for TXU — among other things, the buyers agreed to scuttle plans for several new coal-fired power plants. A bidding battle over a deal could further change its reputation for mutual back-scratching.

TXU has all the hallmarks of a prize in a private equity tug of war.

The price that Kohlberg Kravis and Texas Pacific agreed to pay — $69.25 a share, representing a 25 percent premium over the average closing price in the 20 days ending Feb. 22 — leaves room for a rival to top it and still make a 20 percent annual return on the deal, analysts said. Investors appear to be betting on a higher bid: shares of TXU closed yesterday at $67.03.

TXU's current deal allows the company to shop itself around for 50 days. The company was represented by Credit Suisse in its deal, and has hired Lazard to look for new buyers.

And then there is the issue of ego: private equity firms constantly talk about trying to outdo the other for the crown, however temporary, of mounting the largest deal ever.

DOJ_NMG_0137736

Blackstone, which held that title until last week with its $39 billion acquisition of Equity Office Properties Trust, is planning to take a look at TXU, people close to the firm said. A spokesman for the firm declined to comment. Mr. Schwarzman did not answer questions about the matter in Frankfurt.

Blackstone appears to have been left out of the deal by Kohlberg Kravis and Texas Pacific. Those three firms, together with Hellman & Friedman, acquired Texas Genco Holdings together in 2004, for $3.65 billion.

The Carlyle Group, which has a long history in the energy sector, is also considering jumping into the process, people close to that firm said. Carlyle would have seemed like a natural buying partner for TXU. Former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, who once worked as an adviser to Carlyle, is advisory chairman to Kohlberg Kravis and Texas Pacific. A spokesman for Carlyle declined to comment.

Anyone considering a rival bid for TXU has some hurdles to clear. The buyers have an impressive roster of political relationships and endorsements from environmental groups.

"And I want to say, 'God bless this takeover of TXU by the private equity market this week,' " Jeremy Rifkin, president of the Foundation on Economic Trends, said yesterday at Super Returns, echoing a view that appears to be shared by regulators.

Just yesterday, Senator John Kerry praised the TXU deal even as he said he would hold a hearing on it, saying, "I'm pleased to see that TXU was open to working with the environmental community and I'd like to see similar cooperation extended in other parts of the country,"

Analysts say, however, that a buyer with a higher offer might win the same endorsements by agreeing to the same environmental plan.

Court Sides With N.C. Cigarette Maker In Wholesalers Dispute (AP)

By Duncan Mansfield, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 28, 2007

A federal appeals court on Tuesday rejected a lawsuit by 22 cigarette wholesalers claiming that R.J. Reynolds Co.'s discount pricing program was discriminatory.

The 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati affirmed a summary judgment in favor of the North Carolina-based tobacco company, a part of Reynolds American Inc., issued in 2005 by U.S. District Judge J. Ronnie Greer in Greeneville.

"Defendant's program is designed to promote its financial welfare at the expense of the wholesalers," the appeals court wrote. "Perhaps it is unfair, but it is not illegal."

"OK," plaintiffs attorney Paul Smith of Washington, D.C., said when told of the decision Tuesday by The Associated Press, declining further comment. Other plaintiffs' attorneys did not immediately return calls.

"Previously, the court upheld R.J. Reynolds' right to choose its own distributors, and today it confirmed the legality of our program, which rewards distributors for selling more of our brands," said Robert Stowe, Reynolds senior vice president of trade marketing.

Smith Wholesale Co. Inc. of Johnson City and the other wholesalers claimed they experienced "millions of dollars in lost profits" when Reynolds instituted a discount program in 2000 to boost sales of its so-called second-tier nonpremium "savings" brands of cigarettes.

Reynolds, based in Winston-Salem, N.C., offered discounts and rebates to wholesalers selling the highest volume of Reynolds products. The plaintiffs, mostly smaller distributors in the Southeast, said that put them at a disadvantage because they had to cater to consumers demanding even cheaper cigarettes sold by other manufacturers.

"Plaintiffs allege that the (program) disfavors them because, unlike RJR's other distributors, they operate largely in rural 'low-end' segments of the market where their retail customers demand fourth-tier brands, and RJR does not price any of its brands at the fourth-tier price level," the court wrote.

The plaintiffs said that meant they had to "pay substantially more than their own competitors for the same RJR products," losing out on discounts ranging from as much as $1.12 a carton in 2003 to 74 cents a carton today.

The appeals court said in a 24-page opinion that even if the plaintiffs' allegations were found to be true, "we nonetheless conclude that summary judgment is warranted."

The three-judge panel concluded that Reynolds' market-share discount program "was offered to all wholesalers using a non-discriminatory formula. It was therefore functionally available to all wholesalers not only in theory, but in fact."

The plaintiffs' ability to qualify for the discounts "was a matter of marketing strategy and brand prioritization," the court wrote. Since "price discrimination has not been established," the judges said, "plaintiffs' claim therefore fails as a matter of law."

"Antitrust experts generally recommend market-share based discount programs like R.J. Reynolds' because they are 'size-blind,'" said Darryl Marsh, Reynolds' senior counsel. "This appellate ruling confirms that view."

DOJ_NMG_0137737

The judges said the strategy might "ultimately cull the number of RJR's distributors," but the law "does not require a supplier to ensure the success of its customers."

"Whether this potential loss of participating wholesalers will ultimately benefit defendant remains to be seen," the court wrote.

VMware Fires Broadside At Microsoft (CNET)

By Stephen Shankland, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News.com, February 28, 2007

The up-and-coming virtualization specialist says Microsoft is using its Windows clout to restrict customers choice. Sound familiar?

VMware, the incumbent power in the blossoming realm of virtualization, has accused Microsoft of using foul play to promote its own competing products.

In a white paper published Friday, the EMC subsidiary said Microsoft is using Windows licensing terms to prevent customers from taking full advantage of virtualization.

"Microsoft is trying to restrict customers' flexibility and freedom to choose virtualization software by limiting who can run their software and how they can run it," VMware said.

The software giant rejected VMware's assertions.

"Microsoft believes the claims made in VMware's white paper contain several inaccuracies and misunderstandings of our current license and use policies, our support policy and our commitment to technology collaboration," Mike Neil, Microsoft's general manager of virtualization strategy, said in a statement Tuesday. "We believe that we are being progressive and fair with our existing licensing and use policies and creating a level playing field for partners and customers," he said

Neil added that he believes Microsoft and VMware will be able to settle their differences.

Virtualization lets a single computer run multiple operating systems simultaneously, in compartments called virtual machines. That sharing lets companies use their computers more efficiently. The ultimate promise of virtualization is broader than that, however: by moving virtual machines from one server to another, companies can create data centers that can automatically adjust to shifting work demands or hardware outages.

The Microsoft-VMware debate spotlights the difficult adjustments necessary, as the industry moves into a world where a new software layer breaks the hard link between operating systems and the hardware they use.

There are technical challenges. Software can't be as tightly tied to hardware such as hard drives or network cards, and an operating system might be moved from an overtaxed dual-processor server at one moment to a more powerful eight-processor machine the next.

And there are business challenges too, as companies such as Microsoft and VMware jockey for technology leadership and customer account control.

It's easy to envision virtualization technology as part of the operating system, but VMware has made a strong business selling it as a separate component. Right now, it is moving to deliver higher-level management features that take on products from Microsoft and others.

But Microsoft is building virtualization into the next version of Windows Server, code-named Longhorn, and that could be a minefield for the software company. It has already faced antitrust challenges by building its Internet Explorer browser and Windows Media Player software into the operating system.

VMware stopped short of accusing Microsoft of violating antitrust law--which prohibits a company with a monopoly in one market from using that power to extend into another market--but it came close.

"Microsoft is leveraging its ownership of the market-leading operating system and numerous applications that are market leaders in their respective categories...to drive customers to use Microsoft virtualization products," VMware said. Microsoft needs make sure it's possible for Windows and Windows-based software "to be created, licensed, supported and distributed equivalently on Microsoft or non-Microsoft system virtualization stacks."

VMware leveled several charges at Microsoft:

• Microsoft shared hypervisor interface details at a hardware conference but isn't permitting other virtualization companies to use them. The exception is Novell, which signed a broad intellectual property partnership with Microsoft.

• "Microsoft licensing policies ask for permanent assignment of operating system licenses to hardware and then restrict the movement of those operating system licenses, even for virtualized environments that can be moved seamlessly from machine to machine," VMware said.

DOJ_NMG_0137738

In particular, Microsoft permits Windows Server licenses to be moved only once every 90 days, VMware said. That breaks VMware's VMotion technology (which moves running virtual machines from one computer to another) and the higher-level Distributed Resource Manager (which balances software work with available hardware by moving virtual machines with VMotion).

• Virtual machines stored in Microsoft's VHD format may not be converted into other virtual machine formats, including VMware's.

• Microsoft provides support for virtualization only to customers with premier support contracts.

Neil also defended Microsoft's position in a statement and in a blog entry.

Is Windows getting more expensive?

Photos: Tinkerers treasure tiny motherboards

Newsmaker: Intel eyes future of Itanium

Extra: iPod goes to school

Video: Partying with ILM Oscar winners

"In the end, customers with mixed environments expect it all to work together," Neil said. For that reason, Microsoft is sharing interface details for its current Virtual Server 2005 product and has begun sharing preliminary details with its upcoming Windows Server virtualization technology, code-named Viridian, he said.

Mac users have been in for a tough haul with Windows Vista's virtualization policies. While Intel-based Macs have made it technically reasonable to run Windows through virtualization, and Parallels' software makes it relatively easy, Microsoft has made it expensive to do so legally. Running Vista on a Mac through virtualization requires a full, not an upgrade, version of Windows. Plus, only Vista Business and Ultimate are authorized for it, and not the far less pricy Home Basic or Home Premium varieties.

Neil, though, argued that most consumers just aren't ready for virtual machines.

"Virtualization is a new technology for consumers, and one that isn't mature enough yet from a security perspective for broad consumer adoption," he wrote. "Our security and data protection features can potentially be subverted by a malicious virtualization layer. We're working with the hardware and software industry to improve the security of virtualization technologies and we will evolve our licensing policies as virtualization becomes more widely used on client systems."

A Bit Of Movement In Antitrust Suit (KCS)

By Julius A. Karash

The Kansas City Star, February 28, 2007

The fight isn't over, but an olive branch has appeared in a local health-care antitrust controversy.

The case involves Heartland Spine & Specialty Hospital of Overland Park. In 2005 Heartland sued several area hospitals and health insurers, alleging a conspiracy to drive it out of business in violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act.

The lawsuit alleged a conspiracy that included insurers refusing managed-care contracts to Heartland. Heartland said being shut out of those networks caused it severe financial damage.

Mary Nan Holley, Heartland's chief executive officer, said last week that the hospital had worked out a settlement with one defendant, UnitedHealthcare, effective March 1. That means Heartland will become an in-network provider for about 350,000 UnitedHealthcare members in western Missouri and eastern Kansas.

Holley said UnitedHealthcare was the first defendant to settle and, as a result, will be the first major insurer in the area to allow Heartland in its network. The arrangement is expected to increase Heartland's patient volume 15 percent to 20 percent, she said. The hospital last year had 827 inpatient admissions and 8,142 outpatient encounters.

The settlement is confidential, but it is no secret that most of Heartland's 150 or so employees receive their health insurance through UnitedHealthcare.

"We're very pleased to be able to offer high-quality health care to United's insured, and very excited that our own employees, who are covered by UnitedHealthcare, can come to their own hospital on an in-network basis," Holley said.

Bill Tracy, the CEO of UnitedHealthcare's local operations, confirmed that his company had settled with Heartland.

The remaining defendants in the lawsuit are: HCA Midwest Division; St. Luke's Health System; Carondelet Health; Shawnee Mission Medical Center; North Kansas City Hospital; Blue Cross and Blue Shield of Kansas City; Coventry Health Care of Kansas; Humana Health Plan; Aetna; and Cigna HealthCare of Kansas/Missouri.

The case is scheduled to go to trial April 1, 2008, in federal court in Wichita.

Rural cuts

Sen. Pat Roberts of Kansas says the Bush administration's budget proposes to cut $143 million from the rural health-care delivery system.

DOJ_NMG_0137739

"The proposed budget has drastic cuts in payments to rural physicians, hospitals and home health-care providers," Roberts, a Republican and member of the Senate Rural Health Care Caucus, said at a recent hearing of the Senate Finance Committee. "I don't see how these providers, often the sole provider in many communities, can sustain these cuts."

Roberts said 88 out of 105 Kansas counties are considered rural or frontier and that more than 75 percent of the state's community hospitals are in rural areas.

Roberts said the administration budget would eliminate or cut funding for programs such as clinician recruitment and health insurance for people who can't obtain coverage because of pre-existing medical conditions or lack of affordability.

"I agree that we need to return to a policy of fiscal responsibility and we must get a handle on the growth in Medicare and Medicaid spending so these programs are viable and sustainable for future generations," Roberts said. "However, I'm afraid of going down a path where in order to save a few bucks here or a few dollars there, we end up hurting the people these programs were created to serve."

Onex Gets U.S. Antitrust Clearance To Buy Kodak's X-Ray Unit (BLOOM)

By James Rowley

Bloomberg, February 28, 2007

Feb. 27 (Bloomberg) -- Onex Corp., Canada's largest buyout firm, won U.S. antitrust clearance to purchase Eastman Kodak Co.'s health-care imaging unit, including an X-ray business the world's largest photography company started in 1896

The transaction was on a list of completed merger reviews published by the Federal Trade Commission in Washington.

Kodak said in announcing the sale on Jan. 10 that it will be paid at least $2.35 billion in cash and up to $200 million more if certain milestones are met. The sale will allow Kodak, based in Rochester, New York, to pay down debt as it tries to build its digital photography business.

Qualcomm Lawsuit Against Nokia On Hold (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 28, 2007

Nokia Corp. said a U.S. judge overseeing a patent dispute initiated by Qualcomm Inc. has put the proceedings on hold until further notice.

Qualcomm, based in San Diego, has alleged the Finnish company violated several patents used to make U.S. cellphones running on the global system for mobile communications, or GSM, standard.

The patents were originally used for a rival technology called code division multiple access, or CDMA, which Qualcomm helped pioneer. Nokia maintains it hasn't infringed any of Qualcomm's patents. The administrative-law judge overseeing the International Trade Commission investigation has two options: dismiss the proceeding or resume the investigation.

Richard Windsor, an analyst at Nomura, said the decision is likely "about giving them more opportunity to reach an agreement." Nokia said that since Qualcomm filed its complaint, it has voluntarily withdrawn three of the six patents from the suit.

Qualcomm spokesman William Davidson said the company was awaiting more information from the ITC judge and that no decision on the merits of the case has been made. The trial was scheduled to begin March 5.

ENVIRONMENT:

Nuclear Lab Operator Cited For Safety (AP)

AP, February 28, 2007

(AP) - LOS ALAMOS, N.M.-The National Nuclear Security Administration proposed a $1.1 million civil penalty against the former manager of a nuclear weapons lab for safety violations that included a researcher spreading radiological contamination to two other states and workers inhaling radioactive substances.

The agency announced the notice of violation Monday against the University of California for infractions that occurred in 2005, when UC was the sole manager of Los Alamos National Laboratory.

The notice spells out 15 separate incidents that violated the Department of Energy's nuclear safety rules.

The incidents include a Los Alamos researcher opening a package of slightly enriched uranium nitride pellets. The package was contaminated with americium 241, a radioactive decay product of plutonium.

The researcher unloaded the pellets without the help of a radiological control technician, and he spread the contamination to his home and places he visited in Colorado and Kansas.

Another incident involved workers who inhaled radioactive substances.

DOJ_NMG_0137740

In both cases, the contamination was limited by "good fortune" but had the potential to be significantly greater, acting NNSA director Thomas P. D'Agostino wrote in a Feb. 16 letter to lab director Michael Anastasio.

The notice also referred to a November 2005 inspection that exposed "long-standing" deficiencies in the lab's safety, health and environmental programs.

Since federal law exempted the non-profit university from financial liability at the time of the violations, the UC will not have to pay the fine. But the agency warned the lab's new management team - installed less than a year ago, in part to reverse years of security and safety problems - that those days are over.

"Due both to the recent contract change and changes in the civil penalty provisions of the Atomic Energy Act, future monetary civil penalties imposed ... as part of a notice of violation will no longer be waived," D'Agostino wrote.

The lab is now managed by Los Alamos National Security LLC, which includes the university, Bechtel Corp., BWX Technologies Inc. and Washington Group International.

D'Agostino said he expects corrective actions to be one Anastasio's highest priorities as lab director.

UC spokesman Chris Harrington said in a statement Monday that the university has taken a number of steps to fix the problems outlined by the NNSA.

"The University of California takes safety and security issues very seriously as part of our commitment to managing the national laboratories," Harrington said.

The notice of violation is the latest in a rash of criticism against the lab. Just last month, members of a House oversight committee threatened to strip the lab of its security responsibilities - or even shut it down - to correct security lapses.

Study: 'Tipping Point' For Climate Is Near (USAT)

By Patrick O'driscoll

USA Today, February 28, 2007

Declaring there is "no more time for delay," an international panel of scientists urged the world's nations Tuesday to stave off climate-change "catastrophe" by boosting clean-energy research and sharply cutting industrial emissions that fuel global warming.

Otherwise, Earth this century could cross a climate threshold or "tipping point that could lead to intolerable impacts on human well-being," says the 166-page report prepared for the United Nations. It was written by 18 experts in climate, water, marine science, physics and other disciplines, seven of them Americans.

"It is still possible to avoid an unmanageable degree of climate change, but the time for action is now," says panelist John Holdren, a Harvard University professor of environmental policy.

Without action, the panel says, a litany of harmful consequences awaits: the spread of disease, less fresh water, more and worse droughts, more extreme storms and widespread economic damage to farming, fishing and forests. In the USA, which emits about 25% of the world's carbon dioxide, it could mean more intense hurricanes, heat waves and wildfires.

The two-year study, issued by the U.N. Foundation, says the risk of tipping over that climate threshold rises sharply if Earth's temperature increases 3.6 to 4.5 degrees above what it was in 1750 (it is 1.2 degrees above that point now). That year marked the start of the Industrial Revolution. It led to the widespread burning of coal, oil and other fossil fuels that generate carbon dioxide, the main heat-trapping "greenhouse gas" blamed for global warming.

The scientists say a climate turnaround will take a huge effort. They call for the world's carbon emissions to level off by 2015-2020, then to be reduced by another one-third by the end of the century. Without action, they say, temperatures could rise 11 degrees by 2100.

The report comes three weeks after the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change laid out the latest evidence that human action — burning fossil fuels and deforesting the land — is mostly to blame for global warming.

Tuesday's report recommends a dramatic increase in development and use of "biofuels" such as ethanol to replace oil. It also calls for an immediate shift in power-plant construction away from traditional coal-burners to high-tech designs that capture and hold the carbon dioxide they produce.

The world should spend three to four times more on such advanced energy technology, the scientists add. The USA spends almost $3 billion a year now.

The report also suggests nations define a new category of "environmental refugee" to prepare for people who must flee the extreme effects of climate change, such as rising sea levels.

Conservation May Limit Global Warming (LAT)

By Robert Lee Hotz

DOJ_NMG_0137741

The Los Angeles Times, February 28, 2007

UNITED NATIONS — Dramatic worldwide climate changes can no longer be avoided, but there is still time to stave off the worst consequences of global warming, an international research team said Tuesday.

The scientists from 11 countries urged sweeping conservation measures to hold the expected increase in temperatures to no more than an average of 3.6 degrees Fahrenheit — less than half the expected increase if emissions of greenhouse gas and soot continue unabated.

Based on two years of study, the scientists called for bold actions, including carbon taxes, a ban on conventional coal-fired power plants and an end to beachfront construction worldwide.

The researchers were financed by the nonprofit United Nations Foundation and the 60,000-member research society Sigma Xi.

"Unlike many reports from scientists, this report gives very clear recommendations for what the international community and nations themselves must do to mitigate and adapt to climate change," said biodiversity expert Peter Raven, director of the Missouri Botanical Garden, who helped prepare a Sigma Xi study.

With its emphasis on policy recommendations, the panel's effort marks a shift in the international politics of pollution and climate change, analysts said. Researchers are no longer debating whether human-induced global warming is genuine, but have begun the painstaking process of negotiating international agreement on what to do about it.

Their effort comes on the heels of a landmark United Nations report last month that concluded rising temperatures would continue to increase even if greenhouse gas emissions could be held to current levels.

Global temperatures have increased about 1.4 degrees Fahrenheit over pre-industrial levels, the researchers said. To meet the scientists' goal, global CO2 emissions must level off by 2015 and drop by two-thirds of that level by 2100.

They urged stricter fuel efficiency standards, as well as fuel taxes, registration fees and rebates that favor more efficient transportation, which today is responsible for 40% of the world's carbon emissions.

A 20-fold improvement in car efficiency is well within existing technology, they said. Moving freight by rail instead of truck could also cut emissions substantially.

The researchers also recommended the expanded use of biofuels to reduce dependence on the oil that accounts for one-quarter of the world's CO2 emissions. They endorsed broader use of nuclear power, if it can be made safer. Energy research budgets worldwide ought to triple, they said.

In addition, the scientists called for improved designs of energy-efficient appliances, office equipment and "greener" commercial and residential buildings. Taken together, the heating, cooling and lighting of buildings accounts for about 30% of the world's greenhouse gas emissions.

Most tellingly, the panel called for a ban on any new coal-fired power plants that cannot be equipped to capture and store the carbon dioxide they emit.

All told, the U.S., China and India plan to build about 850 coal-fired plants over the next decade, which by environmentalists' calculations would pump as much as five times more carbon dioxide into the atmosphere than international control measures aim to eliminate.

No matter what people do to reduce soot or curtail emissions of carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases, the world will continue to warm somewhat, and people will have to adapt, the researchers said.

To minimize the hazards of rising sea levels and more powerful storms, the group called for a worldwide ban on beachfront construction near existing high-tide lines.

To reduce the effects of climate-related disasters, such as floods or prolonged droughts, the panel urged better international emergency response measures, warning that there may be as many as 50 million environmental refugees by 2010.

Congress Needs A Marshall Plan In Climate-change Debate (HILL)

By Margo Thorning, Ph.d.

The Hill, February 28, 2007

The recent report released by the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change on the consequences of increasing greenhouse gases (GHG) is a valuable contribution to the ongoing debate in understanding climate science. However, policymakers need to have a clear understanding of the likely economic impacts of alternative approaches to slowing the growth or reducing the level of greenhouse gas emissions.

While President Bush outlined bold steps in his State of the Union address to slow the growth of U.S. greenhouse gas emissions, Democratic leaders on Capitol Hill appear aggressively set on their own track to tackle the issue. Speaker Nancy

DOJ_NMG_0137742

Pelosi (D-Calif.) has appointed a controversial special committee to study climate change. And, at the helm of the Committee on Environment and Public Works, Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) is poised to push for emissions caps on greenhouse gases.

Al Gore's Oscar win for "An Inconvenient Truth" will no doubt become a centerpiece of the debate and generate even more demand for immediate action.

But before the nation is led down the path of the Kyoto protocol or the dramatic carbon dioxide emission reductions adopted in California, the home state of Pelosi and Boxer, a close look should be given to the high price tag of such "solutions."

The European Union's attempt to meet its Kyoto Protocol target is failing. The European Environmental Agency projects that the EU 15 will be 4 percent over its Kyoto target by 2010 without strong new measures to curb energy use. The EU's emission trading system is not working because only 40 percent of emissions are covered, and raising all energy prices enough to meet Kyoto targets would be political suicide.

Research with a variety of economic models show that the Kyoto Protocol targets would reduce U.S. GDP by 1 to 4 percent by 2010 and cost almost 2 million jobs. Less-stringent targets such as those in the McCain-Lieberman bill could reduce GDP by 1 percent by 2010 and cost almost 1 million jobs.

The real economic costs to the U.S. of mandatory carbon emission targets must be weighed against the environmental benefits. U.S. emissions are a falling share of global emissions; in fact, China's are now expected to exceed those of the U.S. by about 2009.

Unless the new majority in Congress looks at GHG reductions on a global scale, mandatory emission reductions in the U.S. would be all pain and little or no gain for the environment.

A good first step for Congress would be to approve the $52 million in seed money for the Asia Pacific Partnership on Clean Development and Climate (AP6) as prescribed by the 2005 energy bill. The goals of the AP6 agreement are to promote both global economic development and the use of cleaner, less-emitting energy technologies. The AP6 countries — China, India, Japan, Korea, the U.S. and Australia — have half of the world's population, use about half of the world's energy and emit about half of all global greenhouse gas emissions.

Unlike the Kyoto Protocol's mandatory GHG reduction, the AP6 partnership focuses on practical steps to promote cleaner, less-emitting technology for electricity generation from coal-fired plants, capturing and storing carbon dioxide as well as reducing emissions from steel, aluminum production, and coal mining in both developing as well as developed countries. Increasing energy efficiency for buildings and renewable energy supplies are also part of the AP6 agenda to promote economic growth and reductions in all types of emissions, including GHGs.

The partnership relies on sharing technology with developing countries, which is exactly what Sens. Mark Pryor (D-Ark.) and Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.) advocated in the Hagel-Pryor amendment. This piece of bi-partisan legislation promoted the adoption of technologies that reduce GHG intensity (amount of GHGs emitted per dollar of output) in the United States and in developing countries. It was a critical piece of the 2005 energy bill, which President Bush signed. The partnership also owes a great debt to Sen. Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.) for his leadership in the 2000 Clean Energy Technology Export Initiative, which focused on the commercial development and deployment of clean energy.

In practical terms, transferring the cleanest, most energy-efficient technologies to countries like China, India and other emerging economies whose emissions are growing rapidly will yield significant benefits. According to analysis conducted for ICCF, lowering the emissions intensity of developing countries to that currently associated with new investment in the U.S. would be roughly equal to what would be accomplished under the Kyoto Protocol by 2012 (assuming all 39 counties with targets met their goals).

Facilitating the adoption of the newest technologies will require initiative and vision from government officials. Promoting a favorable investment climate is a key requirement. The Chinese and Indian governments have already taken farsighted steps to do that, but more could be done to minimize corruption and regulatory burdens, establish effective rule of law, recognize intellectual property rights and permit capital to flow freely in to and out of countries. Progress in these areas will bolster the climate for critical foreign direct investment.

But AP6 and other efforts like it cannot succeed without sustained cooperation between business and government. Only when governments are confident that foreign direct investment is likely to take place in the wake of politically risky reforms are they likely to act. As such, businesses and firms from the U.S., Europe, Japan, Korea and Australia that are already present in China and India and are familiar with the legal, political, cultural and economic terrain have a significant role to play.

Remembering the success of the Marshall Plan is helpful here. After World War II, European governments pledged various actions with the money provided by the U.S. government, working in concert with business interests. When Europeans made good on those pledges the plan was extended and broadened. AP6 could operate similarly. Future actions by Australia, Japan,

DOJ_NMG_0137743

Korea and the United States desired by China and India would be contingent on success in implementing near term reforms agreed to in the process.

Dr. Margo Thorning is managing director of the International Center for Capital Formation (www.ICCFglobal.org), a European think tank focused on public policies to promote savings and investment in the private sector. ICCF advocates the reductions of tax, regulatory, anti-trust, and trade barriers to promote business investment, strong job growth and competitiveness.

A Green Deal On Coal (NYT)

New York Times, February 28, 2007

People who worry about global warming and want the United States to do more to reduce greenhouse gas emissions received some very good news over the weekend from a very unlikely source. As part of an ambitious buyout deal, TXU, a Texas utility that has long been a target of environmentalists, will abandon plans to build eight old-style coal-burning power plants, which would have dumped huge amounts of carbon dioxide into the atmosphere.

The buyers — two private equity companies, Kohlberg Kravis Roberts and the Texas Pacific Group — also agreed to invest $400 million to help their customers use energy more efficiently, and to explore cleaner ways to burn coal. In a gesture of potentially broad political consequence, they pledged to join other forward-looking companies in backing federal legislation imposing mandatory limits on emissions of carbon dioxide, the main greenhouse gas.

The deal represents a shrewd reading of the political waters by the new owners. TXU had come under heavy fire from influential members of Congress, the courts and even the local citizenry. The companies also knew that plants using older technologies and producing heavy emissions could be severely penalized if Congress ever chose to regulate carbon dioxide. It also helped that Texas Pacific's co-founder, David Bonderman, is himself an ardent environmentalist who was willing to reach out to TXU's opponents, including influential environmental groups, for their help in negotiating a deal.

Though the deal could be trumped by another offer, it is already being hailed as a pivotal moment in the fight against global warming. We shall see. It is certainly further evidence that the capital markets are becoming increasingly sensitive to the climate change issue. But the country and the environment cannot depend on good sense or even good business sense to persuade other corporate leaders to follow Kohlberg Kravis Roberts and Texas Pacific. Congress needs to move briskly toward legislation that would put a price on carbon, either by taxing it or capping emissions.

The Energy Department says there are 159 new coal-fired power plants on the drawing boards; of these, only 32 are considering — though not committed to — technologies that could significantly reduce carbon dioxide emissions. What's needed is federal legislation that would drive them in the direction TXU's new owners have promised to take.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Sen. Asks If FBI Will Punish Those Who Retaliated Against Agent (BVND)

By Frederic J. Frommer

The Belleville News Democrat, February 28, 2007

WASHINGTON - One of the Senate's most vocal defenders of government whistleblowers wants to know if the FBI plans to discipline agents who a court found had retaliated against a Minneapolis agent who filed a sexual-discrimination complaint.

Sen. Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, sent the letter to FBI Director Robert S. Mueller on Monday regarding the case of Minneapolis agent Jane Turner, who recently won a $565,000 judgment against the agency.

"Given that her allegations have now been substantiated, I am writing to you for information about how you intend to hold supervisors accountable for the acts of retaliation," Grassley wrote in a letter to Mueller. Grassley's office released the letter Tuesday.

FBI spokeswoman Cathy Milhoan would only say that the agency has received the letter and will prepare a response.

Turner, who retired in 2003, also had a separate dispute with the FBI after she accused colleagues of stealing a Tiffany crystal globe from the World Trade Center ruins. Grassley had rallied to Turner's side over that issue as well.

In this week's letter to Mueller, Grassley asked how many FBI supervisors have been disciplined for retaliation over the past five years and what discipline will be taken against those who were involved in the actions against Turner.

He also asks about the role of three specific supervisory special agents in the Turner case, and whether the FBI plans to discipline them.

DOJ_NMG_0137744

"Now that a jury has substantiated retaliation by the FBI in this case, I am anxious to find out what the FBI will do to demonstrate that your commitment to protecting FBI whistleblowers is more than just words," Grassley wrote. "Unless retaliators are held accountable, the FBI culture will not change."

He asked for a response by March 7.

In a statement, Grassley said: "It's time for the supervisors who retaliated against Jane Turner, and any other whistle blower for that matter, (to) be held accountable."

On Feb. 5, a jury awarded Turner $60,000 in damages for lost wages and $505,000 for emotional distress. According to one of her attorneys, Robert Hill, a statutory cap on monetary damages will require the judge to reduce the $505,000 to $300,000 - so she will get $360,000.

Records show Turner was rated superior or exceptional in her job reviews until she filed a sex discrimination complaint against her supervisor.

"I'm deeply honored to have Sen. Grassley's strong and unwavering support," Turner said Tuesday. "Senior managers in the FBI, by feeling they are a law unto themselves, are losing the legal and moral authority for the FBI."

Accounting Sought From FBI Director (MINNST)

By Dan Browning,

Minneapolis Star Tribune, February 28, 2007

Iowa Sen. Grassley wants to know how many supervisors have been disciplined for retaliation, and if three in particular played a part in a St. Paul agent's case. agency plans to discipline supervisors who retaliated against a whistleblower in its Minneapolis office.

By Dan Browning, Star Tribune U.S. Sen. Chuck Grassley is demanding an explanation of the roles that several FBI supervisors played in the retaliation against a former agent who filed a sex-discrimination complaint against the agency.

Earlier this month, a federal jury in Minneapolis awarded $565,000 to Jane Turner of St. Paul, finding that the Federal Bureau of Investigation had retaliated against her in job reviews after she had filed a discrimination complaint.

Grassley, R-Iowa, has supported Turner since she filed a report in 2002 that some fellow FBI agents had taken items from the wreckage of the World Trade Center in New York after the Sept. 11 attacks.

On Tuesday, Grassley released a copy of a letter that he has sent to FBI Director Robert Mueller asking for an accounting of how many FBI supervisors have been disciplined for acts of retaliation in the past five years. And he asked what role, if any, three male supervisors played in the Turner case, and for an explanation as to whether each would be disciplined.

"It's time for the supervisors who retaliated against Jane Turner, and any other whistleblower for that matter, [to] be held accountable," Grassley wrote.

The agent who directly supervised Turner when she filed her discrimination complaint, Craig Welken, has since retired. But the other two agents Grassley inquired about -- James (Chip) Burrus and James Casey -- still work for the FBI.

Burrus is now assistant director of the agency's criminal division. He testified at Turner's trial that he supported Welken in his review of her work.

Casey is now section chief of the counterintelligence division. He testified that he conducted a review of Turner's files and recommended that she be transferred to Minneapolis from her preferred posting in Minot, N.D., to help get her work back on track.

An FBI spokeswoman said in an e-mail at 2 p.m. Tuesday that the agency was aware of Grassley's letter and was preparing a response, but did not issue a public comment. Mueller has said previously that he would not tolerate retaliation against FBI whistleblowers, a fact underscored by Grassley in his letter.

"Actions speak louder than words," Grassley wrote. "Now that a jury has substantiated retaliation by the FBI in this case, I am anxious to find out what the FBI will do to demonstrate that your commitment to protecting FBI whistleblowers is more than just words."

Grassley asked for a written response by March 7.

Senator Presses FBI For Disciplining (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, February 18, 2007

A senior Republican on the Senate Judiciary Committee yesterday asked the FBI whether it planned to discipline senior supervisors after a ruling by a federal jury that the bureau retaliated against a former veteran agent.

Sen. Charles E. Grassley, Iowa Republican, said in a letter to FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III he was assured by the director on "many occasions" he would not tolerate retaliation against FBI whistleblowers and asked how he now intended to deal with the supervisors held accountable for the acts of retaliation.

Two weeks ago, a Minneapolis civil jury of six women and four men unanimously held that the FBI illegally retaliated against agent Jane Turner, a 25-year veteran of the FBI, by downgrading her performance reviews. The jury awarded her $60,000 in lost wages and $505,000 for punitive damages.

Ms. Turner had claimed in a lawsuit that FBI supervisors falsified negative performance reviews in retaliation for her filing of an equal-employment opportunity complaint and that she was subjected to "continued hostility" after reporting another agent's removal of a Tiffany crystal globe from ground zero at the World Trade Center.

"Given that her allegations have now been substantiated, I am writing to you to for information about how you intend to hold supervisors accountable for the acts of retaliation," Mr. Grassley wrote.

In the letter, he asked Mr. Mueller how many FBI supervisors had been disciplined for acts of retaliation over the past five years and what disciplinary actions, if any, would be taken against the FBI officials for their involvement in or approval of the acts of retaliation against Ms. Turner.

Mr. Grassley, a longtime FBI critic who also serves as ranking minority member of the Senate Finance Committee, also asked Mr. Mueller to explain what roles, if any, supervisory Special Agents Craig Welkin, James "Chip" Burrus and James Casey played in the Turner case.

Mr. Welkin, who directly supervised Ms. Turner when she filed her discrimination complaint, has since retired. Mr. Burrus is the assistant director of the FBI's criminal investigative division and Mr. Casey is chief of the bureau's counterterrorism section.

"Actions speak louder than words," Mr. Grassley said. "Now that a jury has substantiated retaliation by the FBI in this case, I am anxious to find out what the FBI will do to demonstrate that your commitment to protecting FBI whistleblowers is more than just words.

"Unless retaliators are held accountable, the FBI culture will not change," he said.

Mr. Grassley, who asked Mr. Mueller for a written response by March 7, has been an outspoken advocate for Ms. Turner since a report by the Justice Department's Office of Inspector General said agents improperly removed items from the site of the September 11 terrorist attack in New York City.

In a Feb. 26, 2004, letter to Mr. Mueller, the senator said Ms. Turner had a "duty and obligation to report such misconduct," adding that her "reward was continued hostility, and the FBI eventually initiated termination proceedings against her."

Athletes, Celebs Accused In Steroids Rap (AP)

AP, February 27, 2007

Athletes and celebrities were involved as customers of an illicit steroid sales network that produced arrests of four company officials on Tuesday, a New York prosecutor said.

However, Albany County District Attorney P. David Soares declined to name any consumers. He said his office was not investigating patients, but alleged producers and distributors, including doctors and pharmacists.

"I understand that the involvement of athletes and celebrities makes this a sexy story, but I assure you we are not, at this point, we are not concerned with the celebrity factor," Soares said. "Our focus here is to shut down distribution channels."

Soares was in Florida on Tuesday for two pharmacy raids conducted by federal and state agents at two Signature Pharmacy stores. Four company officials, including a married couple who are both pharmacists, were arrested. They were charged with criminal diversion of prescription medications and prescriptions, criminal sale of a controlled substance and insurance fraud.

Soares refused to answer most questions about the case, which involves sealed indictments.

"I cannot elaborate any more and I cannot provide you with any more details without compromising an investigation which even at this point is at a very sensitive stage," he said.

The Times Union of Albany, N.Y., first disclosed the steroid investigation in a report citing unidentified sources. The newspaper said investigators found evidence that testosterone and other performance-enhancing drugs may have been fraudulently prescribed over the Internet to current and former Major League Baseball and NFL players, college athletes, high school coaches, a former Mr. Olympia champion and another top contender in the bodybuilding competition.

Customers include Angels outfielder Gary Matthews Jr., according to the Times Union, which cited unidentified sources with knowledge of the investigation.

Angels spokesman Tim Mead told The Associated Press the team was aware of the story, adding, "That's the only information we have."

DOJ_NMG_0137746

Mead said manager Mike Scioscia told Matthews about it, and that general manager Bill Stoneman and Mead spoke to Matthews. An attempt by the AP to reach Matthews by phone Tuesday night was unsuccessful.

"We strongly recommended that Gary inform his agent and make sure he's aware as well," Mead said. "The information is sketchy at best."

The paper said a New York investigator flew to Pittsburgh last month to interview a physician for the Pittsburgh Steelers about why he allegedly used a personal credit card to purchase roughly $150,000 in testosterone and human growth hormone in 2006.

The physician, Richard A. Rydze, told the investigator the drugs were for his private patients, the paper said, citing an unidentified person briefed on the interview.

There are no allegations Rydze violated any laws.

Steelers spokesman Dave Lockett told the AP that Rydze works for the club mostly on game days. He is listed among the seven doctors under the "medical staff" designation on the official team employment roster.

"We can't comment any further because we are still gathering information," Lockett said.

A message was left seeking comment from Rydze.

Arrested on Tuesday were Stan and Naomi Loomis, who own the Signature Pharmacy in downtown Orlando, Stan's brother Mike Loomis and Kirk Calvert, Signature's marketing director. Soares' office identified Signature as a "producer" of the illegally distributed drugs.

Also arrested as a result of the New York investigation were three people Soares' office described as "distributors" from a Sugarland, Texas, company called Cellular Nucleonic Advantage.

Before the investigation is complete, Soares' office said, up to 24 people could face charges, including six doctors and three pharmacists.

The Loomis' downtown pharmacy contains a small retail store that sells bodybuilding supplements, a drug laboratory and executive offices.

Investigators loaded boxes into a truck and seized drugs, including anabolic steroids and human growth hormone, said Carl Metzger, narcotics commander for Orlando's Metropolitan Bureau of Investigation.

"I can't tell you what percentage of their business was legal and how much involved stacking steroids, but there was a mix," Metzger said.

Metzger said the search revealed a "raid card" at numerous Signature Pharmacy employees' desks with contact information for lawyers. The top of the documents identified it as a Food and Drug Administration/Drug Enforcement Agency telephone list, but only lawyers were on the card, Metzger said.

"We found that to be somewhat interesting," Metzger said. "Why would you need to have something entitled a phone call list for the DEA and FDA with lawyers' names if you have nothing to hide?"

Soares' office alleges that Signature filled prescriptions, in some cases from unlicensed doctors, knowing they had not met patients. The office said at least $250,000 in illegal and controlled substances were sold directly into Albany County, and New York state sales exceeded $10 million.

Soares said his investigation began after an Albany doctor was arrested for allegedly trafficking in narcotics online.

Albany DA Raids Fla. Steroids Center (ALBANYTU)

By Brendan J. Lyons Senior Writer Click Byline For More Stories By Writer.

Albany Times Union, February 28, 2007

Yearlong investigation of Internet drug sales may expose use by pro athletes

ORLANDO, Fla. -- A downtown pharmacy was raided by a law enforcement task force on Tuesday, the climax of a large New York state grand jury investigation into Internet drug sales that could expose widespread illicit steroid use by professional athletes and thousands of people across the nation.

The unprecedented inquiry, led by Albany County's district attorney, has taken New York narcotics agents and an Orlando-based federal task force deep inside a maze of shadowy pharmacies and Web sites that have reaped millions of dollars in profit by allegedly exploiting federal and state prescription laws, according to court records.

More than two dozen doctors, pharmacists and business owners have been, or will be, arrested in the coming days in Alabama, Texas, Florida and New York on sealed indictments charging them with various felonies for unlawfully distributing steroids and other controlled substances, records show.

The Times Union has learned that investigators in the year-old case, which has been kept quiet until now, uncovered evidence that testosterone and other performance-enhancing drugs may have been fraudulently prescribed over the Internet to current and former Major League Baseball players, National Football League players, college athletes, high school coaches, a former Mr. Olympia champion and another leading contender in the bodybuilding competition.

The customers include Los Angeles Angels center fielder Gary Matthews Jr., according to sources with knowledge of the investigation.

Sources also said investigators from the New York Bureau of Narcotics Enforcement, which is part of the state Department of Health, recently interviewed a top physician for the Pittsburgh Steelers about his alleged purchase last year of roughly $150,000 of testosterone and human growth hormone.

In the past several years, Internet-based pharmacies have become the new drug delivery system for tens of thousands of customers nationwide, displacing smugglers, overseas mail-order companies and so-called ``gym rat'' dealers who sell steroids from the trunks of their cars, according to state and federal investigators.

Tuesday's raid of Signature Pharmacy, an Orlando business that collected an estimated $36 million in revenue last year, could expose a long list of sports figures, celebrities and others who have turned to Internet pharmacies for illegal drugs such as steroids, authorities said.

``I don't know the names of a lot of the athletes,'' Lt. Carl Metzger, commander of the Orlando Metropolitan Bureau of Enforcement, said during Tuesday's raid.

``This is a criminal investigation, not an administative investigation,'' Metzger told a gaggle of TV reporters at the scene. ``I think that some of their business was legitimate,'' he said, adding that ``much of it was illegal.''

In a press release, Orlando police said the raid targeted steroids and human growth hormone. ``People forget about the damage steroids can cause,'' Metzger said. ``It goes all the way down to the high school level.''

Albany County District Attorney David Soares said his office pursued the case, in part, because New York has some of the strictest prescription drug laws in the country. In addition, Signature Pharmacy last year did an estimated $10 million in business in New York, he said.

Soares said that his critics will probably question why a local New York prosecutor is pursuing the case. ``We're arresting young men on street corners every day for selling drugs,'' he said. ``Signature did $30 million last year ... $250,000 in Albany County.''

Corruption in the Internet pharmaceutical industry, which has received lax oversight from federal authorities, has been organized and systemic, prompting Congressional hearings on the issue and a crackdown in recent months by federal agencies.

Some companies have enlisted unethical doctors who blindly write prescriptions for as little as $25 each, giving pharmacies the authorization they need to dole out thousands of illegal prescriptions, according to court documents filed in Albany, Orlando and in a related federal case in Rhode Island.

Customers usually have to pay high retail prices for their drugs, in part because many purchasers avoid seeking reimbursement from insurance carriers to escape detection. Mostly, they use cash, checks and credit cards to pay for the drugs.

``It's a complete perversion of the medical system,'' said Christopher Baynes, an Albany County prosecutor assigned exclusively to the case for almost a year.

Some federal agents have complained that until recently the Drug Enforcement Agency and other federal agencies had rarely filed criminal charges in such cases. Instead, they were content to revoke the operating permits of pharmacies that have doled out controlled substances, including addictive painkillers, to customers who have not been properly evaluated by a physician.

In part, an agent said, the unwillingness to prosecute the cases criminally has been a result of federal prosecutors in certain areas of the country being reluctant to take on the complex and time-consuming investigations.

While cases involving heroin, cocaine and other addictive street drugs receive enormous federal resources, law enforcement has been slow to catch on to the Internet pharmacies practices, said the agent, who spoke on condition he not be identified.

In New York, investigators have interviewed numerous suspected steroids buyers, including physicians who prescribed or bought large quantities, an Albany narcotics detective, a top Mr. Olympia bodybuilder and the host of a popular cable television program, sources said.

Last month, a New York investigator who has been tracking suspicious purchases from Signature Pharmacy flew to Pittsburgh to interview a top physician for the NFL's Pittsburgh Steelers about why he allegedly used a personal credit card to purchase roughly $150,000 in testosterone and human growth hormone in 2006.

The physician, Richard A. Rydze, who won a silver medal in platform diving in the 1972 Olympics, told the investigator the drugs were for his private patients, according to a person briefed on the interview. Rydze is an internist at the University of Pittsburgh Medical Center. He also is a consulting physician for the FBI and the Federal Aviation Administration.

DOJ_NMG_0137748

There are no allegations Rydze violated any laws. Many doctors are allowed under Pennsylvania rules to order and dispense prescription drugs. But investigators in New York said his orders of testosterone piqued their interest because of the large volume, his position with an NFL team and because he allegedly used a personal credit card.

``The doctors pretty much have reign to do anything they want," said Carmen Catizone, executive director of the National Association of Boards of Pharmacy.

But Catizone, who has served as an expert witness for the DEA and other law enforcement agencies in criminal trials, said the credit card purchases raised questions.

``I've never seen a doctor pull out his or her own credit card ... it just doesn't make sense," Catizone said. ``Unless you are trying to build frequent-flyer miles on a credit card, I'm not sure why they'd be using a personal credit card."

Rydze and two spokesmen for the Steelers' organization declined repeated requests for comment over the past two weeks. Pennsylvania state medical board officials also declined to comment. NFL officials were taken by surprise as news of the case swept through the sports world on the Internet.

``We just became aware of this, and we will look into it." NFL spokesman Greg Aiello said. The retail value of the drugs allegedly purchased by Rydze, who tends to Steelers' players during their home and away games, is about $750,000, according to an investigator in the case.

In a related case in Mobile, Ala., two owners of Applied Pharmacy Services have been indicted by an Albany County grand jury. Their customer list allegedly includes former professional boxer and heavyweight champion Evander Holyfield, Los Angeles Angels centerfielder Gary Matthews Jr., and retired baseball star Jose Canseco, an admitted steroid user.

A law enforcement source involved in that investigation said authorities have not identified what types of products allegedly were ordered by Matthews or Holyfield, whom they said used the name ``Evan Fields" when placing orders.

Matthews was informed of his name appearing in a Times Union news report before his spring training game Tuesday. ``There's nothing much to say. A name is mentioned. It's sketchy at best," said Los Angeles Angels Vice President of Communications Tim Mead.

``Certainly as we acquire more information, we'll look into it." Mead said.

Holyfield himself did not comment.

``Evander was asked about this by another member of the media and he said he never heard of the company," Donald Tremblay, public relations director at Main Events, a company promoting Holyfield's upcoming fight against Vinny Maddaline, said.

Still, Holyfield and other alleged high-profile customers represent just a fraction of pharmacies' business, which law enforcement authorities said is centered largely on dispensing performance-enhancing drugs.

The Orlando pharmacy is owned and operated by a Florida couple, Stan and Naomi Loomis, who are both licensed pharmacists. Both were arrested Tuesday on indictments from Albany and led in handcuffs from their business.

In 2002, their company reported revenue of about $500,000. Then, driven by a booming Internet prescription market, and the referral business Signature received from various Web sites, revenue topped $35 million last year, authorities in the case said.

Also arrested at Signature on Tuesday on Albany indictments were Kenneth Michael Loomis, also a pharmacist, and Kirk Calvert, Signature's marketing director.

Among Signature's customers was Jason Grimsley, the former Arizona Diamondbacks pitcher who left baseball last year after mail-order steroids were seized at his Scottsdale home by federal agents from San Francisco involved in an ongoing investigation targeting steroid use in professional sports. Grimsley has not been charged with any crimes, but federal agents said he told them about widespread use of performance-enhancing drugs by Major League Baseball players.

In an affidavit from a federal agent who questioned Grimsley, the agent said Grimsley claimed another player, later identified in an ESPN report as former Baltimore Orioles first baseman David Segui, had advised Grimsley on how to obtain human growth hormone from a ``wellness center" in Florida.

But authorities said they believe Signature's steroid and human growth hormone customers extend beyond baseball to other sports.

During surveillance of the pharmacy last year, investigators said they saw a Philadelphia Eagles football player enter the pharmacy, though they are not certain why he was there. They also identified a member of the Washington Redskins as being a Signature customer, according to an agent in the case.

The pharmacy is located in a two-story, $3.2 million facility on Kuhl Avenue in the heart of Orlando. It contains a small retail store that sells mostly bodybuilding supplements, a high-tech drug-manufacturing laboratory and executive offices on the second floor. A mix of federal and state agents spent Tuesday removing computers and records from Signature's offices.

DOJ_NMG_0137749

In the past year, investigators have closely monitored the business through wiretaps. An Orlando investigator also has sifted through the pharmacy's discarded records, removing customer lists and other records, sources in the case said.

People expected to be arrested Tuesday were to be arraigned on sealed felony indictments in New York. They will face extradition hearings over the next several days unless they waive those hearings and agree to appear in Albany on the charges, authorities said.

4 Tied To Pharmacy Are Arrested In Inquiry Into Steroid Sales (NYT)

By Nicholas Confessore

The New York Times, February 28, 2007

ALBANY, Feb. 27 — Federal and state investigators on Tuesday arrested four people with ties to a pharmacy in Orlando, Fla., that law enforcement officials said accounted for a large part of the national market in steroids and other performance enhancers that are sold illegally online.

The arrests followed a two-year investigation by the Albany County district attorney into Internet drug sales in New York State. The investigation spanned at least three states, and included numerous people reported to be customers of the pharmacy, including current and former Major League Baseball players, National Football League players, college athletes, coaches and doctors.

At least two dozen other individuals are expected to face indictment in New York, according to P. David Soares, the district attorney for Albany County, including several doctors and pharmacists. At a news conference in Orlando on Tuesday, he said that three people from Texas whom he described as distributors in the operation had been arrested earlier, and that five other doctors would face professional disciplinary charges.

The pharmacy, Signature Pharmacy, filled prescriptions written by licensed and unlicensed doctors who had never met their purported patients, as required by New York law, Mr. Soares said. The pharmacy sold at least $10 million worth of controlled substances in New York, including $250,000 worth of drugs sold and shipped directly to Albany County, according to Mr. Soares.

Mr. Soares said that "there are celebrities involved in the case as consumers," but declined to name any of the pharmacy's customers, saying his investigation had centered on "the manufacturing, the distribution, the physicians who are taking part in this."

The four people arrested yesterday were Naomi Loomis and Robert Loomis, the husband and wife who own the pharmacy; Mr. Loomis's brother, Kenneth Michael Loomis, a pharmacist at the company; and Kirk Calvert, the company's marketing director.

All four face charges of criminal diversion of prescription medications and prescriptions, criminal sale of a controlled substance and insurance fraud, The Associated Press reported. Mr. Soares's investigation was disclosed Tuesday by The Times Union of Albany on that newspaper's Web site.

The Times Union named several professional athletes as having been customers of Signature or other online pharmacies that were subjects of the two-year investigation, though Mr. Soares would not confirm any of those names, saying he could not reveal more information "without compromising an investigation."

One of those named in the Times Union story was Gary Matthews Jr., a center fielder for the Angels. Scott Leventhal, Mr. Matthews's agent, did not return messages left for him on Tuesday.

Tim Mead, the Angels' vice president of communications, said yesterday that the team had become aware of the story on Tuesday morning, and that Angels officials met with Mr. Matthews the same day to show him the story.

"It's a very general story. There are a lot of things in it that are kind of sketchy," Mr. Mead said. "But we made Gary aware of it, and there will be more down the road."

Before the 2006 season with the Texas Rangers, Mr. Matthews, 32, had played for six teams in seven seasons and was considered a journeyman outfielder, unable to impress teams enough for them to want to retain him.

But Mr. Matthews's modest stature changed when he had a breakout season with the Rangers, batting .313 with 19 homers and 79 runs batted in. The timing was good for Mr. Matthews, who became a free agent after his increased production in 2006 and signed a 5-year, $50 million contract with the Angels.

A spokesman for the National Football League said that officials with the district attorney's office had not contacted the league and that they had become aware of the investigation only on Tuesday.

A spokesman for Major League Baseball also said that the organization had learned of the investigation only through media reports and had no comment on it.

Another customer was Dr. Richard A. Rydze, 56, of Pittsburgh, a physician who tends to members of the Pittsburgh Steelers as well as private patients.

Mr. Rydze said on Tuesday that he was first approached by federal agents from New York in December, who told him during a brief meeting that he had been "caught in the line of fire" of the investigation into Signature.

They urged him to stop using Signature immediately and to switch to a local distributor, he said in a telephone interview. Mr. Rydze said he obliged, severed ties with the firm, and didn't hear from anyone else associated with the investigation again.

He began using Signature, he said, after meeting company representatives at a booth during an anti-aging conference in Las Vegas in late 2005. For more than a year, he said, he paid the company $90,000 to $100,000 for growth hormone drugs, prescribing them to patients in his private practice who suffered from orthopedic ailments, tendon injuries or growth hormone deficiencies.

But he said he never prescribed the drugs to any members of the Steelers.

"I never have, never would and never will," he said. "My involvement was not abusive. I was doing things by the rules."

Anabolic steroids, human growth hormone and other performance-enhancing drugs have proliferated on the Internet just as legitimate business has. A prescription can be approved by a doctor in any country, based on as little as an online questionnaire, with no face-to-face contact.

The state and federal laws against illegal prescriptions are rarely enforced, as drug agencies focus on heroin, cocaine and methamphetamine.

At least seven different federal and state agencies worked with Mr. Soares's office on the investigation, including New York State health, insurance, and drug enforcement officials, the Florida attorney general, and the United States Justice Department and Internal Revenue Service.

According to an individual with direct knowledge of the investigation, the raids are part of a national effort aimed at pharmacies and doctors — the primary suppliers of performance-enhancing drugs — rather than the trainers and coaches who use them.

That individual, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because the investigations are still under way, said that investigators found more steroids and human growth hormone at the Florida pharmacy than they had originally expected.

The individual also said the raids were related to the arrests of two doctors and the owner of a pharmaceutical distribution company on Feb. 23 in Rhode Island.

In that case, according to The Associated Press, the owner of a New Jersey pharmaceutical company and two doctors from New York were charged in an alleged scheme to illegally prescribe anabolic steroids and human growth hormone to bodybuilders in several states, the United States Attorney's Office in Rhode Island said on Feb. 23.

Daniel McGlone, 54, owner of American Pharmaceutical Group, and Ana Maria Santi, a former doctor who has been stripped of her license to practice medicine, were charged in an 80-count indictment handed up last week by a federal grand jury in Providence, R.I., according to The Associated Press. Victor Mariani, a licensed physician with a practice in New York City, was charged separately and has agreed to plead guilty, prosecutors said.

Investigation Of Steroids And HGH Produces Arrests In Three States (WP)

By Amy Shipley, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 27, 2007

MIAMI -- State and federal agents raided an Orlando pharmacy Tuesday as part of a long-term investigation into illegal steroid and human growth hormone sales, the Metropolitan Bureau of Investigation in Orlando said.

The raid of Signature Pharmacy was first reported on the Web site of the Albany (N.Y.) Times-Union, which said it stemmed from a year-long investigation led by Albany County's district attorney, and involved New York Bureau of Narcotics Enforcement agents and the Orlando-based federal task force.

The newspaper said the pharmacy might have supplied prescriptions of testosterone and other performance-enhancing drugs to current and former Major League Baseball and NFL players, high school and college athletes, and bodybuilders. Albany County District Attorney P. David Soares said Tuesday night that athletes and "celebrities" were involved but declined to identify them. He also said his office was targeting doctors, pharmacists and distributors, not individual patients.

"I understand that the involvement of athletes and celebrities makes this a sexy story, but I assure you we are not, at this point, we are not concerned with the celebrity factor," Soares said, according to the Associated Press. "Our focus here is to shut down distribution channels." ...

Several professional athletes were clients of another pharmacy in Mobile, Ala., that might have provided illicit drugs to professional athletes. The owners of that pharmacy recently were indicted in Albany County, the Times-Union reported. An attorney for that pharmacy, Applied Pharmacy Services, did not respond to a request for comment.

Both of the pharmacies offered prescriptions over the Internet, which federal investigators believe has become a primary source for illicit sales of performance-enhancing drugs in recent years as pharmacists skirt lenient laws governing the industry.

A baseball trainer told The Washington Post in 2003 that he had watched one player order a performance-enhancing drug from an Internet pharmacy without an appointment, medical evaluation or prescription.

Twelve agencies participated in the raids of two Signature Pharmacy locations, the Orlando task force reported.

Soares has led the year-long investigation, which he said began after an Albany doctor was arrested on drug charges last year. Investigators collected dozens of boxes of computer equipment, files and drugs during the raid, placing them in a U-Haul truck.

The Times-Union said an NFL team physician used a personal credit card to purchase $150,000 in testosterone and human growth hormone last year but told investigators they were for legitimate prescriptions.

Gene Upshaw, the executive director of the NFL Players Association, said Tuesday night his only knowledge of the case had come through media reports. "I can't really say anything because I have not spoken to anyone about it," Upshaw said.

Staff writer Mark Maske contributed to this report from Washington.

Drug Agents Raid Downtown Pharmacy After Steroid Probe (ORS)

The Orlando Sentinel, February 27, 2007

Federal and state narcotics agents arrested the owners of an Orlando pharmacy Tuesday as part of a New York state investigation into the sale of steroids and other performance enhancers to professional and college athletes over the Internet.

Stan and Naomi Loomis, both licensed pharmacists who own the Signature Pharmacy in downtown Orlando and another nearby, and Stan's brother, Mike Loomis, were arrested before a crowd of reporters. The three said "no comment" as a throng of reporters crowded their path to waiting police cars.

Later Tuesday, Kirk Calvert, who was identified as a manager at the pharmacy, also was arrested, but authorities did not immediately disclose the charges against him. All four have been charged with criminal diversion of prescription medications and prescriptions, criminal sale of a controlled substance and insurance fraud.

Authorities said other arrests had been made, but they did not immediately disclose details.

The Albany, N.Y., Times Union, which first disclosed the investigation, reported that investigators expected to arrest more than two dozen doctors, pharmacists and business owners on sealed New York indictments charging them with various felonies for unlawfully distributing steroids and other controlled substances, court records show.

The Times Union reported that investigators in the year-old case uncovered evidence that testosterone and other performance-enhancing drugs may have been fraudulently prescribed over the Internet to current and former major league baseball and NFL players, college athletes, high school coaches, a former Mr. Olympia champion and another top contender in the bodybuilding competition.

The Loomis' downtown pharmacy contains a small retail store that sells mostly bodybuilding supplements, a high-tech drug-manufacturing laboratory and executive offices on the second floor.

Carl Metzger, narcotics commander for Orlando's metropolitan bureau of investigation, said the Loomises were arrested on a New York warrant, but could not give details. He said Albany County District Attorney David Soares was in Loomis' pharmacy, but Soares was not immediately available for comment.

Investigators loaded boxes into a truck. Metzger said anabolic steroids were among the confiscated items, but he said the legality of them was still being investigated.

"I can't tell you what percentage of their business was legal and how much involved stacking steroids, but there was a mix," Metzger said.

Metzger said authorities found a phone list at numerous employees' desks with contact information for lawyers and representatives with the Drug Enforcement Administration and the Food and Drug Administration.

"We found that to be somewhat interesting," Metzger said. "Why would you need to have something entitled a phone call list for the DEA and FDA with lawyers' names if you have nothing to hide?"

Tuesday's raids of two locations for Signature Pharmacy, which did about $36 million in business last year, could expose a long list of sports figures, celebrities and others who have turned to Internet pharmacies for illegal drugs such as steroids, law enforcement authorities told the newspaper.

In 2002, Signature Pharmacy reported revenue of about $500,000. Revenue topped $35 million last year, authorities told the newspaper.

Soares told the Times Union his office pursued the case, in part, because New York has some of the strictest prescription drug laws in the country. In addition, Signature Pharmacy last year did an estimated $6 million in business in New York, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0137752

"We're arresting young men on street corners every day for selling drugs," he told the newspaper. "Signature did $30 million last year ... $250,000 in Albany County."

Steroid purchasers usually have to pay high retail prices for their drugs, in part because many avoid seeking reimbursement from insurance carriers to avoid detection. Mostly, they use cash, checks and credit cards to pay for the drugs.

"It's a complete perversion of the medical system," Christopher Baynes, an Albany County prosecutor assigned exclusively to the case for almost a year, told the Times Union.

Some companies have enlisted unethical doctors who blindly write prescriptions for as little as $25 each, according to court documents filed in Albany and in a related federal case in Rhode Island.

Pro Athletes Received Steroids From Drug Ring, Prosecutor Says (BLOOM)

By Erik Matuszewski

Bloomberg, February 28, 2007

(Bloomberg) -- Professional athletes were among the customers who bought steroids and human-growth hormone from an illegal Internet drug distribution ring, according to a New York prosecutor involved in a yearlong investigation.

Albany County District Attorney P. David Soares didn't identify customers at a news conference yesterday in front of a Signature Pharmacy in Orlando, Florida. The pharmacy was one of two raided in Florida as a result of the probe.

The raids by a task force of federal and state law enforcement personnel led to the arrests of four Signature Pharmacy officials, including Chief Executive Naomi Loomis, the Albany District Attorney's Office said in an e-mailed statement. A phone message left at Signature Pharmacy for Loomis wasn't immediately returned.

As many as 24 people, including six doctors and three pharmacists, face felony charges for unlawfully distributing anabolic steroids and other controlled substances, according to the statement. The businesses shut by yesterday's arrests are believed to supply a large portion of the national market of the on-line sale of steroids, human-growth hormone and other illegal substances, Soares said.

Statewide sales in New York totaled more than $10 million. The Times Union of Albany, New York, reported the network may have illegally prescribed performance-enhancing drugs and testosterone over the Internet to current and former Major League Baseball and National Football League players, as well as college athletes, high school coaches and a former bodybuilding champion.

Possible Customers?

The customers include Los Angeles Angels center fielder Gary Matthews Jr. and a Pittsburgh Steelers doctor who last year purchased about $150,000 of testosterone and human-growth hormone, the newspaper reported, citing unidentified people familiar with the investigation.

There's no phone listing for Matthews. His agent, Scott Leventhal, and Tim Mead, a spokesman for the Angels, didn't immediately return telephone messages. Steelers' spokesman Dave Lockett also didn't immediately return telephone messages.

``I understand that the involvement of athletes and celebrities makes this a sexy story, but I assure you, we are not concerned with the celebrity factor," Soares said yesterday. ``Our focus here is to shut down distribution channels."

Among the participants in ``Operation Which Doctor" were the Albany District Attorney's Office, the U.S. Justice Department, the New York Bureau of Narcotics Enforcement, the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency and the Florida Attorney General.

SI Reporters Witness Raid (SI/CNN)

Sports Illustrated/CNN, February 27, 2007

Florida Steroid Sweep Could Implicate More Athletes

As part of a broad operation to crack down on the sale of performance-enhancing drugs over the Internet, authorities raided an Orlando pharmacy and a Jupiter, Fla., "anti-aging" clinic Tuesday morning. Sports Illustrated reporters Luis Fernando Llosa and L. Jon Wertheim accompanied investigators on the Jupiter raid, which authorities believe will reveal a trove of athletes as clients. SI.com caught up with Llosa and Wertheim in South Florida on Tuesday night.

SI.com: What did you witness?

Llosa/Wertheim: This sweep was part of an ongoing operation that involves a number of agencies at both a federal and state level. A really wide net has been cast here.

Shortly before noon, a team -- equipped with a battering ram and bulletproof vests -- descended on Palm Beach Rejuvenation Center. The name of the place is a lot sexier than reality. The offices were on the third floor of a nondescript, mustard-colored building -- the kind of place people drive by and pay no mind to -- a mile or so from the Atlantic Ocean. We saw arrests being made, but clearly investigators were more interested in what material evidence they might find.

DOJ_NMG_0137753

SI.com: What do investigators allege?

Llosa/Wertheim: Authorities are concerned about how easy it is to get steroids and human growth hormone (HGH) over the Internet. As an investigator explained it to us, a client using a credit card can "visit" an anti-aging clinic or wellness center on-line, such as Palm Beach Rejuvenation. The customer fills out a brief questionnaire, indicating he'd like to buy such-and-such products. An operator -- and we spoke with several Palm Beach employees Tuesday who likened their office to "a call center" -- speaks with the consumer, takes down some cursory information, and basically takes an order, often for a controlled substance, according to investigators. The operator processes a prescription with a doctor, who is often in a different state (and often being paid, we're told, as much as $50 per script to rubber stamp each order). The signed prescriptions get faxed to the compound pharmacies that know from the very beginning that there is no doctor-patient relationship. The pharmacy then sends the product to the customer. In short, it all makes for a sort of pharmacological Ponzi scheme.

One name that has caught the interest of investigators was that of Richard Rydze, a Pittsburgh internist who also happens to be a team physician with the Steelers for the past 21 years. Investigators allege that Rydze purchased $150,000 worth of HGH with his personal business credit card. The drugs were supplied by Signature. HGH is not only a banned drug in the NFL but the league has committed $450,000 to researching HGH testing.

We interviewed Rydze earlier this month in Pittsburgh about this matter. He confirmed making the purchases but asserted that he uses the HGH to treat elderly patients who are "deficient in growth hormone," and require tendon repair. "[It's] not for athletes, never," says Rydze. "I don't give it to people who want to come in here and look pretty and look young and build up their muscles. I will not do that."

SI.com: What is the Steelers' take on one of their team doctors being questioned by investigators for buying HGH?

Llosa/Wertheim: Team sources told us that they heard about this investigation for the first time Tuesday and "still need to gather information before we can make any comment." Greg Aiello, NFL spokesman, also told us the league had no previous knowledge and "will certainly be looking into it." Interestingly, Rydze told us that: "The Rooneys [the Steelers' owners] are aware that I do this ... I mean, they have my trust that I would never do this with an athlete."

Owners Of Local Pharmacy Arrested Following RaidsRaids Stem From New York Investigation (WESH)

WESH-TV, February 27, 2007

ORLANDO, Fla. -- A task force of local, state and federal agents raided two Central Florida pharmacies on Tuesday and arrested four people.

Search warrants were executed at the Signature Compounding Pharmacies at 1200 Kuhl Ave. in downtown Orlando and at 2304 Aloma Ave. in Winter Park, WESH 2 News reported.

The owners of Signature Compounding Pharmacy were arrested and officials said they could be sent to New York state, where the whole case began.

Naomi and Stan Loomis and Stan Loomis' brother, Michael Loomis, are expected to face charges connected to the illegal distribution of steroids, human-growth hormones and other drugs, officials said.

"We've not done anything wrong," Naomi Loomis said.

Kirk Calvert, who is believed to be he company's marketing manager, was also arrested.

The Florida Metropolitan Bureau of Investigation said some of agencies involved with the investigation include the Orlando Police Department, the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, the Florida Department of Law Enforcement, the Florida Department of Health, the IRS, the Food and Drug Administration and the Florida Attorney General's Office.

"They're New York charges, and it's all part of an investigation into steroids and human-growth hormones. I can't be more specific than that at this time," said Lt. Carl Metzger, an MBI agent.

At both pharmacies, boxes and computer files from Signature Pharmacy were loaded into trucks by federal and state agents.

The pharmacy, which makes specialized prescription medicine, was named in a New York grand jury investigation and other legal documents in a case involving the Internet sale of illegal performance-enhancing drugs, some to professional baseball and football athletes, according to reporter Brendan Lyons with the Albany Times-Union, which is owned by the same company that owns WESH 2 News.

"There are pharmaceutical companies in multiple states and physicians in multiple states who are being looked at as far as this case," Lyons said.

DOJ_NMG_0137754

Officials said the Naomi, Stan and Michael Loomis will face charges of criminal diversion of prescription drugs and insurance fraud.

The Loomis family and Calvert will have their first appearances in an Orange County courtroom on Wednesday.

After that time, New York officials will move to have them extradited.

According to Russ Scala, who is associated with Signature Pharmacy, the pharmacy sells bioidenticals -- customized, hormone-replacement therapy.

He said the FDA is telling companies like his that when they make customized, hormone replacements, the companies are creating new drugs, which need to be regulated by the government.

Internet companies have made it easier for athletes from high school to the pros to get illegal steroids, and Tuesday's raid could potentially expose a long list of sports figures that have turned to companies like this to supply them with performance-enhancing drugs, officials said.

One athlete named as a Signature Pharmacy customer in published reports is Gary Matthews Jr. of the Los Angeles Angels of Anaheim.

Matthews had a break-out season last year with Texas, which lead to a five-year, $50 million contract with the Angels.

WESH 2 sports anchor Guy Rawlings called the Angels on Tuesday and made them aware of the situation. They have since notified Matthews and his agent, who were also unaware of the situation in Orlando.

The Angels couldn't say much at this early stage other than their player has not been found guilty of any wrongdoing.

Other names popping up in association with the investigation include former heavyweight Evander Holyfield and admitted steroid user Jose Canseco.

Again, at this point, none of these athletes have been charged with anything, but the investigation is continuing.

Steelers' Doctor Questioned In Steroids Investigation (WTAE)

WTAE-TV, February 27, 2007

On Tuesday, a report that surfaced said a doctor who works with the Pittsburgh Steelers was questioned in a steroids investigation.

A reporter with the Albany Times Union said Dr. Richard Rydze was questioned about $150,000 in steroids purchases on his personal credit card.

Brendan Lyons reported a New York state health department investigator, last month, flew to Pittsburgh as part of a wide-scale investigation into the online sale of steroids.

Lyons said investigators questioned Rydze about his alleged purchase of steroids and a human growth hormone.

Lyons said his sources in New York told him Rydze is not a target in the investigation, and in fact, New York authorities have no jurisdiction over him.

Team 4 left a message for Rydze's Downtown office, but he did not return our call.

Steelers President Art Rooney II said he doesn't know anything about the case.

Rydze isn't breaking any laws or rules by buying HGH and testosterone online. However, the NFL has a clear policy banning the use of testosterone by players.

Steelers' Doctor Questioned In Steroids Probe (KDKA)

KDKA-TV, February 27, 2007

Authorities in New York have questioned a top Steelers' physician in an investigation involving steroids and other performance enhancing drugs.

An Albany newspaper is reporting that a task force raided a pharmacy in Orlando, Florida this morning after a grand jury investigation into a group of pharmacies and websites that allegedly profited from exploiting federal and state prescription laws.

Among those questioned was Steelers' team doctor Richard Rydze.

Authorities say Rydze used a personal credit card to buy $150,000 worth of testosterone and humane growth hormone from an internet-based pharmacy in 2006.

Rydze told investigators the drugs were for his private patients.

There are no allegations that Rydze broke any laws but investigators say they were curious given the volume of the purchase and that he used a personal credit card.

The newspaper says neither the Steelers nor Rydze would comment on the investigation.

Steelers Doctor Questioned In Steroid Probe (PTR)

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, February 28, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0137755

Authorities have questioned an associate team physician for the Steelers as part of a yearlong investigation into illegal Internet sales of anabolic steroids, according to a published report.

Dr. Richard A. Rydze, an internal medicine specialist at the University of Pittsburgh Medical Center, was questioned last month about a $150,000 purchase of testosterone and human growth hormone, according to a report published Tuesday in the Times Union in Albany, N.Y.

There is no indication that Rydze has done anything wrong, and a spokeswoman for Albany County District Attorney P. David Soares would not say if he is a target of the investigation.

The Times Union story said the investigation could expose widespread illicit steroid use by professional athletes and thousands of others nationwide, including current and former Major League Baseball and National Football League players, bodybuilders and college and high school athletes.

Soares led a task force of 12 state, local and federal agencies in a raid yesterday at two Signature Pharmacy locations in Orlando, Fla., where several people were arrested.

"There are celebrities involved in the case as consumers," said Soares, who refused to identify them or answer most questions about the investigation, which involves sealed indictments.

Pharmacy officials are accused of repeatedly filling prescriptions written by doctors, some of them not licensed, for patients they hadn't met, according to a statement released by Soares' office.

At least $250,000 worth of illegal and controlled substances were sold and shipped to Albany with sales in New York alone totaling more than $10 million, according to the statement.

The Times Union report states that a New York investigator who has been tracking purchases from Signature flew to Pittsburgh to ask Rydze why he used a personal credit card to purchase some $150,000 worth of testosterone and human growth hormone last year.

The newspaper quotes unnamed sources as saying Rydze told investigators that the drugs were for his private patients. The retail value of the drugs, according to the Times Union report, is about $750,000.

Physicians are allowed to order and dispense prescription drugs, but investigators told the Times Union that the orders placed by Rydze drew interest because of the volume, his position with an NFL team and his use of a personal credit card.

A young man who answered the door last night at the Rydze home in Mt. Lebanon said the doctor would have no comment and referred all questions to the Steelers. A Steelers spokesman had no comment last night.

"UPMC has just learned about this from the newspaper article today and we don't have any more information," said UPMC spokeswoman Susan Manko. "We're not making any more comment at this time."

Federal officials in Pittsburgh said they learned of the investigation yesterday after getting calls from the media.

Rydze, who won a silver medal in the platform diving competition at the 1972 Olympics in Munich, is medical director of the FBI's Pittsburgh office, the Little Sisters of the Poor nursing home and Community College of Allegheny County.

Greg Aiello, spokesman for the NFL, and Carl Francis, spokesman for the NFL Players Association, said they only became aware of the story late yesterday afternoon.

"We will very definitely be looking into it," Aiello said.

Francis said executive director Gene Upshaw and other NFLPA officials plan to discuss the matter.

Arrested during yesterday's raids were the Signature Pharmacy owners, a pharmacist and the company's marketing director.

The four are charged with criminal diversion of prescription medications and prescriptions, criminal sale of a controlled substance and insurance fraud.

Three people, identified by Soares' office as distributors from a Sugarland, Texas, company called Cellular Nucleonic Advantages, were arrested on felony counts and extradited to Albany.

Dr. Anna Maria Santi, whose age and address were not released, was identified by Soares' office as a "dealer" and charged with 13 felonies.

"The New York component of this case will result in felony charges against up to 24 individuals, including six doctors and three pharmacists," according to the statement from Soares' office.

"An additional five New York doctors will be facing professional disciplinary charges."

Woman, 49, Pleads Guilty To Money Laundering (CCCT)

Corpus Christi Caller Times, February 27, 2007

A Corpus Christi woman on Monday pleaded guilty to federal charges in connection with a money laundering and drug distribution operation out of Country Meat Market, which she and her husband own.

DOJ_NMG_0137756

Rosalinda Perez, 49, pleaded guilty to money laundering in U.S. District Judge Hayden Head Jr.'s courtroom. Her husband, 46-year-old Alfredo Garcia, pleaded guilty on Feb. 15. to conspiring to distribute cocaine out of the meat market.

Garcia remained in the Victoria County Jail Monday on a $500,000 bond. Perez, who was out of jail on a $30,000 bond, was rearrested Monday and will remain in custody until Head decides the punishment for her and her husband on May 31.

Each faces as many as 20 years in prison, officials said.

Investigation into the couple began in September 2005, when authorities in New York notified Drug Enforcement Administration agents in Corpus Christi that a vehicle registered to Alfredo Garcia had been found in New York with a small quantity of cocaine inside, according to officials with the U.S. Attorney's Office.

DEA agents set up surveillance and, through undercover work, saw Garcia selling cocaine from the Country Meat Market in the 2300 block of Airline Road and his residence in the 2400 block of Songbird Lane, according to U.S. Attorney Don DeGabrielle.

According to arrest affidavits, Garcia on two separate days sold large quantities of cocaine to confidential sources with the DEA. Perez deposited the money into bank accounts, which the couple shared.

The couple was arrested Dec. 18, 2006. Authorities found drugs and weapons, including silencers, at the home and business, officials said. Perez told Head on Monday that she had taken part in the crime.

"I helped," she said.

She said she supported her husband's illegal activity by depositing money into their account. The money was used to pay utility bills, car notes and mortgages on a condominium on Ocean Drive.

She said she often threatened to leave her husband and Head asked her why she never had.

"I didn't want to kick him while he was down," Perez said.

Nationwide Study: Drug Use Dips, But Alcohol Use On Rise (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand

USA Today, February 28, 2007

Seven states in the South and Midwest are driving an increase in the percentage of people nationwide who drink alcohol regularly, a new study shows.

Alaska for the third year in a row has the highest rate of illegal drug use in the nation, the study found.

The study, being released today by the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration (SAMHSA), found rates of illicit drug use significantly higher than the national average in nine other states — Rhode Island, Vermont, Colorado, Montana, Oregon, Maine, Massachusetts, New York and Connecticut — plus Washington, D.C.

SAMHSA used data from interviews with 136,100 people 12 and older, collected as part of the National Surveys of Drug Use and Health in 2004 and 2005. Illicit drugs include marijuana, cocaine, heroin, non-medical use of prescriptions, inhalants and hallucinogens.

Nationally, 51.1% of Americans reported drinking alcohol in the past month, up from 50.2% in the previous study.

"We see a clear red flag around alcohol use," SAMHSA Administrator Terry Cline said.

Those who said they drank alcohol in the past month ranged from a low of 30.1% in Utah to a high of 65.3% in Wisconsin, the study found.

"We've been at the top of all the states in terms of risky drinking, heavy drinking for a long time. It's part of the culture here," said Richard Brown, an associate professor at the University of Wisconsin School of Medicine and Public Health.

Brown said Wisconsin has a $12.6 million grant over five years to screen people for risky drinking habits. He said the Legislature is considering raising beer taxes.

"We know one of the best ways to curtail drinking among young people is to raise the price, because they just can't afford it," he said.

Wisconsin also showed a significant increase in drinking, along with six other states: Alabama, Arizona, Kansas, Minnesota, Tennessee and Texas.

North Dakotans reported the highest rate of binge drinking, with 31.5% having five or more drinks at one time in the previous month. The national rate is 22.7%, the study found.

Drug use nationwide dipped slightly from 8.1% to 8.02% in the previous study, while drug use in Alaska rose from 11.79% to 12.16%. One in 10 Alaskans said they smoked marijuana. Iowa had the lowest rate of illicit drug use, at 5.88%.

Stacy Toner, acting director of Alaska's Division of Behavioral Health, said the agency's annual report attributed the state's drug problems to a lack of services in isolated communities and poverty.

DOJ_NMG_0137757

Bribery Wrecks Drive To Root Out Opium (TEL)

Telegraph, February 28, 2007

The British-backed campaign to eradicate opium poppy growing in Afghanistan has fallen behind schedule and is threatened by corruption, The Daily Telegraph has learned.

Afghan police guard a poppy field in Kandahar province

The operation was designed by the British to end record levels of cultivation in the southern province of Helmand.

A 500-man Afghan police force backed by American private security contractors and two helicopter gunships began work in the drug heartlands two weeks ago aiming to destroy 22,000 hectares before April's harvest. In two weeks, only 1,200 have been ploughed.

A policeman provided a detailed account of systematic corruption within the force. "The only people [whose crops are] being eradicated are those without money or connections," said the man, who cannot be named for his own safety. "On the eradication force, this is being called 'the season to make money'."

Powerful local landowners were bribing officials at a rate of about £500 per hectare. A hectare produces about £3,500 worth of opium.

advertisement

Western counter-narcotics officials said bribery allegations were being investigated. "As with every year, there are allegations of corruptions," said one official who declined to be named.

He said aerial and satellite photographs would be used to verify that eradication had taken place. However, the interior ministry spokesman, Zmarai Bashiri, said he was unaware of the charges of corruption and did not believe them.

This year's effort is regarded as a crucial test of the Kabul government's ability to tackle the drug problem after previous years ended in disaster amid similar tales of corruption.

If the campaign fails in Helmand, which produced 40 per cent of the country's opium last year, then British officials admit that US-led pressure for a radical campaign of aerial spraying of poppy next year will become irresistible.

British and Afghan officials as well as the UN have opposed spraying as a blunt instrument that risks destroying legitimate crops.

The eradication force was recruited in Kabul to blunt the impact of corruption among local officials and police from Helmand's tight-knit tribal society. The strategy appears to have failed.

"The local police are worse than us at taking bribes," said the police officer, who was recruited in Kabul. "But every officer from the highest to the lowest is doing their best to take bribes."

He claimed two battalion commanders and high-level district and provincial government officials were involved. On wages of around £30 a month, the eradication force receives a £5-a-day bonus to try to curb the temptation to take bribes.

Total poppy cultivation in Helmand is thought to be around 70,000 hectares this year, similar to last year's when only 5,000 hectares were destroyed. At the current rate, eradication this year would not exceed that though western officials insist that the rate of destruction has increased.

Western officials were initially encouraged by the campaifgn. on the first day of operations as fleets of tractors tore up fields in Nad Ali district, west of the provincial capital Lashkargar. Attempts at bribery were appeared to be resisted.

Military commanders fear that eradication, delivereed corruptly and unfairly, could increase support for the Taliban.

Bloomington Explosives Case Expands With Munitions Find (MINNST)

By Chao Xiong

Minneapolis Star Tribune, February 28, 2007

Military-grade ammunition was found Tuesday at a south Minneapolis building linked to a man jailed the day before on suspicion of having military explosives at his home, Minneapolis police said.

A federal investigation that remains closely guarded by authorities became public Monday during a search of the man's Bloomington house. The investigation continued Tuesday at a commercial retail building at 5200 47th Av. S., which is owned by the man's wife, said Minneapolis Police Deputy Chief Rob Allen. The findings in Minneapolis are not as worrisome as those in Bloomington, he said.

"There's nothing that's raised our concern to the degree they were at in Bloomington," Allen said. "She's [the wife] being very cooperative."

Authorities would not speak in further detail about what was found in the Minneapolis building's garage. The building houses a convenience store, a massage center, a hair salon run by the suspect's wife and a second-floor apartment. No one was arrested Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0137758

Allen said the man -- described by one acquaintance as a gun-show regular -- stored items on the property. Tenants said he was also the building's repairman. A Minneapolis police bomb squad was called to the scene, and a block was taped off.

The man, who hasn't been charged with a crime, was arrested Monday after authorities found "small quantities" of explosive materials and "quite a few" firearms at his home in the 1700 block of W. 84th Street, said Steve Bogdalek, assistant special agent in charge of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms.

Authorities from the ATF, the FBI and the state Bureau of Criminal Apprehension wouldn't say why or for how long the man was being investigated for possessing the materials. They refused to say whether his cache of detonation cords, blasting caps, guns and explosive materials was part of a larger operation. FBI special agent Paul McCabe said there is no public safety risk at this point.

The suspect has no criminal record in Hennepin County. He is being held at the Hennepin County jail without bond. Authorities have said the case could be presented for federal charges.

Most of the firearms recovered were legally owned by the man, Bogdalek said. All of the explosive materials recovered can be obtained legally -- some by permit and others without -- he added, refusing to say whether the man complied with the law in obtaining the materials.

Arlene Fernandes, who owns the massage center, said she was surprised with the search in Minneapolis because the suspect's wife is "prim and proper."They have all these little old ladies with blue hair that come in" to her salon, Fernandes said.

Canines Help Search For Gun In Road-rage Case (ORS)

The Orlando Sentinel, February 28, 2007

Road-rage killing horrifies race fans

DELAND -- Four specially-trained canines are being sent out today to help deputies look for the gun used in a road-rage incident that killed a race fan on Interstate 4.

The canines and their handlers are from the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives. They will team up with the Volusia County Sheriff's Office to search a large area along I-4 where Erik Houk, 36, was shot and killed while driving back to Land O'Lakes from the Daytona 500, ATF officials said.

Houk was transported to Florida Hospital DeLand after the Feb. 18 shooting, where he was pronounced dead.

Three men -- David P. Edwards, 21, Ronlee Harvin, 21, and Charles Onasanya, 18 -- were arrested in Sanford after the shooting and told police they threw the gun somewhere along I-4 after they left the scene, officials said. Deputies have been looking for the weapon ever since.

The ATF bureau is the Department of Justice's lead agency for training dogs to detect explosives. Its canines are certified to detect 19,000 odors, including gunpowder and explosives, Davidson said. Officials will also use a portable Raytheon Thermal Imaging device to look for the gun.

Agent Says He Discussed Buying Arms From Man (ELPT)

By Darren Meritz, El Paso Times

El Paso Times, February 28, 2007

A federal agent testified Tuesday that he discussed purchasing firearms, in addition to explosive devices, from one of the two men accused of making and possessing pipe bombs that authorities discovered in a sting earlier this month.

Meanwhile, lawyers for the defendants argued Tuesday before U.S. District Court Magistrate Judge Michael McDonald that the government had not established that the suspected pipe bombs actually could have exploded and caused a danger to the public.

Alfredo Rubio, 23, of San Elizario, along with Juan Ortiz, 22, of Socorro, are accused of conspiring to make and possess 15 pipe bombs that Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives undercover agents discovered Feb. 21 during a meeting in Canutillo.

Frank Henderson, a special agent with ATF, said in court Tuesday that he was working to arrange a purchase of weapons as well, including a MAC-10 assault rifle, rocket launchers and a machine gun.

Henderson testified that the Feb. 21 meeting was the second between him and Rubio. The agent said that during the first meeting, on Jan. 20 at a parking lot in the Northeast, he paid Rubio $2,000 for seven pipe bombs, then transported them in the front seat of his truck. Henderson also testified that law enforcement had not tested the devices to determine whether they would explode as designed.

"We would assume they explode," he said.

The judge allowed each defendant free on $10,000 bonds. Rubio was ordered to wear an electronic monitoring device.

DOJ_NMG_0137759

Darren Meritz may be reached at dmeritz@elpasotimes.com; 546-6127.

IMMIGRATION:

5 Plead Guilty In Illegal Workers Case (AP)

By Michael Virtanen, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 28, 2007

(AP) - ALBANY, N.Y.-Five former managers from a major crate and pallet manufacturer that employed illegal immigrants pleaded guilty Tuesday, 10 months after federal agents staged sweeping raids at company sites in 26 states.

James Rice, 37, of Houston, an executive regional general manager of IFCO Systems, pleaded guilty to conspiring to employ illegal workers. Robert Belvin, 43, of Stuart, Fla., a former general manager of the Albany IFCO plant, pleaded guilty to two felony conspiracy charges.

The two executives could face up to two years in prison and a $250,000 fine, Assistant U.S. Attorney Tina Sciocchetti said.

Netherlands-based IFCO Systems NV describes itself as the leading pallet services company in America. It reported $108 million in profits in 2006 on revenues of $647 million.

In April, more than 1,100 people were arrested on administrative immigration charges at more than 40 IFCO sites. More than half of IFCO Systems' roughly 5,800 employees during 2005 had invalid or mismatched Social Security numbers, the government said at the time.

U.S. Department of Homeland Security officials said the raids were part of a stepped-up effort to target employers of illegal immigrants.

Defense lawyers said they reviewed prosecution material that included taped conversations involving their clients.

"Under the circumstances, we thought the only rational thing to do was to plead guilty," said Belvin's lawyer, Terence Kindlon.

Rice's lawyer declined to comment.

Three local plant officials, Dario Salvano, 36, of Amsterdam, N.Y., Scott Dodge, 44, of Elmira, N.Y., and Michael Ames, 44, of Shrewsbury, Mass., each pleaded guilty Tuesday to one misdemeanor.

They could face up to six months in jail and $3,000 fines for each illegal alien employed, though they likely will get reduced terms because they cooperated, Sciocchetti said.

Charges were pending against two other IFCO managers in Houston and Cincinnati.

White House Pushes Immigration Overhaul (LAT)

By Nicole Gaouette

The Los Angeles Times, February 28, 2007

For weeks, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff has waged a clandestine charm offensive on behalf of an immigration overhaul. He consulted with supportive lawmakers, listened to adversarial congressmen and slipped into the private offices of wary senators, the only sign of his presence the beefy security men waiting outside.

Last week, Chertoff took skeptical members of Congress on a helicopter tour of the southern U.S. border to promote the administration's stepped-up enforcement measures.

They gave chase to illegal immigrants, and at one stop the lawmakers picked up a welder and — with a spray of sparks — helped build the solid-steel barrier rising along parts of the border with Mexico.

Today, Chertoff launches a higher-profile effort to win enough votes to pass a comprehensive overhaul when he testifies at the first Capitol Hill hearing on immigration legislation since Democrats took over.

Chertoff's campaign has impressed some lawmakers who may be crucial to the fate of his effort, but it's not clear whether they have been swayed enough to support it.

"It's remarkable how much progress they are making," said Sen. Johnny Isakson (R-Ga.), a staunch opponent of the administration's immigration policies who visited the border with Chertoff. But the trip "reaffirms to me that what we tried to do last year was right — that is, delineate the need for security and require its completion first."

The campaign comes as the White House is working hard to sell its domestic legislative priorities to Democrats. An immigration overhaul is one area where President Bush's agenda closely matches that of the Democratic leadership.

DOJ_NMG_0137760

In addition to confronting stubborn opposition, the administration is contending with a tight schedule and volatile politics. Bush has two years left to cement his legacy, but presidential campaign politics will make complicated legislation difficult to tackle.

"I think we've made a lot of progress on the border, but we need to address all the elements of the problem," Chertoff told reporters Tuesday. "We want to work with Congress. That's the whole point of being in government — to get stuff done."

Chertoff will testify with Commerce Secretary Carlos M. Gutierrez, who has accompanied him on Capitol Hill to promote Bush's vision for legislation that would bolster border security and workplace enforcement, create a program to allow for guest workers, and give most of the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants living in the U.S. a way to earn citizenship.

The House has passed an immigration enforcement bill, but it is unclear how much support there is for broader legislation.

Debate will probably start in the Senate, with Sens. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and John McCain (R-Ariz.) expected to introduce a bill next month that resembles the legislation the Senate passed last year, 62 to 36.

To pass, the bill would need the support of at least the 21 Senate Republicans who voted for it last year. It may even need a few more, because some freshman Democrats campaigned against "amnesty" for illegal immigrants.

The administration is upbeat about the prospects and has started to aggressively lobby Republicans who say enforcement must come first.

The White House hopes that if GOP lawmakers see improvements in border security and workplace enforcement, they may be inclined to support a comprehensive overhaul. Raids last week on restaurants across the country, including several in Los Angeles County, contributed to that effort. So did Chertoff's border tour with at least 10 lawmakers.

At one stop, in San Luis, Ariz., Chertoff held a news conference at the new steel fence — part of a 28-mile test section — to promote border security.

Since Bush ordered 6,000 National Guard troops to the border in May, administration officials say they have seen a dramatic drop in the number of arrests, a sign that fewer people are trying to cross.

As of Jan. 31, arrests were down 27% from last year, with the largest drop, 62%, occurring along a part of the Arizona border where the administration has doubled the number of agents to 850, installed fencing and more than 500 ground sensors, and added five helicopters for a fleet of eight.

The Homeland Security Department also has increased the number of detention facilities to hold illegal immigrants arrested at the border.

"This is the kind of tangible indication of progress that the American people have been waiting for," Chertoff said during the border tour.

The message was also directed at the lawmakers, a carefully chosen group that included members of the House and Senate judiciary committees, which oversee and shape immigration legislation, and long-standing foes of a comprehensive overhaul.

Chertoff and Gutierrez visited Isakson to discuss the legislation he recently introduced that would require the administration to certify that border security was complete before any new overhaul measures could begin.

Chertoff briefed Sen. Ben Nelson (D-Neb.) on border security before the Arizona trip. Nelson opposed the Senate legislation last year, citing concerns that Americans could lose jobs to immigrants.

Chertoff also brought along Rep. Steve King (R-Iowa), the ranking Republican on the immigration subcommittee and an opponent of the administration's immigration policy. Two House Judiciary Committee members on the trip, Rep. Mike Pence (R-Ind.) and Rep. Chris Cannon (R-Utah), support the White House on immigration, and a third, freshman Rep. Jim Jordan (R-Ohio), is new to the debate.

"It eased my worries that we weren't having enough enforcement, because inadequate enforcement over the last few years allowed this problem to grow," Nelson said of the Arizona visit, his first to the border. Nelson said he thought more security was needed before other changes were tackled.

King, one of the strongest backers of a 854-mile fence along the border, was unmoved. "This is not what you'd call a real good start, but at least it's a beginning," he said.

King said Chertoff requested a private meeting, but it "just identified how tenacious each of us might be."

"Chertoff is a pretty good listener, but he works for the White House, and they have a different goal," King said. "We have a working relationship and we'll be able to talk about this policy, but my position is that until we stop bleeding at the border we can't have a discussion about the 12 million who are here."

Low Pay And Broken Promises Greet Guest Workers (NYT)

By Steven Greenhouse

DOJ_NMG_0137761

The New York Times, February 28, 2007

To a rice farmer from Thailand making $500 a year, the recruiter's pitch was hard to resist — three years of farm work in North Carolina that would pay more than 30 times as much as he earned at home.

The pitch was so persuasive that the farmer, Worawut Khansamrit, put his farm up as collateral to pay the recruiter $11,000 to become a guest worker. "The amount of money they promised was very attractive," said Mr. Khansamrit, a slight, soft-spoken 40-year-old with a 15-year-old daughter he wants to send to college.

But after he arrived in North Carolina with 30 other Thai workers, he found there was only about a month's work. He was then taken to New Orleans to remove debris from a hotel damaged by Hurricane Katrina — work he says he was never paid for. This month, he and other Thai workers filed a federal lawsuit asserting that they were victims of illegal trafficking.

Mr. Khansamrit's tale highlights the abuses that many guest workers face at a time when President Bush and many in Congress are pushing to expand the guest worker program as part of an overhaul of the nation's immigration laws.

Each year 120,000 foreign workers receive visas to do farm work or other low-skilled labor, usually for three to nine months. These programs grew out of the World War II bracero program, in which hundreds of thousands of Mexicans worked on farms and railroads, often in deplorable conditions.

Labor experts say employers abuse guest workers far more than other workers because employers know they can ship them home the moment they complain. They also know these workers cannot seek other jobs if they are unhappy.

"I'd say a substantial majority of U.S. guest workers experience some abuses with their paycheck," said David Griffith, a professor in the anthropology department at East Carolina University and author of the new book "American Guestworkers: Jamaicans and Mexicans in the U.S. Labor Market." "It's the recruitment process especially where they get cheated."

The abuses take many forms. Guest workers often pay exorbitant fees and are frequently given fewer weeks of work and lower wages than promised. Many employers fail to make good on their commitment to pay transportation costs. The Thai workers, who were supposed to be paid $16,000 a year for three years, ended up earning a total of just $1,400 to $2,400. Most of the Thai workers had their passports taken away after they arrived, leaving them trapped.

"The program has been rife with abuses, even during the best of times," said Cindy Hahamovitch, a history professor at the College of William and Mary, who is writing a book about guest workers. "There will never be enough inspectors to check every labor camp, contract and field."

For decades, farmers, tree-planting companies, and hotel and restaurant owners have argued that they need guest workers, citing a shortage of Americans willing to fill jobs in their industries. In Washington, many supporters of an expanded guest worker program say they want to strengthen protections to curb abusive treatment.

"The business community supports the idea that these temporary workers should have the exact same employment protections as American workers," said Randel Johnson, co-chairman of the Essential Worker Immigration Coalition, a business group lobbying to expand the guest worker program. "When an employer can't find an American worker to fill a job, the economy is helped if the employer can find someone else."

Critics, including many labor unions and immigrant groups, say employers exaggerate the labor shortage because they are eager for cheap, docile, temporary labor from abroad. The critics say there would not be such a shortage of American workers if employers offered a living wage for these jobs.

In Congress, proposals to expand protections for guest workers include a provision to bar employers from retaliating when these workers protest and one that would let them sue in federal court over contract violations.

Earlier this month, Mr. Khansamrit and 21 other guest workers sued several labor contractors and farmers in federal court in North Carolina, accusing them of fraud, breach of contract, minimum wage violations and illegal trafficking.

The lawsuit, brought by Legal Aid of North Carolina, asserts that the contractors received recruitment fees that are illegal under Thai law, provided far less work than promised, and violated federal law by not paying transportation costs from abroad and not paying three-fourths of the wages promised.

"None of them gave us what they promised," said Pradit Wiangkham, 42, a Thai electrician turned guest worker. Mr. Wiangkham also worked unpaid in New Orleans, where he said the contractor ordered the workers to sleep in a foul-smelling hotel that had no electricity, lights, hot water or potable water. In North Carolina, the living arrangements were not much better; at times 33 Thai workers slept in a storage shed behind the labor contractor's house, the workers said.

The workers' lawyers say federal officials should have detected that something was awry because the contractors were applying to bring in so many Asian workers to work just three months.

"Why would someone want to bring workers from Asia all the way to the East Coast for such a short-term, low-wage job?" said Lori Elmer, a lawyer for the workers. "They couldn't break even unless there was fraud."

DOJ_NMG_0137762

Seo Homsombath, the president of Million Express Manpower, a small labor contracting company that works closely with recruiters overseas, did not respond to faxes and a letter to his home in North Carolina. Roy Raynor, another principal, declined comment.

But in a separate lawsuit, Mr. Raynor testified that Mr. Homsombath and he were supposed to receive payments from the recruiters in Thailand. He said he was to receive $1,200 for each worker, ostensibly for training them to pick cucumbers.

David James, a Labor Department spokesman, said the department was investigating whether the contractor failed to provide adequate wages and housing and failed to pay for transportation. He said the department had no rules regarding the payment of recruitment fees overseas.

Advocates say the Labor Department should require employers to repay recruitment fees and transportation costs from abroad when such costs effectively bring the workers' wages below the minimum wage.

The Thai guest workers are not alone in their complaints. Legal Aid of North Carolina has also sued on behalf of three Indonesians.

Several of the Indonesians and Thais have applied for special visas available to workers who have been trafficked illegally. With such visas, they hope to work in the United States to repay their debts.

"I felt completely defrauded," said Indra Budiawan, who had been a waiter in Indonesia. "They never gave me any work after I arrived."

Mr. Budiawan, 28, paid $6,000 — 10 times his annual pay — putting up his in-laws' ancestral land as collateral after a recruiter showed him a brochure about farm work in North Carolina and about the good housing and food that guest workers receive. "When I was at the airport in Jakarta, I felt very happy," he said. "I felt extremely proud about the job I would have in America, given that there is so much poverty and unemployment in Indonesia."

But when he arrived, the head of the GTN Employment Agency, Leeta Kang, told him there were no farm jobs. He was taken to a sign-making store that was the contractor's main business. There, Mr. Budiawan slept on the storage room floor, waiting for work that never materialized.

Mr. Budiawan told Ms. Kang that he wanted to leave. But he said she demanded $2,000 for a return ticket and for the passport she had taken from him. After two weeks without work, Mr. Budiawan fled. He is now living in Miami with two other Indonesian guest workers.

Mr. Budiawan called his father-in-law, whose land was used as collateral, to explain his predicament. "I felt very ashamed," he said. "Everyone was depending on me. And now the bank has taken steps to repossess our ancestral land."

Ms. Kang insisted that it was not her fault there was no work for Mr. Budiawan. "He showed up way behind schedule," she said. "By the time he arrived, the farm owner had already canceled everything."

Ms. Kang said a squash farmer had completed his harvest and no longer needed Mr. Budiawan. She said she had tried in vain to contact the recruiters in Indonesia to alert them that she no longer needed Mr. Budiawan and several others.

"The agents in Indonesia were obviously just trying to get money out of them," Ms. Kang said. "Whatever these people paid, none of it went to us."

Mike Moore, the squash farmer, said Ms. Kang had asked him to apply for far more guest workers than he needed. "She told me to take 50," he said. "I told her, 'I might need five. I might need 25.' She said, 'That's no problem. Even if you don't need them, we have plenty of work for them in other places.' "

Some experts say abuses are more likely when contractors, rather than farmers, bring in guest workers.

"The guest worker program is not for contractors who feel they might be able to find work for other people," said Mary Bauer, director of the Immigrant Justice Project at the Southern Poverty Law Center. "It's for people who have a compelling need to bring in workers from abroad. There's an enormous incentive for contractors to bring in as many people as possible, even when there isn't enough work, because they often make money from recruitment fees."

Experts say that in some states, contractors bring in less than 10 percent of the guest workers, while in other states, they bring in half.

Like the other Thai guest workers, Chinnawat Kompeemay, who ran a grocery store near Bangkok, is in limbo, living in temporary housing in Virginia.

"All I wanted was to provide my children with a better education and living standards," he said. "If my children get the education I want them to have, they won't be tricked the same way. They won't be taken advantage of like their father."

Immigrants Boost Pay, Not Prison Populations, New Studies Show (LAT)

By Teresa Watanabe

The Los Angeles Times, February 28, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0137763

Two new studies by California researchers counter negative perceptions that immigrants increase crime and job competition, showing that they are incarcerated at far lower rates than native-born citizens and actually help boost their wages.

A study released Tuesday by the Public Policy Institute of California found that immigrants who arrived in the state between 1990 and 2004 increased wages for native workers by an average 4%.

UC Davis economist Giovanni Peri, who conducted the study, said the benefits were shared by all native-born workers, from high school dropouts to college graduates, because immigrants generally perform complementary rather than competitive work.

As immigrants filled lower-skilled jobs, they pushed natives up the economic ladder into employment that required more English or know-how of the U.S. system, he said.

"The big message is that there is no big loss from immigration," Peri said. "There are gains, and these are enjoyed by a much bigger share of the population than is commonly believed."

Another study released Monday by the Washington-based Immigration Policy Center showed that immigrant men ages 18 to 39 had an incarceration rate five times lower than native-born citizens in every ethnic group examined. Among men of Mexican descent, for instance, 0.7% of those foreign-born were incarcerated compared to 5.9% of native-born, according to the study, co-written by UC Irvine sociologist Ruben G. Rumbaut.

Both studies are based on U.S. census data, which includes both legal and illegal immigrants. They were released just days before the U.S. Congress is to restart debate on major immigration reform legislation and as numerous states, including Texas, consider harsh measures against illegal migrants.

The authors say their work shows that immigrants clearly benefit U.S. residents and are being unfairly scapegoated for problems they do not cause.

"There are grossly distorted perceptions between what people think about immigrants and the reality," Rumbaut said. "The old bromide that education is the way to reduce prejudice comes into play here."

Immigration hawks, however, took issue with both studies.

Steven Camarota of the Washington-based Center for Immigration Studies said the wage study, by examining immigrants only in California, failed to consider their effect on the rest of the country. Immigrants working for lower wages in a California factory, for instance, could keep wages down in a competing enterprise staffed by native-born citizens in another state, he said.

Immigrants, who make up one-third of California's labor force, could also be discouraging natives from moving to the state and taking advantage of higher-paying job opportunities, Camarota said.

And, by examining only wage effects, the study failed to address the declining rate of native-born adults working in California, Camarota said. Their percentage in the workforce declined from 65% in 2000 to 62% in 2005, one of the lowest rates in the country that could be caused by competition from immigrants, he said.

"The idea that immigrants compete only with other immigrants is absurd on its face," he said, adding that no industry in America employs only immigrants.

Peri said, however, that his study's more detailed analysis of California's employment trends showed no displacement of native-born workers. Other studies have shown that immigration has had a negative effect on African American high school dropouts. But those conclusions were rooted in different assessments of whether blacks performed identical work as immigrants, he said.

Of the crime study, Camarota said the U.S. government had failed to systematically collect 2000 Census data on immigration status from prisons and other institutions. The study's foundational data are therefore flawed, he argued.

But Rumbaut defended his study, saying the results were consistent with other research stretching back a century. They include national immigration studies conducted in 1911 and 1994, work by two Princeton economists examining 1980 and 1990 census data and more recent analyses of homicide rates in three border cities.

The co-author of the crime study was Walter A. Ewing, a research associate at the Immigration Policy Center. Among other findings, the study showed that the gap in incarceration rates between native-born and foreign-born men was wider in California. Incarceration rates, which rose the longer an immigrant was in the country, were highest among high school dropouts. Those of Asian descent generally showed lower incarceration rates and higher educational levels than Latinos.

Despite the data, Rumbaut said, many continue to perpetuate images of crime-prone immigrants. Last year, the study says, President Bush blamed illegal immigrants for bringing crime to their communities, as did the city of Hazleton, Penn., in passing an ordinance barring them from renting homes or working.

"The problem of crime in American society today is overwhelmingly a problem of natives, not immigrants," Rumbaut said.

DOJ_NMG_0137764

In the wage study, Peri examined immigration flows and wages of California workers between 1960 and 2004 using U.S. Census data. It found that immigrants did not worsen the job opportunities of natives with similar education and experience during the entire period.

The benefit for native-born workers ranged from a 0.2% wage increase for high school dropouts to 6.7% for those with some college, the study showed.

However, the study found that other immigrants suffered wage declines by as much as 20%.

"The findings would seem to defuse one of the most inflammatory issues for those who advocate measures aimed at 'protecting the livelihood of American citizens,' " the study said.

Family Second (NYT)

By Michele Wucker

The New York Times, February 28, 2007

THE Senate's expected introduction this week of a revamped education bill will draw needed attention to the question of who may live and work in the United States. Making sure that the workers we need can come here legally should be a priority — but it's not. Of the permanent-resident visas (green cards) awarded in 2005, 58 percent went to foreign-born relatives of United States citizens; only 22 percent were connected to employment.

Family ties are profound, and we should continue to admit spouses, minor children and parents of naturalized and native-born American citizens without quotas. But it makes no sense that roughly as many green cards are available to adult siblings and adult children of citizens — with no regard for their job abilities — as for skilled workers.

There are shortages of both temporary and permanent visas for scientists, engineers, mathematicians, doctors and nurses. I've interviewed dozens of talented people who gave up waiting and took their skills elsewhere. Meanwhile, family chain migration is common: an immigrant becomes a citizen, then invites his brother, who brings in his children and his wife, who eventually can sponsor her parents and her sister, who can bring her children and husband and his parents. As a result, the foreign-born population in the United States has increased to record numbers since the current system was created in 1965.

Our economy depends heavily on skilled immigration. Half of research and development workers, one-quarter of doctors and nurses, and a quarter of all doctoral degree holders were born in other countries. Government and trade groups estimate that we need some 20,000 more doctors and 300,000 more nurses. Yet because only 140,000 employment-based visas are available each year, skilled workers can wait five years or more for a green card. Annual per-country visa caps make the wait even longer for high-migration countries like India and China, which send us many engineers and scientists, or the Philippines, which sends many nurses.

Skilled workers with professional careers are less likely than unskilled, low-wage workers to risk working under the table. A few lucky ones obtain visas when they marry American citizens. Even those who get green cards can find their spouses and children entangled in the system; there's a six-year wait to reunite the nuclear family of a Mexican green card holder.

Phasing out family-based preferences for adult siblings and adult children would free up 138,066 green cards a year, nearly doubling the size of the job-based category and making space for green card holders to bring wives and younger children. Adult siblings and adult children could still immigrate under more readily available job-based visas.

As adult-relative visas are phased out, we must address the plight of roughly a million extended adult relatives waiting for visas because of country or category caps. Still, eliminating the system's false promise would be fairer for all concerned.

New laws could make it easier for the workers we need to come in the front door instead of sneaking through the back door — or going elsewhere. Even those who so far have opposed increasing work visas ought to see the value of doing so in return for a solution that eases chain-migration pressures and reflects demographic and economic reality.

Report: Immigrants Do Not Commit Most Crimes (NCT)

By Edward Sifuentes, Staff Writer

North County Times, February 28, 2007

NORTH COUNTY -- A common perception that immigrants are responsible for much of the nation's crime is not supported by evidence, according to a study released Monday by an immigrant rights group.

Violent and property crime rates have dropped 34 percent and 26 percent respectively since 1994. At the same time, the illegal immigrant population doubled to an estimated 12 million, according to the study, called the Myth of Immigrant Criminality and the Paradox of Assimilation.

But critics said the study is biased and based on incomplete Census data.

DOJ_NMG_0137765

The authors, sociologists Ruben Rumbaut and Walter Ewing, said immigrants have faced similar perceptions throughout the nation's history. Previous waves of immigrants, such as Italians and Irish, were often viewed as more inclined to crime than native-born people, they said.

Similar views are now thrust upon the newest immigrants, who are predominantly from Latin America, the authors said.

"This myth is not supported by the data and is refuted by empirical data," said Rumbaut, a professor of sociology at UC Irvine.

Researchers said they did not analyze legal and illegal immigrant populations separately, because the U.S. Census data does not ask whether immigrants are in the country legally or illegally.

Based on 2000 Census information, the study concludes that the problem of crime in the United States is not caused or aggravated by immigrants, regardless of their legal status. The study was released by the Immigration Policy Center, a research organization that focuses on the contributions immigrants make the country.

The policy center is a division of the American Immigration Law Foundation, a Washington, D.C.-based nonprofit focusing on immigration.

One of the key findings the study cites is that U.S.-born men, ages 18-39, are five times more likely to be incarcerated than foreign-born men in the same age group. However, the "paradox of assimilation" is that the children of immigrants tend to have higher incarceration rates than their parents, according to the study.

"Their children are another story," said Robert Sampson, a professor of sociology at Harvard University. "They become acculturated. They don't look back at the conditions in Mexico, El Salvador or Vietnam."

Critics of the study said the report is based on faulty data.

Steven Camarota, research director for the Washington D.C.-based Center for Immigration Studies, said 2000 Census data for the immigrant prison population was not reliable because of problems in collecting the information. The center advocates stricter immigration laws.

"The process of collecting information from institutions completely broke down" during the 2000 Census, Camarota said.

That doesn't necessarily mean that the study's conclusions are wrong, Camarota added.

"I think it's probably correct that the foreign-born are less likely to commit crimes," Camarota said. But, "It is the children of illegal immigrants (that are likely to commit more crimes) not the illegal immigrants themselves."

Census officials could not be reached for comment Monday.

Gary Walker, who cofounded the North County-based group Predatory Aliens Stop Killing Our Police!, also said the study released Monday is not credible. His group focuses on raising awareness about crimes committed by illegal immigrants.

"It's a very agenda-driven type of report to spin the facts," Walker said.

The facts paint a very different picture, Walker said. He points to a Government Accountability Office report that says 27 percent of the federal prison population is made up of immigrants and other sources that he says point to a larger crime problem, including anti-illegal immigration Web sites, local news and police blotters.

In recent months, many local governments, including the Escondido City Council and the City of Hazleton, Pa., have adopted laws targeting illegal immigration in part due to the perception that immigrants bring more crime to cities.

Bill Flores, a North County civil rights activist and retired San Diego County assistant sheriff, said the study's conclusions are similar to a study he conducted on bookings between 1997 and 1999 at San Diego County jails run by the sheriff's department.

"They only surprise that I saw was the fact that the local picture was such an accurate reflection of the national scene," Flores said.

That study, called "Bookings -- A Study of Persons Detained in the San Diego County Jail System," looked at about 100,000 bookings a year.

The study suggested that immigrants' place of birth had little to do with the type of crime being committed. About 28 percent of the crimes of all the crimes committed by those incarcerated in county jails were violent, regardless of whether they were born in San Diego County, elsewhere in the U.S. or in another country, the study showed.

Activists on the other side of the immigration debate say that the illegal immigrant crime wave is no myth.

Researcher Rumbaut said anecdotal evidence used by some anti-illegal immigration groups is part of an emotional and political response to immigration, but it is not based on scientific research.

"There's not a single authoritative source for those numbers," he said. "Those numbers seem to be pulled out of thin air."

-- Contact staff writer Edward Sifuentes at (760) 740-3511 or esifuentes@nctimes.com.

DOJ_NMG_0137766

TAX:

Real-Estate Professionals Say IRS Snares Them By Mistake (WSJ)

By Kemba J. Dunham

The Wall Street Journal, February 28, 2007

Some real-estate professionals say they are being mistaken for sometime investors by the Internal Revenue Service, and that could prohibit them from taking advantage of certain tax and economic benefits.

Consider the case of David Friedman, a real-estate broker and property owner in Los Angeles. Like many professionals in the business, he not only sells homes to consumers, he also buys and sells undeveloped land and owns single-family homes that he rents out. He says he works every day and has amassed holdings in Southern California and Oklahoma that are valued at $20 million.

Yet after 20 years in the business, Mr. Friedman finds himself in a battle with the IRS, which is auditing his past tax returns over whether he is really a full-time real-estate professional or one of the many part-time real-estate investors who have sprung up across the country in the past decade.

"Real estate is all that I do, I'm not a contractor or a doctor who does real estate on the side," Mr. Friedman says. "I just think that the IRS has some issues believing that someone truly does this full time."

The distinction is important because full-time real-estate professionals, defined as someone who spends more than half of his working hours in real estate and more than 750 hours a year tending to real-estate activities, can fully deduct losses -- including depreciation, interest expense on loans and property taxes.

But those who don't fit into that category are typically considered to be "passive" real-estate investors with a limited ability to deduct their losses, says Alan Weiner, a CPA and tax partner at the firm of Holtz Rubenstein Reminick LLP in Melville, N.Y.

Robert Marvin, a spokesman for the IRS, said the tax agency can't comment on individual taxpayer cases. However, he indicated that the agency is paying more attention to real-estate activity because it is one of the areas where research shows there is a large tax gap, meaning taxpayers are underreporting income to the IRS. The tax gap in income from rents and royalties is about $13 billion and $11 billion for capital gains. (Income from real-estate activity is included in, but not exclusive to, both categories.) Mr. Marvin said that several thousand returns of real-estate professionals have been audited since last year and approximately 3,000 are under audit now.

But some tax attorneys say these professionals are being unfairly scrutinized. "Unfortunately, real-estate professionals are being caught in a broad net that is intended to catch investors," says Philip Panitz, a federal tax litigator in Westlake Village, Calif., who represents Mr. Friedman. "My clients are real-estate professionals, although the IRS disagrees and they're saying 'prove it.' "

Of the eleven cases Mr. Panitz has pending in the U.S. Tax Court, five involve people who say they are full-time real-estate professionals whom the IRS is trying to reclassify as passive investors. Two years ago, none of his cases involved this issue. "Whenever I see this kind of trend going on, I know some sort of sweep is happening," Mr. Panitz says.

The "passive loss" rule goes back to 1986, when Congress added the measure to stop real-estate investors who were receiving paper-loss deductions, such as depreciation, and using these paper losses to shelter real income from other jobs, Mr. Panitz says.

Real-estate professionals were excluded from this act because real-estate was their job. "If that person had a deduction related to the buying and selling of property, those deductions directly correlated to what they did for a living," Mr. Panitz adds.

Since he has been audited for 2002, Mr. Friedman is now struggling to prove that real estate is his profession. He says he has provided the IRS auditor with every receipt and canceled check related to his business. But they always ask for more proof, he adds, including detailed logs of how he spends his time, a listing of all projects in which he is involved and all the people he talks to on any given day.

"It takes hundreds and hundreds of hours out of my time to provide all these details," he sighs. "I just feel like I'm being harassed."

It has been financially draining as well. Mr. Friedman says that in the past few years, he has spent about $20,000 in fees to his accountant and tax attorney, who are helping him prove his professional status. Because his case is ongoing, those costs could reach $100,000. If the IRS does conclude that Mr. Friedman isn't a real-estate professional, his tax returns for the years in question would have to be adjusted and if one factors in penalties, interest and tax liabilities, he could end up owning the government hundreds of thousands of dollars.

DOJ_NMG_0137767

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush To Visit Floyd School (LCJ)

By James R. Carroll

Louisville Courier-Journal, February 28, 2007

Silver St. Elementary one of several stops

President Bush will visit New Albany's Silver Street Elementary School on Friday, in addition to attending a campaign fundraiser in Louisville.

He also plans to meet with University of Louisville students, according to the White House and Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky.

Bush is scheduled to visit Silver Street Elementary, 2023 Ekin Ave., at 2:15 p.m., according to a schedule the White House released last night.

He will discuss his "No Child Left Behind" program, which holds states accountable for student performance. Schools are required to test students each year in reading and math in grades three through eight, and those that fail to make progress face sanctions.

Silver Street, which has 264 students, has made "adequate yearly progress" each of the four years since the law went into effect, according to the state Department of Education.

Silver Street "has done very well" since Bush signed the act in early 2002, Superintendent Dennis Brooks of New Albany-Floyd County Schools said last night.

He called the president's visit an "unexpected opportunity" for students and teachers at the school.

Teachers likely will spend the next few days working on social studies lessons, explaining what the president does and the importance of the job, Brooks said.

The children also will learn how to behave in front of such a distinguished guest, he said.

"Our students will be prepared," Brooks said.

McConnell told reporters yesterday that the president also will meet privately with about 40 scholars from U of L's McConnell Center.

The time and place of that session are not on the White House schedule, and neither McConnell nor U of L would provide details. A call to the White House was not returned.

The White House announced last week that Bush will speak at a McConnell for Senate reception at the Seelbach Hilton Louisville.

The scheduled time for the president's remarks has been changed slightly, to 5:35 p.m. instead of 5:45 p.m., as announced last week.

Asked yesterday whether a presidential visit might hurt his re-election prospects next year, McConnell said he is not worried.

"Kentuckians by and large understand the need to be strong in the war on terror, and I'm not at all concerned about defending my position of support for the president," McConnell said.

Reporter James R. Carroll can be reached at (202) 906-8141.

Reporter Charlie White contributed to this story.

President Bush To Visit New Albany School (AP)

AP, February 28, 2007

President Bush will visit an elementary school in New Albany on Friday and will speak about reauthorizing the five-year-old No Child Left Behind law.

The White House said Monday Bush will visit Silver Street Elementary School about 2:00pm. Friday and is expected to make remarks about No Child Left Behind at 2:40pm at the school.

The president will be stopping by the school on his way to a fund-raiser in nearby Louisville, Kentucky, for Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell.

President Bush To Visit Southern Indiana School (WDRB)

WDRB-TV Louisville, Kentucky, February 27, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0137768

President Bush is coming back to Kentuckiana. The president will be in town on Friday for a fundraiser for Kentucky Senator Mitch McConnell -- but he's also making a stop in Indiana.

President Bush will visit a New Albany school on Friday. And right now, students and faculty members are sprucing things up for their special guest. 4th Grader Jacob Domalewski tells Fox 41, "I'd probably scream once I saw him."

It is a big week for everyone at Silver Street Elementary School in New Albany. School Superintendent Dennis Brooks refers to the "Great excitement here this morning." The great excitement is about a visit from President George W. Bush.

Principal Tony Duffy says, "It's such an honor. It's a once in a lifetime opportunity for our students and our teachers and everyone involved in our school."

Duffy found out about the visit on Monday and shared it with his staff: "It was kind of the moment when people look at you in disbelief." In fact, Duffy had some disbelief of his own when he received the phone call from the White House. "I asked her, okay, I'm sure you're from the White House and I said, who put you up to this?"

After recovering from the shock, staff and students started preparing for the president's visit. Duffy says, "We are cleaning, and that is something that we need to do, and we're making space for the folks that are coming in."

The president is expected to update the school on No Child Left Behind. School officials suspect he chose Silver Street because of its success with the initiative.

Superintendent Brooks says, "This is a school that has worked very hard to improve student outcomes and that certainly is, I'm sure, part of the reason."

Silver street has 264 students. The few we talked to knew a little bit about the president. 4th Grader Jacob Domalewski says, "I know he's in charge of the country." And he said, "I know he has two twin daughters who I think are in 7th grade." The Bush twins are actually in college. But students will know that and much more about the president by Friday. Principal Duffy says, "Each individual teacher is going to be working with that all week."

The president is expected to arrive at Silver Street at about 2 o'clock on Friday.

Bush To Visit Silver Street Elementary (WLKY)

WLKY-TV Louisville, Kentucky, February 27, 2007

The White House has released more details on President George W. Bush's pending March 2 visit. His itinerary includes a stop at Silver Street Elementary School in New Albany, where he'll talk about reauthorizing the five-year-old No Child Left Behind law.

Afterward, he'll attend a fundraiser for Sen. Mitch McConnell (R-Kentucky). McConnell, the current Senate Minority Leader and a 24-year senator, is raising money for re-election.

Democrats seized control of the Senate by the slimmest of margins after last year's election, preventing McConnell from becoming Senate majority leader.

McConnell, the Senate minority leader, has been an unwavering Bush supporter on the Iraq war and the president's domestic policies. McConnell has said he'll seek a fifth term next year.

No Democrat had announced plans to challenge him.

Labor Rides Political-Wind Shift (WSJ)

By Kris Maher

The Wall Street Journal, February 28, 2007

Organized labor aims to use the House's expected passage tomorrow of a pro-union bill to further the rest of its legislative agenda, even though the bill, under heated industry opposition, faces likely defeat in the Senate.

The Employee Free Choice Act would make it easier to organize workers by giving them the right to unionize as soon as a majority signs cards in favor of a union, a process known as "card check" that can take a few weeks. The typical secret-ballot election can drag on for months and is often slowed further by charges of labor-law violations. Union officials see the bill as a key to stemming a decline in membership and correcting a perceived weakening of workers' rights under the Bush administration. Today, unions represent 7.4% of the nation's private-sector work force, down from 35% in the 1950s.

• The Situation: Tomorrow the House will likely pass legislation that would make it easier for unions to organize workers.

• What's at Stake: Unions hope the bill will help reverse a decline in membership, while business groups argue the bill takes away workers' rights.

• What's Next: The bill is expected to stall in the Senate, but unions are using their current momentum to push the rest of their legislative agenda.

DOJ_NMG_0137769

Although passage is expected in the House, where it has 234 co-sponsors, the bill is expected to face a filibuster in the Senate, in large part because of intensifying objections from employer and industry groups.

In the past two days, the National Association of Manufacturers sent two letters to members of Congress, saying that the association would use tomorrow's vote in determining its future support for lawmakers. The association argues the bill "further erodes the competitive capabilities of American manufacturers." A coalition representing more than 300 state and local employer groups also is lobbying against the bill, and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce said it has sent more than 24,000 emails to members of Congress to oppose it.

The last-minute flurry of opposition also is an attempt to discourage a potential compromise that could involve dropping the card-check provision while keeping provisions that make arbitration mandatory if a first contract isn't reached between a union and an employer, and assess stiffer penalties to employers who violate labor law during organizing drives.

"There's always the danger that someone in the Senate will see themselves as a deal maker and do something like that," said Randel Johnson, vice president for labor policy at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. The Chamber and other business groups would fight the binding-arbitration portion of the bill just as hard as the card-check rule, he said.

Beyond the pending vote, the increasing resistance from business groups also indicates their concern about labor's closer ties to lawmakers since the fall election. Democratic lawmakers are planning to propose efforts in coming months to expand sick-leave coverage, introduce bills on workplace safety, on retirement security, and a bill that would effectively reverse a National Labor Relations Board decision last year on the supervisory status of workers. These measures have been on labor's legislative agenda and opposed by business groups. "It's going to be a long two years," said Mr. Johnson.

Organized labor isn't expected to give up on the Employee Free Choice Act, and the fact the measure is up for a vote at all, and likely to receive approval from a full House, is a victory for organized labor. A year ago, a House vote on the measure was unthinkable to many union officials. Now, the campaign represents one of labor's biggest pushes in decades. Many union leaders are looking ahead to the presidential race and saying that in 2008 they will only back candidates who supported the bill.

At the same time, labor wants to move quickly on other measures while it has the limelight and momentum from an expected House victory.

Anna Burger, secretary treasurer of the Service Employees International Union, said it is crucial to get Congress to act on issues such as health care and immigration reform now. "I think there's a move both in the House and the Senate to get something done [on immigration reform] by June," she said. "I think that this is the moment."

Next week, leaders of the AFL-CIO's 54 affiliate unions plan to announce details on a bankruptcy-overhaul bill, which would make it harder for companies to walk away from wage and benefit obligations when filing for bankruptcy-court protection, as well as a strategy to deny renewal of the president's fast-track authority on trade agreements when they meet at their winter conference in Las Vegas.

Meanwhile, many individual unions are seeking more specialized legislation. The International Brotherhood of Teamsters, for example, is seeking a legislative fix to stop a pilot program started last week that gives Mexican trucks greater freedom to travel throughout the U.S. The union is demanding hearings on the program. "We're going to do everything we can to get this ridiculous pilot program stopped," said Leigh Strope, a Teamsters spokeswoman. There also will be a renewed push by labor to get the stalled minimum-wage increase signed into law.

Labor leaders have tried to position the Employee Free Choice Act as helping to bridge the widening income gap, which they said is connected to the steep decline in union membership. "The single best opportunity for working women and men to get ahead economically is to come together with their co-workers to form a union," said John Sweeney, president of the AFL-CIO.

Yet business groups have called the bill undemocratic because it gives workers the option of skipping a secret-ballot election and could lead to unfair pressure by unions. They have also attacked the unions for having a double standard, noting that unions want to keep a secret-ballot process when it comes to the process of decertifying a union.

Some labor experts have said the employer argument is misleading because it doesn't take into account the context in which many union elections are held, as workers may be pressured by employers. "Cuba has secret-ballot elections. If you think those are democratic then you might think these union elections are democratic," said Harley Shaiken, a labor expert at the University of California at Berkeley who testified in favor of the bill in recent congressional hearings.

Despite the battle over this legislation, there may be areas, including health care and immigration reform, where business and labor may be willing to compromise on legislation. A bill on immigration is expected to reach the Senate in March. While a number of business and union leaders have joined together to work to reduce the number of uninsured Americans, there is little consensus at the federal level on what approach to take.

Labor Looks To Score First Big Win In Years (HILL)

DOJ_NMG_0137770

By Ian Swanson

The Hill, February 28, 2007

A coalition of business groups has launched a massive effort to defeat legislation under House consideration this week that is organized labor's No. 1 priority for the 110th Congress.

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce is leading this drive, whose magnitude rivals the 2001 campaign supporting President Bush's tax cuts. As of last week, the Chamber alone had directed more than 24,000 letters, phone calls and e-mails to House members in opposition to H.R. 800, the Employee Free Choice Act of 2007.

The effort has continued this week with advertising in 60 conservative-leaning blogs and e-mail blasts to House chiefs of staff and legislative assistants on labor. Along with the Chamber of Commerce, the business coalition includes dozens of national and local business groups. Together, they are targeting 51 congressional districts with radio advertisements and phone calls urging constituents to press their representative to oppose H.R. 800.

These districts cover 29 Democrats and 22 Republicans, including freshman Reps. Heath Shuler (D-N.C.), Tim Mahoney (D-Fla.), Ron Klein (D-Fla.), Joe Courtney (D-Conn.), David Loebsack (D-Iowa), Jerry McNerney (D-Calif.), Vern Buchanan (R-Fla.), Steve Kagen (D-Wis.), and Carol Shea-Porter (D-N.H.). All but Mahoney and Buchanan are cosponsors of the bill.

Veteran Republicans targeted by the campaign include Reps. Charlie Dent (R-Pa.), Tom Reynolds (R-N.Y.) and Randy Kuhl (R-N.Y.).

In terms of the effort, "we're beating what we saw for the tax coalition in 2001," said Bruce Josten, executive vice president of government affairs for the Chamber. Bill Miller, the chamber's vice president for congressional affairs, said his group is also outpacing its work in the 2001 "prize fight" that it won over labor when Congress approved legislation rolling back the Clinton administration's ergonomic rules.

Organized labor's effort is just as intense. The AFL-CIO has sent more than 4.7 million messages to union members, their friends and family, and other allies, who have responded by sending 257,000 messages as of last week to members of Congress, sources with the group said.

The AFL-CIO last week organized 90 events across the country with various members of Congress, including House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), to raise awareness of the bill. It is also running newspaper advertisements in support of the bill.

Despite these efforts, sources on both sides acknowledge the bill is unlikely to become law this year. While the House will likely approve the measure this week, the Senate will probably not to be able to muster the 60 votes necessary to break an expected GOP filibuster on the legislation.

The tough Senate fight is illustrated by Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), the only GOP senator to cosponsor identical legislation last year. This year, Specter, whose business groups have lobbied on the issue, has taken no position, according to his office.

"It might not happen in this Congress," said Kelly Ross, a legislative representative of the AFL-CIO. "But we'll try to make it happen in this Congress, and if it doesn't, we'll try the next Congress."

Debate over the bill's "card check" or "secret ballot" provision has dominated both sides' campaigns. The bill's main section would effectively rewrite U.S. law so that workers would no longer be required to use a secret ballot when voting on whether to unionize.

If the legislation becomes law, workers could form unions as long as a majority of employees sign cards designating a labor group as their bargaining representative. Business groups charge that such an open system with no secret ballot would allow union supporters to bully and intimidate workers into joining unions. Union representatives counter that the present system allows employers to get rid of union organizers and threaten and intimidate workers into voting against forming a union.

But the two sides do agree that the bill would generally make it easier for workers to unionize, which could have enormous implications in the political world. Organized labor is a consistent financial backer of Democratic campaigns.

The House bill includes two other contentious sections besides the card-check provision, and some business sources say they could accept them only if the Senate removed the card-check section. According to the Chamber's Josten, one of those is a provision requiring that employees and employer go to binding arbitration if they cannot agree on a contract through mediation. That idea is as bad and onerous to business as the card-check rule, Josten said.

The other disputed section of the bill would impose stiff civil penalties, up to $20,000, on employers who commit unfair labor practices while the initial collective bargaining contract is being negotiated.

One group that has taken aim at the binding-arbitration provision is the National Association of Manufacturers, which warns that some members may not even be aware of key parts of the bill.

"There are members of Congress who aren't fully up to speed on the bill," said Jason Straczewski, the group's director of human resources policy. He said his group is sending the message that the binding-arbitration provision is just as much of a problem as the card-check measure.

Meanwhile, Ross said the AFL-CIO would oppose moving through a bill with only parts of H.R. 800, especially if that means the removal of the card-check provision. She said the three sections of the bill are intertwined and meant to act together. Stripping the card-check provision from the bill would therefore help defeat the bill's purpose.

Speaking from the opposite side, a business source also said that it would make sense for labor to demand that the entire bill be approved. That would hurt the bill's chances of final passage in both chambers, after which labor might ease its position and support moving only a stripped-down bill, the source explained.

Business Group Raps Freshmen (RC)

By David M. Drucker

Roll Call, February 28, 2007

With the House expected to vote Thursday on a measure that would make it easier for workers to unionize, a business coalition launched a six-figure radio ad campaign late Tuesday in an attempt to convince three Democratic freshmen who represent conservative districts to defy organized labor and vote against the bill.

Reps. Nancy Boyda (Kan.), Tim Mahoney (Fla.) and Heath Shuler (N.C.) were all elected in Republican-leaning districts in November, and the business group Coalition for a Democratic Workplace — saying these Members ran as "pro-business" Democrats — is urging their constituents to call them and register displeasure with H.R. 800. The bill would give workers the option of checking a card to indicate their desire to unionize, as opposed to current regulations that mandate secret-ballot elections.

"All three of these Members ran as pro-business Democrats, and we want to make sure that every single freshman Democrat who ran as a new kind of Democrat votes like one," said Todd Harris, a Republican operative who is serving as a spokesman for the business coalition.

The coalition's effort joins a U.S. Chamber of Commerce radio campaign already under way in opposition to the labor legislation. At a cost of roughly $500,000, it is targeting 51 Members, including 22 Republicans who represent labor-heavy districts or are seen as possibly inclined to support H.R. 800.

Neither Boyda, Mahoney nor Shuler seem particularly worried that supporting H.R. 800 will cause them re-election problems next year, as all three plan to vote in favor of the bill. In fact, Boyda and Shuler are co-sponsors.

Boyda said the mail she's received from constituents has been overwhelmingly supportive of her position on H.R. 800. Although Kansas' 2nd district was represented by Republicans from 1994 to 2006, it was held by Democrats for 24 years before that, and Boyda said her district is more pragmatic than conservative.

"We're not wealthy people in the 2nd district. It's a district of working families," Boyda said Tuesday in a telephone interview. "They may be sorry that they spent their money to tear me down on this one. They may be sorry, but we'll see."

The 60-second radio ad targeting the three freshman Democrats is scheduled to run for almost a week on all of the major news-radio stations in their districts, as well as on some highly rated country and mainstream music stations. The linchpin of the coalition's campaign, as referenced in the ad, is that Democrats have demanded the Mexican government mandate secret ballots for Mexican workers who want to unionize, while they oppose them for American workers.

The bill, dubbed the Employee Free Choice Act, would allow workers the option of checking a publicly viewable card indicating their desire to unionize, eliminating the current method that mandates secret-ballot voting supervised by the federal government.

Supporters say the bill would eliminate corporate coercion against unionizing and make it easier for workers to organize; opponents claim the bill would subject workers to intimidation by union officials, discouraging those who are against unionization from voting that way.

House Republicans leaders, making a concerted push to defeat the bill, met Tuesday with members of the Coalition for a Democratic Workplace to strategize on coordinating opposition to H.R. 800, as well as minimizing the number of Republicans who might vote for the bill.

The six House GOP leaders who met with the coalition included Minority Leader John Boehner (Ohio), Minority Whip Roy Blunt (Mo.) and Chief Deputy Minority Whip Eric Cantor (Va.). Among the coalition's members are the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the National Association of Manufacturers and the National Federation of Independent Business.

"Anyone who thinks [Thursday] is going to be the only vote is kidding themselves. The message was, don't give up the fight, we have our work cut out for us over the next couple of days," said Danielle Ringwood, a spokeswoman for Associated Builders and Contractors, another coalition member.

DOJ_NMG_0137772

Ringwood did not want to speculate on the outcome of Thursday's scheduled floor vote, but said House Members of both parties tend to oppose the bill — if not at least question its merits — once they're educated on what it would do. But she said organized labor has drummed up support practicing an effective game of "coercive lobbying."

The AFL-CIO, which held events in 90 Congressional districts with 150 House Members over the Presidents Day recess, is cautiously optimistic that H.R. 800 will pass the House.

Bill Samuel, the union's spokesman, said many Democrats from Republican-minded districts are unlikely to face reprisals at the ballot box for supporting the bill, because they represent areas that are culturally conservative but labor-friendly.

That is why freshmen like Boyda and Shuler, who represent districts that tend to vote for Republican presidential candidates, are co-sponsoring the bill and do not fear a political backlash in next year's elections, Samuel said. The same goes for Mahoney, who is one of just seven or eight Democrats who is not co-sponsoring H.R. 800.

Samuel predicted that as many as two dozen Republicans could ultimately vote for the bill.

"What does it mean to be a red-leaning district where you have a large labor population?" Samuel asked rhetorically. "They may be culturally conservative, but they line up very closely with organized labor."

The business coalition argues that the option of "card-check" unionization — or "majority sign-up," as organized labor prefers — will lead to intimidation by union officials, as workers who oppose forming a union will be loath to do so using the publicly viewable card-check or sign-up forms.

Additionally, the coalition claims, 16 Democratic Members have publicly demanded that the Mexican government preserve secret balloting as the only means by which its workers can vote for unionization. Business groups say American workers should not be given any fewer protections than Mexican workers, and they believe this argument will resonate with the public if they can get the message out.

The coalition uses an August 2001 letter that liberal Democratic House Members wrote to Mexican officials encouraging them to "use the secret ballot in all union recognition elections." The coalition's radio ad tries to make the point.

"Your vote. In America it's as sacred as the Constitution. And it's cast in private," the ad's voice-over begins. "But union bosses want to change that. They want you to choose in public. Yes public."

After some additional rhetoric, the ad concludes: "What's worse? The same liberal leaders want to protect private ballot elections for workers in Mexico. Private ballots for Mexico and open ballots for Americans. That's crazy."

Walter Reed Puts Congress In Bipartisan 'foul Mood' (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan

The Hill, February 28, 2007

The poor conditions and bureaucratic mazes facing wounded soldiers and Marines at the Walter Reed Army Medical Center have sparked condemnation from Democratic and Republican lawmakers as they prepare for a hearing next Monday at the hospital.

Rep. John Tierney (D-Mass.), chairman of the Oversight and Government Reform national security subcommittee, with support from Republican Reps. Tom Davis (Va.) and Christopher Shays (Conn.), announced earlier this week that he would conduct a hearing at Walter Reed, located in northwest Washington, D.C.

The Washington Post reported earlier this month that some wounded soldiers and Marines lived in moldy and rodent-infested housing complexes, while others were financially strapped or physically harmed by bureaucratic inefficiency.

The anecdotes in the Post have spurred an array of responses from lawmakers, generating headlines in local newspapers. Several committees will hold hearings starting this week and several lawmakers, such as Rep. Joe Donnelly (D-Ind.), created a veterans' advisory board.

Donnelly, who sits on the Veterans Affairs Committee, told the South Bend Tribune yesterday that "Everybody's in a very foul mood right now" with respect to the media accounts.

That includes Republicans. A day after the Washington Post story appeared on Feb. 20, Davis, the ranking Republican on the Oversight and Government Reform Committee, asked chairman Henry Waxman (D-Calif.) to conduct a hearing at Walter Reed's Mologne House, one of the outpatient buildings.

Davis noted past hearings he conducted as chairman that examined the medical care National Guardsmen and Reservists received. He said in his letter that "The investigative series that appeared in the Washington Post … is in part based on three years of work by our Committee's investigative staff."

Shays followed up with his own letter one day later, writing, "The conditions described, which included mold, rodent and insect infestation and dilapidated walls and ceilings, are outrageous and deserve swift remediation."

DOJ_NMG_0137773

He asked Waxman to "immediately schedule a hearing at Walter Reed to investigate the circumstances that led to the current conditions and conduct oversight of the repairs."

The Oversight and Government Reform panel, the main investigative committee in the House, is stacked with partisans and freshman Democrats —Reps. John Yarmuth (Ky.), Bruce Braley (Iowa), Paul Hodes (N.H.) and Peter Welch (Vt.) — who ran on holding the Bush administration accountable.

Republican lawmakers on the panel include Reps. Dan Burton (Ind.), Kenny Marchant (Texas), Lynn Westmoreland (Ga.) and Patrick McHenry (N.C.).

While media accounts have noted that the Army has worked to improve the physical conditions at some of the residences and outpatient facilities, lawmakers have taken little comfort.

"You could put all of the wounded soldiers in the Ritz-Carlton and it wouldn't fix the personnel, management and record-keeping problems that keep wounded Guard and Reserve soldiers languishing in outpatient limbo," said David Marin, the Republican staff director on the Oversight and Government Reform Committee.

Congress Reevaluates High-cost Defense Programs As Budget Ax Looms (HILL)

By Roxana Tiron

The Hill, February 28, 2007

Congress is grappling with how to fix a number of high-profile defense programs that are costing taxpayers billions of dollars yet have poor records of success.

Congress traditionally has been averse to canceling defense programs that grow strong constituencies. However, with a defense procurement budget that in recent years has experienced exponential year-over-year growth but that now could be flattening — or even facing cuts — Congress may be forced to quash several technologically complicated programs still in development, according to both congressional sources and outside observers.

Programs in danger may include the Army's Future Combat Systems and the Joint Tactical Radio System; the Air Force's Joint Strike Fighter and several satellite programs; and the Navy's Littoral Combat Ship.

While outright cancellations do not appear imminent in the 2008 defense budget, defense authorizers and appropriators will focus on reevaluating, in some cases redirecting and reprogramming funds.

Defense committees have begun to focus on somewhat less complex and less challenging systems. Too often, congressional sources say, the Pentagon embarks on ambitious programs with even more ambitious deadlines, and as a result forgoes critical early testing and evaluation on technologies.

When the programs enter operational testing and so-called low-rate production, problems crop up, forcing the services to return to the drawing board and incurring cost overruns and delays.

The Army's Future Combat Systems, which bears a $160 billion price tag, is one example of an ambitious program that is facing intense congressional scrutiny. Lawmakers consistently have criticized the development of the technologies and cut money for the program during the last three years (about $825 million).

"FCS has to be pretty ruthlessly vetted, and we'll see whether we'll get all these complicated systems," the chairman of the Air and Land Forces subcommittee of the Armed Services Committee, Neil Abercrombie (D-Hawaii), said.

He said the Pentagon is focusing too much on "Star Trek"-type military programs and too little on figuring out how to defeat improvised explosive devices, commonly known as road bombs.

"We need to do a little more training and equipping and concentrate on the basics rather than the razzle-dazzle technologies," Abercrombie said in an interview.

The Department of Defense has plans for "systems that are high-tech and are pushing the envelope, and whenever you do that you take on risk and cost," said a congressional source who asked not to be quoted by name.

"If you do hard development programs in a short time you have to take smaller bites of the apple, and that would help you with the money problem."

Former Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld's aggressive push for transformation across the services could leave the Pentagon with more troubles, according to the congressional source.

This year the Navy had to stop work on the General Dynamics-Lockheed Martin built Littoral Combat Ship after learning that the price of the first LCS (built by Lockheed) would total $420 million, well above the $220 million the service expects to pay for future ships.

Chief of Naval Operations Adm. Michael Mullen told House defense appropriators that the Navy did not adequately oversee the program and has set ambitious goals for it, putting pressure on the program's costs and schedule. The Navy plans to buy 51 Littoral Combat Ships.

DOJ_NMG_0137774

Meanwhile, the Marine Corps is seeking new contractors to develop the Expeditionary Fighting Vehicle (EFV), an all-capable amphibious armored vehicle, which now is prone to breakdowns and technical glitches.

The Marine Corps so far has spent $1.7 billion on the EFV while the total cost of the program rose to about $12 billion from $8 billion, leading to more Pentagon oversight. Contractor General Dynamics received about $80 million in bonuses on the contract.

A Navy study faulted the company for wanting to rush into production rather than troubleshoot the problems. Navy Secretary Donald Winter said the EFV will be reworked, with the focus on improving its reliability.

The EFV program is critical to the Marine Corps. "It would be a very unhappy prospect to have to cancel the EFV," the congressional source said.

The setbacks with the EFV and the LCS indicate systemic problems in the Pentagon procurement system, said House defense appropriator Sanford Bishop Jr. (D-Ga.) at a recent industry conference.

"Low-ball estimates by contractors, approved by the department, engineering changes by the military and poor contractor performance — all play a role in the LCS situation and, generally, pervade the procurement and contract fulfillment process," he said.

Bishop also conveyed a message from House defense subcommittee Chairman John Murtha (D-Pa.):

"Low-balling by industry, acquiescence by the Pentagon, poor performance by contractors and little, if any, oversight by Congress will come to a screeching halt! There is a new sheriff in town! The committee is done with rewarding bad behavior and reckless spending that takes away money for other needed programs."

Defense appropriators said that they want to be supportive of the defense industry. Murtha plans to increase the ship buys to 12 per year and increase the Air Force's aircraft purchases in 2008 by 100.

The defense industry often complains that program requirements change constantly and details are added after a contract is awarded, increasing the scope of the programs, as well as the cost.

The requirements process is a good place to start to rein in costs and control potential failures, said the congressional source. The Armed Services panels will examine the requirements process — plagued by overambitious requirements or requirements that keep growing.

"A 10-page requirement become a 100-page requirement," the source said.

The strategy is to focus on the first steps of the acquisition process so that "you do not get into crunch-time in the endgame," the source said.

Defense insiders say program costs are driven by decisions made as the initial 10 to 15 percent of the work is being completed. The government lacks the technical expertise required to oversee complex programs, and often the testing-and-evaluation community does not see the technologies until they enter low-rate production and so-called operational testing.

Often, developmental testing is skipped. Moreover, weapons-systems testers do not have the authority to halt systems.

Even if the testing is done early, "unfortunately, people do not pay attention to what happens and sometimes they cut the testing short to stay on schedule," a former Pentagon official who dealt with the issue said.

"There is a lack of discipline in the process and things go ahead when people know that it is not going to work and it is not going to cost that little."

The Marine Corps V-22 Osprey is a costly and tragic example. The Marine Corps bought more than 60 of the vertical take-off and landing aircraft in low-rate production, running the risk of needing additional funding to incorporate fixes to problems uncovered after their procurement. 30 Marines died while testing the V-22.

The Department of Defense invested about $15 billion in the program during the last 25 years.

"Congress will have to cancel programs," said Jeff Green, a former House Armed Services Committee professional staff member and former staff director of the readiness subcommittee who recently opened a lobby firm.

"Politically, the corner that the new majority painted itself into" will force it to cancel those programs that will not make it through systems development and demonstration. "The list of programs that are not vulnerable is much shorter," Green said. He counts the multi-national Joint Strike Fighter as an endangered program as its price tag is increasing; its capabilities are too close to another high-priced fighter, the F-22, and the defense budgets are getting tighter.

House Democrats Angling On Domestic Issues (POL)

By Jeanne Cummings

The Politico, February 28, 2007

Even as Iraq dominates the headlines, congressional Democrats are moving swiftly on key domestic issues aimed at improving their 2008 reelection chances and splitting Republicans.

DOJ_NMG_0137775

This week's House debates on easing union organizing and giving Congress more say in foreign purchases of critical domestic infrastructure are cases in point. One makes good on a campaign promise to an important ally. The other reminds voters about the Bush administration's controversial approval of port purchases by a United Arab Emirates firm and potentially casts doubts on Republican stewardship of homeland security issues.

Coming next are scheduled hearings and debates on health care, education, prescription drugs, stem-cell research and immigration reform, all issues that Democrats campaigned on during the 2006 midterms. This runup to the Easter break is just a sneak peak at the broader agenda Democrats are planning to put in place for the rest of the year. What it shows is that House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (Nev.) are in a hurry to pocket some key domestic victories and avoid the "do nothing" label they gave Republicans last year.

"It's clear that 2007 is a critical year for Congress," said Democratic political adviser Geoff Garin. "It's pretty certain that the spotlight will turn from Capitol Hill to presidential politics early and that the Congress's ability to get a lot done will be eclipsed in some significant measure."

Congressional wariness about the fast-paced 2008 presidential campaign is evident in the aggressive schedule set for the immigration reform law. Reid has set a goal of having the measure in a conference committee by August, "lest presidential politics overtake it," said spokesman Jim Manley.

But in the footrace to get things done, Democrats could stumble.

The ineffectual rollout of Pennsylvania Rep. John Murtha's strategy to tie war funding to troop training and service rotations is a reminder that the skills of even some veterans in the Democratic caucus are rusty.

Pelosi and Reid also face the hurdle of maintaining unity in caucuses with muscular conservative and liberal wings.

Thursday's debate on union organizing is a case in point. The issue moved like lightning through the House committee headed by labor ally California Rep. George Miller and is supported by the vast majority of the caucus. But the early timing of the legislation, so soon after the minimum wage increase vote, is creating some angst among newly elected and some veteran conservative and moderate Democrats.

Democratic strategists say those challenges are outweighed by a need to fulfill their campaign promises. Indeed, any early domestic victories could prove even more vital if Democrats are unable to reverse course in Iraq.

"You don't want the agenda to be consumed by one issue that sucks all the oxygen out of the room and nothing else can survive," said Ross Baker, a political scientist at Rutgers University.

Some of the issues up for action in the next few weeks are emerging early because of independent deadlines for action. The president's signature education legislation, No Child Left Behind, is in need of a tardy reauthorization, and a clean water measure is being pressed to provide critical funding for states to improve sewer systems and other infrastructure.

But others are plucked from a Democratic playbook that sets as priorities the middle-class economic squeeze, child health and safety, energy and environment, as well as conducting oversight of the war, wasteful spending on Iraq reconstruction and the Katrina cleanup in New Orleans. Republicans are largely stuck playing defense, although their numbers in the Senate give them a chance to cut off debate on some legislation or insist on modifying others. More broadly, though, their chances of shaping the 2008 debate depend largely on Democratic missteps.

Bill McInturff, a Republican adviser, said this strategy isn't far-fetched. He recalled the heady days of the 1994 Republican revolution when members remained disciplined in pushing through the Contract with America agenda. A year later, however, attitudes changed as Republicans wound up shutting down the government in a disastrous showdown for them with President Bill Clinton over the budget.

"I think there is every possibility that the Democrats will overreach in over-investigations, too much spending and taxes, and by responding too much to their own primary voters on Iraq and not the public," McInturff said.

Until then, Republicans must tiptoe through political minefields laid by their adversaries. The stem-cell debate expected soon on the Senate floor is a prime example of an issue that tends to unite Democrats and split the Republican Party. In the 2006 Missouri Senate race, for instance, the state's normally pro-Republican business community lined up behind a ballot initiative that promoted stem-cell research. The initiative was opposed by incumbent Republican Sen. Jim Talent, who was defeated by Democrat Claire McCaskill, who backed the measure.

Immigration is another divisive issue for Republicans, although Democrats are likely to suffer their own defections. The proposal that Massachusetts Democrat Sen. Edward M. Kennedy and Arizona Republican Sen. John McCain are expected to introduce will hew closely to a measure debated last year that called for a guest worker program and tougher enforcement. That proposal was modeled after reforms proposed by President Bush. Democrats plan to pressure him to use the full White House arsenal to get the reform proposal through, even if it means driving a wedge between the president and his party.

DOJ_NMG_0137776

Blue Dogs Believe Their Day Is Here (RC)

By Jennifer Yachnin

Roll Call, February 28, 2007

While there are plenty of indications that the fiscally conservative Blue Dog Coalition's cache is expanding on Capitol Hill — an invitation to the White House, regular meetings with the Speaker, plum committee assignments — one lawmaker found perhaps the most telling affirmation far from Capitol Hill and closer to the produce aisle.

"I've been in grocery stores and people come up and say, 'I see you belong to that Blue Dog group,' and I had no idea they would even know what the group is, but it really has taken on some added importance," said Rep. Dennis Moore (D-Kan.), the coalition's policy chairman.

In fact, members of the Blue Dogs are anything but reticent about their growing influence within the new Democratic majority, as the moderate lawmakers — who now number nearly four dozen, the largest contingent in the group's 12-year history — seek to maximize their impact in the House following the power switch in the 110th Congress.

On a recent weekday afternoon, leaders of the moderate group gathered in the office of Rep. Mike Ross (D-Ark.), the coalition's communications chairman, to discuss their place in the new majority, as well as their aims for the 110th Congress. In addition to Ross and Moore, the group included Democratic Reps. Allen Boyd (Fla.), the group's administration chairman, Stephanie Herseth (S.D.), the group's whip, and John Tanner (Tenn.), a co-founder of the Blue Dogs and a current co-chairman of its political action committee.

"I think one of the things that's different now, I think there was a time when Blue Dogs were looked at by some Democrats as though perhaps they weren't really Democrats and I think that's no longer the case," Ross said.

"I think people are recognizing that not only do we represent the middle, which is where we believe the American people are and certainly where we are, I think people within our own Caucus now recognize that we have created the majority and that we have done some pretty heavy lifting as a group to ensure that Democrats did regain a majority."

Pointing to their own growth since the 1996 elections, the Blue Dogs note that their members have captured 24 seats from incumbent Republicans, including those now held by Moore, Ross and Herseth — a tactic the group saw magnified in the 2006 cycle when House Democrats won contests in a number of moderate and conservative districts, handing the party control of the chamber for the first time in a dozen years.

The Blue Dogs themselves added nine freshman lawmakers, raising their own count to 44 members.

"We think it should be obvious to everybody what our role has been in helping us win the majority," Boyd said.

The coalition's leaders assert those efforts already have begun to pay dividends. In particular, Ross pointed to the House adoption of "pay-as-you-go" spending rules — one of the Blue Dogs' top priorities — at the outset of the new Congress.

"We do think that the fact that, not in the first 100 legislative hours, but the first 24 hours of the 110th session of Congress, PAYGO rules being reinstituted on the floor of the House was a significant milestone and demonstrates that we are being taken seriously," he said.

In addition, Boyd asserted that Democratic leadership has "been very inclusive when it comes to the committee assignments. They have been very inclusive when it comes to consulting us on legislation. We meet with them on a regular basis.

"We think this is the group that represents where the greatest bloc of Americans are — toward that big middle. Not far left, not far right, but that big middle, that's going to be able to get things done," he added. "And it's going to have to be done on a bipartisan basis."

Even as the Blue Dogs acknowledge their own potential to serve as a bridge to their moderate Republican colleagues, however, the Democratic lawmakers seek to tamp down expectations that any formal bipartisan efforts are under way, noting that their own group has only recently completed its internal organization.

"I think we're trying to find our way in the majority. The Republicans are trying to find their way in the minority. And both of us are having growing pains. That will come, but it's been so busy and so hectic," Tanner said. He added: "We want to be a complement to the Democratic Caucus and a vehicle if necessary to the Republican Conference to try to make that happen."

While members of both the Blue Dogs and the moderate Republican Tuesday Group previously have suggested the organizations could work together in the new session, for now the Democrats suggest those efforts are limited to one-on-one sessions or the committee level.

"We're still very early in this new Congress, and while we were having discussions throughout the last Congress, particularly before the election and after the election, as we've now moved into majority status our focus has been on our cohesiveness — adding nine new members to our organization — influencing the policy decisions and the direction and agenda of the Democratic majority," Herseth said.

DOJ_NMG_0137777

Nonetheless, the Democrats did make time in December to accept an invitation to the White House, along with the centrist New Democrat Coalition, to meet with President Bush.

"I appreciate the president's reaching out to us, and I'm hopeful for the next two years we can start to work together for the American people, because that's what they want," Moore said.

Despite that gesture, however, Democrats said they remain hesitant about working with the Bush administration, citing not only a lack of comity in recent years but also more specific concerns about the president's budget proposal and accounting methods.

"If the administration continues to reach out to us as they have, on their ideas and the desire to get serious about entitlement reform, you'd have a pretty receptive group of folks here that would want to undertake that difficult task," Herseth acknowledged. "But it's a little bit hard for us given some of the distrust that has evolved over the last few years because of the unwillingness to really reach out to us."

Moreover, Ross emphasized that pursuing bipartisanship does not mean the Blue Dogs will turn against their own party.

"We're a lot more interested in affecting Democratic policy and moving Democratic ideas to the middle than we are into defeating Democratic proposals," Ross said. "We want to help and influence [the Caucus] and not be an obstructionist, but we're not going to be a rubber stamp either."

Although the Blue Dogs face some philosophical differences within their own party, most notably with Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), whose San Francisco-based district trends more liberal than many of the rural districts represented in the coalition, the Members sought to downplay any potential divide.

"Let's face it, we all know that both parties, in large part, are controlled by extremes that in some cases are different from what we might represent in the middle," Boyd said. "We don't think the Speaker's philosophy or her particular district's philosophy is important. What we think is important is the management style she uses. How she is inclusive with us, how she acts."

Emphasizing that the relationship remains positive thus far, the Blue Dogs cite the House's initial efforts to reinstitute PAYGO rules, as well as conversations with the Speaker to pursue a statutory version of that law covering tax cuts as well as spending programs.

"We have talked and talked and talked about the importance of reinstituting the PAYGO rules," Moore said. "The Democratic Caucus has now done that, and we're looking at statuary PAYGO. To her credit, Speaker Pelosi and the leadership in our Caucus are also saying we need to look at this and see if we can go do that."

In addition, Ross noted that the House leadership has offered to pursue a vote on the Blue Dog-backed proposal to implement new accountability standards on government spending on the Iraq War. During remarks on the House floor prior to the Presidents Day recess, Pelosi cited the legislation, authored by Reps. Jane Harman (D-Calif.) and Patrick Murphy (D-Pa.).

"I think we're going to play an important role in continuing to push this accountability of our government," Ross said. "It's our duty and obligation to provide oversight, and the last six years this Congress hasn't been doing it."

In the meantime, the coalition's members are preparing to take on the upcoming budget debate and developing potential legislation in other areas as well as via their internal task forces, including: budget and fiscal policy; business and technology; energy and natural resources; government accountability; health care; immigration reform and border security; national and homeland security; and retirement security.

Much as with the full Democratic Caucus, the Blue Dogs also will give attention to maintaining their majority in the 2008 cycle, notably the defense of their freshman lawmakers.

During the 2006 cycle, the coalition's political arm raised more than $1 million, and according to Ross, Blue Dog lawmakers contributed more than $20 million in combined dues and funds raised to the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

"We will support, of course, all the members financially, to the extent that we're successful in fundraising," Tanner said, adding that the Blue Dogs also will advise their members to "exert their independence" on votes.

"That's not a slap at the leadership," Tanner explained. "One of the philosophies of the Blue Dogs when we started was that the voting card that we all carry should belong to the people that hired us. ... When it comes down to votes affecting the country's future we think it's entirely appropriate for Members to behave as representatives and not as parliamentarians. All that entails is voting the district. ... That usually takes care of any problems."

Lobbying Law Misses Some K St. Numbers (HILL)

By Jim Snyder And Jeffrey Young

The Hill, February 28, 2007

February includes an annual Washington ritual apart from the Presidents Day recess: the tallying of lobbying revenue totals. In the highly competitive world of K Street, firms anxiously await to see how they did in relation to their rivals.

DOJ_NMG_0137778

But while firms act like ambitious law students checking class rank, some critics believe that the Lobbying Disclosure Act (LDA), the law that defines what activities a firm must report annually to Congress, hasn't kept pace with the industry's evolution. Firms now have public relations, strategic consulting, grassroots and federal marketing arms — all of which have the potential to influence public officials, but which often take place outside the public eye.

"The Lobbying Disclosure Act is a good starting point to understand how much money is being spent," said Alex Knott, a political editor at the Center for Public Integrity, which maintains several lobbying databases. "But there are huge amounts of money that don't get reported."

The firms themselves are sympathetic to complaints about the limitations of the LDA, albeit for different reasons. Believing annual revenue rankings are a potential marketing tool for their own businesses, firms are quick to note other revenue streams that aren't included in LDA figures — particularly if it's been a bad year for lobbying.

The Senate has passed a bill to update the LDA, enacted in 1995, but — aside from a new requirement that lobbyists detail fundraising activities — the changes do not include expanding what type of activity should be reported.

The LDA defines "lobbying activities" to include lobbying contact with anyone working for Congress and certain high-ranking executive-branch officials. The definition includes activities to support such contacts, like research and "planning activities," when the intention is to influence the formulation of legislation.

The statue's lack of specificity makes for varied interpretations, said Larry Noble, the former executive director for the Center for Responsive Politics.

"You do have a real need out there for some bright lines and education," said Noble, now a lawyer at Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom.

"There's always a question of where an activity falls along these lines. When you have room for interpretation, some people are going to read the law more strictly than others."

It is not clear under the LDA, for example, how much an association or firm spends on "issue advertising" (of the type found in this publication or on local television), even though it is intended to influence policy.

Associations that pay for such advertising would include it on expenses in tax forms, but these forms do not make plain what the issue is or which legislation the ad was trying to affect.

Federal marketing efforts — the pitching of a client's product to a federal agency — are also undisclosed.

Lobbying at federal agencies should be included on LDA forms, but federal marketing activities are often not required by disclosure rules unless, said Pam Gavin, superintendent of Public Records, the firm is making a pitch to a senior political figure within the administration.

Meetings with procurement officials probably don't fall under the LDA's purview. While this activity is regulated by government procurement rules, agencies have different policies that determine, for example, whether public comments to proposed rules are posted online.

Grassroots efforts, too, are not reported on an LDA form. An effort in Congress to force greater disclosure of grassroots activity did not make the Senate's LDA reform bill.

The Senate bill would require firms and other lobbying entities to file lobbying reports quarterly rather than semiannually. The bill also would require lobbyists to report campaign fundraising.

Gavin, who oversees LDA compliance, said the law was intended to provide the public with a general look at lobbying activities.

Requiring too-specific information presents a forest-and-trees problem, she said. Lobbying efforts could be obscured in an itemized list that includes a $10 cab ride to Capitol Hill.

"The whole idea is if my 16-year-old son wanted to do a report on who was lobbying [on an FDA bill], he should be able to go on the Internet and find out who is doing that," Gavin said.

But government watchdogs contend that imprecise rules about what activities must be disclosed lead to less valuable information being reported on how special interests try to influence policy.

"There's a lot of gray areas and, certainly, people who are willing to exploit it," said Steve Ellis, vice president for programs at Taxpayers for Common Sense.

Lobbying firms are not necessarily hiding what they do. But firms often have different definitions of what to include in an LDA form. Some firms over-report.

"The firms ... have an incentive to inflate their numbers" to impress clients and chasten competitors, said Tim LaPira, of the Center for Responsive Politics.

If LDA numbers are down, firm representatives often point to the other areas of their public-policy business that are up.

DOJ_NMG_0137779

Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld's lobbying revenues dipped nearly 9 percent last year from 2005, but its overall public-policy practice grew by 10 percent. The difference came from undertaking regulatory work that falls outside the LDA and from helping clients prepare for congressional oversight and investigations, a growth area for several firms under a new Democratic majority.

Cassidy & Associates made $24.6 million on lobbying in 2006, a drop of more than 11 percent year to year. (Its affiliate, The Rhoads Group, made another $4.8 million.)

But Cassidy also made nearly $1 million in what gets lumped as "other revenue" that is not included in LDA numbers. That includes money from its strategic-communications practice as well as its federal marketing work.

While all the firm's revenues should be considered to get a picture of Cassidy's business, however, lobbyists there don't believe disclosure rules should be toughened.

"If you help them market to a federal agency, you are not advocating, you are marketing," said Gregg Hartley, Cassidy vice chairman and chief operating officer.

Another big source of revenue for firms trying to influence public policy is lobbying on behalf of foreign governments. Firms report these revenues largely under the Foreign Agents Registration Act. But the reports are not as readily available online as LDA reports are, and there can be months-long lags between when a firm registers to lobby for a client and when the public could know.

"The LDA is just the tip of the iceberg," the Center for Public Integrity's Knott said.

Kerry Puts GOP Donor On Defensive (WP)

By Mary Ann Akers

The Washington Post, February 28, 2007

Not that Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) was out for revenge or anything. But he did seem to enjoy at least a small measure of satisfaction in making mega-GOP-donor Sam Fox squirm during yesterday's Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearing to consider Fox's nomination to be ambassador to Belgium.

Fox contributed $50,000 to fund the infamous Swift Boat Veterans for Truth ads that sought to smear Kerry's Vietnam War record in the 2004 presidential campaign.

The panel did not vote on Fox yesterday, but committee member Kerry got in his say. He walked in a bit late and explained that he did not intend "to play some sort of 'gotcha' game," but he wanted to know: How does the nominee feel about the level of "personal destruction" in politics these days?

Fox replied that he was "very concerned" that politics have become too "mean and destructive," especially with the participation of independent "527" groups such as Swift Boat Veterans. He tried not so subtly to redirect Kerry's line of questioning by saying, "Sir, you're a hero," adding that no 527 group "can take that away from you."

Why then, given Fox's dim views of 527s, did he give such a large chunk of money to help Swift Boat? Kerry asked.

Fox explained that he and his wife donate generously to GOP political causes. "When we're asked, we generally give," he said. He said he could not recall who asked for the Swift Boat donation but explained that he thought it was important to give to a 527 working on behalf of Republicans because a 527 "on the other side" was stooping to such low levels as comparing President Bush to Adolf Hitler.

"So two wrongs make a right?" Kerry asked.

Fox said he thought the dirty work of 527 ads was "disgraceful," but "that's the world we live in."

HUD Gets New View Of Who's Homeless (USAT)

By Wendy Koch

USA Today, February 28, 2007

A groundbreaking survey of homelessness being released today found that 704,000 people nationwide sought shelter at least once in a three-month period.

Families with children accounted for one-third of those seeking emergency shelter or transitional housing between February and April 2005, the most recent period studied, according to the report by the Department of Housing and Urban Development. The rest were individuals, mostly adult men. Nearly half were black.

The count covered only those seeking shelter, not people living on the street, so the total number of homeless people would be higher.

"This first-of-its-kind study is a huge leap forward in our understanding of not only how many people are homeless, but also what their needs are," HUD Secretary Alphonso Jackson says. The report says, for example, that at least a quarter are disabled.

DOJ_NMG_0137780

HUD, which briefed USA TODAY on the report Monday, says it is the most comprehensive government estimate ever of homelessness. Previous counts looked only at the number of people homeless on a given day or week.

The three-month figure — equal to the population of South Dakota — is an estimate based on a sample of 80 communities. It will serve as a baseline for annual reports to Congress and may be expanded to include people living on the street.

Martha Burt, a homelessness scholar at the Urban Institute, says the new database has shortcomings. For example, it has limited information about the health of those seeking shelter, and she thinks future versions will have trouble tracking those living on the street.

HUD's report also cites a previously reported one-night survey of hundreds of communities in January 2005. That survey found 754,000 homeless people, including 45% who were living on the street. USA TODAY published its own estimate of 727,000 in October 2005, based on earlier tallies.

The three-month count found that on an average day, 335,000 people sought shelter, but more than twice that number sought shelter at least once during the entire period.

Dennis Culhane, a professor of social policy at the University of Pennsylvania who co-wrote the HUD report, says it's unclear whether homelessness has increased or declined, because past estimates were done differently.

He says poverty among blacks, who are more likely to live in urban areas, runs deeper than for other groups.

Culhane says families with kids have remained a steady one-third of the homeless, and he says government needs to do more to provide housing, such as expanding rent subsidies.

One of every three homeless kids has a diagnosable psychiatric disorder, such as post-traumatic stress, by age 8, says Ellen Bassuk, a psychiatrist who is president of the National Center on Family Homelessness.

"They have trouble sitting still and learning in school," she says.

Nine of 10 homeless mothers have been victims of violence, often domestic, she says.

Michael Stoops, director of the National Coalition for the Homeless welcomes the new count but says more housing and shelters are needed as well as a focus on the root causes of the problem. He says homelessness "can happen to everyone."

Democracy 21 Renews Calls For Doolittle Probe (HILL)

By Susan Crabtree

The Hill, February 28, 2007

Government watchdog group Democracy 21 singled out Rep. John Doolittle (R-Calif.) for special scrutiny yesterday, renewing its call for the ethics committee to conduct an investigation into multiple potential ethics violations by the lawmaker.

Democracy 21 President Fred Wertheimer said there is no evidence that the committee had taken any action about Doolittle in the last Congress even though his group and a series of press reports raised serious questions about whether Doolittle violated House ethics rules. Now that all of the new committee members have been named, Wertheimer wrote in a letter to the panel, it's time the committee conduct an investigation on its own authority into the lawmaker's actions and ties to former lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who is now serving time in jail.

Specifically, Wertheimer points to Doolittle's practice of paying his wife's company a 15 percent commission on all contributions that the company raised for Doolittle's campaign committee and leadership political action committee (PAC) and whether it violated House ethics rules. He also called on the committee to look into whether fees paid to Doolittle's wife, Julie Doolittle, on contributions indicted defense contractor Brent Wilkes and his associates made to his campaign committee and PAC were linked or appeared to be linked to any official action Doolittle took to help Wilkes's company obtain millions of dollars in government earmarks.

Wilkes was recently indicted in connection with the investigation stemming from former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham's (R-Calif.) bribery conviction and jailing.

Doolittle spokesman Richard Robinson said, "This is a phony, left-wing group that is admittedly recycling the same baseless allegations that it has already raised numerous times with the ethics committee to no avail. We don't expect this latest partisan attack to yield any different result because it remains completely without merit."

Wertheimer wants the panel to probe media reports that claim that Doolittle intervened in support of Abramoff's tribal clients in matters involving gambling licenses pending at the Department of the Interior.

Senator's Railway Lobby Link May Have Helped Derail Loan (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson

The Washington Post, February 28, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0137781

The federal government killed a $2.3 billion railway loan after opponents attacked Sen. John Thune (R-S.D.), because he was the railway's lobbyist before winning election and backing legislation favoring the loan to his former client.

The privately held Dakota, Minnesota & Eastern Railroad wanted the money for an 860-mile Midwestern rail-line renovation and expansion project. The Federal Railroad Administration said its denial was based on financial factors. But project backers and detractors said the loan sank after opponents, led by the Mayo Clinic, based in Rochester, Minn., ginned up congressional heat on the agency. The key to that was Thune's role: The Republican did nothing illegal, but his seamless transition from the railway's lobbyist to its Senate champion handed ammunition to opponents and their own lobbyists.

"The legislation that I introduced . . . had been introduced in three previous congresses," Thune said yesterday. Mayo, he said, "had their lobbyists come in and tell me to my face that they were going to go after me."

His previous work for DM&E, as the company is known, "gave them something to attack."

Mayo Clinic chief executive Glenn Forbes disputes that. "Our real interest is in serving patients," he said. "This project put us definitely in a corner with no interest on anybody else's side to understand our concerns. So yes, we certainly confronted the issue."

The local battle over the rail line has raged for nearly a decade. A Mayo-led coalition of opponents says the project would bring increased rail traffic, which could endanger the safety of clinic patients, staff and the Rochester community.

DM&E chief executive Kevin Schieffer and project backers say the line is vital for the region's corn and coal industries. The track running through Rochester was there before Mayo was, Schieffer said, and renovating it would enhance its safety. Schieffer vows to pursue the project, which has surmounted several court and regulatory challenges over the years.

Chris Gade, spokesman for both Mayo and the opponent group known as the Rochester Coalition, said that before the rail-line project gained traction, Mayo had never hired Washington-based lobbyists.

Thune's role in the railroad project was a topic during November elections, and after Democrats won a majority, opposition gathered steam on the Hill.

Thune worked as a DM&E lobbyist for two years, earning more than $200,000 from the company, before winning his Senate seat in 2004. In 2005, he helped write legislation expanding a federal railroad loan pool from $3.5 billion to $35 billion. DM&E was not mentioned in the legislation, but the expanded funding enabled it to apply for $2.3 billion, about one-third of the project's $6 billion price tag.

While DM&E applied for the loan about one year ago, last month the process entered a 90-day period during which the railroads agency must approve or reject it. Opponents and their lobbyists went into high gear. The loan, one PR firm's e-mail read, "is a deal being done in near complete secrecy -- the loan was inserted into the Transportation Appropriations Bill by former DM&E lobbyist turned Senator John Thune, who was paid $160,000 by DM&E the year he ran for the Senate."

Opponents drummed up opposition from a bipartisan group of three dozen legislators, 18 of whom wrote Transportation Secretary Mary Peters questioning the loan. "Asking the taxpayers to fund one of the largest government-funded loans to a private business in our country's history is unjustified, particularly given the lack of transparency," the letter read.

Rep. Tim Walz (D-Minn.), whose opposition to the project helped him win his seat in November, sponsored legislation to assert congressional oversight of the loan. "It's just appalling to me how it was done," he said. "I want to see rail expanded, too, but I want it done correctly. It's about the system and the transparency of government."

On Monday, the railroads administration sent a letter to Schieffer denying the loan. "I read a lot of things for the first time in the official denial letter," he said. "The list is long and deep with supporters, and we are committed to doing everything we can to see it through."

Mayo's Forbes vowed further challenges: "Our commitment would be unwavering," he said.

Looking back, Thune has no regrets, except: "The railroad probably could have done a lot better job on the PR front."

OTHER NEWS:

Wall St. Slide Fuels Worries On Economy (NYT)

By Floyd Norris And Jeremy W. Peters

The New York Times, February 28, 2007

Stock markets around the world plummeted yesterday in a wave of selling set off by a plunge in China that was reinforced by worries of weakening economies. The falling prices continued in early Asian trading today, but by midday the Chinese market seemed to be stabilizing.

DOJ_NMG_0137782

While China was the first market to tumble, it was not clear what set off the selling. But once it began, it spread first to other Asian countries, then to Europe and the United States.

"It was sort of one of those days where somebody snaps their fingers, and the market's hypnotic trance is over," said Stuart Hoffman, chief economist of PNC Financial.

In China, where the stock market had been soaring, the government had warned banks about improper loans to finance stock speculation.

In America, the selling seemed to add to worries that a decline in the housing market, and problems in particular with loans to risky borrowers, could spill over. And a report yesterday indicating that orders for durable goods — items like washing machines and computers — were surprisingly weak in January revived doubts about the strength of the American economy.

Alan Greenspan, the former chairman of the Federal Reserve, in a speech transmitted to a business conference in Hong Kong on Monday, said that he could not rule out a recession in the United States later this year. In so doing, he seemed to distance himself from Ben S. Bernanke, the current Fed chairman, who has been much more upbeat.

Noting that global markets have been strong for years, Mr. Hoffman said: "We've had this 'What me worry?' mentality. And this is a little bit of a wake-up call."

The Dow Jones industrial average fell as much as 546 points yesterday afternoon, before closing down 416.02 points, or 3.29 percent. In percentage terms, it was the worst day for the market since March 2003. In terms of points, it was the steepest slide since the first day the market resumed trading after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks in 2001.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index, the benchmark index for many investors, slid 3.47 percent, and the technology-heavy Nasdaq composite index fell 3.86 percent. All three major indexes erased their gains for the year.

The sell-off left almost every major stock lower, including all 30 stocks in the Dow industrials and all but two in the S.& P. 500 and one in the Nasdaq 100. As the 4 p.m. closing bell finally rang at the New York Stock Exchange, traders on the floor erupted with hearty boos.

At the close, said Howard Silverblatt, an index analyst with Standard & Poor's, the S.& P. 500 had lost $452 billion in market value, and other American stocks had shed an additional $180 billion.

After steady declines in all markets, panic seemed to hit the American market just before 3 p.m., perhaps caused by sell programs that went off at 2:52 p.m., when the S.& P. 500 fell to the point where it was down 3 percent for the day. Within 10 minutes, it had fallen to its low for the day, down 4.3 percent. It ended with a loss of 3.5 percent.

Investors once took such big falls in stride, but in recent years no such thing has happened as volatility has largely evaporated from the market.

There were some technological problems yesterday. Dow Jones, which calculates the Dow industrials, said its system fell behind shortly before 3 p.m., and that a big fall was shown when the backup system came on. But Standard & Poor's, which calculates the S.& P. 500, said it knew of no similar problems with its calculations.

Despite the tumble, the Dow is down only 4.4 percent from its record high reached last week. And the sell-off was not severe enough to set off any of the circuit breakers the New York Stock Exchange has put in place to help minimize big losses.

One sign of the nature of the sell-off was what went up. United States Treasury prices soared, and yields fell, as some investors sought safety.

"Treasuries rally, the stock market sells," said Ethan Harris, chief United States economist for Lehman Brothers. "It's kind of a classic risk-aversion reaction."

If the rout in the markets is sustained, it will be the first major test for Mr. Bernanke. Two weeks ago, he said the Fed saw inflation as a greater threat than economic weakness.

"You've got a certain cavalierness about market-driven economic signals from the new academic-driven Fed," said Robert Barbera, the chief economist of ITG, an advisory firm.

Mr. Barbera said that Mr. Greenspan gave more attention to market indicators than Mr. Bernanke has.

The selling yesterday began in Shanghai, which had hit a record on Monday. But in tumultuous trading yesterday, the Shanghai composite index plunged nearly 9 percent.

Stephen Green, a senior economist and stock market analyst working in Shanghai for Standard Chartered Bank, said the market fundamentals had not changed drastically in recent weeks, adding that the stock markets in China tended to be volatile, particularly after reaching record highs.

"People are just on edge," he said. "It's very possible in two weeks we'll be right back up there."

The sell-off in China started a few hours before an explosion was reported at an American base in Afghanistan. It killed several people but did not injure Vice President Dick Cheney, who was inside the base at the time.

DOJ_NMG_0137783

Chinese markets stabilized in Wednesday morning trading, with the main Shanghai market index up a quarter of a percent and the main Shenzhen market index up 4 hundredths of a percent.

Other Asian markets — Singapore, Australia, New Zealand, the Philippines and Indonesia — which had all shrugged off Tuesday's decline in Shanghai, dropped sharply on Wednesday morning in response to the heavy selling in Europe and New York.

The Topix index in Tokyo fell 3.45 percent on Wednesday morning while the Hang Seng Index fell 3.37 percent in Hong Kong.

Of Tuesday's trading, Mr. Barbera of ITG said, "People are unwinding the carry trade." In that trade, which has been very popular with hedge funds, traders borrowed yen, at very low interest rates, and then invested the money in assets in other countries.

"Now you try to get closer to shore," said Mr. Barbera, saying that traders had sold investments and used the proceeds to repay their yen borrowings.

From Shanghai, Tremors Heard Around The World (NYT)

By David Barboza

The New York Times, February 28, 2007

SHANGHAI, Feb. 27 — In China's wild cowboy stock market, record-breaking run-ups have been followed by mini-crashes that have been largely confined within this country's borders.

But on Tuesday, China's worst one-day tumble in a decade set off a tumult that rolled through markets around the globe, from Tokyo to Frankfurt to Brazil to Wall Street.

Speculative frenzy had lifted the Shanghai composite index above the 3,000-point milestone on Monday and then gave way to a tumultuous sell-off on Tuesday that sent shares plummeting nearly 9 percent.

The downturn shattered all sorts of records, and analysts said there was no clear reason for Tuesday's severe drop in Shanghai, equivalent to a 1,100-point drop in the Dow Jones industrial average. But the Chinese stock market was rife with rumors that the government was considering new measures to tame the world's hottest stock market before a bubble developed.

To many investors and analysts here, however, the extensive sell-off was just the latest indication that share prices in China had often become unhinged from the broader economy. Millions of everyday investors rushed blindly into stocks, emptying out their savings account to "play the market," as many of them say.

Perhaps the most remarkable sign of the recent irrational exuberance underpinning China's stock markets was that during the last year, when a company announced bad news, its stock price shot through the roof.

Early this year, for instance, when a group of 17 Chinese companies was cited by regulators for misappropriating corporate funds, their stock prices all skyrocketed. When the Tianjin Global Magnetic Card Company failed to report quarterly earnings last April, its stock doubled.

Tuesday was different, though. With shares in Shanghai tumbling, stocks listed in Shenzhen also collapsed, falling 9.3 percent. In Hong Kong, the benchmark Hang Seng index fell 1.76 percent, and in Japan, the Nikkei dropped about half a point, to 18,119.92.

The volatility of Shanghai sometimes produced unusual results. Shares of the Industrial and Commercial Bank of China, which went public simultaneously on the Shanghai and Hong Kong stock markets last October, performed very differently on the two markets, for example. I.C.B.C. shares dropped 8 percent on Tuesday in Shanghai but just 1.8 percent in Hong Kong.

But with stocks in Hong Kong reacting on Wednesday morning to the global sell-off, I.C.B.C. shares dropped 3.7 percent on Wednesday morning in Hong Kong but rose two-tenths of a percent in Shanghai.

None of the world's major stock markets have been as volatile as that of China, where people refer to the stock market as "dubo ji," or the slot machine. The gyrations have become almost commonplace for a stock market that suffered through a five-year depression until 2006, when it rose more than 130 percent, the world's best performance.

The Chinese government, however, is worried about an over-reaction that could produce a bubble and then a crash that could send bankrupt investors into the streets in protest.

Analysts say that at least in some cases, the stocks of tainted companies have risen because the companies were viewed as shedding old problems and starting anew. Still, some of those problems reflect deep cultural attitudes and are unlikely to be fixed overnight.

Analysts also argue that the market has been running up because of stronger fundamentals, rising profits, improved regulation and oversight by officials, and confidence in the market's long-term prospects.

DOJ_NMG_0137784

But in this current run of market mania, even corruption appears to be a buy signal. That was the case for the Shanghai Bailian Group, which reported on Dec. 29 that its chairman was under investigation for fraud. The company's shares have climbed 45 percent since then.

Two weeks ago, after the chairman of the Shanghai Hai Niao Enterprise Development Company was detained, his company's shares rose 15 percent.

"There's just too much liquidity out there, too much," says Chang Chun, a financial reform expert at the China Europe International Business School in Shanghai. "This is a psychological thing."

China's stock market system is still relatively immature, and trustworthy information about a company's performance is still hard to come by. So the average investor does little or no research.

Just to find names of stocks to buy is a task for new investors. So if they see even a mention in the press, positive or negative, they start buying. If alert investors are lucky, they might get a tip. If state television mentions a company, it must be worth something, and if they don't catch the full story, they at least have a name.

"If I hear a stock mentioned on the TV news I will pay attention to it," says Xu Xiaochen, a 55-year-old retiree.

In any case, many investors here seem to believe that the secret to picking stocks is luck and confidence in the government, not the fundamentals of any particular company.

"I don't know how to choose a stock," says a 61-year-old retiree who gave her name as Miss Hou at a local brokerage house a few weeks ago. "But I trust those technology companies. Maybe the names of some companies sound lucky to me, so I choose to buy these stocks."

Government officials began cautioning several weeks ago against "blind optimism" in the stock market. Banks were ordered to stop making loans to people who were speculating in the market. Trading volumes have been so high that the Shanghai Stock Exchange recently warned that the country's electronic trading system could be destabilized.

Stock prices fell sharply for four straight days in early February as investors seemed to contemplate the possibility of an overheated market.

After a brief pause, they rushed in again. Foreign money is also piling in, according to JPMorgan, and hardly an analyst is willing to bet against the stock market.

"You can't be a fundamental investor in China," said Michael Pettis, a professor of finance at Peking University. "You can only speculate."

Mr. Pettis, who has long been a market skeptic here, is now raising a fund to invest in Chinese stocks, based on his projections of the inflow that will push up prices.

"There's a huge amount of money in the banking system with nowhere to go," he said. "I think you're going to see that money getting out of the banking system."

Mutual funds are also helping some individual investors, while others are scrambling into initial offerings, which over the last year have had a strong opening-day track record.

Of the 15 companies that went public on the Shanghai Stock Exchange, 12 of them experienced opening-day rises of more than 10 percent.

Now, regulators are seeing a growing number of stock frauds directed at small investors. And Chinese officials worry that investors are still relying on a welfare state — which is increasingly disappearing — to take care of them.

As for the companies that are seeing their stock prices climb despite their troubles, they may be hard pressed for explanations, but nonetheless defend the phenomenon.

"The stock is the stock, and the C.E.O. is the C.E.O.," said a woman working in the executive office at Shanghai Haixin Group after she acknowledged that the chief executive was under investigation. "As for our C.E.O.'s bad news, yes, it happened. But it is outdated and not newsworthy at all. As for the stock price, we don't know either."

China Volatility Sparks U.S. Sell-off (USAT)

By Adam Shell And John Waggoner

USA Today, February 28, 2007

NEW YORK — If stock investors were complacent, they're not anymore.

U.S. stocks, overdue for a nasty fall after seven months of uninterrupted gains, got their comeuppance Tuesday amid a global sell-off that began in China, spread to Europe and ended with a minicrash on Wall Street that left investors nursing their biggest losses since 9/11 — and wondering if the worst is over.

For weeks, stock gurus have warned that the Dow Jones industrial average's longest run without a 2% correction since 1954 was worrisome: Some negative catalyst was bound to spook investors and start a selling frenzy.

DOJ_NMG_0137785

The selling spark came Tuesday across the globe in China, a highflying market with a speculative zeal rivaling the '90s dot-com stock gold rush. Shanghai's benchmark index plunged nearly 9% amid fears the Chinese government is moving to squash speculation in stocks.

The Dow swooned in response, falling as much as 546 points at one point, before closing down 416.02 points, or 3.3%, at 12,216.24. It was the Dow's seventh-worst point decline and worst since Sept. 17, 2001, the day U.S. markets reopened after the Sept. 11 attacks.

Chinese share prices were up slightly in afternoon training today. Shares in Japan, Australia and Seoul, meanwhile, fell more than 3%.

There was no shortage of theories on Wall Street as to the sell-off's cause.

New York-based investment manager Michael Holland said, "The China story was a great excuse to sell. Down 9% was a number the market could focus on."

Chris Orndorff, a portfolio manager at Payden & Rygel, called it a "self-fulfilling prophecy. … Everyone was expecting a pullback, so when it came, a lot of people sold into the downdraft." Orndorff says investors with cash on the sidelines might want to start looking to buy stocks that are now selling at lower prices.

Hugh Johnson, chief investment officer at Johnson Illington Advisors, says scary declines anywhere in the world cause panic selling: "The transmission mechanism for selling is clearly psychological."

Mark Headley, portfolio manager of Matthews Pacific Tiger fund, says it's not all about China. "This is more about the vulnerability of the U.S. economy," he says: A 9% decline in an index that was up 44% in 2007 on top of a 110% gain in 2006, was not surprising and, therefore, should not have warranted such a big sell-off here.

The rapid cooling of the Chinese market, coupled with a U.S. report showing a bigger-than-expected drop in orders of durable goods, raised fears that two of the world's best-performing economies were in danger of slowing. It also added credence to a statement made a day earlier by former Federal Reserve chairman Alan Greenspan that a recession could not be ruled out in the USA.

Says Milton Ezrati, senior strategist at money management firm Lord Abbett: "When the two engines of world growth look like they might disappoint, that is enough to scare most investors."

Wall Street economists have also warned that serious economic dislocations could result from the fallout from the weak housing market. Similarly, signs of mounting distress in the subprime mortgage market could also pose a danger to stocks.

Still, Bush administration officials Tuesday reiterated that the U.S. economy is in good shape. Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson briefed President Bush on the market decline, the White House said.

"The president's economic advisers are keeping an eye on the markets. We believe that the economic fundamentals in the U.S. economy are sound," said White House spokesman Tony Fratto.

Despite the reassuring words, many investors are no doubt wondering if Tuesday's free fall is the beginning of something more serious, such as a 1987-style crash.

"No," says James Stack, editor of InvesTech Research, in Whitefish, Mont. "We don't have the triggers for a crash."

In the 1987 stock market crash, for example, the Dow fell 508 points, or 23%, in a single day. But events leading up to the crash were far more unpleasant: The yield on the 10-year Treasury note rose to 10.23% in October 1987 from 8.83% at the start of the year. Short-term interest rates were rising at the fastest pace in four years, and the dollar was falling on international currency markets. "We don't have those pressures today," Stack says.

Valuations today are almost 50% below the sky-high price-earnings ratios (company's stock price divided by its earnings per share) in early 2000 — the last time the market plunged — with stocks trading at less than 16 times estimated earnings. The 10-year T-note yields fell to 4.52% Tuesday from 4.63% Monday. Gross domestic product grew at a robust 3.5% pace in the fourth quarter of 2006 and 3.4% for the entire year. Inflation remains tame at 2.1%.

Stack is still cautious. Tuesday's decline "is simply bringing investor expectations back to reality." Adds Joseph Quinlan, chief market strategist at Bank of America: "I don't think we are set up for something dramatic, like a 10% correction."

Investors should get used to more sharp up-and-down swings, says Tim Swanson, chief investment officer for the National City Private Client Group.

Tuesday's "market action has no doubt left many asking, 'Is this the beginning of the end?' The short answer is: We don't think so, … but rather (it was) an important reminder that volatility won't stay low forever. After a very long period of low volatility, it is easy to get lulled into a false sense of security."

Swanson says investors shouldn't be surprised if there is more volatility. He's sticking with his moderately bullish stance because he doesn't believe the underlying fundamentals have changed.

The prime mover in the Chinese meltdown was the market reserved primarily for the Chinese, known as A shares.

DOJ_NMG_0137786

"Those were the ones going crazy," says Raymond Mui, senior portfolio manager for Acadian Asset Management in Boston. The Chinese A shares rocketed 128% last year. "Chinese citizens were borrowing to buy into the stock market, and the government was clamping down on that," Mui says. "That's why you see the drop."

The National People's Congress, which meets next week, is widely expected to pass measures to dampen speculation. This week, the Chinese government required banks to increase their reserves to 10%, up from 9.5%, which makes less money available for loans.

The Chinese weren't the only ones pouring money into their local stock market. Investors poured a record $23 billion into U.S. emerging-markets funds last year, about half of which went to China funds. So far this year, an additional $6.8 billion has gone into emerging-markets funds, $715 million of which went to China funds, says EmergingPortfolio.com, which tracks fund flows.

The rush to emerging markets reflects a worldwide reach for higher returns than developed markets could offer, says Jerry Webman, chief economist at OppenheimerFunds. With those higher returns comes higher risks.

Big international funds took a hit Tuesday: American Funds EuroPacific Growth, which has $99 billion in assets, fell 3.2%. China-focused funds fell more. Fidelity China Region dropped 3.7%, and Dreyfus Premier Greater China Growth A fell 4.9%. Specialty exchange-traded funds really took it on the chin. IShares FTSE/Xinhua China 25 index fund fell 9.9%.

The Dow's decline of 3.3% wasn't nearly as severe. But that's not to say there weren't scary moments. Around 3 p.m. ET, the Dow appeared to drop 151 points in one minute. It happened with incredible swiftness because of a computer glitch that kept some trades in the Dow's 30 stocks from being immediately reflected.

Dow Jones, the media company that manages the flagship index, said that around 2 p.m. it discovered computers were not properly calculating trades. The company blamed the problem on heavy volume and switched to a backup computer. The result: a massive swoon in the index that happened in the seconds it took Dow Jones to switch to its secondary computers.

Measured by percentage loss, Tuesday's Dow decline looks much less threatening. It was the 37th-largest percentage loss since 1950, Stack says, and ranks at 237 since 1900. "In historical terms, it's pretty mild," he says.

One money manager who specializes in Chinese stocks says investors must put the decline in perspective. "If you want a guide to what's going on in China, the Chinese stock market is the last place to look," says Edmund Harriss, portfolio manager of the Guinness Atkinson Asia Focus fund. "It's a very thin market." Investors there tend to buy and sell according to price movements, not fundamentals, Harriss says. "We're seeing a technical pullback which, while significant, has to be seen in the context of the market more than doubling in the past 12 months."

Hu Xingdou, professor of economics at Beijing Institute of Technology, agrees: "The forecast for the stock market looks good over the next year. The Chinese economy is still growing, the state-owned companies are changing for the better, and stock prices remain relatively low."

The scary plunge did remind people that stocks don't go up in a straight line forever. "We'll get a sudden renewal of appreciation for risk," says Jack Ablin, chief investment officer at Harris Private Bank.

So where do we go from here? Orndorff won't rule out a "relief rally," but he advises monitoring how Asian markets react today to the heavy selling on Wall Street.

"The whole world is watching," says Headley.

US Durable Goods Orders Slide (FT)

By Eoin Callan In Washington A

Financial Times, February 28, 2007

US industrial investment appeared to have slowed at the start of this year as figures released on Tuesday showed a steep fall in demand for capital goods.

There was an unexpected drop in orders of durable goods across industry sectors as demand slid by a record 8 per cent to $204bn in January. The biggest monthly fall ever recorded underlined the continued risks to US economic growth from weak domestic business demand, which has lagged behind consumer spending.

The sluggish industrial activity highlights the US economy's reliance on consumers to sustain the growth of 2.5-3 per cent expected by the Federal Reserve this year.

The central bank has a fundamentally benign analysis of the US economy that sees growth recovering and inflation moderating, with interest rates on hold at 5.25 per cent for some time.

But the surprisingly cool demand for industrial goods revealed on Tuesday added to a chill that swept through global markets, as investors priced in an increasing likelihood that the Fed would be forced to cut interest rates.

DOJ_NMG_0137787

The thin order books also prompted Wall Street economists to revisit their forecasts for growth for the first quarter, following already severely reduced expectations for growth last quarter.

Haseeb Ahmed, an economist at JPMorgan, said: “The weakness in orders points to softness ahead for manufacturing and sluggish capital spending. The weakness was broad-based and points to clear risk to our forecasts.”

The fall in orders was led by big drops in demand in volatile sectors such as aircraft, which fell 59 per cent.

Demand for capital goods excluding defence and aircraft orders fell 6 per cent, while orders for motor vehicles and parts dropped 5.1 per cent. However, there were signs of renewed vigour among American consumers, who defied expectations and saw increased confidence this month, according to a private survey by the Conference Board.

There were signs of tentative stability in the housing market as sales of existing homes rose by 3 per cent last month, the biggest rise in two years.

Sales increased to 6.46m last month from 6.27m the previous month, according to the National Association of Realtors. But the median price of a home fell by 3.1 per cent to $210,600 from a year ago. The Fed is cautiously optimistic that the housing market is levelling out.

Durable-Goods Orders Plunged 7.8% In January (WSJ)

By Christopher Conkey

The Wall Street Journal, February 28, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Orders for computers, machinery and other durable goods plunged in January, an indication that this year's outlook for modest economic growth may be making businesses cautious about their capital-spending plans.

Meanwhile, existing-home sales rose last month as lower prices and generous incentives lured some buyers back into the market. But economists say it will be tough to determine whether the housing market has reached a bottom before the spring selling season arrives.

The Commerce Department said new orders for durable goods fell 7.8% in January following a 2.8% increase in December, largely because there were fewer orders for transportation equipment. Boeing Co., for example, received 39 orders for new planes in January, down from an unusually large 212 in December. After two exceptionally strong years in which it secured more than 1,000 new orders per year, the Chicago-based aerospace giant expects to receive roughly half that number this year.

Economists tend to ignore transportation-led fluctuations in overall durable goods orders as long as underlying measures are solid. But that wasn't the case with yesterday's data.

Orders excluding transportation fell 3.1%, and orders for non-defense capital goods excluding aircraft -- a closely watched proxy for future business investment -- dropped 6.0% last month, the second decline in three months. The data suggest many companies are hesitant to plow their profits into such growth-enabling investments as structures and equipment, a trend that emerged late last year and appears to be continuing.

"We started to see some signs late in 2006 that the momentum in business equipment investment wasn't as bullish as it was earlier in the year," said Brian Bethune, U.S. economist at consulting firm Global Insight. "Now the momentum has diminished."

After increasing at an inflation-adjusted annual rate of 7.7% in the third quarter last year, business investment in equipment and software fell at a 1.8% rate in the fourth quarter. Today, the government will release its updated estimate of the economy's fourth-quarter growth, and economists expect the initial tally of a 3.5% inflation-adjusted growth rate to be lowered to between 2% and 2.5%, mostly because of weaker-than-expected inventory accumulation and higher imports.

John J. Castellani, president of the Business Roundtable, whose members are big-company chief executives, said concerns over the future course of economic growth are making some companies cautious. These worries have been reflected in the group's quarterly surveys of CEOs. In December, 39% of CEOs surveyed said their company's capital spending would increase over the next six months, down from 56% a year earlier.

If sustained, weak business spending would impose another drag on the economy at a time when pullbacks in residential investment and manufacturing production are already weighing on growth. It would also come as a surprise to economists since most have assumed businesses will spend freely after a year of record-breaking profit margins. Federal Reserve policy makers are also forecasting solid gains in capital spending this year.

Meanwhile, the National Association of Realtors said existing-home sales rose 3.0% in January to a rate of 6.46 million units, or 4.3% below year-ago levels. The median sales price was $210,600 last month, down 3.1% from a year earlier. The inventory of unsold homes on the market was unchanged last month at a 6.6-month supply.

DOJ_NMG_0137788

The combination of lower prices, reasonable interest rates and warm weather spurred home buying activity in January, and a cold spell in February could depress sales. The key question is whether buyers will come out in force this spring, enabling sellers to lift prices and builders to reduce unsold inventories without further production cuts.

"We shouldn't be surprised to see a near-term sales dip, but that will be followed by continuing recovery in home sales," predicted David Lereah, the Realtors' chief economist.

Separately, the Conference Board, a New York-based research group, said its index of consumer confidence rose to 112.5 this month from 110.2 in January, as consumers' assessments of economic conditions, including the availability of jobs, improved.

Write to Christopher Conkey at christopher.conkey@wsj.com1

Economists Worry As Businesses Tighten Spending (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, February 28, 2007

WASHINGTON — Businesses are showing little appetite for investment in items such as heavy machinery and computers, a trend that is likely acting as a drag on the economy.

A proxy for business investment fell at the fastest rate in three years in January, according to a report out Tuesday. New orders for capital goods, excluding defense and aircraft, fell 6% in January after adjusting for seasonal variations. That was the third drop in four months and the biggest since January 2004, the Commerce Department said.

While the numbers are notoriously volatile, the sharp drop last month raised concern among investors and economists that businesses are stepping on the brakes.

"This trend is not something that makes one comfortable about the strength of the economy," Naroff Economic Advisors President Joel Naroff said in a note to clients.

The data follow other reports that have shown businesses may be growing more cautious.

Business investment fell in the fourth quarter for the first time since early 2003, according to government data. A survey of 446 chief financial officers in November showed businesses expected to increase investment by less than 5% in the next year, a drop from a 7.5% gain they forecast in June, according to the study by Duke University and CFO magazine. A survey of CEOs by the Business Roundtable also has shown a decline in spending expectations.

And while more than 40% of manufacturers said in a Federal Reserve Bank of Philadelphia survey in January that they expected to increase investment, 21.7% said they planned to reduce investment, the biggest number since the question was first asked in January 2004.

A number of factors are making businesses scale back spending, says John Graham, a finance professor and director of the CFO survey at Duke University's business school. Interest rates have increased and energy costs, although off the record highs hit last year, are still elevated. Businesses are also watching how the slowdown in housing affects consumers.

Companies "are just going to be cautious in that environment," Graham says. "The last thing they want to do is build the extra capacity and they (later) find it is not needed."

The caution comes even though business balance sheets are in good shape, according to the Federal Reserve. Companies' financial assets were up 4% in the third quarter from the prior year, the latest data.

Business investment accounts for about 11% of U.S. economic activity vs. 70% for consumer spending. But business investment is still important to watch as a barometer of how company owners are feeling about the economy, which can influence hiring, salaries and other factors that can affect consumers, Union Bank of California senior economist Keitaro Matsuda says.

"Their sentiment is reflected in their buying and purchasing patterns," he says.

Recession Unlikely This Year, Many Economists Say (LAT)

By Molly Hennessy-Fiske And Lisa Girion

The Los Angeles Times, February 28, 2007

WASHINGTON — The dreaded R-word — recession — is back in play, contributing to Tuesday's stock market plunge.

But is recession a real possibility?

Many analysts say recession is unlikely this year, that Tuesday's market sell-off was long anticipated and would be short-lived as the economy rebounds from a housing slump. Also helping the economy are renewed consumer and business spending, a strong but not overheated labor market and possible intervention by the Federal Reserve, analysts say.

DOJ_NMG_0137789

"The economy is percolating along pretty well except for the housing sector," said Edward Leamer, director of the UCLA Anderson Forecast, adding, "We don't see anything in the data that we monitor that suggests the economy is having any real trouble."

Stanford University economist John Taylor said that Tuesday's stock market drop might restore some volatility to what has been an unusually stable stock market, but that it was not a reflection of economic troubles.

"If you look at the overall economy, both U.S. and global, you see continued growth," Taylor said.

Former Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan brought the R-word back Monday, suggesting a recession could come by year's end. And recent data, including a surprisingly weak durable-goods report Tuesday, suggest the economy has not rebounded as strongly as some analysts had expected.

Nouriel Roubini, chairman of Roubini Global Economics in New York and a professor of economics at New York University, had predicted a recession to begin in the first or second quarter of this year and said Tuesday's market downturn provided more evidence of impending trouble. The government today is also expected to sharply lower its estimate for growth in last year's fourth quarter, down to 2.5% from 3.5% last month.

"We have lousy economic news," said Roubini, a former White House and Treasury Department economist. "It's just the beginning of much worse things to come."

With the recovery now 5 years old — long in the tooth by most economic standards — such warnings are not easily dismissed. But other analysts drew a distinction Tuesday between the slow growth they're seeing and conditions that could tip the economy into recession.

"Recession is becoming in my opinion a rather rare event, because the government has learned to manage the economy better," said Keitaro Matsuda, senior economist at Union Bank of California in San Francisco.

Matsuda said he didn't see the economy slipping into negative growth "any time soon."

"We don't see that happening in our forecast," said Kenneth Beauchemin, U.S. economist with Global Insight in Lexington, Mass. "Productivity growth has slowed down, but it hasn't been terrible and we expect it to pick up again. And there's still some slack in labor markets."

Beauchemin said that although unemployment remained a low 4.6% nationally, employers had been posting openings more slowly.

And Tuesday's data showed signs that the housing slump might be ending. The National Assn. of Realtors reported that sales of previously owned homes rose 3% since January, the largest gain in two years.

Beauchemin expects growth to post a "decent" 3% this year.

A recent decline in interest rates, helped by Tuesday's sharp bond market rally, raises another possibility: that the Fed might come to the slowing economy's rescue and cut rates. Concerns about possible blowups in the sub-prime mortgage market also could encourage the Fed to cut rates after pausing last summer in its two-year campaign of raising interest rates to fight inflation.

"There's going to be more and more talk about the economy being weak and the prospects for the Fed lowering interest rates," said Ed Yardeni, president of Yardeni Research in New York.

Yardeni said recession talk "has been brewing" among analysts this year, and Greenspan simply brought it to the fore, catching markets by surprise. Yardeni expects the government to report today that fourth-quarter growth fell to 2% but said it would rebound to 3% by year's end as consumers continue to spend, making a recession "not possible" this year.

Consumer confidence rose to a 5 1/2 -year high this month, with the Conference Board's index up to 112.5 from 110.2 in January.

"My view is, so far the economy continues to demonstrate that it's remarkably resilient," Yardeni said.

Although the Commerce Department reported Tuesday that new orders for durable goods fell by 7.8% in January after a December gain of 2.8%, Yardeni called the data "volatile" — not enough to stake a recession on.

Businesses have been dialing back spending, attempting to sell existing inventories, said Bernard Baumohl, managing director of Economic Outlook Group in Princeton Junction, N.J.

"That is not necessarily an indication that the economy is in trouble," Baumohl said.

Financial Experts Say Investors Shouldn't Panic (LAT)

By Martin Zimmerman

The Los Angeles Times, February 28, 2007

Don't panic. That's what financial planners were advising clients today as they tried to cope with the worst day for the stock market in almost four years.

DOJ_NMG_0137790

It seemed the perfect day to hit the "sell" button. Stock markets around the world were tumbling and safe havens such as gold were taking a beating. But dumping stocks in the heat of the moment -- even one this hot -- wouldn't be prudent, financial advisors say.

"It's best to try to take the emotions out of market decisions," said financial planner Victoria Collins of the Keller Group in Irvine. "If your assets allocation is clear and you're confident about it, you should be able to ride out market fluctuations like this."

Of course, that assumes you have a clear asset allocation plan. Market meltdowns are painful reminders that an investment mix of stocks and bonds that matches an investor's risk profile and savings needs is crucial, pros said. Indeed, while stocks were suffering around the world today, U.S. government bond investors were enjoying a banner day.

"Days like today can be scary for people, but the focus on the long term and building a portfolio is still important," said Paul Herbert, senior mutual fund analyst at Morningstar Inc. "And on days like this, people get a reminder of just how important they are."

As a general rule, advisors tell their clients to lighten up on stocks as they get closer to retirement and move more money into bonds.

Fixed-income investments typically are less volatile than stocks, making it less likely that investors will suffer a blow that can't be recouped within the shorter time frame of their retirement years. Bonds can also provide a steady stream of income for retirees suddenly without a regular paycheck.

But advisors caution that forsaking stocks completely would be a mistake -- even for older investors and even on days like today. With people living longer and retirement expenses such as health care growing, the added boost that stocks can give a portfolio is essential, even for investors well into their 60s.

"The old rule of thumb of switching to 100% fixed income when you retire doesn't make any sense these days," Collins said.

Anatomy Of A Wall Street Freefall (WP)

By Tomoeh Murakami Tse

The Washington Post, February 28, 2007

The dramatic drop in U.S. stocks began yesterday when sharp declines in the Chinese market triggered a global equities sell-off. News of a larger-than-expected drop in durable-goods orders heightened skittishness, even before the U.S. markets opened.

By the end of the day, the Dow Jones industrial average had suffered its largest one-day decline in percentage since 2003, dropping 416.02, or 3.3 percent, to 12,216.24. The sharpest decline occurred shortly before 3 p.m., when the Dow dropped 200 points -- triggered by a technological glitch that caused a backlog of trades to be calculated at nearly the same time.

The Nasdaq composite index dropped 96.66, or 3.9 percent, to 2407.86. The broader Standard & Poor's 500-stock index lost 50.33, or 3.5 percent, to 1399.04.

The slide in U.S. shares erased about $600 billion in market value. Following losses last week, the blue-chip average erased all its gains for the year so far.

In early trading, even as the Dow dropped 100 points, many analysts shrugged off the decline, saying such fluctuations were not surprising and were relatively small, given that the Dow has gained 10,000 points since the Black Monday crash of 1987.

But after the rapid descent that put the Dow down more than 540 points, the tension increased, and traders speculated about what had caused the afternoon plunge.

"You have to figure . . . there must have been someone very large who got out," said Chris Low, chief economist with FTN Financial. "Every single market is down. I've rarely seen such a sell-off."

Analysts and economists said a number of factors contributed to the market's slide. "It starts out with the Chinese government saying they're going to crack down on speculators," Low said.

Every sector was affected, but among the hardest hit were commodities, which were riding high based on the belief that demand from China would only grow. The materials, energy and technology sectors were also knocked down, while emerging-market companies and riskier small-cap stocks took a hit as investors fled to safer turf, such as bonds.

The Russell 2000 index of smaller companies fell 3.8 percent, to close at 792.66.

With the markets awash in cash, investors have been willing to venture out to riskier investments, a trend that had to reverse at some point, analysts said. Yesterday, they were turning to safer investments. "Treasuries were up, large-cap stocks are off 1 percent, emerging markets are down several percent," said Jerry A. Webman, chief economist at OppenheimerFunds. "By the time you get to Shanghai, you're off 8.5 percent. There is a flight to quality."

DOJ_NMG_0137791

Declining stocks outnumbered winners by more than 6 to 1 on the New York Stock Exchange; 4.3 billion shares were traded, compared with 2.8 billion Monday.

Some market strategists said they were holding off on buying, seeing a potential for larger drops. Others characterized the retreat as a long-overdue correction and good for a market still fundamentally strong. They said recent increases in oil prices, geopolitical events in the Mideast and growing concern about the subprime-mortgage market combined to set off the market downturn.

"The trick is for real investors not to overreact," Webman said. "The last thing people want to do in this kind of environment is get off their long-term financial plans."Movers

U.S. Steel shares dropped $7.39, to $86.51.

Apple fell $4.72, to $83.93, after delaying the launch of Apple TV.

Caterpilla r dropped $2.43, to $64.83.

Walt Disney Co. fell $2.01, to $33.10.

Credit Correction (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 28, 2007

Any equity selloff as large as yesterday's will produce a multitude of explanations. Among other culprits, we heard about "overbought" Chinese stocks that were due for a correction, a weak durable goods report, the Kabul explosion aimed at Vice President Dick Cheney (see below), and former Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan for declaring Monday that a "recession" was possible later this year.

Our own "whodunit" contribution would point to the mortgage-related markets, which sold off nearly as much as stocks. This reflects the cracks appearing in the housing credit markets, especially in subprime loans but with some damage up the income chain as well. Along with emerging markets such as China, this is where the excesses have been most notable. And when Adam Smith does a house cleaning like yesterday's, he sweeps the dirtiest corners first.

The question is whether this is a forecast or merely a correction. As evidence of the latter, we'd point to Mr. Greenspan, whose Monday remarks seem to have been over-interpreted as a recession prediction. In the same discussion, we're told, he called the world economy "benign and stable." Nonetheless, we'd also note that Mr. Greenspan's predecessor as Fed Chairman, Paul Volcker, didn't muse about recession dangers after he left office in the 1980s. He didn't want to complicate Mr. Greenspan's monetary task at the time.

We also wouldn't make too much of one month's decline in durable goods. These are notoriously volatile, especially in transportation, which was way down in January. Today's report on fourth quarter GDP is also widely expected to be revised downward from the original 3.5%. But much of that revision may be due to an inventory work off, which bodes better for growth going forward. The labor market remains strong, if slowing from the rapid pace of job growth in 2006.

The bigger risks continue to be political and monetary. The era of tax cutting has ended with the arrival of the Democratic Congress, and other policy errors are possible (see further below). As for the Fed, we'd feel better if current Chairman Ben Bernanke had been running a tighter monetary policy for the last year; it might have left him with more policy room if the economy does turn sour. As it is, any easing now runs the risk of a dollar rout, which could lead to an even larger loss of confidence and selloff.

The current problems in the housing credit markets owe a great deal already to the Fed's mistake in keeping monetary policy too easy for too long during the late Greenspan era. We now have to ride them out, and Mr. Bernanke shouldn't make them worse with a panicky, premature easing.

Economy Appears Headed For A Period Of Turbulence (MCT)

By Kevin G. Hall

McClatchy Newspapers, February 28, 2007

WASHINGTON - Tuesday's stock market plunge shows the start of a "correction," the age-old euphemism for a steep drop in stock prices, but it may also signal worse news than that.

A steady stream of recent data shows mixed signals about where the U.S. economy is headed. The old sage himself, Alan Greenspan, suggests recession could be looming.

Fasten your seat belts - some economic chop could be coming.

The Dow Jones industrial index fell more than 416 points, or 3.29 percent, in trading Tuesday. The tech-heavy Nasdaq composite was off by 3.86 percent, and the S&P 500 was off by 3.47 percent. It was the largest one-day drop for markets since Sept. 17, 2001, the first day trading resumed after the Sept. 11 terror attacks

DOJ_NMG_0137792

Tuesday's drops mirrored a global decline in stock markets as the investor mood turned bearish. Investors, who have been murmuring about a coming "correction" for weeks, are concerned that the U.S. and Chinese economies may be entering a period of cooling.

The drop underscores how connected the U.S. economy is now with the broader global economy. U.S. exchanges sank following a nearly 9 percent drop Tuesday on China's Shanghai Composite Index. It was the Shanghai's biggest one-day drop in a decade, and investors worried that interest rates may soon rise to douse China's sizzling economic growth.

Higher lending rates in China matter to average Americans. Most large American corporations either manufacture there or purchase from Chinese contract manufacturers. Higher lending rates in China would slow economic activity there and raise the cost of doing business. The costs could be passed back to Americans as pricier imported goods.

Adding to the economic uncertainty, oil prices are climbing again, due in part to the Bush administration's escalating war of words with Iran. Just weeks ago, some analysts projected a return to $40-a-barrel oil, but it now trades around $60 a barrel. AAA reports that unleaded gasoline averaged $2.37 a gallon nationwide on Tuesday, compared with $2.14 a month ago.

Other economic data are sending, at best, mixed signals.

The Commerce Department reported on Tuesday a 7.8 percent decline for orders of durable goods in January. It was the biggest dip in demand for business equipment in three years. The Manufacturers Alliance/MAPI said the drop was felt across industries such as transportation, high tech and industrial metals.

"There is no escaping the observation ... that growth in the manufacturing sector ground to a halt in September 2006 and continues to struggle as consumers rethink big-ticket spending and businesses turn risk adverse in their capital spending," said Daniel J. Meckstroth, the trade association's chief economist.

But the Conference Board reported Tuesday that consumer confidence in January jumped unexpectedly to its highest level since August 2001. And in another surprising announcement, the National Association of Realtors reported that existing home sales in January rose by 3 percent, the largest monthly jump in two years.

That good housing news, however, was tempered by concern about delinquent mortgages. The Mortgage Bankers Association reports that 3.8 percent of all adjustable-rate sub-prime mortgages are in foreclosure proceedings, up from about 3 percent in 2005.

"It's not a great number, but it's enough to make a dent on the sales numbers, so we'll see (home) sales continue to drop through the end of this year," said Patrick Newport, an economist with consultancy Global Insight in Lexington, Mass. "So far what we've seen is a lot of this has been contained to the mortgage market and particularly to the sub-prime market (of riskier borrowers). No one has a sense of whether this will spread to other markets, like the prime mortgage market. So far it hasn't."

John Silvia sees the U.S. economy as being "on the edge of a knife." He's the chief economist for Wachovia, a large national bank based in Charlotte, N.C. He sees below-trend economic growth, corporate profits leveling off and short-term lending rates higher than longer-term rates. This phenomenon, called the inverted yield curve, historically has been a harbinger of recession.

"When you go into a fog, it's hard to make commitments as an investor," Silvia said. "It's not the time to make big bets."

That cautious view sounds remarkably like former Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan, who told businessmen in Hong Kong on Monday that a U.S. recession was possible late this year or early next year.

While the "r" word got the headlines, Greenspan also warned that risk premiums are unusually low, meaning that lenders aren't demanding higher returns for riskier investments as they should.

"Risk is no longer perceived as major risk, at least as it was in years past, and that, I must say, I find disturbing," Greenspan said, according to The Wall Street Journal. "We do not and cannot look into history without being very concerned when you see the absence of awareness and concern about risk that we see today."

The concern sounded remarkably like Greenspan's warning in the 1990s that stock market investors were suffering from "irrational exuberance," a warning of the bubble that eventually burst and brought recession in 2001.

A Recession That Arrived On Cats' Paws (NYT)

By David Leonhardt

The New York Times, February 28, 2007

The nation's manufacturing sector managed to slip into a recession with almost nobody seeming to notice. Well, until yesterday.

Wall Street was caught off guard when the Commerce Department reported yesterday morning that orders for durable goods — big items like home computers and factory machines — plunged almost 8 percent last month. That's a big number, but it really shouldn't have come as too much of a surprise. In two of the last three months, the manufacturing sector has shrunk, according to surveys by the Institute for Supply Management that have been out for weeks.

DOJ_NMG_0137793

But the new report seemed to focus investors' attention on the problems in manufacturing and became one more reason for people to sell stocks. By the time the market opened in New York, stocks in almost every industrialized country had already fallen sharply.

The trouble began in Asia, where the Chinese stock market plummeted, before spreading to Europe and finally this country. The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index ended up with a loss of 3.4 percent, its fifth straight daily decline and its worst since 2003.

All of which raises a question that would have sounded strange even a month ago. Is the entire United States economy in danger of going the way of the manufacturing sector? Is it possible that we're headed for a real recession?

For months now, the economy seemed to shrug off the forces weighing on it and just kept on growing. But those forces never went away. If anything, a number of them have gotten stronger. And that's the most worrisome part of the bad news from the nation's factories: it fits into a larger story.

As stocks were dropping yesterday morning, an economist named Ian Shepherdson wrote one of his regular e-mail messages to clients: "Manuf is in recession; Fed please take note." Mr. Shepherdson, it's important to mention, is not one of Wall Street's perma-bears. When manufacturing last shrank, back in 2003, he correctly insisted that it was a false harbinger.

But this time, the manufacturing downturn stems from a couple of larger economic problems. One, of course, is the housing slump, which has caused a big drop in new construction and much less demand for doors, windows, countertops and a lot of other things that kept factories busy in recent years.

In recent weeks, the troubles in housing have spilled into the financial sector. Big lenders like NovaStar Financial are paying the price for extending credit to people who couldn't actually afford the homes they bought during the real estate boom. With many of those homeowners falling behind on their mortgage payments, lenders are making it tougher to get loans.

That's a sensible, and overdue, move. But it will hurt economic growth in the months ahead. The second big problem for manufacturers is the series of interest rate increases that the Federal Reserve has imposed since 2004.

They may seem like old news, because the last of them came eight months ago, but it typically takes a year to a year and a half for a rate increase to have its full impact. A lot of the big decisions affected by interest rates, like whether to buy a new car or a new piece of factory equipment, aren't everyday decisions. Only now are some families and businesses starting to react to the higher rates.

The economic news certainly isn't all bad. The housing problems still haven't turned into a crisis, thanks in part to interest rates that are still not high by historical standards. So the most likely situation is not a full-blown recession (often defined as two consecutive quarters of a shrinking economy).

The forecasters at the Economic Cycle Research Institute in New York, who have accurately predicted each of the last three recessions, argue that the current slowdown won't amount to much more than a lull. By the middle of the year, they say, low interest rates and healthy corporate spending will have the economy growing nicely once again.

Lakshman Achuthan, the institute's managing director, told me yesterday that he thought the odds of a recession over the next year were less than 20 percent. Mr. Shepherdson — the chief United States economist at High Frequency Economics, who's more bearish than most forecasters right now — still puts the odds at only 30 percent.

But for all the attention that formal recessions get on Wall Street, they are not really the benchmark that matters to most people. A significant slowdown that falls short of a recession can do a lot of damage to stock prices, profits and wages.

Only in the last few months, for example, has the current expansion grown strong enough to give most American workers pay increases that outpace inflation. Those raises would be endangered if the economy were to slow from last year's growth rate of 3.4 percent to even 2 percent.

"This is going to get worse before it gets better," Mr. Shepherdson argues. "We're in danger of slipping into something very like a recession, if not necessarily hitting the technical definition. It would be big enough to hurt, that's for sure."

The main message of yesterday's worldwide stock sell-off — as well as the stealth manufacturing downturn — is that the economy is facing bigger risks than we imagined just a few weeks ago.

In mid-February, Ben S. Bernanke, the Federal Reserve chairman, told members of Congress that he was worried about inflation taking off. The clear implication was that the Fed's next move might be to raise rates yet again to keep the economy from overheating.

Until yesterday, that seemed plausible. It doesn't this morning. Like stocks, the price of a futures contract tied to Fed policy shifted sharply yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0137794

Before the day began, investors expected the Fed to hold its benchmark rate steady through the end of the summer. Now they are betting that the rate will be cut once before July and again by the end of the year. If that's all that is necessary to keep the economy healthy, it will be a relief.

Plunge Leads To Predictions (CHIT)

By Bill Barnhart

Chicago Tribune, February 28, 2007

After watching the biggest one-day plunge in U.S. stocks in nearly four years on Tuesday, investors face two scenarios.

One is that Tuesday's market action, including a critical error by Dow Jones & Co. in calculating the Dow Jones industrial average, represented a catharsis in market sentiment and mechanics unlikely to be repeated.

"This was a flash point, a reality check," said Pat O'Hare, manager of investor content at Briefing.com, an online investor information service.

Noting that the day's decline began in China, O'Hare said, "Does a 9 percent decline in the Shanghai stock market really disrupt the economic order? The answer is no. We still anticipate the Standard & Poor's 500 index to gain 5 percent this year."

The second is that Tuesday's trading exposed long-simmering vulnerabilities in world markets, arising from investor exuberance, especially in Asia, and a wave of debt-financed speculation. Working through those issues could mean days, weeks or months of weak stock markets.

"This market has been compressed like a spring, and when you get a combination of events, that spring will explode on you," said trader Fane Lozman of Scanshift. "If something really happens, the market will get spooked. At some point, the Dow will get back to 10,000."

The Dow closed at 12,216.24, down 416.02, or 3.3 percent, after falling as much as 543 points, the biggest drop since the first day of trading after the Sept. 11 attacks. The S&P 500 tumbled 50.33, or 3.5 percent, to 1399.04. It was the worst day for both indexes since March 2003.

Analysts on both sides agree on several points. Major economies are strong. Interest rates are low. Even with Tuesday's blow to the China outlook, oil prices closed higher in U.S. futures trading.

Moreover, Tuesday's market sell-off virtually wiped out fear of an interest-rate increase by the Federal Reserve anytime soon. Treasury securities rallied strongly, sending 10-year Treasury yields to their lowest level since early December. The decline in 10-year yields, to 4.5 percent from nearly 5 percent in late January, is a godsend to the embattled U.S. housing market.

Given the economic fundamentals, it's hard to make a case for a sustained and significant drop in stock market values, even though the pace of U.S. corporate profit growth is expected to slow.

"The economic outlook remains reasonable in the U.S. It's supported by stronger growth in Europe and Asia," said James MacDonald, director of equity research at Northern Trust. Tuesday's sell-off "is just a deflation of people's view that we can just keep marching on without interruption."

Indeed, until Tuesday the stock market had put on a bullish run not seen since the 1950s. There were 228 days without a 2 percent pullback in the benchmark S&P 500, the longest such streak since a 293-day run in 1953-54.

Investor optimism, especially in Asia, suffered a big hit. The Chinese government signaled that it wishes to curtail speculative stock buying that had prompted a 140 percent gain in the Shanghai stock market composite index in the past 12 months. It worked.

At the end of New York trading Tuesday, the question was not whether U.S. stock prices would ease but whether the correction would be orderly and not turn into a self-fulfilling cascade.

To see the crosscurrents influencing the outlook, you need to take a global view.

Stocks continued to swoon in early Asian trading Wednesday, reflecting the enormity of the surprise U.S. sell-off. Sustained declines in the stock markets of developing economies and Asia could sour U.S. investors on one of the most popular ideas of recent years: emerging-market stocks.

For example, the iShares exchange-traded fund that tracks an index of emerging-market stocks sank more than 8 percent, back to its level in late November. For months, U.S. investors have been turning away from domestic equity-mutual funds in favor of international funds. A shift in sentiment could bolster U.S. stocks.

Slightly higher interest rates in Japan, implemented earlier this month by the Bank of Japan, reflect optimism about Japan's economy after years of economic stagnation.

But the prospect of still-higher Japanese interest rates has disrupted the so-called carry trade, by which speculators borrow in Japan to make higher-returning investments elsewhere. Traders said Tuesday's rally in the yen meant this strategy was unwinding.

DOJ_NMG_0137795

Many analysts fear that threats to this sort of debt-financed speculation could prompt a severe reversal of financial markets around the world.

The fact that the price of gold sank along with stocks supports the view that the market action was a speculative blow-off, not a fear of economic stress. Gold, which is viewed by many investors as a safe haven, had advanced steadily since early January, nearly reaching $700 an ounce, before falling 3 percent Tuesday.

Separately, so-called margin debt, representing loans to investors issued by brokers and secured by stock, rose last year to the highest level since the peak of the U.S. stock market in early 2000. A sudden collapse of stock prices could prompt a wave of margin calls, forcing investors to sell to raise cash.

SUDDEN RETREAT Markets' Slide Spotlights Risks (WSJ)

By E.s. Browning And Craig Karmin In New York, James T. Areddy In Shanghai, And Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, February 28, 2007

Yesterday's plunge in stock prices around the world, including the steepest percentage decline in the Dow Jones Industrial Average in nearly four years, signals that investors may finally be re-evaluating their insatiable appetite for risky investments.

The catalyst was Tuesday's nearly 9% fall in stock prices in Shanghai, one of the hottest and most volatile markets in the world. That helped send U.S. stocks on a roller coaster that ended with the DJIA down 416.02 points, or 3.3%, to 12216.24.

For a moment yesterday it was even worse. Starting just before 3 p.m. Eastern time, the Dow plunged more than 200 points in minutes, to a low of 12086.86, after a technical glitch delayed the reporting of its true value. 1

For months, global stock markets had been pointing almost straight up, ignoring admonitions that investors were excessively complacent. The amount of compensation, in the form of higher yields, that investors usually demand for lending money to riskier companies or countries had been shrinking steadily. And with credit plentiful and cheap, private pools of capital have been borrowing to buy up bigger and bigger companies. Even prices of art and wine have soared.

The mood changed sharply yesterday. U.S. Treasury bonds rallied in a flight to safety by suddenly nervous investors. The 10-year Treasury note's yield -- which falls when the note's price rises -- sank to 4.47% at one point. The Treasury note's yield ended the day at a two-month closing low of 4.515%.

The atmosphere first began to shift Sunday night, New York time, when former Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan, speaking by satellite to a Hong Kong audience, used the word "recession" and appeared to question the widespread notion that the current expansion will last all decade. "We do not and cannot look into history without being very concerned when you see the absence of awareness and concern about risk that we see today," Mr. Greenspan said.

Stocks didn't flinch at first. But on Tuesday, a day after hitting a record high, the Shanghai Composite Index fell 8.8% for no obvious reason, its biggest drop since jitters in 1997 about the death of Communist Party elder Deng Xiaoping. Analysts suggested investors wanted to get out of the soaring market before Beijing made any moves to cool it, such as new trading taxes.

GLOBAL SPIN

• The News: A selloff in China stocks triggered market declines around the globe yesterday.

• The Background: Investors around the world have been blasé about risk in recent months.

• What's Happening: Investors may finally be tempering their appetite for risky investments of all sorts.

Then in the U.S., the Commerce Department made Mr. Greenspan appear prophetic yesterday with its report that orders for big-ticket factory goods fell sharply in January. That raised questions about the strength of capital spending, a force that many have been counting on to offset housing-market weakness.

About the same time, mortgage lender Freddie Mac said it was tightening standards on subprime loans. It was one more sign the market for loans to the least creditworthy borrowers was deteriorating rapidly. Defaults are up. Lenders' shares are down. The prospect that lenders will grow increasingly tightfisted has raised concerns that the worst isn't yet over for the housing sector, which has been showing some signs of stabilizing.

A weaker-than-expected U.S. economy could undermine many assumptions that have been underlying investors' embrace of risk. It could lead to higher defaults among companies that have taken on large amounts of debt. And it could undermine the outlook for foreign markets, which tend to depend far more on the U.S. economy than the U.S. depends on theirs.

The remarkably low concern about risk has been the most striking feature of markets world-wide in recent years. Stocks have risen, and the riskiest markets have risen furthest. Yields on bonds from the riskiest countries, companies and mortgages have fallen the most. These trends have had powerful effects on businesses and economies. They have sparked a wave of private-equity buyouts of companies such as the big bid for utility TXU Corp. this week.

DOJ_NMG_0137796

There are several reasons for investors' appetite for risk: Growth has been steady and inflation low world-wide for several years. China, oil-rich countries and other emerging economies are generating savings far in excess of their domestic needs, and need to invest it somewhere. The concern has been that investors have extrapolated such trends too far.

Despite yesterday's financial-market turmoil, there is little sign the prognosis for the U.S. economy has changed much. Strong readings on home sales in January and consumer confidence in February suggested that the U.S. economy may be growing at about a modest 2% annual rate. "The growth situation is not great, but I don't think it's much different from what the Fed has been anticipating for a while," said Stephen Stanley, chief economist at RBS Greenwich Capital.

Still, corporate-profit growth, in double digits for more than three years, is showing signs of falling back to single digits this year. In the fifth year of a bull market, money managers increasingly have been worrying that stocks are overdue for a significant pullback. So they've been poised to sell at the first sign of trouble.

Many central banks maintain relatively low interest rates. But the shift in market sentiment comes amid increasing signs central bankers are ready to tighten the credit spigot.

The Chinese central bank has been trying to cool lending. Japan's central bank recently raised interest rates -- albeit to just 0.5% from 0.25% -- in part to discourage speculative borrowing in its markets. The European Central Bank yesterday reported that money supply grew at its fastest rate in 17 years in January in countries that use the euro, a trend that could argue for higher European rates.

The major exception is the U.S. Fed, which appears to be on hold for the foreseeable future. Though it has a bias to raise rates again if inflation worsens, futures markets are betting the next rate move is a cut.

The market setbacks were broad yesterday. Major stock-market indexes in France and Germany fell 3% each, Britain's fell 2.3%, Turkey was down 4.5% and Brazil plunged 6.6%.

WALL STREET JOURNAL VIDEO

18 • WSJ's David Wessel discusses19 Tuesday's big selloff and whether this is a reflection that something is amiss in the global economy.

• Barron's associate editor Michael Santoli says20 eight straight months of pent-up selling combined with China's volatility helped spur Tuesday's market drama.

Investors dumped bonds of developing countries, sharply widening their yields compared with safe U.S. Treasurys. This so-called "spread" widened by 0.14 percentage point -- a major increase -- as investors demanded higher returns for owning the riskier assets. Some investors in these emerging markets believe a correction is long overdue. "We need to be paid a lot more for the additional risk we are taking," said Andrew Feltus, a bond-fund manager at Pioneer Investments in Boston.

In another sign of risk aversion, the Japanese yen strengthened more than 2% against the U.S. dollar, its biggest jump in about a year. Global speculators have for years been borrowing yen, taking advantage of Japan's low interest rates, and then investing in markets that promised higher returns. The practice, known as the carry trade, has been an emblem of investors' seemingly limitless appetite for risky strategies.

Yesterday's tumult spurred some traders who used this strategy to begin reversing it. That meant closing out some of their riskier bets and putting the money back into yen -- thus giving the yen a boost. These sales by investors in the carry trade apparently contributed directly to the global stock declines.

Yesterday was the heaviest trading day ever for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange: 4.07 billion shares. One trader said he was unable to fill all his orders on the NYSE trading floor in the last 15 minutes of the trading day. Instead, he was rerouting orders to alternative electronic venues away from the Big Board. "We just hit a brick wall," said Stephen Porpora, an NYSE floor broker with William O'Neil. "These markets move faster than anyone can."

With increased electronic trading -- in which stocks are bought and sold by computer instead of on a traditional trading floor -- traders "can't slow things down" as they used to when a crush loomed, Mr. Porpora said. At around 3 p.m. he saw the Dow slip by more than 100 points in seconds as he tried to trade a large, volatile stock. One order entered around 3:58 p.m. took 10 minutes to process, even though the market officially closes at 4 p.m., he said. Usually, trades are processed in less than a minute.

Volatility, which has been tame for months, soared yesterday, as measured by the CBOE Volatility Index.

China's impact on the day's events is remarkable on several counts. Shanghai's so-called A-share market is largely closed to foreign investors, and local speculators who make up its primary investors typically pay little attention to factors outside of China.

Chinese share prices, after years in the doldrums, have soared for much of the past 20 months -- a rally that has prompted millions of Chinese to take up stock trading. Officials have expressed concern about the pace of the runup, after the benchmark index surged 130% in 2006.

DOJ_NMG_0137797

Traders said the index's close above 3,000 earlier this week made them nervous that the government would have added reason to adopt new taxes or other measures to apply brakes to the market when China's legislature convenes next week for its annual session. The government yesterday denied rumors it was considering a 20% capital-gains tax on stock investments, the state-run Shanghai Securities News reported.

The long rally has made China's stock market more important globally. Many of the world's best-performing mutual funds last year targeted stocks of Chinese companies listed overseas. China's stock market long has been divorced from the underlying economy, with share prices undergoing several boom and bust cycles even as growth has hummed along with remarkable consistency. As China's economic boom made many of its citizens wealthier in recent years, most Chinese ignored stocks and instead spent money on apartments, new cars, and new businesses.

The market's rapid rise since mid-2005 has made stocks an increasingly important part of the lives of many Chinese. The gains have been fueled by millions of new investors -- from retirees to college students -- who have poured into street-level brokerage outlets to sign up for trading accounts. Online trading is gaining in popularity too. Since Chinese stocks rarely sell for more than a few pennies a piece, barriers to entry are low and as many as 90,000 accounts have been opened per day in recent weeks.

Chinese have plenty more money to invest. In total, individuals in China still sit on about $2 trillion in bank deposits -- far more than the $1.4 trillion in combined market capitalization for China's two stock exchanges, in Shanghai and Shenzhen.

In Chicago yesterday, at Harris Private Bank, chief investment officer Jack Ablin was sitting in the waiting room of his doctor's office waiting for a stress test when his trader sent an urgent email: "The market is down 500 points."

Mr. Ablin, who manages $50 billion, said he looked at the email and thought, "What am I missing?" The news from China "went from a blip to a tidal wave" in a matter of moments, catching Mr. Ablin by surprise. After receiving good news from his doctor after the test, Mr. Ablin returned to his office and began compiling a list of blue-chip stocks that he planned to begin buying today, he said.

In early trading Wednesday in Tokyo, the benchmark Nikkei 225 Stock Average was off 3.6%, and Hong Kong's Hang Seng Index dropped 3.8% shortly after opening. Shanghai also started with a fall in Wednesday trading, but began to rebound after about 10 minutes.

Stock Sell-Off In China Hits Wall Street (WP)

By David Cho And Tomoeh Murakami Tse

The Washington Post, February 28, 2007

A plunge in Chinese stocks rippled across global markets yesterday, triggering a massive wave of selling in the United States that sent the Dow Jones industrial average down 3.3 percent, or 416 points, its biggest decline since March 2003.

The news from Asia sparked the initial sell-off, but a confluence of other events, including news of rising real estate loan delinquencies, a surprisingly weak manufacturing report and a bombing near Vice President Cheney in Afghanistan, made an already difficult day worse.

For most of the morning the Dow declined steadily until it had fallen 300 points. Then, just before 3 p.m., it plummeted another 200 points before recovering slightly because of a trading glitch that led to a backlog of sell orders clearing at once. The Standard and Poor's 500-stock index, a broader measure of stock prices, also lost more than 3 percent by the close of the trading day, its biggest drop in 3 1/2 years.

By midday Wednesday, Japan's Nikkei 225-stock index was down 3.1 percent, to 17,557.65 and Hong Kong's Hang Seng index was down 3.1 percent, to 19,523.69. But the Shanghai Composite index, whose drop precipitated yesterday's sell-off on Wall Street, was up 0.15 percent, to 2775.82.

From currency markets to blue-chip companies to international stock exchanges, no sector was left unscathed yesterday. The day was reminiscent of when the Internet bubble burst several years ago -- traders and investors around the world stared at electronic boards and televisions showing markets falling deeper into the red.

Todd Leone, head of trading at Cowen & Co., said he saw "nothing but sellers. My whole screen is red. Every group is down."

Adding to the market's woes, former Federal Reserve chairman Alan Greenspan warned in a speech Monday that the U.S. economy might slip into recession by year's end. "It didn't help that Greenspan used the 'R-word,' " said Al Goldman, chief market strategist at A.G. Edwards. "People overreacted to that. He's still an icon."

Some analysts said, however, that it was about time for the market to cool after a breathless run-up in share prices.

"I don't think a one-day [sell-off] is going to do justice for what's been going on," said John O'Donoghue, co-head of equity trading at Cowen. "It wouldn't surprise me to see a total 5 percent correction and even more from here."

DOJ_NMG_0137798

A major long-term concern among analysts is whether the heady days of "cheap debt" are coming to an end. The ability to borrow money at low rates and with favorable terms has fueled much of the world economy in the past few years, including the record-topping leveraged buyouts on Wall Street, the global run-up in real estate prices and the surge of investments in emerging markets overseas.

Signs surfaced yesterday that the easy availability of debt may be ending.

The mortgage company Freddie Mac announced tougher standards for its subprime mortgages, saying it would not buy such risky loans that are linked to a high number of delinquencies and defaults.

Moreover, investors fled emerging markets and took safe positions in the currencies of Japan and other countries where borrowing costs are among the lowest in the world. As emerging markets took it on the chin yesterday, the yen climbed 2.3 percent against the dollar, the most in nearly a year.

This occurred because investors sought to protect their money in case of a sustained downturn. In a growing global economy, these investors can take more risks and obtain higher returns by borrowing money and pouring it into emerging economies like China and India.

To many investors, yesterday's events were a stark demonstration of the vulnerabilities of the global economy, not just that of the United States. That a sell-off in China could have such serious reverberations around the world was noteworthy, said Joseph E. Stiglitz, a Nobel Prize winner and former chief economist at the World Bank.

"China has been the engine for global growth," Stiglitz said. "And a significant slowdown in China would have fundamental implications for commodity prices around the world. . . . Oil prices have been sustained by high Chinese demand. Just think of what would happen if there's a significant part of China that had a slowdown."

Analysts in China blamed yesterday's plunge, which at 9 percent was the largest single-day drop in a decade, on the news of a crackdown by the State Council, the Chinese cabinet, on illegal activities related to securities trading. According to a statement on the government's Web site, a special task force would be convened to provide recommendations for how to "repair" illegal securities activities.

On Wednesday morning, Chinese regulators denied rumors of plans for a 20 percent capital gains tax on stock investments, one factor that had sent markets lower.

China's stock markets began their surge upward in June 2006, after the government again allowed domestic initial public offerings after a long hiatus. There were a number of other securities milestones last year. The government took $200 billion of stock it owned and allowed it to be traded publicly. And several of the country's largest state-owned companies, including the Industrial and Commercial Bank of China, were dual-listed on the Shanghai and Hong Kong stock exchanges.

The Shanghai Stock Exchange rose 130 percent in 2006, and it was up 12 percent from Jan. 1 to mid-February. Just before the Chinese New Year holiday, the Shanghai Stock Exchange broke the 3,000-point mark for the first time.

Signs that China's two domestic stock markets, in Shanghai and Shenzhen, may be over-inflated began to show up in early February after Cheng Siwei, vice chairman of the Nation's People Congress, said publicly that he worried about a "bubble." The stock market fell 11 percent that week but quickly made up the losses and continued to hit new highs.

Then came China's Black Tuesday, which yesterday wiped out $100 billion of market value.

Feng Yu, a broker at China Galaxy Securities in the southeastern city of Ningbo, said he believed yesterday's drop was only a "technical correction" to make up for the unprecedented rise in recent months.

"At the beginning it was just banking stocks," Feng said. "Then it affected all shares," Feng said he believed the drop was precipitated by signals from the government that it wanted to slow down the explosive growth, which has prompted individual investors to line up for hours to open brokerage accounts.

Another piece of troubling news was released yesterday: The Commerce Department reported that durable-goods orders fell 7.8 percent in January, to a seasonally adjusted $204 billion. The decline, including in such large-order items as airplanes, semiconductors and appliances, surprised Wall Street, which had expected a 3.2 percent drop.

In Washington, the confluence of world economic events got the attention of the White House. "The president's economic advisers are paying attention to the markets," spokesman Tony Fratto said. "We continue to believe that the U.S. economy is sound."

The Federal Reserve, meanwhile, was silent, indicating that it did not view the market's drop as a threat to the abilities of U.S. financial firms to function.

This was in contrast to the Fed's response to the much sharper stock price declines of the October 1987 crash and after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, when the central bank issued statements reassuring the markets and investors that it would provide ample funds to the financial system to ensure transactions could be completed.

DOJ_NMG_0137799

But analysts said Fed Chairman Ben S. Bernanke would probably be asked to comment on the global financial gyrations this morning when he is scheduled to testify before the House Budget Committee.

Biggest Loss Since Sept. 11 For Wall Street (LAT)

By Walter Hamilton

The Los Angeles Times, February 28, 2007

The Dow Jones industrial average suffered its worst loss in six years today as an overnight plunge in Chinese stocks and fears about slowing economic growth sent investors into a worldwide dash for the exits.

The Dow, which at one point was down more than 500 points, finished with a loss of 416.02 points to close at 12216.24. It was the Dow's biggest loss since September 2001, when it fell following the terrorist attacks in New York and at the Pentagon.

The decline stirred memories of the Dow's historic 508-point drop in October 1987. But with the market so much higher today, the drop was far lower in percentage terms than 20 years ago. While the 1987 slide was a 22.6% plunge, Tuesday's was a 3.3% fall.

"Not to make light of 400 or 500 points, but this is a natural market correction," said Robert W. Bissell, president of Wells Capital Management in Los Angeles.

At the heart of the sell-off were long-simmering fears that economic growth, particularly in the U.S., may be slowing from its torrid pace of the last year.

"The fear is that economic growth is slowing and, more important, that [corporate] profits are slowing," said Diane Swonk, chief economist at Mesirow Financial in Chicago.

The immediate catalyst was an almost 9% drop in the Chinese market, which was triggered by the Chinese government taking steps to rein in the rampant market speculation that had sent its shares soaring in recent months.

Selling pressure increased steadily throughout most of the day in the U.S. and was fed by several other factors, including disappointing economic news and comments from former Federal Reserve chief Alan Greenspan that it is possible the U.S. could slip into a recession this year.

All that came at a time when the U.S. had gone an unusually long period without a deep sell-off, and some market veterans said investors were looking for a reason to unload their stocks.

"At least for the last three years, everybody's been waiting for the other shoe to drop, or for both shoes to drop," said Brian Wesbury, chief economist at First Trust Advisors in Lisle, Ill.

Several experts said the sell-off was overdone, and that the U.S. economy remains on solid footing.

"I don't think the typical investor will look back and say, 'the Chinese sell-off was a major event in my investing life,'" said John Bollinger, head of Bollinger Capital Management in Manhattan Beach.

Doubts Trigger 416-point Dow Dive (WT)

By Patrice Hill

The Washington Times, February 28, 2007

The Dow Jones Industrial Average plunged 416 points yesterday, the most since the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, as worries about the U.S. economy suddenly surged and sent inflated stock markets tumbling around the world.

The chain reaction started in China, where a 9 percent drop in the main stock index, the worst in 10 years, was triggered by government moves to quell stock speculation and a speech by former Federal Reserve chairman Alan Greenspan pointing out that profits in the U.S. have peaked and the business cycle may be drawing to a close with a recession possible -- though not likely -- by year-end.

After reverberating in trading in Asia and Europe on Monday night, doubts about the U.S. economy were reinforced by fresh data yesterday raising fears that the U.S. housing and manufacturing sectors are headed back into recession as a result of sharply tighter credit conditions and the end of a capital spending boom.

"It's a mood swing to more concern about the economy," said Alexander P. Paris, analyst at Barrington Research Associates Inc. He noted that the darker outlook likely will be underscored by news today that economic growth slowed to 2.5 percent or less at the end of last year.

"Superimposed on that you have this China thing. That's the powder that ignited it," he said. Like many economists, Mr. Paris says the economy is fundamentally healthy and that the market is overreacting to the weak points.

In a frenzied day of trading, every stock sector posted big losses. The market started out the day with a mild downturn, but the sheer volume of trading caused a computer glitch that turned the downdraft into what looked like a free fall about 2:30 p.m., when the Dow dropped suddenly by about 300 points.

Dow Jones & Co. Inc. said it discovered its computers were not properly calculating trades and it had to switch to a backup computer, which caused the massive swoon in the index.

The Dow fell 546 points, or 4.3 percent, to 12,086 before recovering some ground in the last hour of trading to close down 3.29 percent to 12,216. Because the worst of the plunge on the Dow and the Standard & Poor's 500 Index did not exceed 5 percent, the New York Stock Exchange's trading limits, designed to halt the most precipitous moves, were not activated.

Nevertheless, in terms of points, the Dow's drop was the worst since Sept. 17, 2001, the first trading day after the terrorist attacks, when the blue chips closed down 685, or 7 percent. Just a week ago, the Dow had reached a new high of 12,796.

The broader S&P 500 lost 50 points, or 3.47 percent, to end at 1,399, while the tech-dominated Nasdaq Composite Index fell 97 points, or 3.86 percent, to 2,408.

Before the Wall Street drubbing, European markets fell from 1 percent to 3 percent on the Chinese news. Hong Kong's benchmark Hang Seng Index dropped a relatively mild 1.8 percent.

Traders expect Wall Street's losses to reverberate in markets overnight and possibly lead to more selling in the U.S. today.

Bryan Piskorowski, stock analyst at Wachovia Securities, said the market's "nasty little sell-off" was due to "good old-fashioned profit-taking" after seven straight months of market gains in the U.S. that had left most stocks at lofty price levels.

"The market was due for a pullback. We're getting it," he said. "The size and scale was somewhat surprising," he added, but he expects the market to resume its upward trend after reaching a bottom in the next few days.

Mr. Piskorowski noted that the drop was less than 5 percent on Wall Street, and even the 9 percent drop in the Shanghai Composite Index looked minor against the backdrop of a 130-percent gain in Chinese stocks in the past year and a 13 percent run-up in the previous six sessions.

Still, the economic outlook has dimmed in the past month. A Commerce Department report yesterday of a 7.8 percent drop in orders for big-ticket goods from U.S. factories in January showed that "growth in the manufacturing sector ground to a halt in September 2006 and continues to struggle as consumers rethink big-ticket spending and businesses turn risk averse in their capital spending," said Daniel J. Meckstroth, chief economist for the Manufacturers Alliance.

But the biggest change of fortunes has been the collapse in housing. After stabilizing somewhat at the end of last year, a plunge in home building resumed last month, and a potentially destabilizing fall in home prices got deeper. A report from the National Association of Realtors yesterday showed a 3.5 percent drop in the median home price nationwide -- and prices have fallen even further in big cities such as Boston and San Diego.

Economists expect the housing downturn to worsen before it gets better as increasing defaults on mortgages for the purchase of overpriced homes are starting to pinch home lenders and prompt them to close the spigot of easy money that fueled the housing boom.

Mortgage giant Freddie Mac announced yesterday it will no longer buy high-risk home mortgages prone to foreclosure, such as loans made with little or no documentation of a borrower's income and job status.

"The housing market is in the middle of a far-reaching adjustment," said Roger M. Kubarych, economist at Unicredit Markets. While consumer confidence and spending has been holding up well, the downturns in housing and manufacturing will slow growth in the first half of the year to the weakest pace since the 2001 recession, he said.

Markets Find It Hard To Break The Greenspan Habit (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, February 28, 2007

WASHINGTON -- As chairman of the Federal Reserve, Alan Greenspan had 200 Ph.D. economists at his disposal to help decipher economic and market trends. Now, in the year since retiring from the job he held for 18 years, he relies on less than a half-dozen staffers to analyze the same economic trends.

The last 48 hours have made clear, though, that investors can be just as devoted to what he has to say about those trends -- a devotion some say makes it harder to concentrate on what his successor, Ben Bernanke, has to say.

Mr. Greenspan told an audience via satellite early Monday, Hong Kong time, that a U.S. recession was possible. "When you get this far away from a recession, invariably forces build up for the next recession, and indeed we are beginning to see that sign," he said, according to Dow Jones Newswires. "For example, in the U.S., profit margins ... have begun to stabilize, which is an early sign we are in the later stages of a cycle."

Mr. Greenspan didn't say a recession was likely. Indeed, he said most forecasters don't see one, the global environment is "benign" and there has been no "significant spillover" from the contraction in housing activity. His comments appeared more aimed at questioning the conviction of many investors that because each of the last two expansions lasted a decade, this one, now five years old, will, too.

DOJ_NMG_0137801

But the perceived pessimism of the remarks grew as headlines made their way around trading rooms and were blamed for helping contribute to a two-day, world-wide selloff in stocks, a plunge in bond yields as bond prices rallied, and increased market expectations of a cut in interest rates by the Fed.

In a widely distributed email yesterday, Stan Jonas of hedge fund Dutch Book Partners LLC wrote, "MR. GSPAN SAYS A RECESSION IS LIKELY."

The power of Mr. Greenspan's remarks both awed and frustrated some in the markets. "Somehow, he's still the maestro," said Thomas Joseph Marta, a fixed-income strategist at RBC Capital Markets. "Even though Bernanke is the one calling the shots, Greenspan's crystal ball is somehow given more weight."

He compared it with a retired general commenting on military matters on cable television. "They're loose cannons and can do a lot more damage than good, and I see Greenspan the same way."

Alan Blinder, who served as vice chairman of the Fed under Mr. Greenspan in the mid-1990s, said, "From the Fed's point of view, it's a little off message. What Greenspan said was noticeably more pessimistic than the Fed's outlook."

Keeping Quiet

There are no formal prohibitions on what a Fed official talks about after he leaves the Fed, other than confidential Fed deliberations. Upon retiring, though, Mr. Greenspan went further and said he would follow the example of his predecessor, Paul Volcker, and not comment on his successor's monetary policy. By most accounts he has stuck to that commitment.

In an interview yesterday, Mr. Greenspan said, "I have been scrupulous not to respond to any questions which refer directly to monetary policy, what the Fed is doing, or what it should do."

He added: "What I do talk about are the global forces that are functioning, how the world is running and how the economy is developing in a manner that I used to do when I was an economic consultant. The only difference is back then I'd discuss what the Fed was going to do as a consequence of all this. Now, I just don't do that."

But Mr. Greenspan's observations on economic and market developments have been inevitably interpreted for their significance toward interest rates.

Barely a week after he left office a year ago, he appeared at a private event for fewer than a dozen clients of Lehman Brothers, mostly prominent hedge-fund managers. Reports of his remarks filtered out the next day, roiling markets.

At the time, some in the market and some of his former colleagues questioned his judgment for hitting the speech circuit so soon after leaving office.

Yesterday, that criticism was largely absent, in part because Mr. Bernanke is widely considered to have established himself as a credible Fed chairman in his own right. "You can't expect him to be quiet forever," said Mr. Blinder, who now teaches at Princeton University but also analyzes Fed policy for fee-paying clients.

Market Overreaction?

Adds Robert Parry, former president of the San Francisco Fed: "It's hard for me to blame him for what could turn out to be an overreaction by markets."

Yesterday, Mr. Greenspan said, "I recognize there is no way I can fully insulate myself, but I do my best."

As chairman from 1987 to 2006, Mr. Greenspan became famous for his carefully crafted, often opaque remarks.

When he spoke clearly, it often took markets by surprise -- triggering an outsize reaction, and, often, a later re-examination of what he really said.

'Irrational Exuberance'

In 1996, he asked if stock investors were seized with "irrational exuberance," triggering a brief stock selloff.

In 2003, he said the Fed needed a "firebreak" against deflation, triggering a plunge in bond yields on expectations of steep rate cuts that ultimately didn't come.

Since leaving office he has become a more relaxed speaker, willing to say things in language that a Fed chairman usually avoids, such as the possibility of recession.

"An entire niche within the market was dedicated over the period of two decades to interpreting the musings of the oracle," said Joseph Brusuelas, chief U.S. economist for IDEAglobal, a financial advisory service.

Since leaving the Fed, Mr. Greenspan has set up shop in a plush, sun-drenched office in downtown Washington with a Bloomberg terminal and a handful of staffers, including two research associates.

That, along with the Internet, gives him the ability to study most economic data with the same intensity he did at the Fed.

He is also continuing to work, with Fed economist James Kennedy, on a project the two began at the Fed: building a database to examine the flows of money through the housing and mortgage market.

The two have published one paper on the subject and another is forthcoming. Other than that, he has little contact with his former colleagues except at social occasions.

DOJ_NMG_0137802

Book Release

Other than his speaking engagements, for which media reports and clients say Mr. Greenspan is usually paid $150,000, his main activity is completing his book, with some fact-checking help from a few retired Fed economists. Titled "The Age of Turbulence," it is due to be released by Penguin Group on Sept. 17.

A central theme of the book, according to people with whom he has spoken, is a theme he addressed Monday: The U.S. and global economies are far more resilient now to economic and financial shocks.

But, in a telling note, he also warned his audience,

"We do not and cannot look into history without being very concerned when you see the absence of awareness and concern about risk that we see today."

As for how Mr. Bernanke feels about Mr. Greenspan's comments, Al Broaddus, who served with Mr. Bernanke on the Fed, says he can't imagine the chairman being ruffled by his predecessor's remarks or their impact on markets.

"He's just going to do what he feels he needs to do. The first year of his tenure has shown that ... he keeps his eye on the ball. Recently, the perceptions of [the Fed] in markets seem very favorable."

Greenspan Comments Helped Grease Markets' Skid (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, February 28, 2007

WASHINGTON - He's baaaack.

More than a year after leaving the Federal Reserve, former chairman Alan Greenspan is again grabbing headlines, this time for saying the U.S. economy could fall into recession later this year.

Greenspan's comments, made via satellite to a group in Hong Kong on Monday, were partly blamed for a sell-off in world financial markets Tuesday. That suggests the former Fed chief, whose every utterance was parsed by investors during his more than 18 years at the Fed, still holds sway over markets.

"Greenspan is probably feeling awful today. He's probably thinking, 'How do I get out there and clarify things without making it worse,' " Wachovia senior economist Mark Vitner says.

The Associated Press quoted Greenspan as saying it is "possible" the USA could slide into recession in 2007. But he noted most forecasters are predicting the economy will expand into 2008.

"When you get this far away from a recession, invariably forces build up for the next recession, and indeed we are beginning to see that sign," Greenspan said, according to the AP.

Vitner and others say Greenspan's words were not that extreme. He didn't predict an imminent recession. In fact, he said it was "very precarious" to make forecasts months ahead.

Investors were already on edge and used Greenspan's comments as one excuse to sell, Putnam chief economist David Kelly says. "If it wasn't Alan Greenspan who upset the markets, something else would have," Kelly says.

A spokeswoman for Greenspan said he would have no comment Tuesday.

But Greenspan should be a bit more careful, knowing investors continue to follow his every word, says Global Insight chief economist Nariman Behravesh. "Ex-Fed chairmen should exercise more circumspection," he says.

Greenspan, 80, began making public and private speeches almost immediately after he left the Fed in January 2006. That drew criticism from some, including Sen. Jim Bunning, R-Ky., who expressed his concern when Greenspan's successor, Ben Bernanke, testified before Congress in February 2006.

Bernanke is scheduled to testify before Congress today on budget issues.

Recently Greenspan drew attention after saying the downturn in the U.S. housing market was likely over.

Greenspan started an economic consulting firm and has a book coming out in September, The Age of Turbulence: Adventures in a New World, according to BookExpo America. The group says Greenspan will be interviewed by his wife, NBC correspondent Andrea Mitchell, at their conference on June 1.

As Ethics Panels Expand Grip, No Field Is Off Limits (NYT)

By Patricia Cohen

The New York Times, February 28, 2007

Ever since the gross mistreatment of poor black men in the Tuskegee Syphilis Study came to light three decades ago, the federal government has required ethics panels to protect people from being used as human lab rats in biomedical studies. Yet now, faculty and graduate students across the country increasingly complain that these panels have spun out of control, curtailing academic freedom and interfering with research in history, English and other subjects that poses virtually no danger to anyone.

DOJ_NMG_0137803

The panels, known as Institutional Review Boards, are required at all institutions that receive research money from any one of 17 federal agencies and are charged with signing off in advance on almost all studies that involve a living person, whether a former president of the United States or your own grandmother. This results, critics say, in unnecessary and sometimes absurd demands.

Among the incidents cited in recent report by the American Association of University Professors are a review board asking a linguist studying a preliterate tribe to "have the subjects read and sign a consent form," and a board forbidding a white student studying ethnicity to interview African-American Ph.D. students "because it might be traumatic for them."

"It drives historians crazy," said Joshua Freeman, the director of the City University's graduate history program. "It's a medical model, it's inappropriate and ignorant." One student currently waiting for a board to approve his study of a strike in the 1970s, Mr. Freeman said, had to submit a list of questions he was going to ask workers and union officials, file signed consent forms, describe the locked location where he would keep all his notes, take a test to certify he understood the standards.

Review boards, first created in 1974, were initially restricted to biomedical research. In 1981 the regulations were revised to cover all research that involves "human subjects" and is designed to contribute to "generalizable knowledge."

Yet precisely how to interpret these rules has largely been left to each review board — 5,564 in all. And while the regulations apply specifically to research that gets federal dollars, many colleges use Institutional Review Boards to monitor all research, no matter where the funds come from. This system of helter-skelter enforcement, critics say, has no meaningful oversight and no appeal process.

Debbie S. Dougherty and Michael W. Kramer, two former members of a review board at the University of Missouri, Columbia, who wanted to study review boards, had to first get their own board's O.K. Although they thought their project was exempt from board approval, the only entity authorized to make that decision is the board itself, and the only appeal if the researchers had rejected the ruling is also the board.

Bernard A. Schwetz, director of the federal Office for Human Research Protections, which administers the regulations, acknowledges that the guidelines covering the boards' actions have not been clear enough and says he intends to make public new proposed guidelines before the end of the year. Still, he said the priority is to protect human subjects and dismissed the notion that most nonmedical research carries few dangers. "Obviously the balance is very subtle," he said. "I think it's naïve to say there isn't any risk."

But to many faculty and graduate students, review boards are like a blister that gets worse with every step. Those outside of the hard sciences say the legitimate concerns over ethics and safety are largely irrelevant to most of their research.

According to a stack of reports, symposiums and studies by academic associations and scholars, the system's "mission creep" is having a pernicious and widespread effect on humanities and social science research. Legal scholars also argue the boards violate the First Amendment.

The growing number of complaints in recent years apparently stems from an overall crackdown after a series of medical-research blunders beginning with the death of an 18-year-old in a gene-therapy trial at the University of Pennsylvania in 1999.

A board is required to have a minimum of five members, including one nonscientist and one person unaffiliated with the institution, said Pat El-Hinnawy, spokeswoman for the Office for Human Research Protections. Larger universities often have several boards. Members are generally appointed for limited terms.

When Robert L. Johnson, the review board administrator for Appalachian State University, talks to students, he said he starts off by asking, "If you were going to participate in a study, what are the things you would like to know?"

The usual responses, he said, are: What are you doing? Will you use my name? Who's responsible if I get hurt? What's in it for me? Making sure those questions get answered, said Mr. Johnson, "that's the purpose of the I.R.B."

Mr. Johnson said his board met monthly and reviewed approximately 200 projects a year; most are routine, require what he called minor changes and get approved within two weeks. About 30 to 40 require full board review, which takes at least six weeks.

Timothy Wilson, a social psychologist at the University of Virginia, now in his second term as a member of Virginia's nonmedical review board, said that "I.R.B.'s naturally become cautious," but that given the constraints, "I think our board works extremely well."

In the past year, discussions about what some call the "I.R.B. wars" have sprung up in specialty publications like The Chronicle of Higher Education, conferences, scholarly journals and blogs. Although research proposals are rarely rejected, scholars argue that the requested changes in the wording of questions and consent forms can alter the nature of the study and scare off participants.

Bernadette McCauley, a historian at Hunter College, said she ran into trouble a couple of years ago when she tried to help students working with the Museum of the City of New York on an exhibition about Washington Heights. She asked if a few nuns who had grown up in that neighborhood and whom she knew from her research would talk to the students. And that, Ms. McCauley said, was "when things went haywire."

DOJ_NMG_0137804

The review board discovered the request and lambasted Ms. McCauley for failing to consult with it, she said. The board also demanded proof that previous research for a completed book did not use any archival material involving living people and banned her from doing any research.

Michael Arena, the director of communications at City University, said in an e-mail message that Ms. McCauley initially refused to send in a "brief description" of her research so that board members could determine whether federal regulations covered her work. Ms. McCauley hired a lawyer and after six months of negotiations, the board agreed that her research was exempt.

Ms. Dougherty, an associate professor of communications at Missouri, said review boards were needed because "historically, social science has done things abhorrent to human subjects." Unfortunately the current process "obliterates a lot of research," she said, because untenured faculty and graduate students on a timetable cannot afford to spend months waiting for approval. So, for example, "instead of talking to people who are victims of violence, you might look at newspaper articles," she said, echoing a common complaint that the requirements cause academics to steer clear of controversial topics. Research decisions "should be guided by science," she said, "not whether or not it's going to get through the board."

Ms. Dougherty said she was willing to speak openly, unlike many graduate students and faculty, because she had tenure.

Professors also say that some board directives, like destroying interview recordings and notes after publication to ensure confidentiality, violate accepted scholarly practices. "There probably will be litigation," predicted Philip Hamburger, a professor at Columbia Law School who argues that prior approval violates the First Amendment. "There are potentially hundreds of thousands of plaintiffs."

Mr. Schwetz said there was no chance that some subjects like oral history and journalism would be altogether excluded from review, as some academic organizations have urged. "If we were just to say, 'Assume you don't have to take them before an I.R.B.,' I think we would regret that," he said. But he said the new guidelines "will give a lot of examples and will give more guidance on how to make the decision on what is research and what is not."

Some critics fault the universities, placing blame either with overzealous panels or with university administrations that have not done enough to differentiate between research that receives federal money and research that does not.

Mr. Freeman of City University said that within the humanities "most faculty members don't know these rules exist." He added, "If they in fact followed these rules, the whole I.R.B. system would grind to a halt."

Panel Finds Flawed Data In A Major Stem Cell Report (NYT)

By Nicholas Wade

The New York Times, February 28, 2007

An inquiry panel has found what it called "significantly flawed" data in a major stem cell paper published in Nature in 2002.

The article, which claimed stem cells isolated from an adult could change into all the major tissue types of the body, was seized on by opponents of abortion as showing that embryonic stem cell research was unnecessary since adult stem cells could provide all the predicted benefits.

The lead author of the article, Catherine Verfaillie, said yesterday that she had sent a letter to Nature stating that the flawed data should not be relied on but that they did not affect the article's conclusions. She said the journal was resubmitting the article to the original referees for them to make their own assessment.

Problems with the article were first reported this month by New Scientist. Two writers for that magazine, Peter Aldhous and Eugenie Samuel Reich, noticed last year that a set of graphs in the Nature article was the same as that in an article by Dr. Verfaillie published in a different journal but ascribed to different mice.

Timothy Mulcahy, vice president for research at the University of Minnesota, where Dr. Verfaillie had led the stem cell institute, said an inquiry panel was set up after Dr. Verfaillie asked the university to look into the issue of the duplicated graphs, which she attributed that to a mix-up when preparing two papers for publication at the same time.

The panel confirmed Dr. Verfaillie's account, Dr. Mulcahy said, and concluded that there was no issue of scientific misconduct. But it found another problem besides the duplication, involving inconsistencies in the data describing the proteins on the cells' surface.

The university then sent both articles to stem cell experts to assess whether the conclusions would still hold if the inconsistent data were to be eliminated. Three experts said that conclusions would still stand, one that they would be weakened. Because of this lack of complete agreement, the university believed that the scientific community should be informed of the situation, through Dr. Verfaillie's letter to the journal editors, and make its own evaluation, Dr. Mulcahy said.

DOJ_NMG_0137805

Dr. Verfaillie is now at the Catholic University of Leuven in Belgium but still holds a part-time appointment at Minnesota. “I have no idea how this could have happened or why it happened,” she said, referring to the inconsistencies described by the panel.

Other laboratories have had difficulty repeating Dr. Verfaillie’s results, but recently some have succeeded, Dr. Verfaillie said, although they often gave the cells different names.

Recently she wrote an article with Irving Weissman of Stanford University, a stem cell expert renowned for his rigorous methods. But that article confirmed only that her cells could make blood, not that they would transform into other tissue types.

“I think he is still not totally convinced they can make all the other cell types,” Dr. Verfaillie said.

Dr. Weissman did not respond to e-mail messages asking for his assessment.

This is the second time that a major stem cell paper has come under criticism, the previous episode involving the collapse last year of Hwang Woo-suk’s claims to have generated embryonic stem cell lines from adults. Although Dr. Hwang’s case involved fraud and belongs in a different category, the problems with the two papers underline the difficulty of working with stem cells and the immaturity of the field, despite the large sums of money being invested in it.

“Working with stem cells is pretty tricky,” Dr. Mulcahy said.

Document Shows Romney's Strategies (BOS)

By Scott Helman

The Boston Globe, February 28, 2007

Here are some views of Mitt Romney causing concern inside his campaign: His hair looks too perfect, he's not a tough war time leader, and he has earned a reputation as "Slick Dancing Mitt" or "Flip-Flop Mitt."

Romney and his advisers have identified those perceptions as threats to his bid for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination, according to an exhaustive internal campaign document obtained by the Globe.

The 77-slide PowerPoint presentation offers a revealing look at Romney's pursuit of the White House, outlining a plan for branding himself, framing his competitors, and allaying voter concerns about his record, his Mormon faith, and his shifts on key issues like abortion.

Dated Dec. 11, the blueprint is wide-ranging and analyzes in detail the strengths and weaknesses of Romney and his two main Republican rivals, Senator John McCain of Arizona and Rudolph W. Giuliani, former mayor of New York. The plan, which top Romney strategist Alex Castellanos helped to draft, charts a course for Romney to emerge as the nominee, but acknowledges that the "electorate is not where it needs to be for us to succeed."

It is unclear how the campaign is using the document. However, its expansiveness, level of detail and the involvement of Castellanos suggest that it is a significant strategic blueprint. On the campaign trail, Romney is sounding some of the themes outlined in it.

Romney spokesman Kevin Madden would not confirm or deny the plan's authenticity, saying only that the former governor has received an "overly abundant" amount of input on how to run his campaign. Asked specifically about the contents, Madden said: "If anything, it's a compilation of political conventional wisdom."

"We're obviously very, very focused on introducing Mitt Romney and his vision for leading the country into the future," Madden said. "And everybody recognizes that he's somebody with a lot of energy and a lot of ideas."

Campaign blueprints analyzing a candidate and the competition are not unusual; earlier this year, the New York Daily News obtained and wrote about a similar dossier from Giuliani's campaign. And the Romney presentation lacks any big bombshells. Still, it provides a window into the challenges and opportunities Romney and his advisors envision as he tries to win the Republican primary.

The plan, for instance, indicates that Romney will define himself in part by focusing on and highlighting enemies and adversaries, such common political targets as "jihadism," the "Washington establishment," and taxes, but also Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton, "European-style socialism," and, specifically, France. Even Massachusetts, where Romney has lived for almost 40 years, is listed as one of those "bogeymen," alongside liberalism and Hollywood values.

Indeed, a page titled "Primal Code for Brand Romney" said that Romney should define himself as a foil to Bay State Democrats such as Senators Edward M. Kennedy and John Kerry and former governor Michael Dukakis. Romney should position himself as "the anti-Kerry," the presentation says. But elsewhere in the plan, it's clear that Romney and his aides are aware he's open to the same charge that helped derail Kerry's presidential campaign in 2004: that he is a flip-flopper who has changed positions out of political expediency.

DOJ_NMG_0137806

Because he is attempting to capture the conservative vote, Romney is facing persistent questions about his relatively recent shifts to more conservative positions on issues such as abortion, gay rights, and gun control. One page of the plan cites Kerry and says Romney doesn't want to spend 2007 facing skepticism about his conservative message.

The blueprint also describes political assets and vulnerabilities of McCain and Giuliani, who lead Romney in the polls.

McCain is described as a war hero and maverick with a compelling narrative and a reputation for wit, authenticity, and straight talk. But he's also seen as "too Washington," "too close to [Democratic] Left," an "uncertain, erratic, unreliable leader in uncertain times." "Does he fit The Big Chair?" the document asks. The plan calls McCain, 70, a "mature brand" and raises questions about whether he could handle the rigors of leading the free world.

Giuliani is called an outside-the-Beltway rock star and truth teller who earned the nation's trust for his leadership of New York City's response to the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. But he is described as a one-dimensional Lone Ranger whose social views -- he supports abortion rights and civil unions for gay couples -- could destroy the "GOP brand." "We can't disqualify Dems like Hillary on social issues ever again" if Giuliani is the nominee, the document states.

The plan also touches on what it calls Giuliani's ethical issues, including his relationship with Bernard Kerik , former New York police commissioner who withdrew from consideration to become US homeland security secretary amid allegations of improprieties. It raises Giuliani's "personal political liabilities," an apparent reference to his three marriages and bitter public divorce from his second wife, Donna Hanover.

It is clear that Romney's campaign operatives plan to make sure that voters are familiar with the perceived weaknesses of McCain and Giuliani and conduct opposition research on the candidates. But the campaign, according to the blueprint, also wants to avoid attacking either man too directly or harshly, in part because Romney wants their supporters to ultimately shift to him. At a campaign stop in New Hampshire last week, he called McCain and Giuliani friends and national heroes.

The plan concedes that, with McCain and Giuliani in the race, Romney is unlikely to be the top pick for those voters looking for a "war/strong leader." His goal appears to be establishing himself as a credible second choice for those voters, but the first pick for voters looking for an energetic, optimistic, and innovative chief executive. (A page titled "Own the future" dubs McCain the past, Giuliani the present, and Romney the future.)

The case for Romney, according to the plan, is this: "Mitt Romney, tested, intelligent, get-it-done, turnaround CEO Governor and strong leader from outside Washington, is a better candidate than McCain & Giuliani to ensure that America's strength is maintained so we can meet a new generation of global challenges."

The document underscores Romney's aim to become the "only electable choice" for socially conservative voters. But the plan anticipates that Romney could face a serious threat if Newt Gingrich, the former House speaker who is considered one of the GOP's leading conservative intellectuals, decides to enter the race.

Romney's sensitivity to his Mormon faith as a campaign issue is apparent throughout the plan.

It acknowledges that some view Mormonism as weird and lists ways Romney should defend his faith, from highlighting the way he has lived his life, rather than which church he attends, to acknowledging theological differences with mainline Christian denominations while refusing to be drawn into an extensive discussion of Mormon doctrine and practices. It also suggests Romney might soon need to address the issue head-on, perhaps as John F. Kennedy did in a 1960 speech amid concerns about his relationship to the Catholic Church.

The document appears to raise the possibility of Romney delivering such an address at George H.W. Bush's presidential library outside Houston, the same city where Kennedy gave his.

Enmity toward France, where Romney did his Mormon mission during college, is a recurring theme of the document. The European Union, it says at one point, wants to "drag America down to Europe's standards," adding: "That's where Hillary and Dems would take us. Hillary = France." The plan even envisions "First, not France" bumper stickers.

In addition, the document provides a Romney roadmap for the early primaries, suggesting that he hopes to emerge as a credible "alternative to frontrunner" in Iowa, win New Hampshire, show strength in South Carolina, and be dominant in states, such as Michigan, that are eyeing early primary dates. The plan suggests Romney make full use of new media to reach voters, from feeding videos to YouTube to perhaps creating his own radio programming.

Like every Republican in the race, Romney faces the delicate task of how to talk about President Bush, whom the country gives low job-approval ratings .

But the plan lists two ways Romney can set himself apart from Bush. The first says, simply, "Intelligence."

Internal Romney Document Airs Concerns (AP)

AP, February 28, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0137807

An internal document shows Mitt Romney's presidential campaign is concerned about his vulnerability to charges of flip-flopping, while suggesting he can differentiate from President Bush with a single word: "intelligence."

Campaign advisers even fret that the former Massachusetts governor has too perfect hair, according to the 77-slide PowerPoint presentation, a copy of which was obtained by The Boston Globe.

The document also outlines plans for positively branding the Republican contender, negatively framing rivals John McCain and Rudy Giuliani, and allaying voter concerns about his record and Mormon faith.

One idea for dealing with the religious question is to address it head-on, perhaps as John F. Kennedy did in a 1960 speech amid concerns about his relationship to the Catholic Church.

The document appears to raise the possibility of Romney speaking at the presidential library of Bush's father, George H.W. Bush. It is located outside Houston, the same city where Kennedy delivered his speech.

The blueprint, dated Dec. 11, was drafted in part by Alex Castellanos, Romney's media adviser. It is similar to one for GOP rival Rudy Giuliani that was recently obtained and published by the New York Daily News.

McCain is described as a war hero and maverick with a compelling narrative and a reputation for wit, authenticity, and straight talk. But he's also seen as "too Washington," "too close to (Democratic) Left," an "uncertain, erratic, unreliable leader in uncertain times." "Does he fit The Big Chair?" the document asks.

Giuliani is called an outside-the-Beltway rock star and truth teller who earned the nation's trust for his leadership of New York City's response to the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. But he is also described as a one-dimensional Lone Ranger whose social views — he supports abortion rights and civil unions for gay couples — could destroy the "GOP brand."

"We can't disqualify Dems like Hillary (Rodham Clinton) on social issues ever again" if Giuliani is the nominee, the document states.

Romney spokesman Kevin Madden declined to verify the document's authenticity in response to a request from The Associated Press.

"Outside consultants routinely offer input and analysis — both solicited and unsolicited — on the dynamics of a political campaign all the time," Madden said. "But we cannot and will not verify any documents that are not marked Romney for President, Inc."

Romney Latest To See Internal Critique Leaked (WP)

By Chris Cillizza And Michael D. Shear

The Washington Post, February 28, 2007

Former Massachusetts governor and Republican presidential hopeful Mitt Romney has hair that is too perfect, a flip-flop reputation and a particular antagonism toward France.

That information comes not from an adversary but from a 77-page internal PowerPoint presentation about Romney's strategy obtained by the Boston Globe and published yesterday. Former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani experienced a similar leak last month when his self-critical strategy briefing ended up in the hands of the New York Daily News.

In the Romney document, which his campaign declined to confirm as authentic, advisers confront the challenges that the former governor faces as he seeks the Republican nomination. Among them, the document says, are his newly conservative positions on social issues and his belief in the Mormon faith, which is viewed skeptically by many members of other Christian denominations.

The document notes that Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) is seen as a war hero but also as an inside-the-Beltway politician, the Globe reported. It sees Giuliani's political strength emanating from his post-Sept. 11, 2001, actions as mayor, but touches on his "personal political liabilities" -- a reference, perhaps, to his nasty and public divorce from his second wife, Donna Hanover.

It also contemplates using antipathy toward France as a campaign tool, suggesting that comparing Sen. Hillary Clinton (D-N.Y.) to that country might earn Romney votes.Date Set to Fill Ga. House Seat

Mark June 19 on your calendars. That is the day that Gov. Sonny Perdue (R-Ga.) has chosen for the special election to fill the vacancy created when Rep. Charlie Norwood (R) died on Feb. 13.

The two leading Republican candidates to replace him are state senators. Ralph Hudgens is making his second try at the seat after losing to Norwood in a 1994 primary. In that race, Hudgens led on the initial ballot but lost 51 percent to 49 percent to Norwood in a runoff.

Hudgens's primary challenge will come from Jim Whitehead, who is seeking to tie himself to Norwood's legacy.

Several other Republicans are either running or contemplating the race, raising the possibility that no one will claim a majority in the primary. In that case, the two top vote-getters would advance to a July 17 runoff.

DOJ_NMG_0137808

Democrats are not expected to seriously contest the northeastern Georgia district, where President Bush won 65 percent of the vote in 2004.

Edwards Apologizes For 2002 War Vote (AP)

By Beth Fouhy

AP, February 28, 2007

Democrat John Edwards said Tuesday that honesty and openness were essential qualities for a president, and that he was proud to acknowledge his 2002 vote authorizing the invasion of Iraq was a mistake.

Trolling for campaign cash on a three-day visit to New York — home of his chief Democratic rival, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton — Edwards spoke to reporters after attending a union-sponsored workshop on eradicating poverty.

Asked whether his repeated apologies for his vote would be a turnoff to voters over time, the 2004 vice presidential nominee said that after six years of President Bush, voters craved a president willing to acknowledge errors and change course if necessary.

"If you asked me what I think the most important personal characteristics of the next president are, I would say honesty, openness and decency," he said. "There's not a single voter in America who doesn't understand that their president is human, and their president will sometimes makes mistakes."

At a voter forum in Carson City, Nev., last week, Edwards said Clinton's decision not to disavow her vote was "between her and her conscience." He didn't mention her Wednesday, taking a swipe at President Bush instead.

Voters, the former North Carolina senator said, "want you to be willing to change course when something's not working. We've had six-plus years now of a president who is completely unwilling to do that."

For her part, Clinton's also had a busy fundraising week — thanks in part to an online effort by her husband, Bill Clinton.

In an e-mail to his wife's supporters last Wednesday, the former president launched a fundraising drive aimed at raising $1 million in a week. As of Tuesday afternoon, the campaign said it had brought in nearly $890,000.

Blacks Shift To Obama, Poll Finds (WP)

By Dan Balz And Jon Cohen

The Washington Post, February 28, 2007

The opening stages of the campaign for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination have produced a noticeable shift in sentiment among African American voters, who little more than a month ago heavily supported Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton but now favor the candidacy of Sen. Barack Obama.

Clinton, of New York, continues to lead Obama and other rivals in the Democratic contest, according to the latest Washington Post-ABC News poll. But her once-sizable margin over the freshman senator from Illinois was sliced in half during the past month largely because of Obama's growing support among black voters.

In the Republican race, former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani, who recently made clear his intentions to seek the presidency, has expanded his lead over Sen. John McCain of Arizona. Giuliani holds a 2 to 1 advantage over McCain among Republicans, according to the poll, more than tripling his margin of a month ago.

The principal reason was a shift among white evangelical Protestants, who now clearly favor Giuliani over McCain. Giuliani is doing well among this group of Americans despite his support of abortion rights and gay rights, two issues of great importance to religious conservatives. McCain opposes abortion rights.

Among Democrats, Clinton still enjoys many of the advantages of a traditional front-runner. Pitted against Obama and former senator John Edwards of North Carolina, she was seen by Democrats as the candidate with the best experience to be president, as the strongest leader, as having the best chance to get elected, as the closest to voters on the issues and as the candidate who best understands the problems "of people like you." Obama was seen as the most inspirational.

The Post-ABC News poll was completed days after aides to the two leading Democrats engaged in a testy exchange over comments critical of Clinton and her husband, former president Bill Clinton, by Hollywood mogul David Geffen, a former friend and financial backer of the Clintons who held a fundraiser for Obama last week in Los Angeles.

Early national polls are not always good predictors for presidential campaigns, but the Post-ABC poll offers clues to the competition ahead.

On the January weekend when she announced her candidacy, Clinton led the Democratic field with 41 percent. Obama was second at 17 percent, Edwards was third at 11 percent and former vice president Al Gore, who has said he has no plans to run, was fourth at 10 percent.

DOJ_NMG_0137809

The latest poll put Clinton at 36 percent, Obama at 24 percent, Gore at 14 percent and Edwards at 12 percent. None of the other Democrats running received more than 3 percent. With Gore removed from the field, Clinton would gain ground on Obama, leading the Illinois senator 43 percent to 27 percent. Edwards ran third at 14 percent. The poll was completed the night Gore's documentary film "An Inconvenient Truth" won an Academy Award.

Clinton's and Obama's support among white voters changed little since December, but the shifts among black Democrats were dramatic. In December and January Post-ABC News polls, Clinton led Obama among African Americans by 60 percent to 20 percent. In the new poll, Obama held a narrow advantage among blacks, 44 percent to 33 percent. The shift came despite four in five blacks having a favorable impression of the New York senator.

African Americans view Clinton even more positively than they see Obama, but in the time since he began his campaign, his favorability rating rose significantly among blacks. In the latest poll, 70 percent of African Americans said they had a favorable impression of Obama, compared with 54 percent in December and January.

Overall, Clinton's favorability ratings dipped slightly from January, with 49 percent of Americans having a favorable impression and 48 percent an unfavorable impression. Obama's ratings among all Americans improved over the past month, with 53 percent saying they have a favorable impression and 30 percent saying they have an unfavorable impression.

Her position on the war in Iraq does not appear to be hurting Clinton among Democrats, even though she has faced hostile questioning from some voters about her 2002 vote authorizing President Bush to go to war. Some Democrats have demanded that she apologize for the vote, which she has declined to do.

The Post-ABC News poll found that 52 percent of Democrats said her vote was the right thing to do at the time, while 47 percent said it was a mistake. Of those who called it a mistake, however, 31 percent said she should apologize. Among Democrats who called the war the most important issue in deciding their 2008 candidate preference, Clinton led Obama 40 to 26 percent.

In the Republican contest, McCain was once seen as the early, if fragile, front-runner for his party's nomination, but Giuliani's surge adds a new dimension to the race. In the latest poll, the former New York mayor led among Republicans with 44 percent to McCain's 21 percent. Last month, Giuliani led with 34 percent to McCain's 27 percent.

Former House speaker Newt Gingrich of Georgia ran third in the latest poll with 15 percent, while former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney was fourth with 4 percent. Gingrich has not said he definitely plans to run, and without him, Giuliani's lead would increase even more, to 53 percent compared with McCain's 23 percent.

When Republicans were asked to rate Giuliani, McCain and Romney on a series of attributes, Giuliani was seen as the strongest leader, the most inspiring, the candidate with the best chance of winning the general election, the most honest and trustworthy and the one closest to them on the issues. McCain was seen as having the best experience to be president, but only by a narrow margin.

Giuliani faces potential problems because of his views on abortion and gay rights. More than four in 10 Republicans said they were less likely to support him because of those views. More than two in 10 Republicans said there was "no chance" they would vote for him.

With Clinton and Obama as possible barrier-breakers in this presidential campaign, Americans were asked how a candidate's race or sex would affect their vote. What the poll showed is that Americans indicated they were less likely to support a candidate older than 72 or a candidate who is a Mormon than a female or black candidate.

Those findings could affect McCain, who is 70, and Romney, who is a Mormon. Nearly six in 10 said they would be less likely to vote for someone older than 72, while three in 10 said they would be less likely to support a Mormon.

The Post-ABC News poll was conducted by telephone Feb. 22-25 among a random sample of 1,082 adults, including an oversample of 86 black respondents. The margin of sampling error for the poll was plus or minus three percentage points; it is higher for the sub-samples.

Pardons Reemerge As Issue In Clinton Run (BOS)

By Michael Kranish

The Boston Globe, February 28, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Six years ago, the launch of Hillary Clinton's career in the US Senate was marred by allegations that her brothers had received payments from people pardoned by President Bill Clinton in the waning months of his presidency.

Now, in the wake of the launch of her presidential campaign, the pardon controversy has reemerged in an obscure court case in which Senator Clinton's brother Tony is battling an order to repay more than $100,000 he received from a couple pardoned by President Clinton.

DOJ_NMG_0137810

Tony Rodham, who acknowledged approaching the president about a pardon for the couple, is the second of Hillary Clinton's brothers to receive money from people who were eventually pardoned by President Clinton. Hugh Rodham received $400,000 from two people, one of whom was pardoned and one whose sentence was commuted.

But while Hillary Clinton immediately expressed chagrin over the news in 2001 that Hugh received the money -- and asked him to return it -- she said Tony was "not paid," according to a congressional report. The Clinton campaign yesterday declined to comment on the case involving Tony Rodham.

Clinton critics have been seeking to revive an array of controversies, from the Whitewater land deal to the Monica Lewinsky case. The Clinton campaign has sought to depict them as old or moot cases. But the Tony Rodham case could be different because it is in court just as Senator Clinton's campaign reaches full speed.

Yesterday, US Bankruptcy Court Judge Marian Harrison of Nashville ordered Tony Rodham to respond by March 16 to the allegation that he failed to repay a loan of $107,000 from the couple pardoned by Clinton, according to attorneys involved in the case.

President Clinton's pardons have been a political issue for Hillary Clinton because of her ties to a number of the cases. In addition to the people who paid her brothers, those receiving pardons included commodities trader Marc Rich, a fugitive who was prosecuted for tax evasion by then-US Attorney Rudolph Giuliani and fled to Switzerland. Rich was pardoned after his former wife, Denise Rich, contributed heavily to Hillary Clinton's Senate campaign.

Controversy over the pardons was reignited last week after Hollywood mogul and former Clinton supporter David Geffen criticized the Clintons for the Rich pardon.

"It is a legitimate campaign issue," said Stephen Gillers, professor of legal ethics at New York University School of Law. He said that Hillary Clinton should answer questions about her brothers' and her own involvement in the pardons because "the stench of the Marc Rich pardon still stinks and it has never been adequately explained. "

The Tony Rodham lawsuit revolves around his work for a carnival company, United Shows of America, which was owned by Edgar and Vonna Jo Gregory. The couple, who had been convicted of bank fraud, hired Tony Rodham as a business consultant and paid him $244,769 in salary over 2 1/2 years, according to a congressional report.

President Clinton pardoned the couple in March 2000. The Republican-controlled House Government Reform Committee issued a 2002 report that said Rodham had helped the couple obtain the pardon.

Edgar Gregory has since died, and his company is now bankrupt. The lawsuit against Tony Rodham, brought by the bankruptcy trustee, revolves around whether the Gregorys loaned Rodham $107,000, or whether that money was part of his salary. The trustee for the bankrupt estate says it was a loan that was never repaid and that, with interest, it would now be $153,000.

When Tony Rodham's involvement with the Gregorys first became public in early 2001, Hillary Clinton said that her brother had known the couple "for some time . . . he has a personal relationship with them. He was not paid."

The House Government Reform Committee report the next year, noting that Rodham had worked as a consultant to the Gregorys, said a further review should be conducted to determine whether Hillary Clinton "knew of the financial relationship between Tony Rodham and the Gregorys when Rodham was lobbying the President for pardons." The report said Hillary Clinton's "statement that Tony Rodham 'was not paid' is not accurate."

Rodham yesterday did not respond to a request for comment. In 2001, he said on CNN that he had worked as a consultant for the Gregorys but that "on the pardon issue, I never received a dime from them."

Rodham also said that he mentioned the pardon application to then-President Clinton. "Yes, I did," Rodham said. "And I have no problem saying I mentioned it to the president."

Attorneys for Rodham and the bankrupt estate said they have no plans to involve the Clintons in the case and declined to comment on the pardon.

"We are dealing with a bankrupt estate, so we are not going to be spending a lot of money to flesh out the pardon issues that are related to this," Michael Collins, the attorney for the bankrupt estate, said.

Rodham's attorney, Samuel Crocker, said in an interview yesterday that he believed the case would be settled. Crocker said he had "no interest" in involving the Clintons in the proceeding or delving into the pardon.

Groups critical of the Clintons have tied the case to questions about the pardons. Judicial Watch, a group that has targeted the Clintons for years, said the bankruptcy proceeding should prompt the Justice Department to review the circumstances of the pardon.

But a Justice Department official wrote to Judicial Watch on Jan. 16 that "it is likely that any new allegations would be outside of the five-year statute of limitations period."

DOJ_NMG_0137811

Judicial Watch last year tried to obtain unredacted documents related to the pardon of the Gregorys but were rebuffed by the Bush administration, which said releasing them would violate executive privilege.

The Clinton pardons were a major scandal in early 2001, as Hillary was beginning her term. She said she and the president did not know her brother Hugh had received $400,000 in fees from two people, one of whom received a commutation and one a pardon. Hugh Rodham has said he returned the money.

The Rich pardon received the most attention. Rich had been indicted in 1983 on charges of tax evasion and illegal trading with Iran. Rich fled to Switzerland and never stood trial.

Before Rich received the pardon in January 2001, his former wife, Denise Rich, contributed $70,000 to a fund supporting Hillary Clinton's Senate bid, and also made a large contribution to the Clinton presidential library.

President Clinton has said he pardoned Rich at the behest of Israeli officials, and has denied any wrongdoing.

Clinton Foundation Not Listed On Senator's Disclosure Reports (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, February 28, 2007

The charitable family foundation that Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton and former President Bill Clinton have operated since 2001 has not been listed on Mrs. Clinton's annual Senate financial disclosure reports for five years.

Aides to the Clintons said that the omission was a clerical error and that it was corrected immediately after The Washington Post brought it to their attention on Monday. The Post published an article on the foundation on Tuesday.

"It was inadvertently omitted from her Senate filing, an oversight that has since been corrected," said Philippe Reines, a spokesman for Mrs. Clinton.

Details about the foundation have been on an Internal Revenue Service Web site for years.

According to the I.R.S. filings, the Clintons have contributed $5 million to the charity, the Clinton Family Foundation, and it has made grants to Yale University, where they both attended law school, and to other charities that have personal meaning for the Clintons. They and their daughter, Chelsea, are officers of the charity, but they do not receive compensation. All the money goes to other charities, the advisers said.

As a result of the foundation, Clinton advisers say, the couple receive the standard tax benefits for philanthropy.

"The Clinton Family Foundation was created solely for their personal charitable giving, and it represents only a fraction of their overall charitable giving," said Jay Carson, a spokesman for the former president.

Mr. Clinton's personal foundation directs millions of dollars to charities each year, and he has raised billions in corporate funds to fight AIDS, disease and poverty through his annual Clinton Global Initiative conference.

Feb. 5 National Primary (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, February 28, 2007

Pressure from the leading presidential candidates has set the stage for a Feb. 5 national primary that will likely include 20 states, possibly more.

Working behind the scenes and mostly through surrogates, Democratic Sens. Barack Obama (Ill.) and Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), and Republicans Sen. John McCain (Ariz.), former Gov. Mitt Romney (Mass.) and former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani have fueled a rush of states to hold primary elections on Feb. 5 next year, or earlier. As many as 23 states are in the frame to hold primary elections on that date.

Delaware, Missouri, New Mexico and Oklahoma in 2004 held their nominating contests on the first Tuesday of February, and are likely be joined this time by such big states as California, Illinois, Michigan, New Jersey, New York and Texas. They may be joined also by smaller states including Tennessee, Arkansas, Arizona, Alabama, Georgia, North Dakota, Utah, Kansas, Colorado and (for the GOP only) West Virginia and Nevada. The legislatures of Pennsylvania and North Carolina are holding hearings on the issue but the outcomes of these are uncertain.

Allies of candidates who expect to do well in these states are taking lead roles in moving primaries there to early February. By holding primaries soon after the Iowa caucuses, the first contest of the year, such states will have a bigger impact than before on who becomes the Republican and Democratic presidential nominees.

Clinton's allies in New York and New Jersey will be instrumental should those states move their primary dates to Feb. 5.

In recent weeks, buzz over a Feb. 5 primary date has picked up noticeably in New York. Those who could make it happen are Democratic state assembly speaker Sheldon Silver, who supports Clinton, and state senate majority leader Joseph Bruno, who says he is neutral at this point.

DOJ_NMG_0137812

In New Jersey, legislators are moving ahead with a bill to create a Feb. 5 primary with the approval of Gov. Jon Corzine (D), who has signaled to state Clinton supporters that he will soon endorse her.

Clinton's advantage in New York, where she recently won re-election with 67 percent of the vote, is obvious. But she is also expected to have a significant advantage over her rivals in New Jersey, where much of the population is part of New York City's media market.

In Illinois, Obama's allies have been outspoken about helping their favorite by establishing an early primary date.

"Sen. Obama offers real hope for the American people and I am proud to give him my support," said Democratic Gov. Rod Blagojevich on the day of Obama's official presidential announcement, "I want to take this opportunity on this historic day to urge the legislature to immediately send me a bill to move our state's primary from March 18, 2008 to February 5, 2008. That will give Illinois voters an opportunity to send an early message in support of Sen. Obama and send him to victory."

Obama is expected to win the state because he represents it in Congress, even though Clinton was born in Chicago.

New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson has also been active. He has worked personally to move Nevada and Utah, Western states where he is expected to have an advantage, up in the process.

"There was certainly cooperation between Gov. Richardson and Sen. [Harry] Reid [D-Nev.] to move Nevada up, in the overall belief that Nevada is the makeweight of the 2008 presidential race," said Mike Stratton, who formerly served on the Democratic National Committee's (DNC) scheduling and nominating commission.

Stratton, who advocated for a Western regional primary while on the commission, said Richardson also worked with Utah Gov. Jon Huntsman (R) to advance the Utah primary to Feb. 5.

Richardson is expected to do well in both states because issues important to New Mexico, such as water rights and federal land management, are also important in Utah. Being Hispanic could also help him in Nevada because perhaps 20 percent of its population is Hispanic. Supporters of Romney, a Mormon, and McCain, a westerner, have also pushed for an early Utah primary, a state GOP official said.

Richardson has also pressed to move California's primary to Feb. 5. During a speech in Washington yesterday, Richardson joked that he would like to see the California primary "with all those Latino voters" take place earlier, adding that he had spoken with Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R-Calif.) about it during this week's National Governors Association conference.

The candidates' influence over the state primary calendars has drawn criticism.

"On the one hand, the Republican Party supports any effort to make it more relevant [in the presidential nomination process]," said Jason Heffley, deputy executive director of the Illinois Republican Party, in reference to efforts by Blagojevich and House Speaker Michael Madigan to move the primary up, "but it's very unfortunate that the Democratic leadership in the state is doing it to help the political ambitions of one person."

Republican White House hopefuls and their allies have also worked to move up primary dates in states where they have an advantage.

McCain won the Michigan presidential primary in 2000 and has a well-coordinated campaign there. His supporters pressed for an early February primary, which is in the process of being made official.

"McCain won here and it's thought he has good chances," said Michigan GOP party chairman Saul Anuzis, who has pledged to stay neutral.

"Last year the McCain folks were all in favor of" an early primary, said Anuzis. "They were the only ones organized. I think they were the ones last year who were most up front and center in pushing for an open primary system and having it early. His partisans were key players on the process committees and the ones pushing for the current proposal in front of the legislature."

A strategist with a rival Republican campaign said Romney's people were pushing for a Jan. 29, 2008 primary for Florida, where the former governor has invested much time and effort.

In Florida, one of the first and most influential advocates of an earlier primary was former state Republican chairman Al Cardenas, now a member of Romney's Florida statewide steering committee.

Cardenas noted that when he began pushing for an earlier primary, he was not yet committed to Romney.

Republican leaders in the state House are pushing for an earlier primary, and Cardenas said that while they are neutral right now, there is a good chance they will side with Romney. Three former Florida House speakers are on Romney's steering committee: Allan Bense, John Thrasher, and Rep. Tom Feeney (R-Fla.).

Cardenas said Romney's advantage in Florida is revealed by the fact that "more than half of the Republican major donors and fundraisers" have committed to Romney. But one GOP strategist countered that an early Florida primary may not be in Romney's interest because Giuliani is far better known in the state.

DOJ_NMG_0137813

Giuliani's allies have been active in trying to move up the GOP primaries in California and New Jersey, according to a source close to his campaign. The source said former California gubernatorial candidate Bill Simon has worked behind the scenes to build support for a Feb. 5 primary. Simon did not respond to a request for an interview.

The source said Giuliani's allies are also part of the effort to advance the New Jersey primary. A strategist with a rival campaign made the same assertion.

Giuliani is expected to do well in California because his relatively liberal record on social issues is likely to be more palatable to GOP voters there. And many voters in New Jersey in the New York media market followed his exploits while he was mayor of the Big Apple, including his heroics on Sept. 11, 2001.

Only Strong Will Survive This Big Bang (HILL)

The Hill, February 28, 2007

Nineteen states or more, with half of America's population, are moving to hold their presidential nominating primaries on Feb. 5, 2008, a mere three weeks after the Iowa caucuses and two weeks after the New Hampshire primary. In effect, we will now have a national primary and the presidential nominating season will last only three weeks from start to finish.

The effect of this gigantic sea change will be that whoever is the frontrunner in each party by the fall of 2007 will be virtually certain to win the nomination because only the frontrunner can possibly hope to amass enough money to compete in half the country at once. Nobody but the likely winner in each party will be able to compete at that level on Feb. 5.

Money will now be king. Nothing else will count very much. If you can afford to run a national campaign three weeks after the first caucus, you will win. If you can't, you're doomed. And the polling that designates a frontrunner now will do much to determine the nominee.

Big states, including California, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Michigan, New Jersey, and North Carolina, are moving their primaries up to Feb. 5. They are going to be joined by a dozen smaller states: Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, Colorado, Delaware, Kansas, Missouri, Nevada (GOP only), New Mexico, Oklahoma, Tennessee, and Utah. With half of the country — these states have a combined population of 145 million — voting on Feb. 5, many other states are sure to join the move and vote on that early date. After all, which state legislature wants to consign its voters to political irrelevance by voting in April or May? Before we are done, we will have America's first national primary on Feb. 5.

The financial demands of competing in each of these states are so onerous that only the richest of candidates can hope to win. That kind of money only goes to frontrunners. As a result, the process will be sufficiently top-heavy that the candidates who enjoy clear leads in the polls after the summer of 2007 will have a virtual lock on the nomination before anybody has cast a vote on anything in any state!

The danger, of course, is that the frontrunner will have been anointed without ever actually holding a primary. The effect will be to strip the primary process of its power — for the first time since it became the central way of selecting candidates in the aftermath of the 1972 reforms — and give the power to designate candidates to national public-opinion polls conducted among random representative samples of the voters. It is the triumph of the pollsters and fundraisers.

So how will we choose who are the frontrunners before anyone has voted? How will candidates impact the polls in order to swell their coffers? The early primary date means that the virtual primaries that will designate the frontrunners will be held on cable television, the Internet, and talk radio. The Republican Virtual Primary will be held on Fox News, the Limbaugh, Hannity, and other conservative talk radio shows, and the right-wing websites. The Democratic Virtual Primary will be held on National Public Radio, PBS, a handful of liberal talk shows, the network news programs, and websites like MoveOn.org where liberals congregate.

But what happens if the candidate chosen by this instant virtual lottery has feet of clay that only become evident when he or she actually runs for office in a real election? The testing, seasoning, vetting, and whittling-down of the field, which used to take five or six months, cannot now take place at all. We will never know how the candidates of each party will perform in an actual election. Voters in each party will be buying a car without being able to take it for a drive.

In 2004, when the process was so truncated that Kerry was chosen as the nominee in March, the Democratic Party found itself saddled with a deeply flawed candidate whose shortcomings were not evident until after the Democratic Convention had nominated him. Throughout the fall of 2004, Kerry's inability as a candidate became so glaringly obvious that Democrats didn't give him a second look when he sought their nomination again this year.

The early primary dates would seem, at the moment, to confer an enormous advantage on the frontrunners in each party: Hillary Clinton and Rudy Giuliani. Their current leads in the polls and their consequent fundraising advantage make them stronger favorites than they might be if they had to run in a succession of primaries week after week.

DOJ_NMG_0137814

So the new process, bequeathed to us by the advancing of the primary dates, will reward the rich, the pollsters, and the talk shows. And politics will never be the same again.

Morris, a former political adviser to Sen. Trent Lott (R-Miss.) and President Bill Clinton, is the author of Condi vs. Hillary: The Next Great Presidential Race. To get all of Dick Morris's and Eileen McGann's columns for free by email, go to www.dickmorris.com.

Competing In The Money Marathon (NYT)

The New York Times, February 28, 2007

If nothing else, the disheartening frenzy to raise huge campaign donations in this front-loaded presidential race is making money — lots and lots of money — a public issue. In the cross-fire, federal election regulators are expected to approve Senator Barack Obama's clever but cagey attempt to claim a reformer's mantle: he wants to let the nominees keep bagging unlimited private donations in the run-up to the primaries, then have the choice of returning a chunk of it after the conventions and accepting limited public financing for the general election.

Of course, Mr. Obama is proposing to adopt the even-money truce — should he win the nomination — only if the Republican nominee does the same.

Behind this shadowboxing is the fact that the post-Watergate public financing of presidential elections has not kept pace with inflation. This failure, which a conscientious Congress would repair in time for the 2012 election, has put private fund-raisers back at the wheel. All major candidates, including Mr. Obama, are rejecting the $65 million possible through the public money route for the primaries as a trifle.

Mr. Obama may be scoring political points in the reformers' image race with Senator Hillary Clinton, who lately yielded and agreed to disclose who her fund-raising megabrokers are. But voters should not get their hopes too high. The Obama and Clinton campaigns did not hesitate to upstage the Oscars with a hissy fit over who can best beg before Hollywood's deep-pocketed political sages. The candidates' mix of furious money-seeking and ritual umbrage at its excesses evokes St. Augustine's self-reform: "Make me chaste, oh Lord, but not yet."

Group Says Gore's Home Overuses Electricity (USAT/AP)

USA Today, February 28, 2007

NASHVILLE (AP) — Al Gore, a leading voice in the fight against global warming, is being called a hypocrite by a conservative group that claims his Nashville mansion uses too much electricity.

A spokeswoman for Gore said the former vice president invests in enough renewable energy to make up for the home's power consumption.

Gore's documentary filmAn Inconvenient Truth, which chronicled his campaign against global warming, won an Academy Award on Sunday.

The next day, the Tennessee Center for Policy Research put out a news release saying Gore was not doing enough to reduce his own consumption of electricity. The group disputes whether global warming is a serious problem.

"We wanted to see if he was living by his own recommendations and walking the walk," said Drew Johnson, president of the think tank, which pushes for conservative economic issues.

Utility records show the Gore family paid an average monthly electric bill of about $1,200 last year for its 10,000-square-foot home.

The Gores used about 191,000 kilowatt hours in 2006, according to bills reviewed by The Associated Press spanning the period from Feb. 3, 2006, to Jan. 5. That is far more than the typical Nashville household, which uses about 15,600 kilowatt-hours per year.

His Nashville home is more than four times larger than the average new American home built last year — about 2,400 square feet, according to the National Association of Home Builders.

A spokeswoman for Gore said he purchases enough "green power" — renewable energy sources such as solar, wind and methane gas — to balance 100% of his electricity costs.

"Sometimes when people don't like the message, in this case that global warming is real, it's convenient to attack the messenger," Gore spokeswoman Kalee Kreider said.

Gore participates in a utility program that sells blocks of "green power" for an extra $4 a month. Gore purchases 108 such blocks every month, covering 16,200 kilowatt-hours and helping subsidize renewable energy sources.

Johnson said it's unclear whether global warming is caused by humans, and he said the threat outlined in Gore's documentary is exaggerated.

DOJ_NMG_0137815

The think tank said that Gore used nearly 221,000 kilowatt hours last year and that his average monthly electric bill was $1,359. Johnson said his group got its figures from Nashville Electric Service.

But electric company spokeswoman Laurie Parker said the utility never got a request from the policy center and never provided them with any information.

Parker said Gore has been purchasing the "green power" for $432 a month since November. The Gore home is also under renovation to add solar panels, Kreider said.

Gore also owns homes in Carthage, Tenn., and in the Washington area.

Gore has said he leads a "carbon-neutral lifestyle." To balance out other carbon emissions, the Gores invest money in projects to reduce energy consumption around the globe, Kreider said.

"For every ton of carbon they emit, he offsets that by doing investments in renewable energy sources," Kreider said.

Johnson said those efforts were unconvincing.

"In general, I applaud his efforts to reduce energy consumption, but if he is going to be a spokesman for global warming, he has to be willing to make the same sacrifices," Johnson said.

Johnson said Gore's home has gas lamps lining the driveway, a heated pool and an electric gate, all of which would be easy to do without.

Kreider confirmed that Gore's home has a heated pool and an electric gate, but noted that the gate is important for security and that the driveway has only one gas lamp.

Focusing on Gore's personal electricity consumption misses the point of An Inconvenient Truth, Kreider said, which is that governments and the public can work together to reduce emissions.

Politicians' Flights Called Wasteful (LAT)

By Paul Pringle

The Los Angeles Times, February 28, 2007

Sen. Dianne Feinstein offers plenty of tips on how California households can combat global warming, such as carpooling and running only a full dishwasher.

But one bit of information Feinstein declines to share is the number of times that she flew last year on her husband's Gulfstream jet, which burns much more fuel per passenger-mile than commercial airliners.

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger also has asked constituents to do their part to conserve energy — including cutting summertime power consumption — even though he takes to the skies on leased executive jets.

Aides say there is nothing contradictory between the pro-green pronouncements and the flying habits of the Democratic senator and Republican governor.

Some environmentalists aren't so sure.

"There appears to be a discrepancy between calling on people to make personal reductions and using a private jet that exacerbates the problem," Clean Air Watch President Frank O'Donnell said.

Flying on a Gulfstream rather than an airliner is like driving a sport utility vehicle instead of riding a bus, O'Donnell and others say.

A single cross-country round trip on a Gulfstream IV, or GIV, the model owned by Feinstein's husband, churns out about 83,000 to 90,000 pounds of carbon dioxide, experts say. By contrast, on a per capita basis, the average American produces 50,000 pounds from all activities in an entire year.

Nonetheless, Feinstein and Schwarzenegger intend to continue their noncommercial flying ways because their jobs demand a flexibility the airlines can't match, spokesmen say.

Schwarzenegger's office said he and a jet-leasing company are establishing a "carbon offset" program for the governor and fellow customers, retroactive to Jan. 1. Carbon offsets are bought from organizations that plant trees and support renewable energy enterprises, among other measures, to offset greenhouse gases produced by the buyers.

"This is big news," Schwarzenegger spokesman Bill Maile said of the governor's undertaking with NetJets, the leasing firm.

Feinstein, however, got the jump on Schwarzenegger. She began buying carbon offsets last year to partially cover the travel on the GIV, and will purchase enough offsets this year to compensate for all the trips, spokesman Scott Gerber said.

He added that Feinstein took "numerous" commercial flights in 2006, but flew mostly on the GIV. He balked at disclosing the tally of her Gulfstream journeys.

"We're not going to get into specifics," he said.

Noncommercial aircraft and other carbon-related indulgences have caused politicians considerable turbulence recently.

DOJ_NMG_0137816

A conservative group has condemned Al Gore for racking up an average monthly electricity bill of $1,200 at his Nashville mansion last year while championing the anti-global warming cause. A Gore spokeswoman said the former vice president invests in renewable energy to offset his electricity use.

As part of an ethics push, the House and Senate are toughening restrictions on lawmakers who fly private jets, though exceptions for members and spouses who own planes are under consideration.

Earlier this month, Republicans accused House Speaker Nancy Pelosi of requesting a large military jet to fly her and family members between the capital and her San Francisco district.

Security protocols grant Pelosi occasional military flights because she is second in line to the presidency. Her office said she had only inquired about an aircraft with enough fuel capacity to make the trip nonstop, and would fly commercial if necessary.

Pelosi flew on private jets seven times in 2006, her spokesman said. "She made every effort to travel commercially whenever possible," Drew Hammill said.

Sen. Barbara Boxer says she took four trips on private aircraft last year, one with multiple stops over 2 1/2 days.

"If you can take a commercial plane to get where you need to go at the time you need to be there, you should do it," she said in an e-mail. "If not, you have to look at alternatives such as trains, fuel-efficient vehicles, buses, and in some cases, private planes."

For that last option, Feinstein reimburses her husband, Richard Blum, for use of the jet, Gerber said. Blum bought the GIV for about $23 million in 1999. The reimbursements are based on a first-class commercial fare, with more than 90% of the money coming from Feinstein's personal funds and the rest from campaign coffers, the spokesman said. Last year, the reimbursements to Blum totaled about $73,000, he said.

But a GIV's operating expenses are much higher than a first-class booking. A round-trip Los Angeles-Washington flight on the Gulfstream burns about 4,500 to 5,000 gallons of fuel at a cost of roughly $20,000, depending on local pump prices, said Jeff Beck, a veteran corporate pilot. And that doesn't include pilot fees, maintenance and parking bills.

"It's the least environmental thing that politicians can do," Beck said. He said Gulfstreams devour so much fossil fuel per passenger that "it's like they're throwing dinosaur bones out of the tailpipe."

A coast-to-coast, first-class ticket on a major airline goes for about $1,200 to $2,500, round trip, according to a sampling of three airlines' prices Tuesday.

A Boeing 767-200 airliner burns about 1,550 gallons an hour — three times as much as a GIV. But the larger plane typically can seat about 180 passengers, as opposed to a GIV's 12 to 14.

Eric Carlson, executive director of Carbonfund.org, a nonprofit that sells offsets, said it would charge $229 to cover the emissions from the GIV round trip.

Schwarzenegger flies a variety of leased jets, which cost his campaign $733,000 during the three months ending last September. Maile said the governor digs into his own pockets for some flights.

He also said Schwarzenegger has converted one of his Hummers to biodiesel fuel, and plans to install solar panels on his house. His other three Hummers remain gas hogs.

For her part, Feinstein drives a hybrid Lexus sport utility vehicle when she is home in San Francisco, Gerber said. But she drives a Lincoln Town Car in Washington.

Not that the eco-crowd is eager to criticize Feinstein and Schwarzenegger, who are generally viewed as key supporters of the growing movement to curb emissions.

Representatives of some environmental groups either would not comment on the two politicians' penchant for private jets, or suggested that allowances could be made in their circumstances.

"Given the exigencies of the campaign trail, if not the demands of governing of a large state, it may not be realistic to expect elective officials to fly commercial all the time," said Jon Coifman, spokesman for the Natural Resources Defense Council.

But O'Donnell, of Clean Air Watch, invoked a loftier ideal:

"It is fair to hope that our political leaders will lead by example."

Ozone Man Sequel (NYT)

By Maureen Dowd

The New York Times, February 28, 2007

HOLLYWOOD

Al Gore now has a movie with an Oscar and a grandson named Oscar.

Who could ask for anything more?

Al Gore could.

DOJ_NMG_0137817

The best ex-president who was never president could make one of the most interesting campaigns in American history even more interesting. Will he use his green moment on the red carpet in black tie to snag blue states and win the White House?

Only the Goracle knows the answer.

The man who was prescient on climate change, the Internet, terrorism and Iraq admitted that maybe his problem had been that he was too far ahead of the curve. He realized at a conference that "there're ideas that are mature, ideas that are maturing, ideas that are past their prime ... and a category called 'predawn.'

"And all of a sudden it hit me," he told John Heilemann of New York magazine last year. "Most of my political career was spent investing in predawn ideas! I thought, Oh, that's where I went wrong."

As Mr. Gore basked Sunday night in the adoration of Leo, Laurie David and the rest of the Hollywood hybrid-drivers, Democrats wondered: Is this chubby guy filling out the Ralph Lauren three-piece tuxedo a mature idea or an idea that's past its prime?

With Hillary overproduced and Barack Obama an unfinished script, maybe it's time to bring the former vice president out of turnaround.

Hillary's henchmen try to prognosticate the Goracle's future by looking at his waistline, according to Newsday; they think if he's going to run, he'll get back to fighting weight.

With her own talent for checking the weathervane, Hillary co-opted Mr. Gore's eco-speak right after the Oscars, talking environment throughout upstate New York. Given his past competition with Hillary, Mr. Gore must have delighted in seeing his star rise in Hollywood as hers dimmed.

If he waits long enough to get into the race, all the usual-suspect-consultants will be booked — which would be a boon for Mr. Gore, since his Hessian strategists in 2000 made him soft-pedal the environment, the very issue that makes him seem most passionate and authentic. The same slides about feedback loops and the interconnectedness of weather patterns that made his image-makers yawn just won his movie an Academy Award.

But what's going on in his head? Like Jeb Bush, Al Gore was the good son groomed by a famous pol to be president, only to have it snatched away by a black sheep who didn't even know the name of the general running Pakistan (the same one he just sent Vice to try to push into line.) It must be excruciating not only to lose a presidency you've won because the Supreme Court turned partisan and stopped the vote, but to then watch the madness of King George and Tricky Dick II as they misled their way into serial catastrophes.

Even though Chickenhawk Cheney finally got close to combat in Afghanistan, his explosive brush with a suicide bomber has not served as a wake-up call about the danger of Osama bin Laden's staying on the lam, and Afghanistan's slipping back into the claws of the Taliban and Al Qaeda while we are shackled to Iraq.

A reporter asked Tony Snow yesterday what the attack on the Bagram Air Base that targeted the vice president and killed at least 23 people said about the Taliban's strength. "I'm not sure it says anything," he replied.

Mr. Gore must be pleased that he's been vindicated on so many fronts, yet it still must rankle the Nobel Peace Prize nominee to hear the White House spouting such dangerous nonsense. He must sometimes imagine how much safer the world would be if he were president.

The Bush-Cheney years have been all about dragging the country into the past, getting back the presidential powers yanked away after Watergate, settling scores from Poppy Bush's old war, and suppressing scientific and environmental advances. Instead of aiming for the stars, the greatest power on earth is bogged down in poorly navigated conflicts with ancient tribes and brutes in caves.

Surely the Goracle, an aficionado of futurism, must stew about all the time and money and good will that has been wasted with a Vietnam replay and a scolding social policy designed to expunge the Age of Aquarius.

When he's finished Web surfing, tweaking his PowerPoint and BlackBerrying, what goes through his head? Does he blame himself? Does he blame the voting machines? Ralph Nader? Robert Shrum? Naomi Wolf? How about Bush Inc. and Clinton Inc.?

With the red carpet rolled up, the tux at the cleaner's, and the gold statuette on the director's mantle, not his, the Goracle is at his Nashville mansion, contemplating how to broker his next deal. Will he cast himself as the savior of the post-Bush era, or will the first Gore in the Oval Office be Karenna, mother of Oscar?

Inside The Beltway (WT)

By John Mccaslin

The Washington Times, February 28, 2007

Spoons kill people

DOJ_NMG_0137818

Thanks to the Gun Owners of America for sending us their nifty new T-Shirt, bearing the message:

"If guns kill people, then ...

— Pencils miss spel words

— Cars make people drive drunk

— Spoons make Rosie O'Donnell fat

Too much popcorn

Who isn't talking about the exhibit of obesity that Al Gore unveiled at his Oscar-winning appearance this week?

Now, Inside the Beltway may have discovered why Mr. Gore is so suddenly rotund: "An Inconvenient Truth."

Iain Murray, senior fellow for global climate change and environmental science at the Competitive Enterprise Institute, forwards speculation that Mr. Gore's Oscar-winning movie could be hazardous to the former vice president's health, and everybody else's for that matter.

The Scotsman, Scotland's national newspaper, is claiming that half of the children between the ages of 7 and 11 in that country are now so anxious about global warming that they're losing sleep over it.

"A quarter of them blame politicians for the problem, and 1 in 7 believes their parents aren't doing enough to save the earth," Mr. Murray notes. Furthermore, Science Daily is reporting that children who don't get enough sleep are more prone to obesity.

"And this article points out that kids who sleep better learn better," he adds. "One has to wonder just how much damage to civilization that Gore and company will do to impose their climate-control regime on the world."

Eye on Freedom

What's with the telescope in the 10th floor office of Christopher Cox, the former congressman-turned-chairman of the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission, overlooking the U.S. Capitol dome?

"Sometimes I jokingly refer to this as my legislative affairs operation — using the telescope I can just read the memos on their desks," the chairman noted in recent remarks. "But I don't have the telescope focused on the offices, but rather on the Statue of Freedom on top of the dome."

Mr. Cox observed that the statue was placed on its prestigious perch in 1863, during the height of the Civil War.

"She stands on a globe encircled with our national motto, E Pluribus Unum: Out of Many, One," he said. "And she was cast in bronze by a former slave, Philip Reid, who along with other D.C. residents gained his freedom ahead of the Emancipation Proclamation by act of Congress."

Man on the moon

NASA says it plans for astronauts to be "camping" on the moon as early as 2020.

A future lunar outpost, says a new NASA posting, would be used to make preparations for a journey to Mars. Initial missions to the pressurized camp — inflatable habitats, with connecting tunnels to crew quarters and the lunar surface — would last several days for the initial construction period, then be extended to two weeks, then two months and ultimately to 180 days.

Puffs of pink

Yes, Virginia, there will be cherry blossoms this spring.

Barely a month ago everybody from Washington to Tokyo was worried because cherry blossoms were blooming in the unseasonably warm weather. Not to worry, says the National Cherry Blossom Festival, which quotes Rob DeFeo, chief horticulturist of the National Park Service, as saying that the variety of trees that were in bloom in January are sometimes referred to as the "winter-blossoming cherry."

They will often bloom during a warm spell, even if spring is still months away. Mr. DeFeo says the famous cherry trees around the Tidal Basin are of a different variety — the Yoshino — and they will blossom as usual come spring.

The National Cherry Blossom Festival's 95th Anniversary Dinner & Silent Auction will be held this evening.

Hurricane hand

Sister Sledge, Ciara, Patti LaBelle and Brian McKnight are among the artists whose previously unreleased recordings are featured in a new "We Are Family 2007" CD put together by the Washington-based Points of Light Foundation to help victims of recent hurricanes.

Produced by Grammy Award winner Rodney Jerkins, the CD centers on Sister Sledge's 1970s hit, "We Are Family," which is the title song. The CD is available through stores, online music providers, or WeAreFamily2007.com.

Up In The Air (RC)

By Tory Newmyer And Kate Ackley

Roll Call, February 28, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0137819

Experiencing some professional turbulence? At least you're not Robert Land.

As JetBlue's only man inside the Beltway, Land has had the unenviable task of single-handedly explaining the discount flier's recent meltdowns to lawmakers while trying to beat back their attempts to impose new regulations on the industry.

The trouble started Feb. 14, when an ice storm in the Northeast scrambled travel schedules. At New York's JFK International Airport, JetBlue's hub, nine of the carrier's planes got pinned down on the tarmac, forcing some passengers to sit on the runway for more than 10 hours. The trouble spilled into the following week, with JetBlue forced to cancel more than 1,000 flights to get back on schedule.

Land went to work Feb. 15, the morning after the crisis erupted, paying visits to the Transportation committees and also calling on officials at the Department of Transportation. He walked staffers through a chronology of what had happened the day before — explaining how JetBlue, relying on what proved to be erroneous weather reports that showed the storm clearing, kept planes queued in the hopes of getting them off the ground. And, like other executives at the airline, he piled on the apologies.

"Looking back, we were a little too aggressive trying to get our customers where they wanted to go," said Land, who served as assistant Transportation secretary under former President Bill Clinton before joining JetBlue at its outset eight years ago.

JetBlue has pledged to spend $30 million in vouchers, refunds and other costs to recover from the events and has issued its own passenger bill of rights to guarantee there will not be a repeat performance.

But the controversy already has prompted lawmakers to action, with Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) introducing a measure setting mandatory guidelines for airlines and Rep. Mike Thompson (D-Calif.) to follow suit this week. Industry sources said some version is likely to be included in the Federal Aviation Administration reauthorization set to move this year.

Land, like others hoping to head off the legislation, stressed the airline already has taken corrective steps and is best equipped to handle future problems on its own.

"We think we know how best to make up for our mistakes," he said. "That's the message we've been sending to the Hill: No one has more to lose than we do, because regardless of what Congress does or doesn't do, people have a choice to make when they fly."

Several airline lobbyists said K Streeters, smelling blood, have been hurling themselves at JetBlue since its problems erupted. Land, officially the company's senior vice president for government affairs, said that while JetBlue "has been looking for key people to join our team in different positions on an ongoing basis," it has not made any moves yet to add lobbying muscle, either internally or externally.

Lift Off? Speaking of canceled flights, lobbyists and other supporters of Rep. Nick Lampson (D-Texas) who had hoped to join the freshman for a viewing of a space shuttle launch in Florida will have to rearrange their schedules.

A hail storm earlier this week damaged an external tank on the shuttle Atlantis and NASA officials are expected to delay the planned March 15 launch as a result.

For $2,300 for an individual, or $5,000 from a political action committee, trip participants were set to fly to the Sunshine State in two weeks for a three-day jaunt that included the launch. For the occasion, Lampson's team had rented the Indian River Queen, a paddle-wheel boat that was set to cruise up the Banana River to within about five miles of the launch site.

(Aside from the novel view, the boat placed the event within the law. The official viewing area for Kennedy Space Center launches is on federal land, making it off-limits for political fundraisers).

In case of any last-minute problems with the launch, the crew had the boat reserved for two more morning cruises.

For those less enthusiastic about space flight, or paddle boats, trip organizers bought a package of tickets for a spring training game between the Houston Astros and the New York Yankees.

"It's a relatively portable event," said a source close to the event who spoke on condition of anonymity. "Everybody knows not to plan too far ahead for it."

The source said final decisions on the trip will be made once NASA announces its plan for the launch.

Coming Out. Add one more name to the long list of politicians that want some K Street cash. Former Health and Human Services Secretary Tommy Thompson, who is mulling whether he wants to give up his plush office at Akin Gump Strauss Hauer & Feld for the Oval Office, is having his first Washington, D.C., fundraiser next week. The money goes to his coffers at the Thompson Presidential Exploratory Committee — 2008.

The event is sponsored by Barbour Griffith & Rogers lobbyist Robert Wood, who was Thompson's chief of staff at HHS, and others around town, said Darrin Schmitz of the committee, known as "Tommy 2008."

"This is really a way for friends, colleagues and former staff to show their support," Schmitz said, adding that the former Wisconsin governor expects to raise about $50,000 from 75 attendees.

Thompson, a Republican, will hold court at The Caucus Room on March 8. "Gold level" contributions cost $500, while joining the "green level" will set you back $1,000, according to an invitation.

DOJ_NMG_0137820

K Street Moves. The Livingston Group, the firm founded by former Rep. Robert Livingston (R-La.), has followed the trend of hiring Democrats. Stacie Walters, a former legislative aide to Rep. Vic Snyder (D-Ark.), has joined the firm as a principal. "At a time when there are new Democrat members of Congress, who are dealing with multiple issues, her expertise on several matters, along with her relationships on the Hill, will be a tremendous asset to our clients," Livingston said in a statement.

• Another Democrat has landed at Artemis Strategies: Ryan Modlin, a one-time staffer for House Energy and Commerce Chairman John Dingell (D-Mich.), has signed on as vice president. Modlin also has worked in the government affairs division for Chrysler and with the American Automotive Manufacturers Association.

Some Push For Huckabee To Run For Senate, Not President (HILL)

By Aaron Blake

The Hill, February 28, 2007

Though his long-shot presidential campaign is still in its early stages, some wish former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee would drop his national aspirations and return home to wage what they see as a vital campaign against Sen. Mark Pryor (D-Ark.) in 2008 instead.

Arkansas is often listed among the top Republican pickup opportunities in the country, but Huckabee is the only Republican who matches up to Pryor and there are no comparable alternatives, observers say.

Although those close to Huckabee chalk up the Senate talk to overanxious bloggers and speculation, some see Huckabee-for-Senate as a real possibility and most Republicans make it clear they would welcome him home.

One state GOP source familiar with Huckabee's campaign said a Senate bid could indeed materialize and that it's something Huckabee has considered and analyzed. Huckabee ran for Senate in 1992.

Huckabee couldn't wait too long to abandon the presidential bid, the source said, and the Aug. 11 Republican straw poll in Ames, Iowa, could be a fork in the road.

"If he's knocked out by the straw poll, then, yes, that's a credible scenario," the source said. "If he's still around, I think, timeline-wise, it would add to the baggage that he already has in the state to drop a presidential [campaign] and come back and run for Senate."

Huckabee's presidential campaign said a Senate bid is not in the works and that it's not something he's looking at right now.

"At the moment, he has absolutely no plans to run for Senate," spokeswoman Kirsten Fedewa said. "He's on one track, and that's to explore the presidential bid. He has no Plan B."

Even if Huckabee were to enter the Senate race, Republicans see the 10-year governor as an underdog. Despite his long tenure in state government's top office, he was reelected with just 53 percent of the vote in 2002, which was less than Pryor's 54 percent in a good year for Republicans nationally.

Yet unlike other underdogs, Huckabee would have a reasonable chance at victory. He's seen as a better national than state figure, but he hasn't raised the kind of money required of a presidential candidate. At the same time, some see him competing with Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) for the "true social conservative" niche.

Operatives around the state struggle to think of other potential candidates. Nobody has expressed interest publicly yet, and there aren't any Republican statewide office holders.

Sen. Blanche Lincoln's (D-Ark.) 2004 opponent, former state legislator Jim Holt, took 44 percent against her in a presidential year despite spending less than $150,000 on the race. He called a repeat bid a "slim possibility" and said he would need to be promised $8 million to $10 million to finance it.

Banking executive J. French Hill, an appointee of the first President Bush, and 2006 lieutenant governor candidate Chuck Banks have been in talks with the National Republican Senatorial Committee (NRSC), as has fourth-term Rep. John Boozman, the only Republican in the Arkansas delegation.

Boozman's chief of staff, Matt Sagely, however, said Friday that Boozman has "zero interest" in the job and completely ruled it out: "He considers himself lucky to be in the 3rd congressional district … That's about as far as it goes as far as running for another office in Arkansas."

The NRSC wouldn't comment on any communications with Huckabee but made it clear the committee would embrace his candidacy.

"Certainly, we would welcome a run by Gov. Huckabee if that was something he decided to do," spokeswoman Rebecca Fisher said. "But it's not our only option in that state."

DOJ_NMG_0137821

Huckabee is, however, by far the best option. Aside from Boozman, none of the other potential candidates currently holds office, few have run campaigns, and there aren't many potential self-funders in the mold of a Pete Ricketts, the wealthy former Ameritrade executive who financed his unsuccessful bid against Sen. Ben Nelson (D-Neb.) in 2006.

Banks failed to force a primary runoff in the lieutenant governor's race. Holt won the nomination but performed slightly worse than he did in his 2004 Senate bid.

Pryor, meanwhile, is the son of a well-known former senator and has maintained an approval rating above 50 percent throughout his four years in office. He's been a relatively quiet figure, but he also hasn't provided Republicans with much ammunition to use against him.

"My gut is: Huckabee will either do it or not do it, and they're probably not going to win this race with anybody else," a politics professor at Hendrix College, Jay Barth, said.

The lack of candidates is mostly a symptom of the Arkansas Republican Party's state of disarray. An anomaly among Southern states, Arkansas remains solidly Democratic. At the same time, it chose President Bush by nine points in 2004.

With Huckabee replaced by Democratic Gov. Mike Beebe, the Democrats now hold all seven constitutional offices and three-quarters of the state legislature.

After the election, Arkansas GOP Executive Director Clint Reed posted a message on the party's website about its wounded state and its need to bounce back. This month, he left to become a regional director for the Republican National Committee, setting the party back another step.

"Look at what [Republicans] have — they got their clocks cleaned," Holt said. "There's not a lot of Republicans, even if they were very well established like a Huckabee, that would have the interest in taking on a Pryor in this state."

Republicans in Arkansas are a small yet factionalized group, split between the religious base, which controls the nominating process, and the moderates. The divisions have been both personal and ideological.

Part of the Republicans' challenge is finding someone who will rally both of those sects, an Arkansas GOP consultant, Bill Vickery, said. Other than Huckabee, few fit that mold.

"I think the Republican Party in Arkansas is searching for that one candidate who can unite their social conservatives and yet appeal to broad, moderate business conservatives in the state," Vickery said. "That's what the search is now."

NRSC Donates Funds From Terror Suspect (CCT)

The Contra Costa Times, February 28, 2007

WASHINGTON - A Republican Party campaign committee that received $20,000 in 2003 from a man now accused of helping terrorists has donated the money to a foundation that comforts families of wounded soldiers.

The National Republican Senatorial Committee, the campaign arm for Republican senators, renounced the contribution after news reports identified Abdul Tawala Ibn Ali Alishtari as an NRSC "Inner Circle Member for Life."

Federal prosecutors charged Alishtari two weeks ago in New York with terrorism financing, material support of terrorism and money laundering. Alishtari pleaded not guilty in U.S. District Court in Manhattan.

"In light of the recent charges filed against a former donor, the National Republican Senatorial Committee will donate the sum total of the former donor's contributions to a charitable organization," NRSC spokeswoman Rebecca Fisher said.

The committee gave $20,000 last week to the Fisher House Foundation, which provides housing for families on the grounds of military and Veterans' Administration hospitals.

Alishtari also donated more than $15,000 to the National Republican Congressional Committee, the campaign arm for Republican House members.

Jessica Boulanger, a spokeswoman for the NRCC, said the committee is awaiting the outcome of Alishtari's case. If found guilty, she said, the money would be donated to charity.

Corporate Execs' Names Should Be Disclosed, Lawmakers Tell Governors (USAT)

USA Today, February 28, 2007

Three influential members of Congress' Democratic majority urged the National Governors Association Tuesday to support proposed legislation aimed at anonymously-controlled companies involved in crime.

"The central problem is that the 50 states are currently forming nearly 2 million companies in the United States each year with little to no information about who is behind those companies," wrote Sen. Carl Levin, of Michigan, and Sen. Barack Obama and Rep. Rahm Emanuel, both of Illinois.

STORY: Corporate owners hide assets, identities

DOJ_NMG_0137822

While acknowledging that most of those companies operate legally, the lawmakers warned that some instead function "as conduits for organized crime, money laundering, terrorist financing securities fraud, tax evasion and other misconduct."

They asked the governors to back proposed federal legislation that would require those who register new companies in the 50 states to first gather information about their clients' identities. The proposal would also include company formation agents in federal anti-money laundering regulations.

The nation's governors, who ended their winter meeting in Washington Tuesday, are examining the issue, said Jay Hyde, communications director for organization.

The request for support followed a USA TODAY computer-aided review that showed a mini-industry has capitalized on weaknesses in incorporation laws and virtually non-existent oversight to promote some U.S. states as secrecy rivals of offshore havens. The USA TODAY story was published Friday.

The newspaper's review among other things showed that a promoter with a suspended law license has teamed with a convicted felon in a business that promoted forming Nevada corporations to shield assets "from 'capricious federal judges and any government agency.' "

Court records in a Federal Trade Commission lawsuit showed that two Nevada corporations formed through the business had been involved in what appeared to be money laundering for a suspected identity theft ring in Virginia.

Perry's 'Bizarre' Moves Vex Conservatives (WT)

By Hugh Aynesworth

The Washington Times, February 28, 2007

DALLAS -- Texas Gov. Rick Perry, elected with strong conservative support in November, has taunted that political base recently and could face serious opposition in the state Legislature amid a developing power struggle.

Mr. Perry, a Republican, has begun to assert himself on several hot-button issues after a relatively quiet six years in office in a state where the constitution gives its governor little formal power. His executive order earlier this month ordering all Texas girls entering the sixth grade to be immunized against a venereal disease that causes cervical cancer provided the most heat and criticism from conservatives.

But another Perry edict, to speed up state review of proposed coal-fired power plants, was checked by a state judge last week. And another Perry suggestion, that the state should sell its lottery to help fund cancer research and care, hasn't caught on.

Richard Murray, director of the University of Houston Center for Public Policy, said Mr. Perry's latest moves constituted "bizarre behavior" in view of his courting of conservatives last year when, for a time, it appeared Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, a Republican, might return to Texas and run for governor.

"He solidified himself with the social conservatives then, and now he's just totally ignoring them on this issue, which they are to very sensitive to," said Mr. Murray. "It suggests he's not planning to run in any Republican primaries in the future."

But a spokesman for Mr. Perry denied that his boss has usurped too much power, and Mr. Perry has argued that the Texas Constitution gives him the power to lead "as the chief executive officer of the state."

"To ask the governor to stop directing agencies would be tantamount to asking him to stop leading," said his press secretary, Robert Black.

Mr. Black also said accusations against his boss as invalid. He said Mr. Perry showed strong leadership in 2001 with his Trans Texas Corridor plan, a massive proposal to build 4,000 miles of superhighways and railroads across rural Texas from the Mexican border to the Red River. He said his boss stood tall in 2003 when he strongly resisted efforts to raise taxes in the state and later led "the most sweeping tort reform legislation" in the United States.

"If you're going to throw big ideas out on table," said Mr. Black, "somebody's going to get mad at you."

But it was the HPV edict that bounced the hardest and loudest. Mr. Perry did not inform most of the legislative leadership of his plan before he announced it.

Almost immediately, some of the state's leading conservatives berated the idea, claiming that the human papillomavirus (HPV) vaccine, marketed under the name Gardasil, might also increase preteen promiscuity. Some opposed the edict for its mandatory nature, and others criticized it as neither needed nor helpful.

They combined to fllod the airwaves and the Internet in opposition. Last week in Austin, a legislative committee passed a resolution to rescind Mr. Perry's order, with a full-scale bill predictably not far behind.

Also last week, a group of Texans filed a lawsuit in district court in Austin, challenging Mr. Perry's authority to issue the order and seeking to block any state money from being spent on the vaccine until that question is resolved, said Kenneth Chaiken, the attorney representing the families.

DOJ_NMG_0137823

"The school-age girls of Texas are not guinea pigs who may be subjected to medial procedures at the apparent whim of Texas' governor," according to the lawsuit, which was filed Thursday.

The best bet, said Cal Jillson, a Southern Methodist University political science professor, is that a bill to rescind the Perry executive order will pass. Then he sees a strong possibility that Mr. Perry will veto that, and a miffed Legislature then will override his veto and kill the program.

Mr. Black, the governor's spokesman, said yesterday Mr. Perry will "stand firm" on his belief the HPV plan is "morally right," and he added, "Legislators will have to determine what they stand for."

Others should not have been surprised at the HPV overture, he added, because Mr. Perry mentioned his support for it in his re-election campaign last summer.

"Evidently, someone wasn't listening," said Mr. Black.

Advocates Hopeful On Gun Ban (BSUN)

By Jennifer Skalka

The Baltimore Sun, February 28, 2007

With the support of a new Democratic governor, advocates for a state assault weapons ban said Tuesday that they have the legislative backing and momentum to pass a bill this session.

"We are hopeful that the new political landscape will make a difference this year," said Sen. Michael G. Lenett, the Montgomery County Democrat sponsoring the proposal.

Gov. Martin O'Malley and state Attorney General Douglas F. Gansler are behind a proposal that would forbid the transport, sale, posses sion or purchase of military-style assault weapons. The 11-member Senate Judicial Proceedings Committee, which heard hours of testimony Tuesday on the proposal, appears split on the matter. If the bill were defeated in committee, it would take 16 senators to petition the initiative to the floor; the bill has 21 co-sponsors.

A proposed state ban died last year in the General Assembly. Then-Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr., a Republican who had voted in 1996 while a member of Congress to repeal the federal assault weapons ban, didn't push for tougher state legislation.

The proposed assault weapons ban is the latest issue that had fizzled under Ehrlich to be resurrected with O'Malley at the helm. Tougher emissions standards for automobiles is another. Stem cell research will benefit from an additional $10 million commitment from O'Malley, a promise he made since being sworn in last month. And the governor lobbied last week for repeal of the death penalty.

O'Malley submitted a letter of support to the Senate committee Tuesday, urging passage of the assault weapons ban, which designates 45 firearms as assault weapons.

"More than 600 people die in Maryland each year from gun violence -- on average, more than 50 victims every month," the governor said in a statement. "Assault weapons are so frequently used in crime that one assault rifle is traced back to a Maryland crime every 48 hours. This legislation will help prevent these guns from reaching Maryland streets and will therefore assist law enforcement efforts to keep our communities safe."

Gansler, a Democrat and former Montgomery County prosecutor, provided the committee with his endorsement as well. "Weapons optimized for killing large numbers of people as quickly and efficiently as possible have no place on the streets of our communities," he wrote in a letter.

In addition to the ban, the bill would impose a registration re quirement and give gun owners a 60-day period, effective Oct. 1, to file the required information with the secretary of the state police.

Opponents, who packed the committee room and adjoining lounge wearing buttons with a slash through the bill number, testified Tuesday that their Second Amendment rights would be violated should the bill be passed.

"We as abiding citizens will not be controlled by criminals," said John Hutchinson, a Montgomery County hunter and competitive marksman.

Clyde Lutter, a Gaithersburg engineer, said the proposed ban would "make us all less safe."

"The Second Amendment is not about hunting. It's not about sport. It's about self-defense," he said. Supporters of the ban testified that it would keep dangerous weapons off the streets and out of criminals' hands, that civilians have no need for weapons that are used in warfare in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Dale Miller, a 20-year-old from Calvert County, tearfully told the committee about her father, a former FBI agent who was murdered in Washington police headquarters in 1997. The shooter was carrying a compact assault weapon, according to news reports.

"No little girl should have to grow up without her father, should have to walk down the aisle alone on her wedding day," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0137824

Proponents also lauded Maryland for the 1994 passage of a ban on assault pistols but urged that the law be expanded to prevent tragedies such as the 2002 Washington-area sniper shootings.

Paul Helmke, president and CEO of the Brady Campaign to Prevent Gun Violence, said most big-city mayors and police chiefs around the country are supportive.

"Maryland's doing a lot better than most states, but it could be doing better," said Helmke.

Representatives of the Maryland State Police testified in favor of the Maryland ban, saying it would help keep officers safe. A spokesman for the Fraternal Order of Police lobbied against it, however, arguing that it would be difficult to enforce.

Changing The Constitution (WP)

The Washington Post, February 28, 2007

MARYLAND VOTERS will probably get to decide whether the state constitution should be amended to allow early voting. Let's hope they show more discernment and judgment than the Democratic-controlled legislature that is muscling an ill-defined measure onto the ballot.

Both houses of the General Assembly have approved a constitutional amendment to permit early voting, making it almost certain there will be a referendum in 2008. The action follows a rancorous two-year fight in which Democrats rammed through measures that gave them a clear advantage over Republicans. For instance, the only places where people would have been able to vote ahead of time just happened to be in heavily Democratic precincts. Republicans were right to think the effort was more about helping Democrats than helping voters. The Democratic effort was thwarted when the Court of Appeals rejected the law, saying the constitution does not authorize voting on any day other than Election Day.

So the Democrats are back with a bid to amend the constitution, arguing that early voting is a civic good because, by making it easier to vote, it boosts turnout. Too bad that's not really true. The experience of other states has shown that early voting does not increase turnout in any significant way. It's important that any decision about whether to allow early voting be framed by the facts -- not politics. There are arguments pro and con. Voters like having the choice and convenience of early voting, and ballot counting is more accurate under the system. On the other hand, there are increased costs associated with maintaining extended polling places and more opportunities for fraud. Plus, Maryland already allows no-excuse absentee voting, so early voting may be duplicative.

Still, we would be inclined to favor anything that makes it easier for people to vote. The Democrats are right that a constitutional amendment should not be encumbered by operational details such as where polling places would be located; changing the constitution is the first step. But the lack of a mechanism to ensure fair implementation of early voting is worrisome -- particularly given the Democrats' record of playing politics with the issue.

The House and Senate still must work out the differences between their respective bills. It's only fair that they also set up a system whereby voter approval of the amendment would trigger establishment of a bipartisan commission charged with working out the details of early voting. If they refuse to do that, voters should realize they are being asked to hand out a blank check.

States' Pension Shortfalls Widen Amid An Increase In Tax Receipts (WSJ)

By Christopher Cooper

The Wall Street Journal, February 28, 2007

State governments' unfunded pension liabilities continue to increase despite a recent rise in tax receipts, in a continuation of a spiral that began in the late 1990s, according to a Standard & Poor's analysis to be released today.

The report says states collectively had about $330 billion in unfunded pension obligations in fiscal 2005, the last period for which complete data are available. That is $46 billion more than in fiscal 2004. For the purposes of the report, a state's fiscal year is assumed to end in June.

Pension shortfalls have been building and could increase borrowing costs for some states, but the ratings firm said it expects the ratio to improve slightly in the next few years as states begin recording improved investment gains in fiscal 2006 and perhaps 2007. Better investment gains mean states can make smaller cash contributions to pension funds, which frees up money for other government obligations.

Parry Young, one of the report's authors, said in an interview that while the mean funded ratio for fiscal 2005 continued to widen, he expects a stable "investment atmosphere" will halt the trend. In fiscal 2000, he said, state pensions on average were funded at slightly more than 100% of obligations; a subsequent market slowdown has left the ratio at roughly 82% of projected liabilities. For fiscal 2004, S&P pegged that ratio at 83.5%.

The gap is the unfunded amount of projected liabilities, based on the current work force and benefit levels.

DOJ_NMG_0137825

Among the states with the biggest unfunded obligations were Connecticut, Illinois and Oklahoma, the report said, all of which had gaps in the lower 40% range. West Virginia had the biggest gap, with an unfunded liability of more than 50%.

By contrast, the state in the best shape was Florida, with obligations funded at 107.3%, followed by North Carolina, with a 106.5% ratio. Oregon, Delaware and Georgia notched positive funding ratios as well.

Besides pension costs, states have been grappling with spiraling expenses in other areas, such as health care for the poor. States also are carrying an enormous and increasing amount of debt: The S&P report said pension liability and tax-supported borrowing in states reached 6.8% of money available to pay back such obligations. In fiscal 2004, the ratio stood at 6.3%.

While state revenue has been strong in recent years, this hasn't generally translated into healthier pension funds. The stock market was responsible for most of the gains states made in pension funding in the 1990s, but when the bubble burst in the early part of this decade it caused much of the unfunded gap.

Outsize investment returns have the greatest effect on pension reserves. Mr. Young said investment income accounts for about 60% to 70% of a typical state pension fund. Much of the remaining balance is made up by contributions from local and state governments. The report said such government contributions rose by about 50% over a two-year period beginning in fiscal 2002. Contributions declined about 7% in fiscal 2005.

The Cost Of Coverage (WSJ)

By Amy Finkelstein

The Wall Street Journal, February 28, 2007

Thanks to widespread concern about the millions of Americans without health insurance, several states have recently mandated universal coverage for their residents. Massachusetts enacted legislation last spring; other proposals are brewing in California, Pennsylvania and elsewhere. Such reforms are likely to affect health-care spending, which has been growing faster than the overall economy for decades. It makes up approximately 16% of GDP, and is a prime area of policy concern, right up there with the number of uninsured.

For evidence of how such programs can lead to increased spending, just look at the effects of the introduction of Medicare in 1966. Medicare provides health-insurance coverage to virtually all Americans aged 65 and over. Prior to its enactment, only about one-quarter of these individuals had any meaningful health insurance. As a result of Medicare's introduction, about three-quarters of the elderly, or about 7.5% of the total U.S. population, gained health-insurance coverage. (For perspective, this is a similar increase in the share of the population with insurance coverage as what will happen in Massachusetts under its new universal coverage program.)

Research I conducted shows that Medicare had a substantial effect on the health-care sector. By 1970, the program caused a 37% increase in hospital spending. This is an enormous number. If I extrapolate from the Medicare experience to compute the effect of the overall spread of insurance -- both public and private -- between 1950 and 1990, it suggests that it is responsible for about half of the sixfold growth in real per capita health-care spending during this period.

Why does increased health insurance lead to increased health spending? One factor is that when individuals have insurance, they tend to consume more health care. This makes sense: If you only have to pay some fraction of the cost, you are more likely to go for an extra doctor's visit or get an additional diagnostic test than when you have to pay the full cost out of pocket.

Another reason is that hospitals and doctors respond to the increased demand for health care by changing some of the ways in which they practice medicine. For example, hospitals were more likely to adopt new medical technologies after Medicare was introduced because now, with greater insurance coverage, there were more people who could afford these new technologies. This in turn may have encouraged the development of a new generation of health-care innovations. All of this contributes to higher health-care spending.

Of course, the effect of health insurance on health spending tells us only of the costs of expanding health insurance coverage. We can also ask, what are the benefits? And once again, we can learn something from the Medicare experience. Robin McKnight of the University of Oregon and I have examined the data, and as best we can tell, Medicare did not have any effect at reducing elderly mortality in its first 10 years of existence. Of course, mortality is only one measure of health, and it is possible that other aspects of health improved. It is also possible that in the long run, the new technologies adopted (and perhaps developed) because of Medicare had important health benefits that our 10-year analysis would not capture.

While the health benefits from Medicare therefore remain uncertain, we found clear evidence of a different type of benefit: It provided substantial financial protection to the elderly. Prior to Medicare, they faced the risk of large out-of-pocket medical expenditures. About one in 10 of elderly individuals spent one-fifth of their annual income on medical expenses that were subsequently covered by Medicare. By 1970, we estimate that Medicare had reduced this risk of extremely large out-of-pocket medical expenditures by half.

DOJ_NMG_0137826

What all this means is that, as best we can tell, the elderly were not foregoing life-saving treatments prior to Medicare. Rather, they were getting these treatments, albeit at large or even enormous personal financial cost. But overall Medicare did not so much save lives as it did provide financial security. This is the goal of insurance -- not to prevent an awful event from occurring, but to make sure that if it does occur you are not devastated financially.

The Medicare experience offers valuable lessons for today. Recent state efforts to create universal health-insurance coverage would reduce the fraction of the population in a state without insurance by similar amounts as did the introduction of Medicare nationwide. And if that program is any guide, we may perhaps see changes in the structure of the health-care system, such as the development and adoption of new medical technologies. We are likely to witness an improvement in the financial security of the currently uninsured. There are also likely to be increases in health-care spending -- quite possibly substantial ones.

Ms. Finkelstein is an assistant professor of economics at MIT and a faculty research fellow at the National Bureau of Economic Research.

Add Roads, Not Tolls (USAT)

By Bill Graves

USA Today, February 28, 2007

Congestion pricing, touted as a cure for gridlock, is unfair, ineffective and ignores the transportation needs of Americans.

The several forms of congestion pricing all rely on giving motorists better highway access for a price. In many uses, it does not markedly reduce congestion, but merely raises revenues — taxes, in other words. Congestion pricing increases cargo transportation costs and hurts the economy. Higher manufacturers' and retailers' operating costs mean higher costs to consumers for everything from gasoline and clothing to food.

Congestion pricing is unfair, because motorists have already paid for highways with taxes, and fuel taxes are a much more efficient way to fund new infrastructure that effectively reduces congestion. Toll booth islands decrease speeds and increase congestion. Research shows that a toll system consumes more of the revenue than does fuel tax administration.

Proponents of congestion pricing say those who don't want to pay or cannot afford to pay increased commuting costs have other choices. But many low-income motorists cannot change their work hours or child-care needs. Not everyone has access to public transit, which can take longer and is less reliable than traveling by car. The motorist's alternative to paying more at the toll booth is to find another route that is time-consuming and merely shifts congestion to other roads and neighborhoods.

London's model urban congestion pricing scheme spends on overhead about half of the $14 charged a vehicle for entering the city's center. Motorists complain of invasion of privacy from video cameras and tracking devices, and residents of neighborhoods near the city complain of increased congestion.

The U.S. Environmental Protection Agency has called congestion pricing "relatively risky to implement" because people pay for a service they were getting for free, many people would rather have congestion than pay more, and it's hard to predict how much emissions would be reduced.

Congestion pricing comes at a cost to motorists, businesses and the economy. Motorists also lose a bit of their right to travel freely. Adding capacity with new infrastructure funded by fuel taxes is a better solution.

Bill Graves, president and CEO of the American Trucking Associations, served eight years as governor of Kansas.

Legal Imperialism (WSJ)

By Joseph G. Finnerty III And John Merrigan

The Wall Street Journal, February 28, 2007

The media recently has been writing the obituary of the tort lawyers. "The power of the plaintiffs bar is on the wane," argued the American Lawyer; a cover story in Business Week promised to reveal "How Business Trounced the Trial Lawyers." With apologies to Mark Twain, the reports of the trial lawyers' demise are greatly exaggerated.

While asbestos and tobacco litigation bonanzas are winding down, America's most aggressive contingency-fee law firms still have in place a fee structure in search of an investment strategy. And so, faced with shrinking domestic opportunities, these firms have gone global.

Consider one class-action lawsuit, in which a plaintiffs firm sued Deutsche Bank on behalf of an African tribe which suffered atrocities committed by imperial Germany in the 19th century. Or another, consolidating 10 complaints filed around the country on behalf of all South Africans injured by the former apartheid regime from 1948 to the present.

DOJ_NMG_0137827

One of the South African complaints was on behalf of a class including 32,000 plaintiffs; the class in another was estimated to encompass "millions of individuals." The defendants, almost 100 multinational corporations that did business in South Africa after 1948, were alleged to be liable for injuries on the theory that they had aided and abetted the apartheid regime. Purported damages in just one of the consolidated actions total $400 billion.

The law used to lodge these massive foreign class actions in the U.S. is the Alien Tort Statute (ATS). This obscure piece of legislation adopted in 1789 gave federal district courts jurisdiction in civil cases brought by an alien for a tort committed in violation of the law of nations, or of a U.S. treaty. The law was passed primarily to assure a hearing for cases involving offenses against foreign ambassadors, violations of safe conduct and piracy.

The ATS was virtually dormant for two centuries. Then relatives of a Paraguayan citizen who had been kidnapped and tortured to death by a Paraguayan police official -- on Paraguayan soil -- brought a civil suit against the police official. Plaintiffs and defendants happened to be in the U.S., the police official illegally. In 1980 a U.S. court of appeals allowed the suit to go forward under the ATS, on the grounds that the police official violated international law, including various U.N provisions. From that acorn a mighty oak has grown.

Even by American standards the size of recent ATS class actions is extraordinary. Cases involving wholly foreign events routinely consist of tens or hundreds of thousands of "John Doe" plaintiffs who reside in remote locations as distant as Sudan and Pakistan. The size of the class of defendants has also grown to 500 or more deep-pocketed individuals or companies.

The fact that these lawsuits appear in U.S. courts at all defies common sense. Imagine our justifiable indignation if courts in Japan, France or Russia determined they had jurisdiction over alleged wrongdoing by Americans, in America, against other Americans. It takes a thoroughly arrogant view of the world -- call it legal imperialism -- to presume that our courts should be the arbiter of problems everywhere, whether or not the problem had anything whatsoever to do with the U.S.

Nevertheless, our tort lawyers presume just that, demanding that our court system sit in judgment over alleged conduct occurring completely within the borders of other sovereign nations, regardless of the effect this may have on U.S. foreign relations. Huge ATS cases have been filed against classes of unnamed defendants in Saudi Arabia, the United Arab Emirates, Qatar and other countries in the Middle East where vital, and delicate, U.S. national security interests are at stake.

Of course, it ultimately will be impractical for U.S. courts to police these monster ATS class actions if they are allowed to proliferate; they dwarf in size the asbestos cases that currently plague the U.S. courts. Congress could have amended the ATS to limit the damage, and in 2005, Democratic Sen. Dianne Feinstein proposed to do so, without success.

Fortunately, the Supreme Court weighed in. In Sosa v. Alvarez-Machain, a Mexican doctor suspected to have participated in the torture and murder of a U.S. DEA agent was apprehended in Mexico by Jose Sosa, a Mexican national hired by U.S. law enforcement. Mr. Sosa brought the Mexican doctor to the U.S., where he was arrested. The doctor sued Mr. Sosa for unlawful detention. In 2004, the Supreme Court dismissed the action and imposed a "high bar" against innovative ATS lawsuits. As a result of Sosa, several ATS suits have been rejected because of the potential for interference with U.S. foreign policy.

In one case, the D.C. circuit dismissed an ATS case seeking reparations from Japan for crimes committed during World War II because the suit interfered with state-to-state negotiations and threatened to "disrupt Japan's delicate relations with China and Korea, thereby creating serious implications for stability in the region."

In another, a federal court dismissed a case brought after the Israeli Defense Forces used heavy equipment to demolish buildings in the Palestinian territory. Plaintiffs sought damages from the manufacturer, Caterpillar, along with an order to stop supplying products to the Israeli armed forces. The court noted that the plaintiffs improperly sought to challenge the acts of an existing government in a region "where diplomacy is delicate and U.S. interests are great."

Trial lawyers nevertheless continue to test the outer limits of ATS liability, "high bar" or not, by filing an array of increasingly ambitious ATS class actions. In one pending case, Wal-Mart has been sued on behalf of residents of China, Bangladesh, Indonesia, Swaziland and Nicaragua. Plaintiffs seek to hold the company vicariously liable for the labor policies of its overseas suppliers. The improvement of labor policies in other countries is certainly a worthy goal. But it is the province of the executive branch and Congress under the foreign affairs and treaty-making powers, not that of attorneys looking for contingency fees.

The corporations named in the South African case -- including IBM, General Motors, Ford, Xerox, Coca-Cola and Citigroup -- were legally doing business in South Africa pursuant to the official U.S. policy of "constructive engagement" that sought to encourage positive changes in South Africa through economic investment. Recognizing this, the federal court in the Southern District of New York dismissed all 10 of the cases.

That dismissal, along with the dismissals of several other ATS cases, is now pending on appeal before the Second and Ninth Circuits. As these and other ATS cases ripen for appellate review, the era of post-Sosa ATS jurisprudence is entering a critical phase.

DOJ_NMG_0137828

The executive branch has promoted strict conformance with Sosa: Both the Clinton and Bush administrations have filed progressively stronger "Statement of Interest" briefs urging that federal courts dismiss ATS cases that could interfere with U.S. foreign policy.

Still, leading class-action law firms such as Motley Rice, Milberg Weiss and Cohen Milstein have launched exploratory ATS cases to test the waters, trying to maneuver around sovereign immunity, which prevents lawsuits against foreign governments. Instead, the plaintiffs lawyers claim that U.S. corporations doing business abroad are vicariously liable for the purely overseas acts of foreign governments, or other actors, in jurisdictions where the U.S. companies do business. And pressured by the massive exposure involved in ATS class actions, defendants in some early cases have opted to settle rather than undertake the risks of litigation.

These plaintiffs firms are flush with cash, experts in the business of creating cases, and undeterred by setbacks. In fact, contingency-fee lawyers take each rejection as a lesson in which tactics work and which do not. They know that if they can weather dismissal motions in a single case, they can proliferate a succession of copycat ATS class actions.

Once they do, you can be sure that a torrent of global ATS class actions will follow -- to the detriment of the U.S. court system, foreign policy and U.S. standing around the world.

Mr. Finnerty heads the New York Litigation Practice Group for DLA Piper, which represents defendants in ATS cases. Mr. Merrigan, a partner at DLA Piper, is former chairman of the Democratic National Committee's Business Council.

American Insourcing (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 28, 2007

The House of Representatives takes up a foreign investment bill today, so it's time to hold your breath. In the best case scenario, the Members will do their Lou Dobbs riff on "the selling of America," and then pass largely symbolic legislation. But the debate is taking place with an "open rule" on the House floor, which means protectionists could yet do real harm.

For their part, the voters have long ago moved past last year's Dubai Ports fiasco, with polls showing that most Americans understand the benefits of foreign investment. They can see it every day. Only this week, Toyota announced its latest plans to make cars in the U.S., creating some 2,000 jobs in Mississippi. Hyundai is locating an R&D headquarters in Michigan. And Governor Ed Rendell, a Democrat, recently boasted that Pennsylvania "has almost 400,000 people employed by foreign owned companies."

In 2005 alone, foreigners increased their investment in the U.S. by $1.4 trillion, an amount larger than the entire GDP of all but seven nations. Foreigners like our giant market, its rapid growth and, especially since the 2003 tax cuts, our higher returns on capital investment. According to Commerce Department data, last year foreigners invested roughly $500 billion more in the U.S. than Americans invested abroad.

"The United States derives substantial benefits from open trade and investment flows," concludes the latest Economic Report of the President. Net foreign direct investment "accounts for a disproportionately high share of U.S. exports" (19%), physical capital expenditures (10%), and R&D spending (13%). This investment also accounts for five million American jobs paying well above the national average.

Open U.S. capital markets allow Americans to invest in growing foreign companies as well. From 1997-2005, American shareholders have tripled the net value of their ownership of foreign firms, to more than $3 trillion. Nokia may be based in Finland, but some 55% of the cellular phone company's shares are owned by Americans. Capital Group, a U.S. asset management company, recently became the largest single Nokia shareholder. Limits on foreign investment here will only invite retaliation abroad.

The protectionists can't really rebut any of this, so instead they play up the "security" angle. And there is no denying that some foreign takeovers deserve to be scrutinized on national security grounds. That's precisely what the executive branch now does via the Committee on Foreign Investment in the United States, or CFIUS, an interagency group that has up to 75 days to inspect transactions. A handful are changed or disapproved, but 94% of all foreign investment in the U.S. is made by European and other OECD nations that are hardly a threat.

In the wake of the Dubai Ports debacle, the Bush Administration is already making CFIUS review too stringent. A new study by the National Foundation for American Policy finds that in the last year the "process for securing approvals within CFIUS has grown more difficult and uncertain for foreign investors" with a tripling in the number of investigations and a doubling in the number of withdrawn mergers.

A dangerous precedent was set last year in the $11.6 billion sale of Lucent Technologies to France's Alcatel, when the Administration asserted an authority to revisit a deal even after it was approved and the merger had taken place. Perhaps Administration officials should read their own White House economic report.

DOJ_NMG_0137829

As for this week's House vote, the Democratic bill does less damage than Republicans threatened to do last year. On the good side, it would restrict an Administration's ability to re-open CFIUS reviews after they've been closed, reducing the chances of political double jeopardy. On the bad, the bill would require more careful regulatory scrutiny when U.S. assets are sold to foreign enterprises that are government-owned. That involves only about 5% of all such sales, however. More Congressional scrutiny or longer delays were wisely dropped from the bill.

The real danger is the threat of floor amendments from protectionists in both parties. California Republican Duncan Hunter has one of the worst ideas with his proposal to prohibit the sale of any "critical infrastructure" to foreigners. That's a definition so elastic it could include just about everything -- which is what Mr. Hunter wants. If any such provisions get through the House, they deserve a veto.

U.S., N. Korea To Normalize Ties (WT)

By Andrew Salmon

The Washington Times, February 28, 2007

SEOUL -- North Korea's top nuclear negotiator was on his way to the United States yesterday for talks on issues that a State Department official said would include the first steps toward the normalization of diplomatic relations.

The trip, which coincides with the first high-level talks between North Korea and South Korea in more than four months, reflects the rapid easing of tensions with President Kim Jong-il's regime since North Korea agreed this month to freeze its nuclear program in exchange for heavy fuel oil and other concessions.

Kim Kye-gwan, North Korea's vice minister of foreign affairs, arrived in Beijing yesterday and was expected in San Francisco tomorrow, a State Department official told The Washington Times. He will continue to New York for talks with his U.S. negotiating counterpart, Christopher Hill, which will likely begin early next week.

At a State Department briefing yesterday, spokesman Sean McCormack said the two would begin a process of normalization described in the nuclear deal concluded with Pyongyang on Feb. 13 in Beijing.

That agreement calls for the two countries to open bilateral talks "aimed at resolving pending bilateral issues and moving toward full diplomatic relations."

Asked yesterday to confirm that diplomatic normalization would be a part of the New York talks, a State Department official said yes. Normal diplomatic relations typically involve an exchange of ambassadors and related courtesies.

The process to be started in New York also calls for the United States to "begin the process of removing the designation of [North Korea] as a state-sponsor of terrorism and advance the process of terminating the application of the Trading With the Enemy Act with respect to [North Korea]."

Before traveling to New York, Mr. Kim is expected to deliver a speech and meet with private organizations in the San Francisco Bay Area. The State Department official was not certain how long he would be there.

Travel by North Korean diplomats at the United Nations normally is restricted to a 25-mile radius of Manhattan, although exceptions have been made with State Department permission.

The United States still maintains it does not talk to North Korea outside the context of the six-party negotiations, which involve China, Russia, South Korea and Japan. But the outlines of the Beijing deal were worked out in advance during three days of one-on-one meetings between Mr. Kim and Mr. Hill in Berlin.

The breakthrough was also preceded by negotiations between North Korea and the U.S. Treasury Department, which in September 2005 successfully pressured a bank in Macao to freeze $24 million of Pyongyang's overseas holdings.

"Changes are being made to lift the sanctions in the Office of Foreign Assets Control," a source familiar with the U.S. financial community told The Washington Times yesterday. The Office of Foreign Assets Control is tasked with tracking the assets of the United States' enemies.

"Officials there are saying, 'If you look at our documents, North Korea, Iran and Cuba were the enemies of the United States,' " the source said. " 'Going forward, we are looking at Iran and Cuba.' "

A South Korean delegation led by Unification Minister Lee Jae-joung, meanwhile, arrived in Pyongyang for what was expected to be four days of talks. It was the first such meeting since North Korea conducted a nuclear weapons test in October.

The talks were expected to deal with the implementation of the Feb. 13 accord as well as a resumption of South Korean aid and other North-South economic projects.

The delegates could also discuss South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun's call this month for a peace treaty to replace the armistice that halted fighting in the Korean War in 1953.

DOJ_NMG_0137830

"The meeting is to create the future of the Korean people and the hope of the Korean Peninsula," Mr. Lee said before leaving Seoul. "We will also focus on normalizing the framework of inter-Korean dialogue and discuss ways of establishing a lasting peace on the Korean Peninsula."

In the North Korean capital, Pyongyang, the group was welcomed by Prime Minister Pak Pong-ju and treated to a gala dinner at the flagship Yanggakdo Hotel.

"Now is the time for the two Koreas to step on a springboard planted on firmer ground," Mr. Pak said, according to pool reports.

McConnell Fears Iran Nukes By 2015 (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, February 28, 2007

Iran's development of nuclear arms is "very dangerous," and Tehran could deploy the weapons within the next several years, the nation's most senior intelligence official told the Senate yesterday.

"We assess that Tehran seeks to develop nuclear weapons and has shown greater interest in drawing out the negotiations rather than reaching an acceptable diplomatic solution," said retired Vice Adm. Michael McConnell, the new director of national intelligence.

"This is a very dangerous situation, as a nuclear Iran could prompt destabilizing countermoves by other states in this volatile region," he told members of the Senate Armed Services Committee.

Iran could have the capability to build nuclear weapons by 2015 and about the same time will be able to mount a nuclear warhead on a missile, Mr. McConnell said in response to a question from Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat.

Asked whether Iran would use a nuclear weapon against Israel, Mr. McConnell said: "They've stated that they would consider that, that Israel shouldn't exist, should be wiped off the map. I don't know that I would conclude that they would use it in a prescribed period of time, but that risk would be there."

Mr. McConnell said Iran poses a threat to the United States beyond its nuclear weapons program and is seeking to project military power "with the goal of dominating the Gulf region." Iran is working to disrupt U.S. military operations and the reinforcement of U.S. forces in the region, "thereby raising the political, financial and human cost of our presence," he said.

"To this end, Tehran views its mounting inventory of ballistic missiles as an integral part of its strategy to deter and, if necessary, retaliate against forces in the region, to include United States forces," Mr. McConnell said.

Tehran's power projection capabilities include "terrorist operations" that are aimed at regime preservation, deterring U.S. or Israeli attacks and driving the United States out of the Middle East, he said.

The Lebanese terrorist group Hezbollah is a key element of Iran's strategic goals, and the group could carry out attacks against the United States if it or Iran is threatened, Mr. McConnell said.

He also described Iran's role in Iraq, saying the United States has evidence that Iran is training insurgents at sites outside Iraq to use explosively formed penetrators against U.S. troops.

"If Iran is training Iraqi militants in the use of Iranian weapons, which are then being used to kill Americans in Iraq, I think that's a very serious act, and one that we ought to consider taking steps to stop," said Sen. Joe Lieberman, Connecticut independent.

Army Lt. Gen. Michael Maples, director of the Defense Intelligence Agency (DIA), was asked during the hearing whether China will pose a threat to the United States because of its weapons buildup.

"China, today, could be a military threat," he said. "They have intercontinental ballistic missiles and nuclear warheads and so on, so it's a matter of they're building their military, in my view, to reach some state of parity with the United States. So, in a threat sense, it becomes intentions. So they're a threat today, they would become an increasing threat over time."

But Tom Fingar, the deputy director of national intelligence for analysis, said China has had nuclear capability for decades and that Beijing "appeared to have decided that we are not an enemy" and wants a peaceful global environment to better address its "very severe social problems."

Gen. Maples also told the Senate panel that North Korea is taking "initial steps" to comply with the Feb. 13 Beijing agreement by allowing international inspections of the Yongbyon nuclear facility. The DIA will be watching "a number of successive steps" that North Korea needs to take under the agreement, Gen. Maples said.

Joseph DeTrani, the mission manager for North Korea in the Office of the Director of National Intelligence, disclosed during the hearing that U.S. intelligence agencies have information that Pyongyang acquired "material sufficient for a production-scale capability of enriching uranium" in violation of agreements to denuclearize. It was the first time a senior U.S. intelligence official had discussed the covert North Korean uranium-enrichment program publicly.

DOJ_NMG_0137831

"They were confronted with that information in October 2002, and at that time they admitted to having such a program," Mr. DeTrani said. "And immediately thereafter, that's when they pulled out of the [nonproliferation treaty], they asked the [International Atomic Energy Agency] to leave and so forth."

Iran Worries US Officials Beyond Its Nuclear Plans (CSM)

By Peter Grier

The Christian Science Monitor, February 28, 2007

WASHINGTON

The consensus view of US intelligence agencies is that Iran is a power on the rise in the Middle East, eager to expand its military might and committed to the development of nuclear weapons.

If it forges ahead with its current program Tehran could produce an atomic bomb by the early or middle years of the next decade, said the new Director of National Intelligence, retired Vice Adm. Michael McConnell, at a Senate Armed Services Committee hearing Tuesday on future threats to the United States.

"Iran is growing in its ability to project military power with the goal of dominating the Gulf region," said Admiral McConnell.

This warning comes at a time when the US has charged that Iranian forces are sending deadly weapons to Shiite militias inside Iraq. In addition, US officials have cited the potential threat of long-range Iranian missiles as a reason why Europe might need US-made missile defenses.

Critics of the White House say that the US may be misusing intelligence information to create a pretext for conflict with Iran, in a manner similar to the run-up to the Iraq war.

Intelligence officials appearing before the Senate Armed Services panel said that they were calling Iranian intentions as they saw them.

McConnell said that as part of the learning process for his new job he recently reviewed intelligence about the position of Iran's hard-line president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and was disappointed with what he found.

"He remains popular," McConnell said. "He has staffed his cabinet and [positions] around him with hard-liners. The economy is strong because of oil revenues."

Iran's ballistic missiles currently can reach only as far as Israel, said Lt. Gen. Michael Maples, director of the Defense Intelligence Agency. Iranian scientists might perfect longer range models by 2015, he said.

"We are seeing them develop some space launch capability," said Mr. Maples.

In addition, it is "probable" that Iran's leadership knows that the Iranian Qods Force, an elite unit of the Revolutionary Guards, is shipping sophisticated anti-armor explosives to Iraqi Shiite militias, according to US intelligence.

"There is no direct link," said McConnell. "I am comfortable saying it is 'probable'."

Meanwhile, on Tuesday the White House said that it would be willing to attend a regional conference in Iraq next month that could include Iran and Syria.

The conference would be aimed at ways to stabilize Iraq. The administration has ruled out any direct talks with Tehran unless it suspends its uranium-enrichment program.

But if Iraq puts together a multilateral meeting, "[and] if we were invited to participate, we certainly would," said White House spokeswoman Dana Perino.

At the Senate Armed Services threat briefing, intelligence officials also presented a mixed view about the prospects and implementation of the president's plan to push for more security in Baghdad.

President Bush presented the effort as one in which Iraqi troops would be in the lead, with US forces serving in a supporting capacity.

To this point, Iraqi units are not fully at the point of the spear in Baghdad, but "are in the process of taking the lead," McConnell said.

Iraqi brigades moved into Baghdad have had anywhere from 43 to 82 percent of their approved manpower, he said. "It is a work in progress."

Military success will not occur without progress toward political reconciliation, said intelligence officials. Yet that remains a difficult challenge.

The Shiites are not confident of their position in the majority, and remain worried about a Sunni resurgence, said the officials. The Sunnis, for their part, are not yet willing to admit they are no longer in charge.

"The question is, will leadership emerge and be capable of taking the country to the next level," McConnell said.

US Military Chief "Categorically" Denies Plans For Iran Air Strikes (AFP)

DOJ_NMG_0137832

AFP, February 28, 2007

The head of the US military declared "categorically" Tuesday that the United States is not planning air strikes against Iran.

"It is not true," said General Peter Pace, chairman of the joint chiefs of staff, when asked during an appearance in Congress about suggestions that the US military was preparing to launch air strikes on Iran.

Asked by Senator Robert Byrd if he was categorically denying the reports, Pace replied: "Categorically sir".

US Vice President Dick Cheney fueled concerns about possible US military strikes against Iran over the weekend by saying that "all options are still on the table" to deal with Iran's suspected nuclear weapons program.

There have also been reports in the US media that the Pentagon has been doing contingency planning for military action, possibly including air strikes on nuclear sites around Iran.

But senior officials have stressed publicly that Washington remains committed to using diplomacy to convince Iran to comply with a UN resolution calling on it to suspend uranium enrichment activities some believe are a precursor to producing atomic weapons.

Hezbollah Warns U.S. Against Iran Attack (AP)

By Scheherezade Faramarzi

AP, February 28, 2007

The deputy chief of Hezbollah warned Tuesday that any "military adventure" by the United States and Israel against Iran would have dangerous consequences across the Mideast.

Sheik Naim Kassem suggested his pro-Iranian group would not get involved if the U.S. attacks Iran, but he raised the possibility that Israel might attack Lebanon as part of such an assault — in which case, he said, Hezbollah would "definitely" respond.

He said Hezbollah guerrillas were making plans in case Israel, like last summer, attacks Lebanon again.

"The resistance is taking all the necessary measures to be ready and prepared," Kassem said in an interview with the Associated Press. He would not elaborate but said Hezbollah is constantly changing its fighting tactics so the Israelis would not know its capabilities.

"We've evaluated the experience of the war and learned lessons from it and are taking steps to accommodate them with new realities," he said. "We are making sure the enemy will be in the dark in the future. This is the strength of the resistance and the secret of its success."

The United States insists it is not planning to attack Iran and is trying to persuade Tehran to suspend uranium enrichment, as demanded by the United Nations. But fear of a strike is growing throughout the Middle East.

Kassem, a Shiite Muslim cleric, warned that an assault on Iran could expand across the region.

"It remains to be seen what the level of an American aggression on Iran would be," he said. "Is it going to be limited or an all-out war? Will other countries become involved? Will it spread to the entire region?"

Asked if the U.S. attacked Iran, Hezbollah would retaliate by striking Israel, Kassem said Iran is capable of defending itself because it "possesses the means, a tenacious populace and a wise leadership."

Iran has threatened to attack the hundreds of thousands of U.S. forces based in the Persian Gulf and in Iraq if America launches a strike.

Kassem warned, "we will definitely respond and defend ourselves" if Israel attacks Lebanon.

Kassem's comments aimed to counter speculation that Hezbollah may stir up trouble in the region — including attacking Israel — if Iran is attacked: "They have to know that any military adventure, if widened and involves several countries in the region, would have dangerous consequences for everyone."

In Lebanon, Hezbollah has been locked in a power-struggle for months with the U.S.-backed government of Prime Minister Fuad Saniora. The Shiite group and its allies are demanding a new government in which they would have greater power. Washington has dramatically beefed up support for Saniora, who has rejected the opposition's demands.

Kassem blamed the United States for the deadlock, saying it is pressuring Saniora to refuse a compromise. Washington's goal is to undermine Hezbollah's resistance against Israel, he said.

Kassem, who is the deputy of Hezbollah's charismatic leader, Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, dismissed Lebanese and American government charges that Hezbollah was a tool of Iran and Syria. In contrast, he said, "the (Saniora) government is directly dictated by the Americans."

US Targets Iran's Financial Underbelly (FT)

By Guy Dinmore In Washington

DOJ_NMG_0137833

Financial Times, February 28, 2007

Encouraged by what it sees as the success of financial sanctions imposed on North Korea, the Bush administration is embarking on an aggressive policy of raising the cost to Iran of its alleged nuclear and terrorist activities by targeting non-US private sector ties to Tehran.

Officials say the policy has support from "hawks" in the administration who see actions against financing as a key component in the "war on terror".

However, there is still debate over whether the financial pressure on North Korea ultimately forced it to agree two weeks ago to a freeze of its Yongbyon nuclear facility, or whether the measures wasted a crucial 17 months while Pyongyang boycotted talks and continued producing plutonium for its growing nuclear arsenal.

North Korea's frozen accounts in Banco Delta Asia, a small Macao bank that was designated a "primary money laundering concern" in September 2005, remain an issue that could still have an impact on the February 13 agreement to freeze Yongbyon.

US Treasury officials are in Macao this week to discuss the fate of the accounts with the monetary authority there. Chris Hill, the senior State Department official who negotiated the nuclear suspension, reached an understanding with North Korea that the issue would be "resolved" within 30 days.

Daniel Glaser, the Treasury official leading the Macao talks, on Monday said the US wanted to take "specific steps" to resolve the issue as soon as possible. But he also said the US, having investigated 300,000 documents, had confirmed its "suspicions and concerns".

The White House said it saw the actions taken against North Korea as a model for its Iran policy. "Concerted diplomatic activity and pressure on the government of North Korea did bring the North Koreans back to the six-party talks. And we look at that as a possible template," Tony Snow, the spokesman, said in reference to Iran.

Other officials and US bankers note, however, that the financial sanctions hurt North Korea mainly because Chinese banks took part, in a reflection of how seriously Beijing regarded its neighbour's nuclear -programme.

Although the US is starting to make progress in persuading European banks to cut ties with Iran, diplomats are less confident that China and other big customers for Iranian oil will follow suit at this stage.

Trita Parsi, an Iran analyst who advocates dialogue between the US and Iran, argues that Washington's "euphoria" over the perceived success of its financial sanctions is severely flawed. He says the dwindling popularity of Mahmoud Ahmadi-Nejad, Iran's hardline president, is more due to his own failed economic policies and the exaggerated expectations raised by his populist promises.

Matthew Levitt, who until last month was a senior official in the US Treasury's terrorism and financial intelligence branch, said: "The most exciting tool we are experimenting with is private sector investment."

The Treasury was looking at ways to raise the cost to Iran, he told a meeting hosted by the Washington Institute of Near East Policy where he is now a senior analyst.

Mr Levitt said foreign banks were responding to US pressure by considering the risk to their reputation from dealing with Tehran, following sanctions imposed on two Iranian commercial banks. However, while "engaging" the private sector was proving beneficial, he said some banks were doing the "minimum to keep out of trouble" with the US by halting dollar transactions with Iran but not transactions in other currencies.

U.S. Sanctions With Teeth (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, February 28, 2007

Everybody knows that economic sanctions don't work. Just look at the decades of fruitless pressure on Cuba. But guess what? In the recent cases of North Korea and Iran, a new variety of U.S. Treasury sanctions is having a potent effect, suggesting that the conventional wisdom may be wrong.

These new, targeted financial measures are to traditional sanctions what Super Glue is to Elmer's Glue-All. That is, they really stick. Deputy Treasury Secretary Robert Kimmitt doesn't even like to call them sanctions, preferring the term "law enforcement measures." Explains Stuart Levey, Treasury's undersecretary for terrorism and financial intelligence: "Sanctions are scoffed at. They have a bad history."

Authority for the new sanctions, as with so many other policy weapons, comes from the USA Patriot Act, which in Section 311 authorizes Treasury to designate foreign financial institutions that are of "primary money laundering concern." Once a foreign bank is so designated, it is effectively cut off from the U.S. financial system. It can't clear dollars; it can't have transactions with U.S. financial institutions; it can't have correspondent relationships with American banks.

DOJ_NMG_0137834

The new measures work thanks to the hidden power of globalization: Because all the circuits of the global financial system are inter-wired, the U.S. quarantine effectively extends to all major banks around the world. As Levey observed in a recent speech, the impact of this little-noticed provision of the Patriot Act "has been more powerful than many thought possible."

Treasury applied the new tools to North Korea in September 2005, when it put a bank in Macao called Banco Delta Asia on the blacklist. There was no legal proceeding -- just a notice in the Federal Register summarizing the evidence: Banco Delta Asia had been providing illicit financial services to North Korean government agencies and front companies for more than 20 years, according to the Treasury notice. The little Macao bank had helped the North Koreans feed counterfeit $100 bills into circulation, had laundered money from drug deals and had financed cigarette smuggling. North Korea "pays a fee to Banco Delta Asia for financial access to the banking system with little oversight or control," Treasury alleged.

Wham! The international payments window shut almost instantly on Pyongyang's pet bank. Transactions with U.S. entities stopped, but the Treasury announcement also put other countries on notice to beware of Banco Delta Asia. The Macao banking authorities, realizing that they needed the oxygen of the international financial system to survive, took regulatory action on their own and froze the bank's roughly $24 million in North Korean assets. And around Asia, banks began looking for possible links to North Korean front companies -- and shutting them down.

A similar financial squeeze is being applied to Iran. Here again, the impact has come from the way private financial institutions have reacted to public pressure from Treasury. "As banks do their risk-reward analysis, they must now take into account the very serious risk of doing business in Iran, and what the risks would be if they were found to be part of a terrorist or proliferation transaction," says Kimmitt.

Treasury began squeezing Iran last September, when it accused Bank Saderat, one of the largest government-owned banks, of financing terrorism by funneling $50 million to Hezbollah and Hamas since 2001. The Treasury order cut the bank off from any access to the U.S financial system, direct or indirect. A similar ban was imposed in January on Bank Sepah, which Treasury alleged was a key intermediary for Iran's Aerospace Industries Organization, the agency that oversees the country's ballistic missile program.

Meanwhile, top Treasury officials began visiting with bankers and finance ministers around the world, warning them to be careful about their dealings with Iranian companies that might covertly be supporting terrorism or weapons proliferation. This whispering campaign was enough to convince most big foreign banks in Europe and Japan to back away from Iran.

The new sanctions are toxic because they effectively limit a country's access to the global ATM. In that sense, they impose -- at last -- a real price on countries such as North Korea and Iran that have blithely defied U.N. resolutions on proliferation. "What's the goal?" asks Levey. "To create an internal debate about whether these policies [of defiance] make sense. And that's happening in Iran. People with business sense realize that this conduct makes it hard to continue normal business relationships."

The writer co-hosts, with Newsweek's Fareed Zakaria, PostGlobal, an online discussion of international issues athttp://blog.washingtonpost.com/postglobal. His e-mail address isdavidignatius@washpost.com.

GLOBAL POSITIONING Russian Deals In Middle East Snarl U.S. Strategy On Iran (WSJ)

By Gregory L. White And Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, February 28, 2007

As the U.S. struggles to contain Iran and its nuclear program, it is bumping into a new impediment: an assertive Russia bent on regaining leverage -- and markets -- in the Middle East.

While the U.S. and Russia tussled last autumn over a United Nations resolution to rein in Iran's nuclear program, Moscow quietly moved ahead on another front. It delivered more than $700 million worth of air-defense systems to help protect Iran's nuclear enrichment and research sites from attack, Russian officials confirmed in December. The Russian military then started training Iranian officers to use the new systems.

"We don't think Iran should feel itself encircled by enemies," President Vladimir Putin told al-Jazeera television earlier this month, after Tehran successfully tested the weaponry. "The Iranian people and the Iranian leadership should feel that they have friends in the world."

Pumped up by surging oil revenues and a rebounding economy, the Kremlin now is keen to reclaim a prominent global role and help offset the perceived might of the U.S., especially in the Middle East. Under broad pressure to engage Tehran and other adversaries diplomatically, the U.S. yesterday agreed to join in with both Iran and Syria in regionwide talks about Iraq, though Washington said the scope of the talks would stay narrow.

In its campaign to recapture its sway in the region, Moscow has forgiven billions of dollars in Soviet-era debts and lined up lucrative energy and arms deals, causing heightened concern for Washington. U.S. and Israeli officials say there also are signs that Russian antitank missiles are finding their way back into the hands of Lebanon's Hezbollah militia via Syria, even after the Kremlin promised to cut off any flow after the war last summer between Israel and Hezbollah. Russia also has broken with the U.S. by nurturing contacts with the Palestinian militant group Hamas, which the U.S. regards as a terrorist group.

DOJ_NMG_0137835

Stark Example

But the starkest example of Russia's new assertiveness is toward Iran. For months, the Bush administration had tried to get Moscow to stop the arms sale, Russia's biggest to Iran in years. For the White House and much of the Arab world, last summer's war in Lebanon served as a wake-up call on Iran's growing role in supporting radical groups such as Hezbollah. The U.S. since then has bulked up its forces in the Persian Gulf and declined to rule out an attack on Iran. It has led a financial crackdown against Iran's banks and other financial entities, along with the U.N. effort to curb Iran's nuclear program.

Russia has taken a far different tack. For four months last autumn Moscow used its U.N. veto power to fight successfully against U.S. and European efforts to impose tough sanctions on Iran's nuclear program. Russia finally agreed in December to a much more narrowly tailored resolution that targeted only parts of Iran's nuclear and ballistic-missile programs.

In January, while the U.S. and Europe were working to isolate Iran and U.S. forces were detaining Iranian officials in Iraq, Mr. Putin reacted warmly to an Iranian proposal for Russia and Iran, two countries with the world's largest reserves of natural gas, to form an OPEC-style alliance. The idea drew a swift negative response from Washington and Europe. Earlier this month, in a speech in Germany that raised fears in the West of a new Cold War, Mr. Putin said American military aggressiveness was the reason countries like Iran are seeking nuclear weapons.

"Russia is a huge problem on the Iran front," says John Bolton, who frequently wrestled with Moscow as President Bush's ambassador to the U.N. until December. "When it comes to Russia and Iran, it is hard to say who is whose client state."

Current administration officials who work closely with Russia aren't quite so harsh, but concerns over Moscow's intentions in the Middle East -- as well as its overall foreign policy -- are rising. "When it comes to Iran, the Russians want to have their cake and eat it, too," said one senior U.S. official. "They want to look tough in working to keep Iran from getting nuclear weapons, while also standing in as Iran's friend and weapons provider."

Tensions are likely to sharpen again, after the U.N. International Atomic Energy Agency found last week that Iran was adding hundreds of new centrifuges at its main nuclear research site at Natanz and accelerating efforts there to enrich uranium. The work is a sign to many in the West that Tehran -- despite its protestations to the contrary -- is seeking to develop nuclear weapons. The U.S., France and Britain immediately called for another sanctions resolution, but Russia warned that it would resist any moves to hit Iran's economy. Diplomats met in London Monday but have yet to negotiate details.

Russian officials insist they share the U.S. goal of preventing a nuclear-armed Iran. But Russia has argued that the Bush administration's confrontational approach to Iran won't work, and could pave the way for another war in the region. The Kremlin also looks at Iran as an important customer for its weapons and civil nuclear technology and says economic ties give it much-needed leverage over Tehran.

Softer Approach

Moscow's much softer, carrot-and-stick approach toward Iran also serves Russia's other goals. It allows Moscow to wield its leverage within the U.N. Security Council, where Russia is one of just five countries with veto power. Fending off tough economic sanctions also allows Russia to continue expanding trade ties with Iran, while showing other regimes in the region that friendship with Moscow pays geopolitical dividends.

The Middle East is a key target market for Russia's nuclear-power and arms exports, industries that Mr. Putin is counting on to help diversify its oil-dependent economy. Russia's global arms exports are expected to hit a record $7.5 billion in 2007, and they are growing fast in the Middle East, though still far behind the U.S. and Europe. Russia is also building Iran's only nuclear power plant, which is now unopposed by the U.S. and European leaders, at the southern port city of Bushehr under a contract signed in 1992. Mr. Putin dismisses U.S. sanctions on Russian arms and nuclear exporters that do business with Iran as efforts by the U.S. to engage in "unfair competition." He says the Kremlin won't sell any weapons that would change the balance of power in the region.

With its economy growing and its foreign debts paid, the Kremlin is in a much stronger position to push its view and make the U.S. listen. "Russia is not claiming the role of a superpower," Mr. Putin told al-Jazeera. "But Russia knows its own worth and we will strive to make the world multipolar."

Russian officials argue that harsh sanctions would only cause Iran to speed up its nuclear-weapons program. Iran's nuclear sites are too well dispersed and concealed for an air attack to be successful, Russian officials say, an assessment shared by many in Washington and Europe. A failed assault, they warn, would trigger a wave of violence and instability across the entire region, dwarfing the chaos in Iraq and reaching into Russia's southern border regions, already riven by separatism. "We cannot subscribe to the notion that the best path to finding a long-lasting and comprehensive solution lies through isolation and confrontation," says Russia's ambassador to the U.S., Yuri Ushakov.

DOJ_NMG_0137836

Moscow and Washington have split over thorny Middle East issues in the past, but until recently the conflicts didn't go far. As the U.S. prepared to invade Iraq in 2003, for example, the Kremlin warned that Washington's confrontational approach would prove counterproductive. But in the end, Moscow limited itself to sounding off in public.

As recently as 2005, after U.S. and Israeli warnings the weapons could fall into the hands of Hezbollah, Moscow shelved plans to sell sophisticated portable antiaircraft missiles to Syria, signing a deal with Washington to disclose sales of those weapons in the future.

'Difficult Partner'

But now, talk of a "strategic partnership" between Washington and Moscow has been scrapped. Russian officials bristle at U.S. criticism of Mr. Putin's crackdown on opposition at home, as well as Washington's courting of Russia's former-Soviet neighbors and moves to counter efforts by Kremlin-controlled energy giants to expand internationally.

After a visit to Washington this month, Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov told Russian TV that the U.S. is Moscow's "most difficult partner."

Then Moscow stirred a furor in Washington by vehemently opposing U.S. plans to build a rudimentary missile-defense network in Europe to counteract future threats from Iran. Moscow's top military brass, in language smacking of the Cold War, threatened to target planned U.S. installations in Poland and the Czech Republic. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice called the threat "extremely unfortunate."

Russian officials from Mr. Putin on down barely disguise their relish when they highlight setbacks for U.S. policy in the Middle East and recount Moscow's prewar warnings that the invasion of Iraq was a bad idea. "Today, America is viewed as the great loser in the eyes of the Russian establishment," says Yevgeny Satanovsky, president of the Institute of Middle Eastern Studies in Moscow.

At the same time, years of careful courting of Iran and the Arab countries of the Middle East are paying off for the Kremlin as political and economic ties to the region flower in a way not seen even during the Cold War.

Russia is unencumbered by the communist dogma that made the Soviet Union anathema in large swaths of the Middle East. "There are no countries in the Arab world left that we have any differences with," Mr. Putin told al-Jazeera before his recent trip to the region.

As on his other visits, his delegation was packed with representatives of big Russian companies looking for deals in areas like energy, arms and nuclear power. While Western capitals routinely criticize the Kremlin for rolling back democratic institutions, Middle Eastern leaders have publicly called for Mr. Putin to defy a constitutional ban and remain in office when his term ends next year.

"There's no more ideology, there's just business," says Mr. Satanovsky.

Just how much has changed has become clear over the last year. In June, Russia finally agreed to let the fight over Iran's nuclear program spill into the U.N. Security Council, signing onto an incentives package that promised Iran a range of trade and other concessions -- including direct talks with the U.S. -- if Tehran suspended its uranium enrichment work. But Russia also made clear that it would not endorse any moves to target Iran's economy or to lay the ground for possible military action.

Two weeks later at the G-8 summit of leading nations in St. Petersburg, Mr. Putin, hosting the summit for the first time, took the floor as leaders struggled to come up with a joint response to the war then raging in Lebanon. According to people familiar with the meeting, he recalled that in 2000 when he took office he faced what the Kremlin saw as an Islamist uprising in Chechnya and a moribund economy. Promises of support from G-8 partners proved largely empty, overshadowed by criticism of Russian brutality in the Chechen war. Middle Eastern countries were ultimately more supportive, sending observers to vet elections after fighting subsided. Noting Russia's big Muslim population and vulnerable borders near the Middle East, Mr. Putin gave his bottom line: He was only ready to sign on to a G-8 statement on the Middle East if it didn't hurt Moscow's relations with the Islamic world "by one iota."

Things got testier in September when Russia, China, France, Britain and the U.S., along with Germany, began trying to draft a U.N. resolution on Iran. Russia was adamant that any sanctions be finely tuned to limit the inflow of sensitive nuclear technology, and not try to hit Iran's economy in a broader way. Moscow also insisted that nothing hamper its work at the Bushehr nuclear plant.

Tougher Punishments

The Bush administration initially wanted to push for a much tougher package of economic punishments, even if it meant that both Russia and China abstained from the measure. Russia in the end succeeded in keeping the U.N. measures as minimal as possible to win its support, and left the work at Bushehr unscathed.

DOJ_NMG_0137837

Despite the view of the U.S. and most European capitals, the Kremlin frequently argues that Iran isn't necessarily seeking to build nuclear weapons. Russian officials also say they carefully restrict what kinds of weapons to sell to Iran, for example, refusing requests for shoulder-mounted antiaircraft missiles that are a favorite among terrorists.

The Kremlin also is partly using the Bushehr project as a tool to prod Tehran over the nuclear program, according to some Western diplomats. Though Russian officials publicly deny any connection, as Iran has dug in its heels on its uranium-enrichment efforts, Moscow has repeatedly put off shipment of the fuel for the reactor. Just last week, Russian officials said problems with payments from Iran -- which Tehran denies -- would lead to further hang-ups.

After the Kremlin last year offered a compromise in which Iran would do sensitive work with uranium fuel only with Russia, Tehran stalled and then ignored the offer. That fueled Russia's U.N. vote for sanctions, which surprised Tehran. "They hoped until the end that Russia would block or veto," says Rajab Safarov, director of the Russian-Iranian Business Council in Moscow. "They were horrified."

Yet just as swiftly, Russia moved to repair its ties to Tehran, exchanging high-level visits and delivering the air-defense missiles.

Russia: Hamas To End Attacks Against Israel (USAT)

USA Today, February 28, 2007

Hamas supreme leader Khaled Mashaal promised during a meeting Tuesday with Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov in Moscow that the militant Palestinian group will end missile attacks and other violence against Israel, Lavrov said.

However, Mashaal said his group is not ready to recognize the Jewish state. Renouncing violence and recognizing Israel are key demands of international peace negotiators before ending a financial aid boycott of the Hamas-led Palestinian government.

Sudan rejects chargesof war crimes in Darfur

Sudan Justice Minister Mohammed Ali al-Mardi rejected on Tuesday the International Criminal Court's allegations against a government minister and a militia leader accused of war crimes in Darfur.

"All the evidence the prosecutor referred to is lies," he said. He said the ICC "has no jurisdiction to try any Sudanese" and the suspects would not be handed over for trial.

The court accused Ahmed Muhammed Harun, junior minister for humanitarian affairs, and militia commander Ali Mohammed Ali Abd-al-Rahman, also known as Ali Kushayb, of 51 counts of crimes against humanity and war crimes in 2003 and 2004. Harun was junior interior minister during the worst Darfur fighting.

Since 2003, at least 200,000 people have been killed and 2.5 million displaced in fighting between the Sudanese army and its Arab militia allies against a tribal uprising.

Two Canadian anti-terror laws will not be renewed

Canada's Parliament scrapped two anti-terrorism measures adopted after the 9/11 attacks in 2001. One allows three-day detention without charges of anyone suspected of planning an imminent attack. The second allows a judge at investigative hearings to force witnesses to testify about alleged terrorist activities.

The House of Commons voted 159-12 not to renew the measures. They expire March 1.

Liberal Party leader Stephane Dion said the laws have never been used and "represent a risk to individual rights." Prime Minister Stephen Harper, whose Conservatives won power in January 2006, says the Liberals are soft on terrorism.

U.S., Italian envoys injuredin Sri Lanka rebel attack

U.S. Ambassador Robert Blake and Italian envoy Pio Mariani were slightly wounded when Sri Lankan military helicopters carrying them came under fire from ethnic Tamil rebels. The helicopters had landed in Batticaloa when mortars exploded, government minister Mahinda Samarasinghe said. The U.S. Embassy said Blake was "all right," but it did not elaborate.

Ex-official, Militia Chief Charged With War Crimes (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, February 28, 2007

NEW YORK -- The International Criminal Court yesterday charged a former Sudanese official and the leader of the government-backed Janjaweed militia with committing war crimes in Darfur, the first of many anticipated attempts to punish participants in the bloody ethnic conflict.

The nascent court, which has been collecting evidence on Darfur for 20 months, accused Ahmad Mohammed Harun, formerly the junior interior minister in charge of the western Sudanese region, and Janjaweed commander Ali Kushayb of being involved in war crimes and crimes against humanity between August 2003 and March 2004.

DOJ_NMG_0137838

The Bush administration, until recently a foe of the ICC because of claims it lacks safeguards to protect U.S. soldiers and civilians in conflict zones, praised the court action.

"We fully support bringing to justice those responsible for crimes and atrocities that have occurred in Darfur," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack told reporters in Washington.

Prosecutors at tribunal based in The Hague made the charges public yesterday morning.

"The prosecution has concluded there are reasonable grounds to believe that Ahmad Harun and Ali Kushayb ... bear criminal responsibility in relation to 51 counts of alleged crimes against humanity and war crimes," said ICC prosecutor Luis Moreno-Ocampo.

"The evidence shows they acted together, and with others, with the common purpose of carrying out attacks against the civilian populations," he said.

The two men were largely responsible for carrying out a campaign of 51 specific counts of war crimes and crimes against humanity, including rape, murder, torture, forcible transfer, destruction of property, pillaging, inhumane acts, outrage upon personal dignity, attacks against the civilian population, and unlawful imprisonment or severe deprivation of liberty, the court said.

Human rights groups welcomed the action, but warned that a meaningful international military intervention is still necessary to save the remaining survivors and stabilize nearby Chad, temporary home to some 230,000 Sudanese refugees displaced by four years of fighting and attacks that are thought to have killed more than 200,000 people.

The Sudanese government yesterday rejected the ICC's authority as "illegitimate" and said it would not turn over the suspects for trial.

"The court has no jurisdiction to try any Sudanese for any alleged crimes," Justice Minister Mohammed Ali al-Mardi told reporters in Khartoum, according to wire service accounts.

"[Our] stance is not limited to those who fight on the government's side, but applies to all Sudanese, including those who still bear arms and fight the government. They are Sudanese, and we will not let them be tried by any court outside Sudan."

He dismissed the court's evidence, but also noted that one of the two suspects, Mr. Kushayb, had been in government custody since November on charges relating to the killings in Darfur.

The Sudanese government, which has grudgingly allowed an ill-equipped African Union peacekeeping force to police specific areas, has rejected a more robust U.N. peacekeeping force.

The charges announced yesterday at The Hague describe a direct link between the Interior Ministry and Mr. Kushayb, who is referred to as "the colonel of colonels" in charge of Darfur.

An estimated 2.5 million people have been driven from their homes since 2003, when ethnic African rebels took up arms against the government, claiming decades of discrimination and neglect.

Outside observers, including officials from the United Nations and African Union, blame pro-government militias for the worst atrocities.

Sudan Official Accused In Darfur Atrocities (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 28, 2007

UNITED NATIONS -- A top Sudanese government official colluded with militias to commit atrocities against civilians in the Darfur region, the International Criminal Court's chief prosecutor said Tuesday.

Prosecutor Luis Moreno-Ocampo presented results of a 21-month investigation that he said showed "reasonable evidence" that Ahmed Haroun, then state minister for the interior, and imprisoned militia leader Ali Kushayb, "bear criminal responsibility" for mass executions, rapes and the forcible removal of thousands of people from their homes.

The allegations, which are not an indictment, are a first step that could lead to arrests and prosecutions by the court at The Hague, and they come amid an international campaign to halt the violence in Darfur, which has killed more than 200,000 people and displaced 2.5 million in the last four years.

Prosecution, however, will not be easy. Sudan's justice minister immediately rejected the allegations and said the suspects would not be handed over for trial.

Haroun is Sudan's state minister for humanitarian affairs. Kushayb, whose real name is Ali Mohammed Ali Abdalrahman, has been under arrest in Khartoum, the capital, since November, on unspecified charges.

"The court has no jurisdiction to try any Sudanese for any alleged crimes," Justice Minister Mohamed Ali Mardi said. Sudan is not a signatory to the treaty that created the International Criminal Court and says it will not respect the court's decisions.

If the Sudanese government refuses to cooperate with the ICC, Tuesday's announcement could be the beginning of a long judicial process for the fledgling international court. Its judges can issue a warrant for the men's arrest, but if Sudan decides to prosecute them for the same crimes under its own judicial system, the international court would no longer have jurisdiction.

DOJ_NMG_0137839

"I have no assurance of cooperation," Moreno-Ocampo said in a conference call with journalists. "We know it is a difficult challenge."

He added that in previous cases, a summons was sufficient to get the suspects to appear in court.

Human rights groups have pressed the court to assign blame with the president and army chiefs.

Moreno-Ocampo said that additional suspects could be named later but that his team for now had gone after those they could clearly link to crimes against humanity.

The investigation focused on militia attacks on four towns in Darfur, in western Sudan, from August 2003 to March 2004.

As head of the "Darfur security desk," Haroun coordinated the recruitment, arming and funding of militiamen known as janjaweed, the prosecution document says. It quotes Haroun as saying during a public meeting that he had been given "all the power and authority to kill or forgive whoever in Darfur for the sake of peace and security," and shows that he directed the militiamen to attack villages.

A member of Haroun's office said the state minister was in Khartoum but unavailable for comment.

Ali Kushayb, a commander of thousands of militia fighters in Darfur, issued orders "to victimize the civilian populations" through mass rapes, killings, torture, looting and the displacement of residents, the court said in a statement.

Moreno-Ocampo said witnesses had testified that Kushayb personally participated in the execution of 32 men in Mukjar, and that his fighters tied women to trees and raped them repeatedly.

Sudanese government officials called the ICC accusations politically motivated and were preparing to organize mass demonstrations.

"The whole thing is counterproductive," a senior official in Khartoum said. "They are just trying to put pressure on the government. The rebels committed atrocities. The government committed atrocities. But we are still in the situation of war. All other tribunals like this took place after the war was over. The issue of justice should come after the peace."

The pending indictments have been a factor in ongoing talks with Khartoum about whether United Nations peacekeeping troops will be allowed in Darfur. Sudan's negotiators have questioned whether U.N. troops would be used to enforce court arrest warrants or to pursue suspects.

Cameron Hume, the U.S. charge d'affaires in Sudan, urged all sides to not allow the court's accusations to interfere with efforts to resolve the crisis. Like Sudan, the U.S. does not recognize the authority of the ICC.

"The urgent thing is improving the humanitarian situation and protecting the humanitarian operations, and having a political dialogue that leads to peace," Hume said.

In an attempt to appease the international community, Sudan created a special court in 2005 to try suspects accused of war crimes in Darfur.

A handful were put on trial in Nyala, accused of being militia members.

"It was a mockery," said Adam Azzain Mohammed, head of the University of Khartoum's Institute for the Studies of Public Administration and Federal Governance. "They only tried ordinary people who had nothing to do with the real clashes."

Justice Ministry officials have suggested that additional prosecutions are imminent, and Khartoum newspapers have reported that trials will start next week.

Some local humanitarian groups expressed frustration that the international court did not list more names or higher-ranking suspects.

"This is very disappointing," said Salih Osman, a human rights attorney in Darfur. "People were expecting more than a list of two men. It's not going to satisfy the victims."

Osman said that both men were "deeply implicated" in the Darfur crisis but that neither was a major orchestrator of the violence. He said Haroun did not hold much political or tribal power in Khartoum and might easily be "sacrificed" by the government.

Nevertheless, he expressed hope that the case would help end the crisis in Darfur.

"Justice and accountability are very important elements to stopping the violence," he said. "The ICC can be a deterrent for government officials who are continuing to commit crimes."

2 Face Trials At The Hague Over Darfur Atrocities (NYT)

By Marlise Simons

The New York Times, February 28, 2007

THE HAGUE, Feb. 27 — International prosecutors on Tuesday designated their first suspects in atrocities in the Sudanese region of Darfur, selecting a government minister and a militia commander to bring to trial.

DOJ_NMG_0137840

Luis Moreno-Ocampo, the chief prosecutor of the International Criminal Court, said he had presented close to 100 pages of evidence and asked the judges to issue summonses for the two men, Ahmad Harun and Ali Muhammad Ali Abd-al-Rahman.

Mr. Harun, currently Sudan's deputy minister for humanitarian affairs, was a senior government official in charge of the military and police and intelligence forces in Darfur as civilians were killed, raped and chased from their homes in the region, the prosecutors said.

His "unlimited" budget, the prosecutors said, allowed him to arm and finance Mr. Rahman, also known as Ali Kushayb, the militia leader who led fighters in a brutal campaign of violence against civilians. "We have focused on some of the most serious incidents," Mr. Moreno-Ocampo said.

The announcement came after 20 months of criminal investigation into Darfur's enormous bloodshed and humanitarian disaster. Human rights activists described the two suspects as powerful but not among Sudan's top leaders.

At a news conference in The Hague, Mr. Moreno-Ocampo declined to say whether the most important figures in Sudan's political or military hierarchy would be held accountable for the mass killing, looting, rape and general devastation in Darfur, which has uprooted more than two and a half million people, according to the United Nations.

The prosecution is believed to be investigating crimes by the government, the militias aligned with the government and the rebel forces they oppose.

Court officials said the prosecutor favored a strategy of focusing on specific events to which he can link individuals, rather than pursuing broad, ambitious indictments. He may also be following the path of other war crimes tribunals, building a base of evidence with lesser cases before moving up the chain of command. But the arrival of any Sudanese suspects at the court is far from assured.

In Khartoum, the Sudanese minister of justice immediately said the nation did not recognize the court's jurisdiction, did not intend to hand over anyone and would try any cases itself. Sudan has told Mr. Moreno-Ocampo that it has already arrested 14 people for human rights violations, including Mr. Rahman. Even so, human rights groups said most of those arrested in Sudan have been low-level fighters.

The prosecutors' decision, and the reaction from Khartoum, raised the basic difficulty the court faces: how to investigate, let alone put on trial, officials from sitting governments.

The International Criminal Court, embraced by 104 countries but independent from the United Nations, has a broad mandate to investigate war crimes and crimes against humanity. But it has no police to enforce its summonses or arrest warrants, leaving it dependent on the very governments it may be investigating, as in the case of Sudan.

Such issues have confronted United Nations war crimes tribunals for a decade, with prosecutors for Uganda's genocide and the wars in the Balkans still begging for the arrests of important suspects.

For the first Darfur case — the court is handling cases in three other African nations — the prosecution has focused on violence in four villages and towns, starting in the summer of 2003.

In April of that year, Mr. Moreno-Ocampo said, rebels attacked Al Fasher airport in Darfur, destroying planes, killing government soldiers and kidnapping the Sudanese air force commander. That was a turning point in the conflict, the prosecutor said, and led to intense recruiting of Arab militiamen, or janjaweed, who have been aligned with the Arab-dominated government.

The janjaweed focused on the civilian population, he said, on the rationale that they were supporters of the rebels.

"This strategy became the justification for the mass murder, summary execution and mass rape of civilians," Mr. Moreno-Ocampo said.

At the time, Mr. Harun was the minister of state for the interior, and oversaw the Darfur Security Desk.

Mr. Harun was seen traveling with well guarded boxes of cash and was observed distributing money, weapons and ammunition throughout Darfur, according to the prosecutor's statement, and worked closely with the militia leader, Mr. Rahman.

On one occasion, in early August 2003, Mr. Harun arrived by helicopter in the Darfur town of Mukjar as janjaweed militia were moving in and gave a public speech. According to the prosecutor, Mr. Harun said that since the children of the Fur tribe had become rebels, the Fur people and their possessions had become booty for the militia. Immediately upon his departure, the janjaweed "looted the entire town," the prosecution statement said.

Mr. Rahman personally led the attack on Mukjar and three other villages and towns, the statement said. By mid-2003 he was commanding thousands of janjaweed. His forces pillaged and burned homes and shops, killed hundreds of people and tied women to trees and repeatedly raped them. According to the prosecution, Mr. Rahman took part in a number of summary executions.

He was arrested in Sudan in November and is being held on a different set of human rights violations.

Mr. Moreno-Ocampo said his staff tried to meet with him, and with Mr. Harun, in recent weeks, but the Sudanese government prevented it.

DOJ_NMG_0137841

World Court's Big Move On Darfur (CSM)

By Robert Marquand

The Christian Science Monitor, February 28, 2007

THE HAGUE

After 20 months, more than 100 formal witness statements, and visits to 17 countries, the chief prosecutor of the International Criminal Court (ICC) Tuesday indicted a high-ranking Sudanese interior minister and a janjaweed militia leader on 51 counts of war crimes and crimes against humanity in the ongoing crisis in Sudan's troubled Darfur region.

The naming of Ahmed Haroun, a former deputy interior minister, and a janjaweed leader known as Ali Kushayb, is considered a bold move for the young ICC and its chief prosecutor Luis Moreno-Ocampo. Despite Sudan's rejection of the indictments, most experts hailed them as an international censure that could help end the four-year-old crisis that has killed more than 200,000 people, and displaced more than 2 million.

"The ICC did the right job at getting individuals who can be sacrificed by the Sudanese government, but who at the same time have a significant degree of culpability," says Alex de Waal, a Darfur expert and program director at the Social Science Research Council in New York.

Prosecutor Moreno-Ocampo intrinsically linked the Sudanese government and the feared janjaweed arguing that after Mr. Haroun took charge of the Darfur security desk in April 2003, he oversaw the "staffing, funding, and arming of the [janjaweed]," which grew by 10,000 soldiers and conducted atrocities in Darfur under Haroun's direct authority.

Darfur is widely regarded as the highest profile case in international justice circles, and a possible turning point in efforts to establish a global criminal tribunal – though ICC investigations into Darfur have proceeded during the conflict, and without cooperation by Sudan.

The "Sudanese Armed Forces" conducted a systematic campaign of "underlying operational" support for the janjaweed, the indictment argues, saying that Haroun and Mr. Kushayb met frequently. Janjaweed militiamen told villagers they had the backing of the state, including "the power to kill or forgive." Haroun visited Darfur towns so often he was "known as 'the official' from Khartoum," in west Darfur, Moreno-Campo charged, saying Haroun provided funds from "an unlimited budget...that was not audited."

Significantly for the war crimes and crimes against humanity charges, the janjaweed attackers "targeted no rebel peasants, but civilian residents, based on the idea that they supported the opposition rebels," Moreno-Campo said, and conducted "mass murder, summary executions, and rape."

The ICC has often been termed a "court of the future" for its prospective role as an arbiter of international justice. It was conceived in 1998 as a "court of last resort," and has built its legal approach and validity on the example of the UN Yugoslavia and Rwanda criminal tribunals also housed at The Hague. The ICC has not prosecuted anyone, though it is preparing a trial for Thomas Lubanga Dyilo for enlisting child soldiers in the Congo war of 2002-03.

Still, Tuesday's Darfur indictment is considered crucial in international legal circles since it is the first such case to be referred by the United Nations Security Council. Neither China, which has close ties to the Sudanese regime, Russia, or the US blocked the Darfur case.

Washington's tacit approval is significant, experts say, since the US has not participated in the ICC since it was established in 1998.

"The US position [to allow Darfur investigations to go forward] is a turning point institutionally," says Diane Orentlicher of American University's Washington College of Law, "since it reflects a willingness of the US to accept the jurisdiction of the court."

"All the NGO reports, the UN reports, the State Department, and the commissions, point to a pattern of crimes committed by the janjaweed as a proxy of the Sudanese government," says a source with close ties to the prosecutor. "The pattern is one of aerial attack by government planes and helicopters followed by janjaweed on the ground, sometimes supplemented by government troops."

Sudan says it will not extradite those indicted at The Hague. Still war crimes experts argue that international courts such as the Rwanda and Yugoslavia tribunals eventually proved to build moral and strategic arguments against those charged, which eventually limited their ill-doings and provided a basis for rebuilding the society.

International tribunals, which rarely have much clout, have faced a steady uphill climb over the years, with skepticism if not cynicism about their effectiveness a widely shared feeling among politicians and powerbrokers.

Yet they have continued to develop.

"Some people may never be brought to trial," says Anne Heindel, assistant director of war crimes research at American University in Washington. "But restricting their movements has an overall effect, making it harder [for them] to operate."

DOJ_NMG_0137842

The inability of the court to travel in Darfur worries some international human rights legal scholars, who say the evidence should be gathered from the site of the war crimes themselves. Others have argued eloquently that charges of genocide should be brought in Darfur.

Yet most experts seem to agree that the ICC should simply proceed with as much professionalism and investigation as possible. "With this submission, the ICC Chief Prosecutor has stood up for the victims of the mass atrocities in Darfur and awakened the hope for justice in the region. He has also warned all parties to the conflict that they will pay a heavy price for any further attacks on civilians," said Maureen Byrnes, executive director of Human Rights First in New York, in a press release Tuesday.

"The first submission should not be the last," Byrnes adds. "The Chief Prosecutor should pursue evidence of criminal responsibility up the chain of command, no matter how high it takes him." The ICC prosecutor will submit his indictment to judges at The Hague court, after which the judges will decide how and whether to conduct a trial.

Most wanted

A look at the ICC's main targets since it began issuing arrest warrants in 2005:

Ahmed Muhammed Harun (Sudan): Former head of Khartoum's Darfur Security Desk; currently junior minister for humanitarian affairs

Ali Mohammed Ali Abd-al-Rahman, aka Ali Kushayb (Sudan): Janjaweed militia leader

Thomas Lubanga (DR Congo): Militia leader accused of recruitingchild soldiers during 2002-03 conflict; first person put in ICCcustody; ordered last month to stand trial

Joseph Kony (Uganda): Head of fearsome rebel group, the Lord's Resistance Army

Justice For Darfur (WP)

By Angelina Jolie

The Washington Post, February 28, 2007

BAHAI, Chad -- Here, at this refugee camp on the border of Sudan, nothing separates us from Darfur but a small stretch of desert and a line on a map. All the same, it's a line I can't cross. As a representative of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, I have traveled into Darfur before, and I had hoped to return. But the UNHCR has told me that this camp, Oure Cassoni, is as close as I can get.

Sticking to this side of the Sudanese border is supposed to keep me safe. By every measure -- killings, rapes, the burning and looting of villages -- the violence in Darfur has increased since my last visit, in 2004. The death toll has passed 200,000; in four years of fighting, Janjaweed militia members have driven 2.5 million people from their homes, including the 26,000 refugees crowded into Oure Cassoni.

Attacks on aid workers are rising, another reason I was told to stay out of Darfur. By drawing attention to their heroic work -- their efforts to keep refugees alive, to keep camps like this one from being consumed by chaos and fear -- I would put them at greater risk.

I've seen how aid workers and nongovernmental organizations make a difference to people struggling for survival. I can see on workers' faces the toll their efforts have taken. Sitting among them, I'm amazed by their bravery and resilience. But humanitarian relief alone will never be enough.

Until the killers and their sponsors are prosecuted and punished, violence will continue on a massive scale. Ending it may well require military action. But accountability can also come from international tribunals, measuring the perpetrators against international standards of justice.

Accountability is a powerful force. It has the potential to change behavior -- to check aggression by those who are used to acting with impunity. Luis Moreno-Ocampo, chief prosecutor of the International Criminal Court (ICC), has said that genocide is not a crime of passion; it is a calculated offense. He's right. When crimes against humanity are punished consistently and severely, the killers' calculus will change.

On Monday I asked a group of refugees about their needs. Better tents, said one; better access to medical facilities, said another. Then a teenage boy raised his hand and said, with powerful simplicity, "Nous voulons une Ã©preuve." We want a trial. He is why I am encouraged by the ICC's announcement yesterday that it will prosecute a former Sudanese minister of state and a Janjaweed leader on charges of crimes against humanity.

Some critics of the ICC have said indictments could make the situation worse. The threat of prosecution gives the accused a reason to keep fighting, they argue. Sudanese officials have echoed this argument, saying that the ICC's involvement, and the implication of their own eventual prosecution, is why they have refused to allow U.N. peacekeepers into Darfur.

DOJ_NMG_0137843

It is not clear, though, why we should take Khartoum at its word. And the notion that the threat of ICC indictments has somehow exacerbated the problem doesn't make sense, given the history of the conflict. Khartoum's claims aside, would we in America ever accept the logic that we shouldn't prosecute murderers because the threat of prosecution might provoke them to continue killing?

When I was in Chad in June 2004, refugees told me about systematic attacks on their villages. It was estimated then that more than 1,000 people were dying each week.

In October 2004 I visited West Darfur, where I heard horrific stories, including accounts of gang-rapes of mothers and their children. By that time, the UNHCR estimated, 1.6 million people had been displaced in the three provinces of Darfur and 200,000 others had fled to Chad.

It wasn't until June 2005 that the ICC began to investigate. By then the campaign of violence was well underway.

As the prosecutions unfold, I hope the international community will intervene, right away, to protect the people of Darfur and prevent further violence. The refugees don't need more resolutions or statements of concern. They need follow-through on past promises of action.

There has been a groundswell of public support for action. People may disagree on how to intervene -- airstrikes, sending troops, sanctions, divestment -- but we all should agree that the slaughter must be stopped and the perpetrators brought to justice.

In my five years with UNHCR, I have visited more than 20 refugee camps in Sierra Leone, Congo, Kosovo and elsewhere. I have met families uprooted by conflict and lobbied governments to help them. Years later, I have found myself at the same camps, hearing the same stories and seeing the same lack of clean water, medicine, security and hope.

It has become clear to me that there will be no enduring peace without justice. History shows that there will be another Darfur, another exodus, in a vicious cycle of bloodshed and retribution. But an international court finally exists. It will be as strong as the support we give it. This might be the moment we stop the cycle of violence and end our tolerance for crimes against humanity.

What the worst people in the world fear most is justice. That's what we should deliver.

The writer is a goodwill ambassador for the United Nations High Commission for Refugees.

US Sees Repression 'worsening In Cuba' (FT)

By Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, February 28, 2007

The Bush administration official whose job is to hasten the end of communism in Cuba on Tuesday claimed the Castro government was stepping up its internal repression in response to an increasingly active opposition movement.

Caleb McCarry, the US State Department's Cuba transition co-ordinator, cited "independent Cuban journalists" as saying civil society had become more active, especially in the provinces, since Fidel Castro temporarily passed power to his brother Raúl last July.

Cubans were starting to speak up in defence of their neighbours from attacks by government-orchestrated mobs, Mr McCarry told the conservative American Enterprise Institute (AEI) policy group. His assessment contrasted with that of analysts and members of Congress who recently returned from Cuba with reports of a smooth transition of power.

"What you see is an uneasy version of the status quo," said Dan Erikson, analyst with the Inter-American Dialogue think-tank. What was remarkable since last July was the level of caution and lack of new thinking displayed by all sides – the government in Havana, the Bush administration and the exiled Cuban community.

The no-change in US policy was underlined by Carlos Gutierrez, the US commerce secretary, in a speech to the AEI. He indicated no intention to relax the travel ban or the partial trade embargo as members of Congress have proposed. He also reiterated the administration's rejection of dialogue offered by Raúl Castro.

"The problem is the repressive communist system. The only solution is to change the system," Mr Gutierrez said.

While Mr Gutierrez stressed the US had "no imperialist intentions" or military plans to occupy Cuba, Roger Noriega, a former Bush administration official, said "international intervention" could be necessary if the regime used "deadly force" to survive.

Asked if the US would intervene to stop such an outcome, Mr McCarry said he did not answer hypothetical questions.

Mr McCarry heads an inter-agency office which has been planning for the "day after" Fidel Castro's death. His mandate is to "accelerate the demise of Castro's tyranny" with a more proactive approach that would undermine the regime's survival strategies.

DOJ_NMG_0137844

McConnell: Repression In Cuba Increases (AP)

By Barry Schweid

AP, February 28, 2007

Repression is increasing in Cuba under the control of Raul Castro, and the domination of the government by his brother, Fidel, is nearing an end, Bush administration officials said Tuesday.

"In Cuba, this year will mark the end of the long domination of that country by Fidel Castro," Mike McConnell, the nation's new spy chief, told Congress.

McConnell, who did not explain his remark, told the Senate Armed Services Committee that significant positive change immediately after Fidel Castro's death was unlikely. He said Raul Castro has had the opportunity to solidify his control in the seven months since his brother's incapacitating illness last July.

Separately, the Bush administration official who oversees a White House effort to promote transition to democracy in Cuba said he has seen no indication that the government is getting ready to make any changes.

"What has increased is repression," Caleb Charles McCarry said at a seminar at the American Enterprise Institute.

Security forces have stepped up harassment of dissidents and have kept closer track of reporters since Fidel Castro transferred control of Cuba's government to his brother after undergoing intestinal surgery, the U.S. official said.

McCarry said the White House Commission for Assistance for a Free Cuba does "what it can to hasten the day when they can enjoy freedom again."

He spoke primarily of broadcasts to Cuba and expressions of support for human rights, and said only peaceful means are used by the United States.

On the job since July 2005, McCarry dismissed any suggestion of U.S. dialogue with Cuba to prepare for transition to democracy. "The dialogue that needs to take place is between Cuban authorities and the Cuban people," he said.

The fall of Castro's 48-year-old government has long been predicted by U.S. officials since the 1959 revolution on the island.

New United Nations Chief Tackles The Agency's Tradition Of Patronage Jobs (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, February 28, 2007

UNITED NATIONS, Feb. 27 — Secretary General Ban Ki-moon is installing tough new requirements for hundreds of jobs at the United Nations that he hopes will begin to dispel the reputation for inaction and bloat that has long dogged the institution, according to officials in his office.

He is adopting the changes, which include increasing internal competition for jobs and removing some job guarantees, first in his own office, and is calling on others to follow suit or leave the organization. Mr. Ban has found that approach necessary because the powers of a secretary general to force change outside his own office are limited, and the barriers to change in patronage procedures erected by the 192-member General Assembly are substantial.

"From Day 1, he wanted to change the working culture of the United Nations by leading by example," said Kim Won-soo, a Korean associate regarded at the United Nations as Mr. Ban's most influential adviser.

"He says, 'I do it myself and I expect my senior members to do it,' " Mr. Kim said. "He's keen on that."

Among the new procedures, which have already started to agitate the organization, are strict annual performance reviews and term limits for new hires, the opening of high-level jobs at headquarters to United Nations workers in the field and strong pressure for all top officials to make public their confidential financial disclosures.

He is also removing what are known as "reversion options" under which officials ending their service at a high level automatically have the right to revert to their previous level and stay in United Nations service. All appointees will now be told they must give up this option or the job offer will be withdrawn.

High-level officials will be reviewed at the end of their first two years, and all positions will be considered five-year appointments. The secretary general's term is five years, and aides say Mr. Ban believes that other officials should pass through the same reappraisal process he will face if he runs for a second term.

Another innovation Mr. Ban hopes will expand through the executive ranks is what he calls "opening the floor" — making all top deputy positions available to candidates from throughout the United Nations system. The offer of job opportunities in New York has provoked a big response from workers in the field who previously had little hope of landing a coveted headquarters job. More than 1,200 applications have come in for 12 such positions on the 38th floor, which houses Mr. Ban and his top executives.

DOJ_NMG_0137845

"Everybody thinks this is the secretary general's floor and the secretary general can put into office whoever he wants," said an official who said he could not discuss policy changes for attribution. "But he wants to show that he has no hidden agenda or any person in mind, he just wants to get the best qualified."

An official who worked on the new arrangement said it had been received well in United Nations offices in Geneva, Vienna and Nairobi, but less so in New York, where, he said, people were likely to want the protection of patronage to enable them to stay put.

Overhauling United Nations management has been a long-thwarted goal.

Last year, reform was aggressively pushed by Ambassador John R. Bolton, then the United States delegate, but the effort ended in confrontation with ambassadors from the developing world and little achievement. The present plan has had only limited input from the United States, according to Mr. Ban's aides and American observers.

Outside experts give Mr. Ban's approach higher odds for working than past efforts.

"This is real change," said Edward C. Luck, a professor of international affairs at Columbia who has followed the United Nations for more than three decades. "This is a way to make top management accountable in ways that have never been tried before."

John G. Ruggie, a professor of international relations at Harvard and former under secretary general for planning, said: "There's a big cultural change under way here that is more than just an institutional change agenda. Ban understands that it's not enough just to move boxes around the organization charts."

Kathy A. Bushkin, chief operating officer of the United Nations Foundation, said: "It's very much like what very modern companies do by changing culture at the top and driving it through the organization. It's a significant move in the direction of the kind of real reform that people have been calling for."

The End Of The Affair? (WSJ)

By Kim R. Holmes And Nile Gardiner

The Wall Street Journal, February 28, 2007

For over half a century the Anglo-American "special relationship" has been a dominant force in world affairs. Today it is the engine of the global war on terror, and its enduring strength continues to confound and even infuriate leaders in continental Europe. Britain is the only nation the U.S. truly trusts as an ally; it is the British prime minister and not the German chancellor, the French president or the U.N. secretary-general, to whom the U.S. president looks first for partnership in addressing the big international security matters of the day.

Most Americans automatically think of Winston Churchill and Margaret Thatcher when conversation turns to the Anglo-American alliance, and Britain's Conservative Party is traditionally viewed in Washington as the U.K. home of the special relationship. Tony Blair, a steadfast support for America since 9/11, is acknowledged as an exception to the rule, a pro-American leader of a traditionally America-skeptic Labour Party.

There are, however, growing doubts among American policy makers that the resurgent Conservative Party led by David Cameron remains fully committed to the special relationship. There is now discussion in the White House, State Department and Pentagon of the possibility of dealing with a future Conservative-led British government that seeks to distance itself from the U.S. But the issue is also of concern on Capitol Hill -- among Republicans and Democrats. The notion that the special relationship could be heading for the rocks is no longer a fantasy, but a distinct political reality.

Shadow Foreign Secretary William Hague's Jan. 31 speech to the Royal Institute of International Affairs -- Chatham House -- spoke of a "solid but not slavish" alliance, and called for "the effective management of the relationship with the United States of America." These controversial words caused significant political damage here. It echoed Mr. Cameron's "liberal conservative" speech given on the fifth anniversary of 9/11, where he spoke of the need for "humility and patience" in conducting foreign policy.

Mr. Hague's carefully chosen description of America's and Britain's "loss of moral authority," and the need for Britain to shift more political weight to "the relationships of the Asia-Pacific region," is viewed in Washington as a fundamental reassessment of the special relationship, with far-reaching implications for both the U.S. and the U.K.

What was missing from the speech was any display of solidarity with the U.S. when thousands of British soldiers are fighting alongside their American counterparts in Iraq and Afghanistan, a stunning omission at a time of war. British forces have played an extraordinarily successful role in maintaining security in the southern third of Iraq in the face of Iranian interference and extreme provocation from Shia militias. In Afghanistan, British forces have been in the vanguard of NATO operations to defeat the Taliban and al Qaeda in the south of the country.

Perhaps the greatest benefit that Britain derives from the special relationship, and Tony Blair's close tie to George W. Bush, is the almost invisible security embrace, and close intelligence cooperation, that Washington gives only to its closest ally. U.S.

DOJ_NMG_0137846

intelligence, after all, helped thwart a series of large-scale al Qaeda attacks on British targets, including Heathrow Airport and Canary Wharf, which had been planned by 9/11 architect Khalid Sheikh Mohammed. Standing shoulder to shoulder with the U.S. may not be the most popular policy in Britain, with few votes to be gained, but it is fundamentally in Britain's interest.

The special relationship is a two-way street that significantly enhances Britain's ability to act as a major player on the world stage. For London, any downgrading of the Anglo-American alliance would significantly harm British strategic interests, and result in the loosening of defense and intelligence ties, the further loss of national sovereignty within the European Union, the diminution of British global power, and a weakening of the two nations' close-knit financial, trade and investment relationships.

Unfortunately, in its public statements the Conservative Party's leadership appears increasingly to be following the rise of anti-Americanism in the polls, rather than leading public opinion. There is a very real danger the Conservatives will make the same mistake that Gerhard Schröder did in the 2002 German elections, exploiting widespread anti-U.S. sentiment for short-term political gain. The consequences for U.S.-German relations were disastrous, with a virtual "cold war" between Washington and Berlin until Mr. Schröder's exit in 2005.

If the Conservatives take office in 2009 or 2010, the relationship between the White House and Downing Street could well be a tense one whether the Republicans or Democrats are in power, with a great deal of bad blood generated in advance. Despite President Bush's departure in January 2009, the fundamentals of U.S. foreign policy and America's approach to winning the war on terror are unlikely to dramatically change. Both sides of the political spectrum in Washington would balk at the kind of negative language being used by British Conservative politicians with regard to the Anglo-American alliance.

It is not too late, though, for the Conservatives to adopt a more traditional and pragmatic foreign-policy position, one that recognizes the huge stakes involved in maintaining the alliance. British and American leaders should advance a strongly pro-Atlanticist agenda that emphasizes Anglo-American global leadership.

The U.S. and Britain are committed to many of the same values and ideals on the world stage: the defense of national sovereignty, the projection of military power to confront tyranny and threats to international security, the advancement of free trade, and the protection of human rights.

With the threat of a nuclear-armed Iran just two to three years away, and the continuing war against al Qaeda raging across the globe, it is vital that Britain and America stand together.The future of the free world depends on it.

Messrs. Holmes and Gardiner are, respectively, vice president for foreign policy and director of the Margaret Thatcher Center for Freedom, at the Heritage Foundation.

Blogger On Ice (WP)

The Washington Post, February 28, 2007

THE BUSH administration has tolerated Egypt's brutal crackdown on domestic dissent and the broader reversal of its democratic spring of 2005 in part because President Hosni Mubarak argues that his adversaries are dangerous Islamic extremists. It's true that the largest opposition movement in Egypt is the Muslim Brotherhood; how dangerous it is can be debated. But what is overlooked is that Mr. Mubarak reserves his most relentless repression not for the Islamists -- who hold a fifth of the seats in parliament -- but for the secular democrats who fight for free elections, a free press, rights for women and religious tolerance.

The latest case in point is a blogger named Abdel Kareem Nabil Soliman, who was sentenced to four years in prison last week on charges of religious incitement, disrupting public order and "insulting the president." A brave and provocative 22-year-old student, Mr. Soliman first achieved notice with postings that denounced riots in Alexandria directed at Egypt's Christian Copt minority. He said the brutality he witnessed was the result of extremist Islamic teachings, in part by his own university, Al-Azhar, which he called "the other face of al-Qaeda." He compared the prophet Muhammad to Israel's Ariel Sharon. And he said Mr. Mubarak was a "symbol of tyranny."

Setting aside the hyperbole, there was considerable truth in many of the blogger's charges. Right or wrong, he certainly would seem to deserve the same freedom of speech as Egypt's government-owned newspapers, which regularly publish vile anti-Semitic screeds. But Mr. Soliman was one of several Egyptian bloggers arrested last year. While others were released after being beaten -- and in one case, raped -- by police, Mr. Soliman was brought to trial by Mr. Mubarak's prosecutors in what seemed a clear attempt to freeze what had been a growing space for free expression.

"This verdict sets a legal precedent for prosecuting someone for what they write on the Internet, on charges that are not easily defined or defended against," wrote another Egyptian blogger known as Sandmonkey. "This could be used to prosecute any blogger the government feels like punishing and serves as a huge blow to freedom of speech in Egypt."

As a political prisoner, Mr. Soliman will join Ayman Nour, who was sentenced a year ago on fabricated charges after he ran for president against Mr. Mubarak on a liberal democratic platform. As many as 800 members of the Muslim Brotherhood have also been jailed in the past year. This by a government that continues to be one of the largest recipients in the world of U.S. aid, collecting more than $2 billion a year. What do American subsidies support? Not least, the elimination of what would otherwise be the strongest secular democratic movement in the Arab Middle East.

DOJ_NMG_0137847

DOJ_NMG_0137848

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Terror Suspect's Brig Life Detailed (AP) ... 4
Brig Officials Offer Look At Padilla's Detention (USAT) ... 5
Aspects Of Padilla's Treatment Confirmed (LAT) ... 5
Jailers Testify About Padilla's Confinement (NYT) ... 6
Padilla Was Deprived, Not Abused, Court Told (WP) ... 8
Shorbagi Sentence – 7 Years, 8 Months (ROMENT) ... 8
Rome Imam Sentenced In Terror Case Palestinian Native Gave Money To Islamic Militant Group Hamas (AJC) ... 9
First Terrorism Sentence In Georgia (WXIA) ... 9
Georgia Man Sent To Jail For Aiding Hamas (ATLBIZ) ... 10
Ga. Imam Sentenced For Aiding Hamas (AP) ... 10
False Quotes Shake Up Terror Trial (LAT) ... 11
Details Of Men Held In CIA Jails Demanded (FT) ... 12
New Light Shed On CIA's 'Black Site' Prisons (WP) ... 12
Europe's Runaway Prosecutions (WP) ... 15
Canadian Parliament Decides To Let 2 Measures Passed After 9/11 Expire (NYT) ... 16

Patriot Act:

DoJ Sued For Release Of FISA Court Rules On Spy Program (INFOWEEK) ... 17
EFF Files Suit Against DoJ (TND) ... 17

Homeland Response:

Bush Will Veto Union Rights For Federal Airport Screeners (WT) 18
Labor Language Threatens Antiterror Bill (AP) ... 18
FEDERAL DIARY: Interior Report Finds 'Wall' Between Field Staff, Leaders (WP) ... 19
Call To Expand Union Rights Could Derail Antiterror Bill (NYT) . 20
New Profiling Program Raises Privacy Concerns (WP) ... 21
Under The Gantry (WP) ... 22
It's A Hard Sell For Some, Big Easy For Others (USAT) ... 23

War News:

War Bill Divides Democrats (LAT) ... 25
Democrats Struggle To Reach Consensus On Iraq (MCT) ... 26
Senate Democrats Backtrack, Opt Not To Tackle Iraq In 9/11 Commission Bill (HILL) ... 27
Iraq Bill Vexes Democrats (WP) ... 28
Iraq Moves Unclear (RC) ... 29
Democrats Back Away From War Fund Plan (AP) ... 30
Divided Congress Prepares To Debate Financing And Strategy For Iraq War (NYT) ... 31
New Lawmakers Seek War Debate (WT) ... 32
Democrats Snipe At Senate Leaders Over Handling Of Iraq Issue (POL) ... 33
An Editor's Confession: I'm The Source Of 'Slow Bleed' (POL) .. 34
Service Members Sign Appeal Calling For Troop Withdrawal (NYT) ... 35
Spy Chief Uses 'Civil War' To Describe Iraq (USAT) ... 36
Bush Administration To Join Iraqi-led Talks Attended By Iran, Syria (MCT) ... 37
Car Bomb Near Soccer Field Kills 16 Children, 2 Women In Ramadi (WP) ... 38
Iraq Bombers Target Ice Cream Shop, Restaurants (LAT) ... 39
Coming Soon, Maybe: An Iraqi Oil Law (NYT) ... 40
Iran, Syria May Join Baghdad Talks (AP) ... 40
U.S. Joins Regional Talks To Secure Iraq (AP) ... 41
U.S. To Sit Down With Syria, Iran For Regional Conference On Iraq (USAT) ... 42
U.S. Will Join Talks With Iran And Syria (WP) ... 43
Iraq Calls For Two Regional Summits (FT) ... 44
U.S. Set To Join Iran And Syria In Talks On Iraq (NYT) ... 44
U.S. To Enter Iraq Talks With Iran, Syria (WSJ) ... 46
U.S. To Attend Talks With Iraq, Neighbors (WT) ... 47
U.S. To Join Iran, Syria In Iraq Talks (LAT) ... 48
Al-Qaeda Will Come Back To Haunt US If It Fails In Iraq: Rice (AFP) ... 49
Making Nice With Iraq's Neighbors (LAT) ... 50
Taliban Say Attack Aimed At Cheney (FT) ... 50
Cheney Escapes Harm In Blast (WT/AP) ... 51
Cheney, Karzai Discuss 'Problems From Pakistan' (USAT) ... 52
A Mile From Cheney, Afghan Bomber Kills At Least 23 (NYT) ... 53
Bombing Near Cheney Displays Boldness Of Resurgent Taliban (WP) ... 54
Afghan Bombing Sends A Danger Signal To U.S. (NYT) ... 55
Cheney OK After Afghan Suicide Bombing (CHIT) ... 56
Taliban Says It Targeted Cheney (LAT) ... 57
Inside Politics (WT) ... 58
The Reliable Source (WP) ... 60
Qaeda Rebuilding In Pakistan, Intelligence Chief Tells Panel (NYT) ... 61
U.S. Sees New Al-Qaeda Threat (WP) ... 62

Spy Chief Pushes For Action In Pakistan (AP) ... 62
US Ramps Up Taliban Fight (CSM) ... 63
Warning To Pakistan (WSJ) ... 65

DOJ:

Inside Bush's Prosecutor Purge (SALON) ... 65
Justice Pilots Federated ID Broker (GCN) ... 68

Corporate Scandals:

Former McAfee GC Indicted Over Stock Options (LAW) ... 69
Ex-McAfee Counsel Charged With Fraud (FT) ... 70
McAfee's Ex-Lawyer Indicted (NYT/AP) ... 70
McAfee's Ex-general Counsel Indicted In Stock-option Backdating Case (USAT) ... 71
Fired McAfee Executive Is Charged With Options Fraud (WP/AP) ... 71
MBC Managers Plead Guilty In $830 Million Securities Fraud (AP) ... 71
Former FDA Official Gets Three Years Probation, Fine (FLSUNSEN) ... 72
Feds To List Witnesses In Nacchio Trial (DENP) ... 72
Fine And Probation For Former F.D.A. Chief (NYT/AP) ... 73

Criminal Law:

House Leaders Reach Deal On Subpoenas (HILL) ... 73
Deal Reached On Cunningham Subpeonas (AP) ... 74
Group Asks Gonzales To Review Small's Conduct (WP) ... 74
Deputy Sheriff Charged With Child Pornography (RMN) ... 75
More Jail Time For IC Man (ICPC) ... 75
FIU Couple Heading To Jail (MIH) ... 76
Hollywood Chief Defends Exposing Probe (AP) ... 77
Former Officer Pleads Guilty To Possessing Stolen Firearms (AP) ... 78
Ex-councilman's Conviction Tossed (MACOMBD) ... 78
Mom Taught Children To Fake Retardation (AP) ... 80
Two Indianapolis Men Received Prison Terms Friday For Mortgage Scams. (INDYSTAR) ... 80
3rd Person Charged In $4.2 Million Mortgage Fraud (AP) ... 80
Ex-trooper Gets 5 Years For Soliciting Sex (BOS) ... 81
Former State Trooper Sentenced To 5 Years In Prison In Internet Sex Case (BOS) ... 81
Police Probe Death In Organ Donation Case (LAT) ... 82
Doctors' Hospital Owner's Sentencing Rescheduled (SHRVTIMES) ... 83
Roughing It, Senate Style (RC) ... 83

Civil Law:

Church-state Question Before Justices (USAT) ... 84
Supreme Court Takes Up Church-state Case (CSM) ... 85
Government By Law, Not Faith (NYT) ... 86
Lawyer: FBI Knew Convicts Were Innocent (BSH) ... 87
Wrongly Convicted Say FBI Was At Fault (BOS) ... 87
At What Price The FBI's Treachery? (BOSH) ... 88
Government Contractors Must Take Early Compliance Steps (LAW) ... 89
Lawyer: FBI Knew Convicts Were Innocent (AP) ... 91

Civil Rights:

Justice Dept. Widens FBI Probe Of Deaths During Civil Rights Era (USAT) ... 92
Justice Dept. To Revisit Civil-Rights-Era Killings (WP) ... 93
FBI, Justice Department To Reopen Nearly 100 Cases Of Unsolved Civil Rights-era Killings (MINNST) ... 94
Justice Officials Looking To Prosecute Old Civil Rights Murders (GANNETT) ... 94
FBI, Justice Department To Revisit Civil Rights-Era Killings (BLOOM) ... 95
Attorney General To Civil Rights Era Killers: 'We Are Still On Your Trail' (ABC) ... 95
No Indictment In '55 Emmett Till Slaying (BVND) ... 96
After Inquiry, Grand Jury Refuses To Issue New Indictments In Till Case (NYT) ... 97
The FBI Is Reopening 70 Cold Cases From The Civil Rights Era. (WJTV) ... 97
Two Local Civil Rights Era Deaths Will Get FBI Review (WEDF) 97
FBI To Reopen Memphis Civil-rights Era Cold Case (WMC) ... 98
Feds Probe Two Civil Rights Era Deaths Here (WCNC) ... 98
No Indictment In '55 Emmett Till Slaying (AP) ... 99
No Indictment In Emmett Till Slaying (LAT) ... 99
Cowboy Church Probe Dropped (LYNNA) ... 100
Man Who Was Shot By Ex-EP Border Agents Is Arrested (EPT) 101
S.B. Supervisors Back Ex-border Agents (IVDB) ... 101
Council To Draw New District Maps (FAYOBS) ... 102
Bill Targets 'Don't Ask, Don't Tell' (USAT) ... 102
Defending His Country, But Not Its 'Don't Ask, Don't Tell' Policy (WP) ... 103
Texan Calls For Takeover Of State's Juvenile Schools (NYT) .. 104

Antitrust:

House Gets First Crack At XM-Sirius Proposal (WP) ... 105
Sirius Radio Chief Urges Merger (NYT) ... 106
Satellite Radio Chief To Clear Political Air (FT) ... 106
Sirius Narrows Loss On Subscriber Gains (WSJ) ... 107
Sirius Business (WSJ) ... 108
TXU Profit Up 33%; Dynegy Posts Loss (AP) ... 109
Next Step In TXU Deal Is Backdrop Of Conference (NYT) ... 109
Court Sides With N.C. Cigarette Maker In Wholesalers Dispute (AP) ... 110
VMware Fires Broadside At Microsoft (CNET) ... 111
A Bit Of Movement In Antitrust Suit (KCS) ... 112
Onex Gets U.S. Antitrust Clearance To Buy Kodak's X-Ray Unit (BLOOM) ... 113
Qualcomm Lawsuit Against Nokia On Hold (WSJ) ... 113

Environment:

Nuclear Lab Operator Cited For Safety (AP) ... 114
Study: 'Tipping Point' For Climate Is Near (USAT) ... 114
Conservation May Limit Global Warming (LAT) ... 115
Congress Needs A Marshall Plan In Climate-change Debate (HILL) ... 116
A Green Deal On Coal (NYT) ... 117

DOJ_NMG_0137850

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Sen. Asks If FBI Will Punish Those Who Retaliated Against Agent (BVND) ... 117
Accounting Sought From FBI Director (MINNST) ... 118
Senator Presses FBI For Disciplining (WT) ... 119
Athletes, Celebs Accused In Steroids Rap (AP) ... 119
Albany DA Raids Fla. Steroids Center (ALBANYTU) ... 120
4 Tied To Pharmacy Are Arrested In Inquiry Into Steroid Sales (NYT) ... 123
Investigation Of Steroids And HGH Produces Arrests In Three States (WP) ... 124
Drug Agents Raid Downtown Pharmacy After Steroid Probe (ORS) ... 125
Pro Athletes Received Steroids From Drug Ring, Prosecutor Says (BLOOM) ... 126
SI Reporters Witness Raid (SI/CNN) ... 126
Owners Of Local Pharmacy Arrested Following RaidsRaids Stem From New York Investigation (WESH) ... 127
Steelers' Doctor Questioned In Steroids Investigation (WTAE) 128
Steelers' Doctor Questioned In Steroids Probe (KDKA) ... 128
Steelers Doctor Questioned In Steroid Probe (PTR) ... 129
Woman, 49, Pleads Guilty To Money Laundering (CCCT) ... 130
Nationwide Study: Drug Use Dips, But Alcohol Use On Rise (USAT) ... 130
Bribery Wrecks Drive To Root Out Opium (TEL) ... 131
Bloomington Explosives Case Expands With Munitions Find (MINNST) ... 131
Canines Help Search For Gun In Road-rage Case (ORS) ... 132
Agent Says He Discussed Buying Arms From Man (ELPT) ... 132

Immigration:

5 Plead Guilty In Illegal Workers Case (AP) ... 133
White House Pushes Immigration Overhaul (LAT) ... 133
Low Pay And Broken Promises Greet Guest Workers (NYT) ... 135
Immigrants Boost Pay, Not Prison Populations, New Studies Show (LAT) ... 137
Family Second (NYT) ... 138
Report: Immigrants Do Not Commit Most Crimes (NCT) ... 138

Tax:

Real-Estate Professionals Say IRS Snares Them By Mistake (WSJ) ... 140

Congress-Administration:

Bush To Visit Floyd School (LCJ) ... 141
President Bush To Visit New Albany School (AP) ... 141
President Bush To Visit Southern Indiana School (WDRB) ... 141
Bush To Visit Silver Street Elementary (WLKY) ... 142
Labor Rides Political-Wind Shift (WSJ) ... 142
Labor Looks To Score First Big Win In Years (HILL) ... 143
Business Group Raps Freshmen (RC) ... 145
Walter Reed Puts Congress In Bipartisan 'foul Mood' (HILL) ... 146
Congress Reevaluates High-cost Defense Programs As Budget Ax Looms (HILL) ... 147
House Democrats Angling On Domestic Issues (POL) ... 148
Blue Dogs Believe Their Day Is Here (RC) ... 149
Lobbying Law Misses Some K St. Numbers (HILL) ... 151
Kerry Puts GOP Donor On Defensive (WP) ... 153
HUD Gets New View Of Who's Homeless (USAT) ... 153
Democracy 21 Renews Calls For Doolittle Probe (HILL) ... 154
Senator's Railway Lobby Link May Have Helped Derail Loan (WP) ... 154

Other News:

Wall St. Slide Fuels Worries On Economy (NYT) ... 155
From Shanghai, Tremors Heard Around The World (NYT) ... 157
China Volatility Sparks U.S. Sell-off (USAT) ... 158
US Durable Goods Orders Slide (FT) ... 160
Durable-Goods Orders Plunged 7.8% In January (WSJ) ... 161
Economists Worry As Businesses Tighten Spending (USAT) ... 161
Recession Unlikely This Year, Many Economists Say (LAT) ... 162
Financial Experts Say Investors Shouldn't Panic (LAT) ... 163
Anatomy Of A Wall Street Freefall (WP) ... 164
Credit Correction (WSJ) ... 164
Economy Appears Headed For A Period Of Turbulence (MCT) 165
A Recession That Arrived On Cats' Paws (NYT) ... 166
Plunge Leads To Predictions (CHIT) ... 167
SUDDEN RETREAT Markets' Slide Spotlights Risks (WSJ) ... 168
Stock Sell-Off In China Hits Wall Street (WP) ... 171
Biggest Loss Since Sept. 11 For Wall Street (LAT) ... 172
Doubts Trigger 416-point Dow Dive (WT) ... 173
Markets Find It Hard To Break The Greenspan Habit (WSJ) ... 174
Greenspan Comments Helped Grease Markets' Skid (USAT) ... 175
As Ethics Panels Expand Grip, No Field Is Off Limits (NYT) ... 176
Panel Finds Flawed Data In A Major Stem Cell Report (NYT) ... 178
Document Shows Romney's Strategies (BOS) ... 178
Internal Romney Document Airs Concerns (AP) ... 180
Romney Latest To See Internal Critique Leaked (WP) ... 181
Edwards Apologizes For 2002 War Vote (AP) ... 181
Blacks Shift To Obama, Poll Finds (WP) ... 182
Pardons Reemerge As Issue In Clinton Run (BOS) ... 183
Clinton Foundation Not Listed On Senator's Disclosure Reports (NYT) ... 184
Feb. 5 National Primary (HILL) ... 185
Only Strong Will Survive This Big Bang (HILL) ... 186
Competing In The Money Marathon (NYT) ... 187
Group Says Gore's Home Overuses Electricity (USAT/AP) ... 187
Politicians' Flights Called Wasteful (LAT) ... 188
Ozone Man Sequel (NYT) ... 190
Inside The Beltway (WT) ... 191
Up In The Air (RC) ... 192
Some Push For Huckabee To Run For Senate, Not President (HILL) ... 193
NRSC Donates Funds From Terror Suspect (CCT) ... 194
Corporate Execs' Names Should Be Disclosed, Lawmakers Tell Governors (USAT) ... 195
Perry's 'Bizarre' Moves Vex Conservatives (WT) ... 195
Advocates Hopeful On Gun Ban (BSUN) ... 196
Changing The Constitution (WP) ... 197
States' Pension Shortfalls Widen Amid An Increase In Tax Receipts (WSJ) ... 197

DOJ_NMG_0137851

The Cost Of Coverage (WSJ) ... 198
Add Roads, Not Tolls (USAT) ... 199
Legal Imperialism (WSJ) ... 199
American Insourcing (WSJ) ... 201
U.S., N. Korea To Normalize Ties (WT) ... 202
McConnell Fears Iran Nukes By 2015 (WT) ... 203
Iran Worries US Officials Beyond Its Nuclear Plans (CSM) ... 204
US Military Chief "Categorically" Denies Plans For Iran Air Strikes (AFP) ... 205
Hezbollah Warns U.S. Against Iran Attack (AP) ... 205
US Targets Iran's Financial Underbelly (FT) ... 205
U.S. Sanctions With Teeth (WP) ... 206
GLOBAL POSITIONING Russian Deals In Middle East Snarl U.S. Strategy On Iran (WSJ) ... 207
Russia: Hamas To End Attacks Against Israel (USAT) ... 210
Ex-official, Militia Chief Charged With War Crimes (WT) ... 210
Sudan Official Accused In Darfur Atrocities (LAT) ... 211
2 Face Trials At The Hague Over Darfur Atrocities (NYT) ... 212
World Court's Big Move On Darfur (CSM) ... 213
Justice For Darfur (WP) ... 215
US Sees Repression 'worsening In Cuba' (FT) ... 216
McConnell: Repression In Cuba Increases (AP) ... 216
New United Nations Chief Tackles The Agency's Tradition Of Patronage Jobs (NYT) ... 217
The End Of The Affair? (WSJ) ... 218
Blogger On Ice (WP) ... 219

TERRORISM NEWS:

Terror Suspect's Brig Life Detailed (NSDY)

By Curt Anderson

Long Island Newsday/AP, February 28, 2007

MIAMI -- The exterior window in Jose Padilla's 80-square-foot cell in a Navy brig was painted over. At times, he had to sleep on a steel bunk with no mattress. He went months without a clock and was sometimes seen weeping in his cell.

But officials at the brig in Charleston, S.C., testified Tuesday that the alleged al-Qaida operative was not physically abused during his 3 1/2 years in military custody, nor did he display serious symptoms of mental problems.

Craig Noble, the brig's main psychologist, and Sanford Seymour, the brig's technical director, testified for the first time in public Tuesday in Padilla's competency hearings. The hearings are to determine whether Padilla can stand trial in April on terrorism-related charges.

Padilla, a 36-year-old U.S. citizen and Muslim convert, was arrested in 2002 in Chicago in what U.S. authorities initially claimed was a mission to set off a radioactive "dirty bomb" in a major city. He was held at the brig without being charged after President Bush declared him an enemy combatant.

Padilla was added to a Miami terrorism support case in late 2005. That indictment does not mention the "dirty bomb" plot.

Two mental experts hired by Padilla's lawyers say he cannot assist in his defense because he suffers from post-traumatic stress disorder, which they claim results from isolation and alleged torture at the brig. U.S. officials deny he was tortured.

Noble said he examined Padilla when he arrived June 10, 2002, and again on May 14, 2004. He said Padilla had begun wearing glasses, but he found the second visit "unremarkable" for any signs of problems.

The second interview was conducted at Padilla's cell door, with the prisoner speaking through a small slot, Noble said.

"He was responsive, made good eye contact, in fact smiled frequently," Noble said. "There were no changes."

Seymour described some of the cell conditions, including the painted-over window, lack of clock and periodic removal of Padilla's mattress and Quran. He also said he remembered two instances where he watched Padilla -- who was under 24-hour surveillance -- crying in his cell.

But Seymour also said that the brig staff allowed Padilla outside for recreation, when he sometimes shot baskets. He was allowed no contact with any other inmate.

"Sometimes he sat in the sun," Seymour said. "If it was a nice day, we tried to get him out."

Padilla has claimed his cell was often filled with noxious fumes and that brig staff injected him with LSD or some other hallucinogenic drug.

Seymour said the injection was a flu shot. And he testified that the odors come from a paper mill less than a mile away. "We often had a nasty odor throughout the facility," he said.

U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke barred Padilla's lawyers from delving into the details of this testimony unless it was directly related to a competency report prepared by a Bureau of Prisons psychologist.

Cooke scheduled closing arguments on the competency issue for Wednesday. It was not clear when she would rule.

DOJ_NMG_0137852

Padilla and co-defendants Adham Amin Hassoun and Kifah Wael Jayyousi face up to life in prison if convicted of charges they were part of a North American terror support cell that provided recruits, money and supplies to Islamic extremist groups.

Subscribe to Newsday home delivery | Article licensing and reprint options

Brig Officials Offer Look At Padilla's Detention (USAT)

By Laura Parker

USA Today, February 28, 2007

MIAMI — Two officials from the Navy brig where terrorism suspect Jose Padilla spent almost four years in solitary confinement testified in federal court here Tuesday. They provided the first public description by the Defense Department of Padilla's incarceration.

Sandy Seymour, brig technical director, confirmed some details that Padilla's attorneys have alleged in court papers: that he was kept isolated in an 80-square-foot cell that had its windows blackened. He also testified that he saw Padilla in his cell weeping.

Seymour and brig psychologist Craig Noble appeared as reluctant star witnesses in a mental competency hearing that became a fierce tug-of-war between prosecutors and defense attorneys over how much about Padilla's detention will be revealed.

Prosecutor Stephanie Pell objected 36 times as defense attorneys Michael Caruso and Orlando do Campo attempted to pry out small details about Padilla's life in the brig, such as whether he had a clock in his cell or a stool to sit on.

"This is getting into the line of the general conditions at the brig," Pell complained to U.S. District Court Judge Marcia Cooke, who had limited the inquiry to a narrow scope.

Questions about Padilla's years in the brig have become an issue in determining whether Padilla, 36, is mentally fit to stand trial in April. His attorneys say he was tortured, which causes Padilla to shut down mentally whenever they ask for his assistance in preparing his defense.

Two mental health experts hired by the defense testified earlier that Padilla suffers from post-traumatic stress and is unfit for trial.

That was contradicted by Rodolfo Buigas, a Bureau of Prisons psychologist, who testified that Padilla is fit for trial but has chosen not to help his attorneys.

In his report, made public Tuesday, Buigas said his review of "available military information failed to substantiate" any torture, although he did not rule it out.

Padilla, a U.S. citizen, is charged with supporting terrorist activities overseas. If convicted, he faces life in prison.

Prosecutors have fought hard to keep Padilla's time at the brig secret, so the mere presence of brig officials on the witness stand represented a small victory for the defense — even if little was revealed.

Seymour also provided a glimpse into Padilla's paranoia — a condition described in defense court papers. Padilla feared guards had pumped noxious gas into his cell. He also thought he had been injected with truth serum before meeting with his interrogators.

Seymour said that the brig is near a pulp mill, which spews foul odors, and that Padilla received a flu shot. He did not say whether anyone at the brig ever attempted to disabuse Padilla of his misimpressions.

Noble testified he evaluated Padilla's mental health twice, once after Padilla arrived at the brig in June 2002 and again in May 2004. There were "no remarkable changes," he said.

For the second evaluation, Noble said he reviewed brig logs, interviewed guards and spoke with Padilla for two minutes through the opening in his cell known as the "cuff board," a reference to the slot through which inmates stick their hands to be handcuffed.

"He was responsive to me," Noble testified. "He smiled."

Aspects Of Padilla's Treatment Confirmed (LAT)

By Carol J. Williams

The Los Angeles Times, February 28, 2007

MIAMI — With no clock, watch or natural light to guide him, terrorism suspect Jose Padilla was jailed at a Navy brig in timeless isolation while anonymous jailers monitored him around the clock, a brig official testified Tuesday.

The disclosures in a federal courtroom by Sanford Seymour, technical director of the Navy detention facility in Charleston, S.C., confirmed for the first time some of the conditions of Padilla's detention. His defense attorneys contend that Padilla's sensory deprivation and treatment were tantamount to torture.

U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke called Seymour and two other brig officials to testify in a hearing on Padilla's competency to stand trial on charges of conspiracy and material support to terrorism.

Cooke cautioned defense attorneys that they could only question the witnesses about their conversations with a federal Bureau of Prisons psychologist. A separate defense motion to dismiss the charges due to "outrageous government conduct" may open the torture issue at a later hearing.

The forensic psychologist, Rodolfo Buigas, testified Monday that Padilla suffered from anxiety and a personality disorder but was otherwise fit to proceed. But his report referred to the brig officials, so the judge had to allow defense attorneys to cross-examine them.

Padilla had refused to submit to psychological testing by Buigas, claiming to have repeatedly undergone examination since his May 2002 arrest at Chicago's O'Hare International Airport. U.S. officials contend he spent at least six years abroad recruiting, plotting and bankrolling terrorism.

Two competency experts hired by the defense said last week that Padilla, 36, had sustained mental injury and post-traumatic stress disorder from his brig experience, leaving him incompetent to assist in his own defense.

Seymour, a civilian who oversees correctional procedures at the military brig, appeared reluctant to disclose details of the "special care" ordered by the federal government for Padilla.

Prolonged silences by Seymour followed each of federal Public Defender Michael Caruso's questions, as the witness waited for prosecutor Stephanie Pell to object, which she did at least a dozen times. When Cooke said he should answer, Seymour said he had "no specific recollection," asked to hear the question again, or gave a cryptic response.

What emerged from the cross-examination was that Padilla had little human contact during his 3 1/2 -year incarceration in the brig, that both windows in his cell were covered to create a blackout, and that the electric light in his cell could only be activated by jailers and was, like his Koran, unavailable for unspecified reasons or periods of time.

Caruso was prevented from pursuing matters of Padilla's detention other than those that Seymour had discussed with Buigas in an hourlong conversation the witness said occurred "several weeks ago."

Seymour said he neither offered nor was asked about the removal of Padilla's cell mirror, his access to showers or the length and frequency of the prisoner's interrogations. He confirmed that he had on a couple of occasions observed Padilla weeping.

Asked by Buigas about Padilla's claim to have been administered LSD by his interrogators, the corrections chief said he told the psychologist that the prisoner had been given a flu shot.

As to the defendant's general torture allegations, Seymour said he told Buigas: "I know of no physical abuse that occurred."

Brig psychologist Craig Noble also testified, confirming that he told Buigas of his two brief interactions with Padilla. The first was a mental health intake assessment on June 10, 2002, when Padilla arrived; the second was two years later when he interviewed Padilla through the "cuff hole" his cell door.

Noble said he found Padilla's mental health "unremarkable" both times. A defense attorney asked, based on brig records, whether Noble's contact with Padilla had lasted no more than two minutes, but the witness was not allowed to answer the question because Buigas hadn't asked about the duration.

Maj. Andrew Cruz, a brig social worker who had monthly contact with Padilla, was also summoned to testify. But he was recently deployed to Afghanistan, and did not answer a call that had been arranged for him to testify by speakerphone.

Cooke said she would hear final arguments on Padilla's competency today, but gave no indication when she might rule.

If Padilla is judged fit to proceed, his motion for dismissal for outrageous government behavior could prompt a hearing at which the brig abuse allegations would be more thoroughly explored. Padilla's trial is set for April 16.

Jailers Testify About Padilla's Confinement (NYT)

By Deborah Sontag

The New York Times, February 28, 2007

MIAMI, Feb. 27 — As Jose Padilla dropped his head and grew still, a senior official from the naval brig in Charleston, S.C., testified on Tuesday in federal court here that he had twice observed Mr. Padilla weeping in the electronically monitored cell where the military detained him for three years and eight months.

The brig's technical director, Sanford E. Seymour, also said that Mr. Padilla, an American citizen who was designated an enemy combatant in 2002, sometimes slept on a steel bunk without a mattress, that the windows in his 80-square-foot cell were blackened and that brig employees covered up their nametags around him.

Mr. Seymour said that Mr. Padilla, a Muslim, occasionally visited with an imam and that his Koran was taken from him periodically; that he sometimes went outside to shoot baskets or sunbathe; and that when Mr. Padilla believed he had been administered LSD, it was really a flu shot.

DOJ_NMG_0137854

These scattershot revelations, elicited by Mr. Padilla's lawyers in a hearing of sharply limited scope, did not add up to a comprehensive portrait of Mr. Padilla's time in the brig. But they were nonetheless significant, marking the first time Mr. Padilla's military jailers were forced to speak publicly about the conditions of his secretive confinement without charges.

That confinement ended a year ago when Mr. Padilla, 36, was transferred into the civilian law enforcement system to stand trial on terrorism conspiracy charges. But his lawyers argue that the conditions of his military detention and interrogations traumatized him so severely that he is incapable of assisting them in his own defense. In essence, they say, the government rendered him incompetent to stand trial, a position the prosecution vehemently denies.

Three days of testimony in a competency hearing concluded Tuesday with the brief appearance of two brig officials. After both sides make concluding arguments on Wednesday, Judge Marcia G. Cooke of Federal District Court will choose between two starkly contrasting images of Mr. Padilla: the lucid, occasionally jolly defendant with antisocial tendencies portrayed by the government, and the twitching, fearful, damaged man presented by the defense.

In a 16-page report made public Tuesday, Rodolfo A. Buigas, a Bureau of Prisons psychologist who examined Mr. Padilla for the judge, recommended that he be found competent to stand trial. Mr. Padilla refused to submit to psychological testing, so Dr. Buigas evaluated him by talking to him for about five hours, by examining his records and the reports of experts hired by the defense, and by questioning lawyers and brig officials.

It is because Dr. Buigas interviewed brig officials that Judge Cooke allowed them to testify Tuesday despite strong objections from the government. But she allowed defense lawyers to ask the officials only about their conversations with Dr. Buigas, saying that a more general airing about conditions in the brig might be held if she conducted a hearing on a defense motion to dismiss the indictment because of "outrageous government conduct."

Craig S. Noble, a psychologist at the brig, testified that he had screened Mr. Padilla twice. He did an initial "brief evaluation" when Mr. Padilla arrived in June 2002, finding that he was "responsive, made good eye contact and, in fact, smiled periodically." About two years later, Dr. Noble said, he conducted a "cell front visit," in which he spoke to Mr. Padilla through a rectangular slot on his door, and discovered no new signs of "distress or lethality."

During the hearing, two mental health experts who spent over 25 hours evaluating Mr. Padilla for the defense testified that he was disabled by post-traumatic stress disorder caused by his experiences in the brig.

"I'm not sure that any of us know what happened at the brig, but I know that something there put the fear into Mr. Padilla," said Patricia Zapf, a forensic psychologist who examined him. "Mr. Padilla is an anxiety-ridden, broken individual who is incapacitated by that anxiety."

But the Bureau of Prisons psychologist, Dr. Buigas, disagreed with the diagnosis of post-traumatic stress disorder. He said Dr. Zapf's testing was invalidated by the fact that Mr. Padilla was handcuffed during the tests, a condition imposed on Dr. Zapf by prison officials.

Testifying on Monday, Dr. Buigas, whom defense lawyers do not view as a neutral examiner, said that Mr. Padilla possessed the capacity to work with his lawyers, and that any failure to do so was "volitional."

Dr. Buigas added that during his first encounter with Mr. Padilla, "he was actually pretty happy." Dr. Buigas testified that he had even commented to his boss that Mr. Padilla seemed "happier than our department," referring to his colleagues in the mental health unit of the Miami federal detention center.

Mr. Padilla, who sat placidly through much of the testimony, chatted animatedly with his lawyers as Dr. Buigas talked. One of the lawyers, Anthony Natale, rose to his feet for a cross-examination, and what turned into an odd exchange.

"You used the word 'happy,' " Mr. Natale said to Dr. Buigas. "Do you know if that's when he was allowed for the first time to get a radio? Do you know if that's when he was allowed to have a shower with a curtain? ... So you don't know why he was happy?"

Dr. Buigas said he could not recall the conversation clearly, but he said, "In general, he was talking about being Puerto Rican."

Prosecution lawyers scoffed at the idea the Mr. Padilla was mentally incompetent, saying that his jailers had never reported any psychiatric problems and that he had comported himself well during court hearings.

"Jose Padilla sits quietly," said Brian K. Frazier, a prosecutor. "He follows the instructions of the marshals. He turns around and waves to Mama."

Mr. Frazier said that in court Mr. Padilla manifested none of the tics, grimaces and sweating that the defense describes, "despite the fact that we talk about some pretty uncomfortable stuff."

Prosecutors tried to introduce into evidence what they said was an internal document from Al Qaeda that coached operatives to be obstructionist if captured, to avoid revealing information and to make a claim of torture even if no mistreatment had occurred. This document, which they referred to as the "Manchester manual" because it was found several years ago in Manchester, England, was what guided Mr. Padilla, they said.

DOJ_NMG_0137855

"Don't I have to have some evidence that Mr. Padilla was aware of this document and studied it?" Judge Cooke asked prosecutors.

In declining to admit the manual into evidence, she added that the manual would have converted the competency hearing into a debate over whether the defendant had been tortured in the brig.

Padilla Was Deprived, Not Abused, Court Told (WP)

By Peter Whoriskey

The Washington Post, February 28, 2007

MIAMI, Feb. 27 -- During his 3 1/2 -year detention as an "enemy combatant," accused al-Qaeda operative Jose Padilla was at various times deprived of a clock, windows and a Koran, and forced to sleep on a metal bed frame without a mattress, according to testimony Tuesday from an official at the Navy brig where he was held in Charleston, S.C.

The account of Sanford E. Seymour, the brig's technical director, was narrow in scope and offered only a glimpse of Padilla's incarceration, which Padilla and his attorneys have said included torture that renders him psychologically unfit to stand trial.

Limited by a court ruling to what he had discussed with a psychologist evaluating Padilla's competence for trial, Seymour's testimony was sketchy but ran contrary to some of Padilla's most serious allegations.

"I told him I knew of no physical abuse," Seymour testified.

Seymour's testimony marked the first time any official from the brig had publicly described conditions of Padilla's incarceration.

While Padilla has asserted that he was injected with LSD or a truth serum, Seymour indicated it may have been a flu shot, and while Padilla said he was subject to noxious odors that made his eyes and nose run, Seymour said a nearby paper mill sometimes makes the brig stink.

U.S. District Judge Marcia G. Cooke is expected now to decide whether Padilla is competent to stand trial, as prosecutors assert, or whether, as the defense contends, he is incompetent to stand trial because torture and isolation at the brig have rendered him unable to recall basic details about the case for his attorneys.

Padilla is not expected to take the stand in the competency hearing. At times he has seemed engrossed in the proceedings and engaged in apparently earnest conversations with his attorneys. But during the hour-long appearance of the brig officials, Padilla sat rigidly and did not look up.

A forensic psychiatrist and a forensic psychologist hired by the defense last week testified that when asked for information about the brig or the subjects he may have been interrogated about there, Padilla gets tense, exhibits facial tics and "shuts down."

"He would say, 'Please, please, please don't make me do this,' in a very plaintive manner," Angela Hegarty, the forensic psychiatrist, testified.

One of the lawyers, Andrew Patel, testified that even "softball" questions about the case could elicit pop-eyed revulsion from his client, and that he has been unwilling even to listen to the taped conversations at the core of the case against him.

"We tried everything we could imagine" to get him to help them review the evidence, but Padilla refused, Patel testified.

The window in Padilla's cell to the outside was painted over, Seymour testified, and another window to the interior was covered up in a way that allowed others to look in when they wanted. He was fed through a slot in the door.

Brig workers who interacted with him covered their name tags when dealing with Padilla, Seymour testified, and at various times his clock and Koran were taken away.

While defense lawyers have argued that the isolation and other aspects of his treatment have made Padilla unable to help his attorneys, a brig psychologist who talked to Padilla at the beginning of his detention in June 2002 and then again nearly two years later, noted "no remarkable changes" in his demeanor.

"He was responsive to me," said Craig S. Noble, a brig psychologist, who spoke with Padilla through openings the cell door. "He smiled."

Shorbagi Sentence – 7 Years, 8 Months (ROMENT)

By Mike Gellatly, Rome News-Tribune staff writer

Rome (GA) News-Tribune, February 28, 2007

The sentence was reduced because of his cooperation.

A Floyd County man who led interfaith relations after 9/11 and educated students on the virtues of many religions was sentenced Tuesday for supporting a foreign terrorist group.

DOJ_NMG_0137856

Mohamed Shorbagi, 42, was sentenced in U.S. District Court in Rome to serve seven years and eight months in prison for funneling money to the militant group Hamas during a four-year period.

Judge Harold L. Murphy also ordered Shorbagi to serve three years supervised release and pay $610,454 in restitution to his former employer, Alexandria International Carpets. Shorbagi allegedly defrauded the company.

The charges stem from donations Shorbagi made to the Holy Land Foundation for Relief and Development, an Islamic charity shut down by federal authorities in 2001.

A former member of the Rome-Floyd International Committee and an Imam of a Muslim congregation, he was presented by the defense as an intelligent man much respected by his community.

Several Floyd Countians testified as character witnesses for Shorbagi, including George Pullen, a former Rome City Commission chairman.

Pullen said Shorbagi's imprisonment is a loss for the community. He also said he considers him a friend.

Two Berry College professors, Jeffrey Lipkey and Steve Bell, also spoke on behalf of the native Palestinian.

The last witness to speak was Ezra Shorbagi, the eldest daughter of the defendant. She said she is a proud American, Muslim and Roman and described her father as a humble man leading the Muslim community.

"This is not a bomb-throwing individual," said defense attorney Michael Trost. "He is a calm, peaceful man that has done many things to help his community."

Assistant U.S. Attorney Kim Dammers disagreed with Trost's portrayal of Shorbagi.

"What he did was enable the bomb-throwing individuals to continue their work," said Dammers. "By encouraging his congregation to give money he gave support to a foreign terrorist agency."

Shorbagi could have received a 15-year prison term, however, the government asked U.S. District Court Judge Harold L. Murphy to reduce his sentence.

Prosecutors asked for a lighter sentence, saying he cooperated fully in the investigation.

Murphy described Shorbagi's cooperation as "substantially helpful against terrorist acts" and said that it was given with "considerable threat to personal safety of himself and his family."

In November, Shorbagi testified in a Chicago case against Mohammed Salah, identified by authorities as one of these high-level Hamas operatives.

Rome Imam Sentenced In Terror Case Palestinian Native Gave Money To Islamic Militant Group Hamas (AJC)

By Bill Torpy, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, February 28, 2007

A 42-year-old Palestinian native who confessed to aiding the Islamic militant group Hamas was sentenced by a federal judge today to more than seven years in prison.

Mohamed Shorbagi, the imam of a small mosque in Rome, could have been sentenced to 15 years but received a lighter sentence for helping federal authorities in another prosecution.

Court documents said Shorbagi provided donations between 1997 to 2001 to the Holy Land Foundation for Relief and Development, knowing the money would go to Hamas, which has been designated by the United States as a terrorist organization. Federal prosecutors said Shorbagi has hosted high-ranking Hamas members at the Rome mosque.

Shorbagi, who has been in the United States for 22 years, testified in a Chicago trial last year against Mohammed Salah, who was later acquitted of charges of aiding Hamas.

Because of his cooperation in the case, Shorbagi is eligible to get a visa to stay in the U.S and enter the witness protection program, according to court papers.

First Terrorism Sentence In Georgia (WXIA)

WXIA-TV, February 28, 2007

For the first time in the history of the state of Georgia, a defendant has been sentenced for an international terrorism-related crime. Mohamed Shorbagi, the Imam of a Mosque in Rome, was sentenced to serve over seven years in prison. Shorbagi plead guilty last October to providing financial support to a terrorist organization.

Shorbagi was not only the leader of the Rome Mosque; he was a leader in the Rome community. Several people, including one Rome city official, testified to his character in federal court Tuesday morning. His family was in the courtroom for sentencing. United States District Judge Harold Murphy sentenced Shorbagi to seven-years and eight-months in prison.

DOJ_NMG_0137857

Unites States Attorney David Nahmias said, “The people who financially support terrorism are not the people who are personally building bombs or setting off bombs.” Nahmias added, “But, they're the people who make that kind of activity possible.”

Shorbagi plead guilty to providing financial support to Hamas through donations to an organization called The Holy Land Foundation for Relief and Development. Nahmias says Shorbagi was the Georgia representative for the group, and hosted high-level Hamas officials at his Rome Mosque. In 1997, Hamas was designated as a foreign terrorist organization by the United States.

Michael Trost, Shorbagi's attorney, says his client was aware the money could end up funding violence.

“He understood that once the money left his hands, he had very little control and knew that that was a possibility. Whether that was his intent is another matter,” Trost said.

Despite the support from family and community, it was Shorbagi’s cooperation with the Government that helped him get a reduced sentence from the maximum 15-years for his crime.

“He testified in a trial in Chicago in which there were some terrorism charges brought against several individuals,” his attorney said.

Both the U.S. Attorney and his defense attorney said Shorbagi could reduce his sentence further if he continues to cooperate with the Government.

Mohamed Shorbagi is a citizen of the Palestine territories. He has been in the United States legally for 22 years. In court, he said his family is all United States citizens.

Georgia Man Sent To Jail For Aiding Hamas (ATLBIZ)

Atlanta Business Journal, February 28, 2007

A Georgia representative of the Holy Land Foundation for Relief and Development (HLF) has been sent to federal prison for raising money for foreign terrorist organization Hamas.

Mohamed Shorbagi, 42, of the Rome, Ga., area was sentenced Tuesday to seven years and eight months in federal prison by U.S. District Judge Harold L. Murphy, on a charge of providing material support to Hamas. He also got three years of supervised release and was ordered to pay restitution of $610,454. Shorbagi's sentence was reduced from 15 years in prison because of substantial cooperation he provided in other terrorism-related investigations and prosecutions.

Hamas is a terrorist organization operating primarily in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, which has engaged in numerous terrorist attacks aimed at Israeli military personnel, police officers, and civilians. Hamas attacks have murdered numerous innocent people, including American citizens, and have undermined the Israeli-Palestinian peace process. Federal law makes it a serious felony to provide any material support or resources to a designated foreign terrorist organization.

On Oct. 8, 1997, the United States formally designated Hamas as a foreign terrorist organization. After that date, and continuing until Dec. 4, 2001, Shorbagi provided financial support to Hamas and conspired with unnamed others to provide such material support. He did so knowing that Hamas had been designated as a foreign terrorist organization and that Hamas engaged in terrorist activity. Shorbagi provided the support through donations to the HLF, knowing that some or all of the money was in fact destined for Hamas.

Shorbagi knew that money provided to HLF was actually funneled to Hamas in part because he was a Georgia representative for HLF and he had attended HLF meetings at which high-level Hamas officials made presentations condemning Israel. Shorbagi also had hosted high-level Hamas officials at the Rome mosque at which he served as imam.

"There are three important points to make about this case," said U.S. Attorney David E. Nahmias. "First, this case illustrates that people who illegally support foreign terrorist organizations may be found anywhere in the United States, even in quiet and pleasant places like Rome, Ga. Second, we will use every lawful tool to ferret out terrorism and those who provide material support to it, regardless of where they live or how they try to hide their criminal activities. Finally, defendants who are willing to cooperate fully and truthfully in our efforts to protect national security and bring other criminals to justice may earn substantial sentence reductions from federal courts."

Ga. Imam Sentenced For Aiding Hamas (AP)

By Daniel Yee, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 28, 2007

ROME, Ga. -- The imam of a Georgia mosque who pleaded guilty to providing support to the militant group Hamas was sentenced Tuesday to more than seven years in prison.

Mohamed Shorbagi, 42, could have faced up to 15 years in prison.

DOJ_NMG_0137858

Shorbagi pleaded guilty in August to providing material support to the militant group Hamas in a case in which the agreement, charges and even the plea hearing were handled in secret. U.S. District Judge Harold Murphy sentenced him Tuesday to seven years and eight months in prison.

At the sentencing, Shorbagi said he realized that some of his actions were wrong.

He pleaded guilty in August to a charge of providing material support to Hamas and also testified in a Chicago case against a man identified by authorities as a Hamas operative.

Prosecutors have said that between 1997 and 2001, Shorbagi provided financial support to Hamas, a group designated by the United States as a foreign terrorist organization. He also was accused of conspiring to provide material support to Hamas. The donations were through a charity called the Holy Land Foundation for Relief and Development, prosecutors said.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Kim Dammers suggested that his sentence be less than 15 years because of Shorbagi's help in testifying for the government in other terrorism-related trials.

After the sentencing, Shorbagi shook hands with about a dozen friends and family members who were gathered at the court before he was taken away.

He has said under oath that in return for his testimony, prosecutors agreed to seek a reduction in his sentence, give him a special residency visa, place him in the federal witness protection program and not indict him in an unrelated fraud case.

Shorbagi said Tuesday that he continues to cooperate with the government because of his belief in America.

"I came to this country when I was 18 and I believe in this country," said Shorbagi, a citizen of the Palestinian territory but in the United States legally. He said he has been in America for more than two decades.

"I realize that some of the things that I did was wrong and were never supposed to be done," he said. "That's why I took the responsibility of cooperating with the government."

False Quotes Shake Up Terror Trial (LAT)

By Greg Krikorian, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 28, 2007

Prosecutors say they'll look into a botched wiretap summary that included anti-Semitic remarks.

The mystery of how and why a government wiretap summary falsely attributed anti-Jewish slurs to officials of a Muslim charity remained unanswered Tuesday as federal prosecutors pledged to look into the matter.

In court papers filed late Monday, the U.S. attorney's office in Dallas said it was trying to determine how the recently declassified summary of a 1996 FBI wiretap of the Holy Land Foundation for Relief and Development included vitriolic language that was not found in a verbatim transcript of a recorded conversation.

"The government is attempting to determine the reason for the discrepancy between the summary and the transcript," prosecutors said, adding that officials wanted to locate the language specialist who prepared the summary.

Meanwhile, the unexplained discrepancies have brought potential controversy to the government's biggest terrorism funding case to date.

According to the discredited summary, Holy Land officials referred to Israel as "the government of the demons" and to Jews as trying "to rob as much money as possible from the American taxpayers for the illegitimate excuse of protecting and preserving the chosen people of God."

One Muslim charity official supposedly told a colleague: "Even Jesus Christ had called the Jews and their high priests … the sons of snakes and scorpions."

None of those comments was contained in a 13-page verbatim transcript of the conversation recorded April 15, 1996, by the FBI. In response, defense lawyers demanded declassification of large portions of the government's documents in the case.

On Monday, federal prosecutors argued that the discrepancies were not serious enough to justify such sweeping declassifications.

Five years ago, authorities shut down what was then the nation's largest Muslim charity on grounds that it was a fundraising front for the Palestinian group Hamas, which the U.S. considers a terrorist organization. In 2004, federal prosecutors charged seven former Holy Land officials, six of them U.S. citizens, with sending money to overseas charities controlled by Hamas, an accusation they deny.

Defense attorneys asked U.S. District Judge A. Joe Fish to declassify 10 years worth of wiretapped conversations and faxes after discovering the faulty summary among the first batch they reviewed.

Without declassifying the government's evidence in the case, defense attorneys argued, they would have no way of knowing whether other documents had discrepancies or inaccuracies because the classified originals of documents could not be shared with their clients.

DOJ_NMG_0137859

In response, government prosecutors said it was "an overreaction" to extrapolate that all of the government summaries were useless on the basis of discrepancies found in one set of documents.

Prosecutors also said the contested summary, while including some language not found in the transcript, "does not otherwise misrepresent the substance of the conversation" among the Holy Land officials.

Defense attorneys, who declined to comment Tuesday, have argued that the government summary "fundamentally distorted" the conversation by attributing "an anti-Semitic diatribe" to the foundation officials.

The lead prosecutor in the case said there would be no comment beyond court filings.

In the meantime, defense attorneys filed a new request with the judge to gain access to government documents they contend will show the U.S. Agency for International Development has funded or worked with organizations that are linked to the same overseas' charities allegedly controlled by Hamas and named in the indictment.

Details Of Men Held In CIA Jails Demanded (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, February 28, 2007

The Bush administration was urged on Tuesday to reveal the whereabouts of 16 men who were allegedly detained in secret Central Intelligence Agency prisons.

President George W. Bush last September said the secret prisons had been emptied with the transfer of 14 detainees, including Khaled Sheikh Mohammed, the alleged mastermind of the September 11 2001 attacks, to Guantánamo Bay, Cuba.

Rights groups welcomed the prison closures but were concerned the administration would not provide information about the dozens of other suspected terrorists who had been subjected to the US “renditions” programme – where they are sent to other countries for interrogation – or held in secret US facilities.

In a letter to Mr Bush, Human Rights Watch named 16 men it said were held in CIA prisons and another 22 who it said might have been in the secret facilities. The whereabouts of all the individuals concerned was unknown, the group said.

“The CIA’s detention programme has inflicted great harm on the reputation, moral standing and integrity of the United States,” Joanne Mariner, director of the organisation’s terrorism programme, wrote.

“By revealing information about the fate and whereabouts of people formerly held in CIA custody, you could begin to repair the damage this abusive programme has caused,” she said.

The group also criticised the role of other countries, particularly Pakistan, in rounding up suspects. The report details the case of Marwan Jabour, allegedly arrested in Pakistan before being sent to what he believed was a secret CIA jail in Afghanistan.

“Like an unknown number of Arab men arrested in Pakistan since 2001, he was ‘disappeared’ into US custody: held in unacknowledged detention outside the protection of the law.”

New Light Shed On CIA's 'Black Site' Prisons (WP)

By Dafna Linzer And Julie Tate

The Washington Post, February 28, 2007

On his last day in CIA custody, Marwan Jabour, an accused al-Qaeda paymaster, was stripped naked, seated in a chair and videotaped by agency officers. Afterward, he was shackled and blindfolded, headphones were put over his ears, and he was given an injection that made him groggy. Jabour, 30, was laid down in the back of a van, driven to an airstrip and put on a plane with at least one other prisoner.

His release from a secret facility in Afghanistan on June 30, 2006, was a surprise to Jabour -- and came just after the Supreme Court rejected the Bush administration's assertion that the Geneva Conventions do not apply to prisoners like him.

Jabour had spent two years in "black sites" -- a network of secret internment facilities the CIA operated around the world. His account of life in that system, which he described in three interviews with The Washington Post, offers an inside view of a clandestine world that held far more prisoners than the 14 men President Bush acknowledged and had transferred out of CIA custody in September.

"There are now no terrorists in the CIA program," the president said, adding that after the prisoners held were determined to have "little or no additional intelligence value, many of them have been returned to their home countries for prosecution or detention by their governments."

But Jabour's experience -- also chronicled by Human Rights Watch, which yesterday issued a report on the fate of former "black site" detainees -- often does not accord with the portrait the administration has offered of the CIA system, such as the number of people it held and the threat detainees posed. Although 14 detainees were publicly moved from CIA custody to the detention facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, scores more have not been publicly identified by the U.S. government, and their whereabouts remain secret. Nor has the administration acknowledged that detainees such as Jabour, considered so dangerous and valuable that their detentions were kept secret, were freed.

DOJ_NMG_0137860

After 28 months of incarceration, Jabour -- who was described by a counterterrorism official in the U.S. government as "a committed jihadist and a hard-core terrorist who was intent on doing harm to innocent people, including Americans" -- was released eight months ago. U.S. intelligence and counterterrorism officials confirmed his incarceration and that he was held in Pakistan and Afghanistan. They would not discuss conditions inside black sites or the treatment of any detainee.A House in Islamabad

By Jabour's account, and that of U.S. intelligence officials, his entrance into the black-sites program began in May 2004. In interviews, he said he was muscled out of a car as it pulled inside the gates of a secluded villa in the Pakistani capital of Islamabad.

In the week before his arrival, Jabour said, Pakistani intelligence officers had beaten, abused and burned him at a jailhouse in Lahore, where he was arrested. There two female American interrogators also questioned him and told him he would be rich if he cooperated and would vanish for life if he refused. He said he was later blindfolded and driven four hours north to the villa in a wealthy residential neighborhood.

The house in Islamabad, which U.S. intelligence officials say was jointly run by the CIA and Pakistani intelligence, had been outfitted with jail cells. When Jabour arrived, he saw as many as 20 other detainees, including the 16-year-old son of an Egyptian sheik, who had been captured in Pakistan. Dozens of al-Qaeda suspects swept up in the years after Sept. 11, 2001, have been through the house, according to accounts by former prisoners and U.S. intelligence officials with knowledge of the facility.

Jabour spent five weeks there, chained to a wall and prevented from sleeping more than a few hours at a time. He said he was beaten nightly by Pakistani guards after hours of questions from U.S. interrogators. Then he and others were whisked off to CIA-run sites. Some sites were in Eastern Europe; Jabour went to one in Afghanistan. Interrogators -- whom he described as Americans in their late 20s and early 30s -- told Jabour he would never see his three children again.

Human Rights Watch has identified 38 people who may have been held by the CIA and remain unaccounted for. Intelligence officials told The Post that the number of detainees held in such facilities over nearly five years remains classified but is higher than 60. Their whereabouts have not been publicly disclosed.

"The practice of disappearing people -- keeping them in secret detention without any legal process -- is fundamentally illegal under international law," said Joanne Mariner, director of the terrorism program at Human Rights Watch in New York. "The kind of physical mistreatment Jabour described is also illegal." Mariner interviewed Jabour separately as part of the organization's investigation.

The CIA said it would not comment directly on Jabour. "The agency does not, as a rule, publicly discuss specific rendition cases from the war on terror," said Paul Gimigliano, a spokesman for the CIA. But, he said, renditions "are a key, lawful tool in the fight against terror, and have helped save lives by taking terrorists off the street. They are conducted with care, they are closely reviewed, and they have produced valuable intelligence that has allowed the United States and other nations to foil terrorist plots."

John D. Rockefeller IV (D-W.Va.), chairman of the Senate intelligence committee, plans to investigate the fate of the missing detainees as part of a larger examination into the CIA's operation of secret prisons and its rendition program.Aiding Al-Qaeda Fighters

In interviews with The Post from his parents' home in the Gaza Strip, Jabour acknowledged helping al-Qaeda and Taliban fighters who fled Afghanistan as the U.S. military hunted for the perpetrators of the Sept. 11 attacks.

Jabour was born to Palestinian parents in Jordan, raised in Saudi Arabia and educated in Pakistan. In 1998, he said, he became drawn to the plight of Muslims in Chechnya living under Russian rule. He crossed the border into Afghanistan so he could train in jihadist camps, then planned to join up with Chechen separatists.

"In Afghanistan, I met other people who believed in the Islamic state, where it was safe to practice Islam the way they wanted," Jabour said in a recent conversation. "I became friends with other Arabs who felt like me, Palestinians and Jordanians, but after three months of training I was told there was no chance to go to Chechnya."

Jabour returned to Pakistan in 1999. Two years later, after the U.S. military offensive in Afghanistan, those he lived and trained with came calling for help.

"Some of their children were injured, some of their women were wounded. From that moment, they came to our home and we helped them," he said.

Using funds from al-Qaeda financiers, Jabour said, he arranged for food, medical treatment and travel documents for several dozen people and arranged for others, including two African men who fought for al-Qaeda, to slip out of Pakistan. He did not return to Afghanistan to fight, and he said he had no interest in attacking Americans.

DOJ_NMG_0137861

The U.S. counterterrorism official who discussed aspects of Jabour's classified file did not call him a member of al-Qaeda. But the official said that in Pakistan, Jabour "was in direct touch with top al-Qaeda operations figures," including Hamza Rabia, who briefly served as one of Osama bin Laden's lieutenants before a missile from a CIA predator drone killed him in December 2005. In interviews, Jabour said he met with Rabia on two occasions.

The official said Jabour "provided the money and means for other jihadists to move from Afghanistan to Pakistan" and provided funds that went to an al-Qaeda bioweapons lab. "He's an all-around bad guy," the official said. No charges were brought against Jabour, however, and the official would not say why he is free today.Taken to Afghanistan

On June 16, 2004, after weeks in the villa, Jabour was drugged, blindfolded and put on a plane. Counterterrorism officials did not dispute that he was taken to a black site in Afghanistan. Jabour said the facility was run by Americans in civilian clothes and guarded by masked men who wore black uniforms and gloves.

He said he does not know where the facility is located, and counterterrorism officials would not say whether Jabour was held at two known detention sites in Afghanistan -- one run by the U.S. military at Bagram air base, the other operated by the CIA outside Kabul.

Jabour said he was often naked during his first three months at the Afghan site, which he spent in a concrete cell furnished with two blankets and a bucket. The lights were kept on 24 hours a day, as were two cameras and a microphone inside the cell. Sometimes loud music blasted through speakers in the cells. The rest of the time, the low buzz of white noise whizzed in the background, possibly to muffle any communication by prisoners through cell walls.

Daily interrogations were conducted by a variety of Americans. Over two years, Jabour said he encountered about 45 interrogators, plus medical staff and psychologists. He was threatened with physical abuse but was never beaten.

Once, he was shown a small wooden crate his interrogators called a "dog box" and was told he would be put in it if he didn't cooperate. He was told that Khalid Sheik Mohammed, the suspected architect of the Sept. 11 attacks who was among the 14 moved to Guantanamo Bay last year, became cooperative after he had been put in the box. But Jabour said he was not subjected to the crate.

He was, however, chained up and left for hours in painful positions more than 20 times and deprived of sleep for long periods. Sometimes he would have one hand chained to a section of his cell wall, making it impossible to stand or sit.

About six weeks into his stay, he was issued a pair of pants. Later he was given a T-shirt, then shoes, a Koran and finally a mattress. Jabour said prison conditions slowly improved: Air conditioning was installed; a library was built and stocked with books in Arabic, Urdu and English. Well-behaved detainees were rewarded with movie nights, in which such Hollywood blockbusters as "Titanic" were screened. A deputy director of the facility taught Jabour how to play chess and gave him pencils and paper. Jabour used to draw pictures of trees and grass, which he hung in his windowless cell.

Jabour recalled with fondness the prison director, a man named Charlie. "He told me, 'Marwan, we need information -- if you cooperate, that is good.' I told him I wasn't hiding anything and was not a dangerous man. He told me that they didn't want to use force but would if they had to. I told him I wouldn't lie to him."

Jabour began to receive better food, including pizza and Snickers and Kit-Kat bars.Transferred and Released

On Dec. 18, 2004, six months after his arrival, Jabour was transferred to a larger cell. Under the sink he found a small inscription that read: "Majid Khan, 15 December, 2004, American-Pakistani." Khan, whose family lives outside Baltimore, was arrested in March 2003 in Karachi, Pakistan, and was among the group transferred to Guantanamo five months ago. The U.S. government has not divulged where Khan was held during his first 3 1/2 years of incarceration.

Jabour met only one other prisoner during his time there. That was an Algerian named Yassir al-Jazeeri, a suspected high-level al-Qaeda operative who was arrested in Pakistan in March 2003. Their visits were arranged by the facility director, who told Jabour they were rewards for good behavior.

During interrogations, Jabour was often shown hundreds of photographs of wanted or captured suspects. One photo appears to have been that of Muhammad Naeem Noor Khan, a British-Pakistani who was arrested in Pakistan in July 2004.

Noor Khan, a suspected al-Qaeda operative, was thought to be involved in the planning of a disrupted 2004 attack on U.S. and British financial institutions. Babar Awan, a Pakistani lawyer hired by Noor Khan's family, said he has "heard nothing from the government authorities or any other authorities about where Noor Khan is."

There is no public U.S. government record available that states the CIA ever held Jabour, al-Jazeeri or Noor Khan.

Last April, John D. Negroponte, who was then director of national intelligence, told Time magazine that he did not know what would be the "endgame for the three dozen or so high-value detainees" in CIA custody at that time.

Jabour's odyssey ended with a secret flight to Amman, Jordan, where he woke to find himself in an office staring at government wall portraits of King Abdullah and his dead father, King Hussein. "I don't know why they released me, but I told them everything I knew . . .," Jabour said. "You have to tell them the truth and that was no problem for me. They are smart people," he said of his American captors.

DOJ_NMG_0137862

The Jordanians called the International Committee for the Red Cross, which sent a representative to interview Jabour and to contact his family. He remained in Jordanian custody for six weeks, was interrogated and was then handed over to Israel's security services.

The Israelis treated him better than his other captors, he said. They got Jabour his first lawyer, an Israeli Arab named Nizar Mahajna, who said in an interview that the Israelis had held Jabour in a prison near Haifa for two months. He was not mistreated, blindfolded or shackled, the lawyer said.

Israeli authorities had considered charging Jabour with fighting for an enemy of the Jewish state. But, Mahajna said, Jabour's training in Afghanistan had occurred more than eight years earlier, he was not a member of al-Qaeda and he had never lived in the Palestinian territories.

"The Israelis were given secret information on Marwan, which they got from the Americans. It wasn't shared with me but whatever it says, the central fact remained that the Pakistanis and the Americans had let him go. Why should Israel keep him?" Mahajna said.

The Israeli government dropped the case and transferred Jabour to Gaza. Prison guards drove him to the Erez border crossing between Israel and the Gaza Strip. "Good luck," one of them said to Jabour as he crossed into Gaza, where his parents awaited.

Europe's Runaway Prosecutions (WP)

By David B. Rivkin Jr. And Lee A. Casey

The Washington Post, February 28, 2007

An Italian court announced this month that it is moving forward with the indictment and trial of 25 CIA agents charged with kidnapping a radical Muslim cleric. These proceedings may well violate international law, but the case serves as a wake-up call to the United States. Overseas opponents of American foreign policy are increasingly turning to judicial proceedings against individual American officials as a means of reformulating or frustrating U.S. aims, and action to arrest this development is needed.

The Italian case involves a 2003 CIA mission to apprehend an Egyptian cleric named Osama Mustafa Hassan Nasr. Suspected of terrorist ties, Nasr was seized in Milan and transported to Egypt, where he claims he was tortured. This was, of course, an "extraordinary rendition" -- a long-standing and legal practice that generally involves the cooperation of two or more governments in the capture and transportation of a criminal suspect outside of normal extradition proceedings. It was through such a rendition that the terrorist "Carlos the Jackal" was delivered for trial to France from Sudan in 1994.

The United States has used extraordinary renditions as part of the war on terrorism, but the continuing value of this tactic, particularly in Europe, is questionable. One of the primary European objections to the concept of a "war" on terrorism is the fear that U.S. forces will treat Europe as a battlefield. Although this fear is specious -- international law has long provided that, even in wartime, a nation cannot pursue its enemies into the territory of friendly countries without their express permission -- extraordinary rendition gets uncomfortably close to U.S. military operations on European streets. Moreover, unlike many other aspects of U.S. policy, extraordinary rendition can probably be abandoned without severely undercutting the war effort. That being the case, and given the obvious and increasing hard feelings the policy has prompted in Europe, extraordinary renditions should end.

Yet the United States must still vigorously resist the prosecution of its indicted agents. If they acted with the knowledge and consent of the Italian government (as The Post's Dana Priest reported in 2005), they are immune from criminal prosecution in that country. Although foreign nationals traveling abroad are ordinarily subject to local judicial authority, international law has long recognized an exception for government agents entering another country with its government's permission. As Chief Justice John Marshall explained in The Schooner Exchange v. McFaddon (1812), an early Supreme Court case involving the immunity of a French warship in American waters, "[o]ne sovereign being in no respect amendable to another . . . can be supposed to enter a foreign territory only under an express license, or in the confidence that the immunities belonging to his independent sovereign nation, though not expressly stipulated, are reserved by implication."

Because of this general rule, elaborate Status of Forces Agreements are negotiated before the troops of one state are stationed in another. These agreements usually narrow the jurisdictional immunities to be enjoyed by American troops stationed abroad, although under the NATO Status of Forces Agreements, to which Italy and the United States are both parties, America retains primary jurisdiction over offenses committed by individuals on duty -- as would have been the case here. If the Status of Forces Agreement does not apply -- as it might not, because intelligence agents are involved -- then the general rule applies. In either case, it is up to American, not Italian, authorities to determine whether any offense was committed in the capture and rendition of Nasr.

DOJ_NMG_0137863

Unfortunately, the effort to prosecute these American agents is only one instance of a growing problem. Efforts to use domestic and international legal systems to intimidate U.S. officials are proliferating, especially in Europe. Cases are pending in Germany against other CIA agents and former defense secretary Donald Rumsfeld -- all because of controversial aspects of the war on terrorism. These follow Belgium's misguided effort to pursue "universal jurisdiction" claims for alleged violations of international law, which also resulted in complaints against American officials including Vice President Cheney and former secretary of state Colin Powell. That law was amended, but the overall problem is unlikely to go away. The initiation of judicial proceedings against individual Americans is too attractive a means of striking at the United States -- and one often not subject to control by the relevant foreign government.

Accordingly, Congress should make it a crime to initiate or maintain a prosecution against American officials if the proceeding itself otherwise violates accepted international legal norms. Thus, in instances where there is a clear case of immunity, U.S. prosecutors could answer proceedings such as the Italian indictments with criminal proceedings in U.S. courts. By responding in kind, even if few overreaching foreign officials are ever actually tried, such a law would create a powerful disincentive for these kinds of legal antics.

The authors served in the Justice Department under Presidents Ronald Reagan and George H.W. Bush, and have been expert members of the U.N. Subcommission on the Promotion and Protection of Human Rights.

Canadian Parliament Decides To Let 2 Measures Passed After 9/11 Expire (NYT)

By Ian Austen

The New York Times, February 28, 2007

OTTAWA, Feb. 27 — Canada's Parliament voted Tuesday not to extend two measures that were passed as part of a sweeping package of antiterrorism laws weeks after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on the United States.

The measures will expire Thursday. One allows the police to arrest people suspected of preparing to commit an act of terrorism and hold them for 72 hours without charges, and the other enables courts to compel witnesses to testify at special hearings similar to grand jury proceedings in the United States.

Neither has ever been used.

The vote took place just days after the Supreme Court struck down a law allowing the government to detain foreign-born terrorism suspects indefinitely using secret evidence and without charges while their deportations were being considered.

But the debate reflected the fractious politics of Canada's Parliament, which is not controlled by any single party, as much as a national reassessment of antiterrorism measures.

The Liberal Party was in power when the legislation was passed. But on Tuesday, with the Conservative Party in power and pushing to extend the two measures, all but two of the Liberal members present voted against the extension, as instructed by their new leader, Stéphane Dion. That, combined with the no votes of two smaller opposition parties, ensured the overwhelming defeat of the Conservatives' hopes.

After the vote, the Conservatives portrayed their opponents as unwilling to protect national security.

"Any party that doesn't take the national security of Canadians seriously will never be chosen by Canadians to form the government of Canada," Prime Minister Stephen Harper said.

The harsh words began long before the vote. In the House of Commons last week, Mr. Harper suggested that the Liberal opposition to the measures stemmed from the possibility that they could be used to compel a relative of a Liberal Party member of Parliament to testify at a special hearing to look into the bombing of an Air India flight in 1985.

A prolonged criminal trial in the deaths of 329 people as a result of that bombing ended in two acquittals in 2005. Mr. Harper was jeered down before he could finish his remarks.

Canadians who lost relatives in the 9/11 attacks held a news conference in Ottawa on Tuesday morning, before the vote, to urge that the provisions be extended. The laws, said one widow, Cindy Barkway, "allow law enforcement officials to prevent terrorism from turning people like you into victims like us."

There was some disappointment that the issue of public safety had become politicized by Liberals and Conservatives alike.

Errol Mendes, who teaches human rights law at the University of Ottawa, said that without the preventive arrest provision there could be circumstances when the police would be unable to stop an attack in progress. He said judicial oversight of the arrests and the investigative court hearings would prevent human rights abuses.

"It has been incredibly destructive of national security in Canada to make this area into a partisan issue," Professor Mendes said.

Canada has a long history of allowing preventive detention. In 1970, under the now defunct War Measures Act of 1914, 453 people were jailed without charges after the kidnapping and killing of a Quebec cabinet minister and the abduction of a British diplomat. That episode remains controversial throughout the country, especially in Quebec.

DOJ_NMG_0137864

Amnesty International and other human rights groups urged Parliament let the measures expire. Amnesty argued that conventional criminal laws allowed the police and courts to stop imminent terrorist acts without jeopardizing civil liberties, a position largely shared by Mr. Dion.

After the vote, Alex Neve, Amnesty International's Canadian secretary general, said: "This by no means should be interpreted or misunderstood that Canada is somehow going soft on terrorism. What I think this is an affirmation of is that Canada is increasingly concerned that its approach to terrorism is fully grounded in respect to fundamental human rights."

PATRIOT ACT:

DoJ Sued For Release Of FISA Court Rules On Spy Program (INFOWEEK)

By K.C. Jones, InformationWeek

InformationWeek, February 28, 2007

The Electronic Frontier Foundation has sued the Department of Justice, demanding the release of records related to court orders authorizing electronic surveillance.

The EFF filed a lawsuit Tuesday seeking information on changes to the National Security Agency's surveillance program. The program, which the federal government maintains targets communications involving at least one suspected terrorist, was secret until the New York Times reported on it in December 2005.

The government acknowledged that it was conducting surveillance without warrants from the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court and argued that presidential powers and recent legislation authorized the practice. After defending against allegations that the practice was illegal, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced last month that the government changed its practices and would seek court approval to monitor communications.

EFF used the Freedom of Information Act in an attempt to obtain records showing the court's approval, but the Department of Justice didn't respond to a written request. EFF is seeking immediate release of orders allowing the government to monitor communications and any rules or guidelines associated with the orders. White House Press Secretary Tony Snow has made public comments that indicate the court issued guidelines or parameters that have allowed the government to continue surveillance with court approval.

EFF refers to those statements in its filing. It's not alone in seeking details about the guidelines. News reporters who have been covering the issue have also pressed to find out the parameters of ongoing surveillance.

The White House, Gonzales, and federal agencies have maintained that terrorists could learn too much about the government's capabilities if the government's methods were disclosed. They have argued that national security would be compromised if information about the surveillance program were released.

Although several groups and individuals have sued the government over the secret surveillance, EFF's suit is different since it seeks information about the program since the administration has claimed court approval.

In a statement announcing the lawsuit, EFF senior counsel David Sobel said that Americans have the right to know the government's basic guidelines for electronic surveillance of their personal communications. The government has claimed that ordinary Americans haven't been targeted and that only communications involving suspected terrorists have been intercepted.

Sobel said during a brief interview Tuesday that he's optimistic EFF will obtain the records because the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act requires modifications to its rules and procedures to be declassified and made available to congressional committees. Even if the government successfully argues that the material is highly classified, the lawsuit is likely to make officials account for the documents they have, which would make public more information than has been released up to this point, he said.

The lawsuit is one of dozens filed by EFF as part of a campaign to "hold government accountable."

EFF Files Suit Against DoJ (TND)

Technology News Daily, February 28, 2007

The Electronic Frontier Foundation (EFF) filed suit against the Department of Justice today, demanding records about secret new court orders that supposedly authorize the government's highly controversial electronic surveillance program that intercepts and analyzes millions of Americans' communications.

When press reports forced the White House to acknowledge the program in December of 2005, the administration claimed that the massive program could be conducted without warrants or judicial authorization of any kind. However, in January of this year, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced that the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court (FISC) had authorized collection of some communications and that the surveillance program would now operate under its approval. EFF's suit comes after the Department of Justice failed to respond to a Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) request for records concerning the purported changes in the program.

DOJ_NMG_0137865

"While national security and law enforcement demand a limited amount of secrecy, Americans have the right to know the government's basic guidelines for this kind of invasive electronic surveillance of their personal communications," said EFF Senior Counsel David Sobel. "The burden is on the Justice Department to justify its failure to disclose the information we've requested."

EFF's suit demands the immediate release of the FISC orders regarding the surveillance program and any FISC rules and guidelines associated with such orders.

Today's FOIA action is separate from EFF's lawsuit against AT&T for illegally collaborating with the government's surveillance program. That suit, Hepting v. AT&T, is proceeding in U.S. District Court in San Francisco despite the government's ongoing attempts to have the case dismissed.

For the FOIA complaint filed against the Justice Department:
http://www.eff.org/flag/oipr/oipr_complaint.pdf
For more on EFF's FOIA Litigation for Accountable Government Project:
http://www.eff.org/flag/

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Bush Will Veto Union Rights For Federal Airport Screeners (WT)

By Shaun Waterman
The Washington Times, February 28, 2007

President Bush will veto a proposed bill to implement measures recommended by the September 11 commission if the bill is passed with language granting collective-bargaining rights to airport passenger and baggage screeners employed by the Transportation Security Administration, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff told Republican senators yesterday.

Mr. Chertoff's comments at a private luncheon were reported by Sen. Jim DeMint, South Carolina Republican, and confirmed by the Department of Homeland Security and a senior administration official authorized to speak to the press.

Mr. Chertoff "did make very clear that if the bill goes to the White House with the current provision related to TSA personnel authorities, his recommendation, and that of other senior administration officials, would be to veto it," department spokesman Russ Knocke said.

A letter sent yesterday to Mr. Bush from 36 Republican senators shows that the votes are there to sustain a veto, according to Republican aides.

One of the provision's strongest backers, Sen. Daniel K. Akaka, Hawaii Democrat, said a veto would also kill numerous other provisions of the law.

"I hope that the president would consider all the improvements made by this legislation to protect the nation before making veto threats," he said.

Mr. Knocke said the administration's view is that "the issues relating to the TSA are so extraordinarily problematic that there should be no doubt in anyone's mind" about the need for a veto.

The Senate is slated to begin today debating the bill, which includes measures addressing rail and aviation security, emergency communications, cargo security, nuclear proliferation and national standards for drivers' licenses. The House has passed its version of the bill, which includes the labor rights language, along with dozens of other provisions and authorization for billions of dollars of homeland-security spending.

The provision at issue was introduced as an amendment to the bill while it was in committee and passed on a party-line vote. It repeals a footnote in the 2001 law setting up the TSA, which gave the agency's director wide discretion to decide issues of union and other labor rights for the 40,000-plus passenger and baggage screeners it employs.

Labor Language Threatens Antiterror Bill (AP)

By Laurie Kellman
AP, February 28, 2007

President Bush and his Senate allies will kill a Sept. 11 antiterror bill if Congress sends it to the White House with a provision to let airport screeners unionize, the White House and 36 Republicans said Tuesday.

"As the legislation currently stands, the president's senior advisers would recommend that he veto the bill," said White House spokesman Scott Stanzel.

DOJ_NMG_0137866

Senate Republicans swiftly backed up the threat with a pledge by more than enough senators to block any veto override attempt.

"If the final bill contains such a provision, forcing you to veto it, we pledge to sustain your veto," they wrote to the president. Sen. Jim DeMint, R-S.C., planned to offer an amendment to strip the provision from the bill.

Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said that allowing screeners to unionize would impede the department's quick response to possible threats. Fast redeployment of screeners, such as in response to Hurricane Rita and the failed London plot to blow up airliners, cannot wait for negotiations, he said.

Chertoff said screeners are as much on the front lines in the war against terror as military troops.

"Marines don't collectively bargain over whether they're going to wind up, you know, being deployed in Anbar province or in Baghdad," Chertoff told reporters after a briefing with senators. "We can't negotiate over terms and conditions of work that goes to the heart of our ability to move rapidly in order to deal with the threats that are emerging."

Other federal employees have collective bargaining and whistle-blower protection rights.

Chertoff's reasoning, according to the American Federation of Government Employees, is "an insult to the hundreds of thousands of dedicated public safety officers with collective bargaining rights — from border patrol agents to firefighters to the Capitol Hill police," said John Gage, president of the federation.

The White House made its displeasure with the union provision clear before the House passed it as part of its Homeland Security bill. Sen. Susan Collins said Chertoff told her that a statement Thursday would include an explicit veto threat.

Casting the provision as a deal-killer would flex Bush's political muscle with the new, Democratic-led Congress on the old battleground of labor rights. It also could throw an obstacle into talks over how to debate and pass the recommendations of the Sept. 11 Commission.

For now, senators are eager to follow the House and pass a bill enacting the commission's recommendations to tighten the nation's security. The House bill also includes a provision that would let TSA screeners bargain collectively.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada and Republican leader Mitch McConnell of Kentucky had reached a tentative agreement Tuesday to conduct the debate over the next 10 days without the distraction of Iraq.

The sense of urgency on the 9/11 recommendations was conveyed to both leaders in a letter Tuesday from families of those killed in the terrorist attacks on that day in 2001.

"This legislation is far too important to be politicized by ... controversial amendments and debate, particularly those relating to Iraq," wrote Carol Ashley and Mary Fetchet of the Voices of September 11th.

Reid and McConnell said the Iraq debate would wait for next month, after passage of the 9/11 bill. The arrangement would allow the Senate to debate legislation bolstering anti-terrorism security measures on railroads and airlines without being distracted by the furor over President Bush's buildup of troops in Iraq.

"We have got to finish this bill," Reid, D-Nev., said as he opened the Senate session. He read parts of a letter from relatives of people killed in the Sept. 11, 2001 terrorist attacks asking the Senate to consider the legislation "without complications regarding Iraq."

Even minus an Iraq debate, provisions in the anti-terrorism bill or planned amendments make the legislation contentious.

In addition to its opposition to the TSA provision, the White House also opposes an amendment that would let states delay adopting standardized drivers' licenses.

Collins said Chertoff delivered a staunch defense of the administration's position during the GOP caucus' weekly policy lunch Tuesday. She said she nonetheless plans to try to attach an amendment that would delay requirements for states to adopt national drivers license standards.

Many states have complained about the cost of the program, and civil libertarians are concerned about privacy issues.

Other measures in the bill would improve rail and aviation security, provide funds for state and local emergency communications systems, improve intelligence sharing between federal, state and local officials, and expand a visa waiver benefit for favored countries.

FEDERAL DIARY: Interior Report Finds 'Wall' Between Field Staff, Leaders (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Washington Post, February 28, 2007

Communication. Trust. Leadership.

A report by the Interior Department inspector general, released this month, provides a glimpse of how these issues can arise in agencies that have to manage a workforce spread across the country.

DOJ_NMG_0137867

The report, by Earl E. Devaney, Interior's inspector general, focused on the law enforcement office at the Fish and Wildlife Service. Devaney praised the office for "significant progress" in overhauling its operations since 2002, when the secretary of the interior called for improvements.

But Devaney also found some problems in the law enforcement office, such as a "general mistrust of senior management" and a lack of communication between the headquarters and the field, "which has created a perception that there is a 'wall' between management and field personnel."

For the review, Devaney's staff conducted more than 110 interviews, traveled to field offices and hired a consultant to survey the law enforcement staff. Of 369 employees asked to participate in the survey, 88 percent responded -- an indication, the report said, that the employees are highly committed to the Fish and Wildlife Service.

The agency's law enforcement office enforces federal laws, such as protections for endangered species and migratory birds. The office's work includes breaking up animal-smuggling rings, safeguarding habitat for endangered species, enforcing bird-hunting regulations and inspecting wildlife shipments to detect illegal trade.

The IG review suggested that the agency's law enforcement program is at risk of being undermined because of leadership and communication problems -- issues that hinder operations in many parts of the government.

The report pointed out that the lack of communication between senior leaders and the field "has significantly impacted morale and trust." Field employees said their bosses at headquarters never visited their offices, and many field agents said they rarely got an office visit from their superiors -- the special agents in charge.

Field employees also said they were frustrated by management practices. The IG found that an "unwritten requirement" for promotions is two years of experience working at Fish and Wildlife's law enforcement headquarters and that field employees think promotions often go to agents with little or no supervisory experience.

Bonuses and time-off awards also were distributed on an inconsistent basis, the IG found.

In 2005, about half of the law enforcement employees who received a performance rating of "exceptional" were in one region, while the remaining six regions and headquarters shared the remaining half. In three regions, employees rated as "superior," a step below exceptional, received bigger bonuses than those employees rated exceptional, the report said.

Disciplinary action proved to be another sensitive topic, the IG found. In one case, an employee received the mandated 30-day suspension for misusing a government vehicle, while another employee in a different region received a 14-day suspension for a more serious offense -- driving while intoxicated in a government vehicle and while carrying a firearm.

"Inconsistencies such as these have caused resentment and frustration," the report said.

Benito Perez, acting chief of law enforcement for Fish and Wildlife, said the law enforcement office has started work on 12 recommendations made in the IG report to improve operations.

"We don't disagree with the validity of the recommendations, and we are working toward meeting those recommendations," said Perez, a 19-year Fish and Wildlife law enforcement officer.Unions for TSA Screeners

Senior advisers to President Bush would recommend that he veto anti-terrorism legislation that included a provision to permit federal airport screeners to engage in collective bargaining, a White House spokesman said yesterday.

Legislation to implement the unfinished recommendations from the 9/11 commission would permit Transportation Security Administration screeners to be represented by unions. The provision was added to the bill by Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.).

Scott Stanzel, the White House spokesman, said, "We vigorously disagree with the provisions of the Senate legislation that would eliminate the flexibility given to TSA to perform its transportation security missions."

The TSA needs the ability to quickly reassign and move screeners to respond to threats, he said.

Lieberman has contended that the screeners should have employee protections similar to those provided to Border Patrol agents and customs and immigration officers.

Call To Expand Union Rights Could Derail Antiterror Bill (NYT)

By Eric Lipton

The New York Times, February 28, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 27 — Democrats in Congress are pushing to extend union protection to 43,000 federal airport security workers, reviving a debate that stalled the creation of the Department of Homeland Security and could now derail broad antiterrorism legislation.

The proposal has provoked opposition from Senate Republicans and the Bush administration. It is the latest in a series of labor-related fights in Washington as Democrats try to use their new majority to push long-delayed proposals that benefit rank-and-file workers, like increasing the minimum wage.

DOJ_NMG_0137868

White House officials made clear on Tuesday that President Bush was prepared to veto a bill that enacted recommendations of the Sept. 11 Commission if the provision granting Transportation Security Administration workers collective bargaining rights was not removed.

"Existing authority permits T.S.A. the flexibility to manage and deploy their work force," Scott Stanzel, the White House deputy press secretary, said. "We do think that it is important that T.S.A. maintain that flexibility for personnel performing key homeland security roles."

In a letter sent Tuesday to the White House, Senator Jim DeMint, Republican of South Carolina, and 35 other Senate Republicans said they were prepared, if necessary, to sustain a veto.

Security administration officers are already allowed to join a union. But few do, as current federal law does not permit the union to bargain on their behalf to contest workplace assignments, file grievances or represent them in disciplinary matters. Backers of the measure say giving the T.S.A. workers broader rights does not create security problems.

"There's no good reason to deny these rights to these people," Senator Joseph I. Lieberman, independent of Connecticut, said Tuesday, as the Senate took up the matter.

What collective bargaining rights Department of Homeland Security employees should have has been under dispute since shortly after the 2001 attacks.

The disagreement so divided Congress in 2002 that for months it prevented passage of the bill to create the department. Republicans successfully used the delay, for which they blamed Democrats, to help defeat Senator Max Cleland, the incumbent Democrat of Georgia, that year, openly questioning his commitment to fight terrorism.

Republicans ultimately prevailed, both with T.S.A., which initially was part of the Department of Transportation, and with Homeland Security, which has since taken over.

But union leaders have been pushing ever since to reassert bargaining rights for department employees.

Union leaders say airport screeners are frequently required to work unscheduled overtime, suffer high injury and illness rates — nearly 30 percent compared with 5 percent for all federal employees — and have an attrition rate 10 times as high as the federal average.

"How safe is the public if officers who see security breaches that result from mismanagement cannot disclose that because they fear they could be fired?" said Mark D. Roth of the American Federation of Government Employees.

Under the proposal, the security officers would not have the right to strike, and the union would not have the power to negotiate wages. But it would be authorized to bargain on their behalf to establish work rules to govern overtime and temporary transfers, and to protect them if they file a grievance.

Union officials said that T.S.A., under the proposal, would still have the power, in emergencies, to change work assignments. But Kip Hawley, the security agency's administrator, said such shifts were necessary not just in emergencies but when routine events like weather delays required work reassignments or overtime.

"We require an infinitely flexible security regime that allows us to change what we do and where we do it," Mr. Hawley said, adding that hiring staff members to handle union relations would cost $160 million.

The debate over the collective bargaining rights is just one of several points of contention expected to surface as the Senate takes up its version of the Sept. 11 Commission bill. House Democrats passed their own version in January.

House Democrats, who also included a provision granting collective bargaining rights to airport screeners, have language in their bill that would mandate inspection of all ship containers headed to the United States from overseas, a provision that the Bush administration and many Republicans oppose. A push by Democrats is expected in the coming week to add such language to the Senate bill.

The Senate bill is also likely to include measures intended to increase rail and transit security. And there may be an effort, also opposed by the Bush administration, to delay a 2008 mandate that the states begin to issue a standardized, tamper-proof driver's license.

Officials in many states have said they will not be ready in time and that the federal government should cover the cost of issuing the new licenses.

New Profiling Program Raises Privacy Concerns (WP)

By Ellen Nakashima And Alec Klein

The Washington Post, February 28, 2007

The Department of Homeland Security is testing a data-mining program that would attempt to spot terrorists by combing vast amounts of information about average Americans, such as flight and hotel reservations. Similar to a Pentagon program killed by Congress in 2003 over concerns about civil liberties, the new program could take effect as soon as next year.

DOJ_NMG_0137869

But researchers testing the system are likely to already have violated privacy laws by reviewing real information, instead of fake data, according to a source familiar with a congressional investigation into the $42.5 million program.

Bearing the unwieldy name Analysis, Dissemination, Visualization, Insight and Semantic Enhancement (ADVISE), the program is on the cutting edge of analytical technology that applies mathematical algorithms to uncover hidden relationships in data. The idea is to troll a vast sea of information, including audio and visual, and extract suspicious people, places and other elements based on their links and behavioral patterns.

The privacy violation, described in a Government Accountability Office report that is due out soon, was one of three by separate government data mining programs, according to the GAO. "Undoubtedly there are likely to be more," GAO Comptroller David M. Walker said in a recent congressional hearing.

The violations involved the government's use of citizens' private information without proper notification to the public and using the data for a purpose different than originally envisioned, said the source, who declined to be identified because the report is not yet public.

The issue lies at the heart of the debate over whether pattern-based data mining -- or searching for bad guys without a known suspect -- can succeed without invading people's privacy and violating their civil liberties.

DHS spokesman Larry Orluskie said officials had not yet read the GAO report and could not comment.

Another DHS official who helped develop ADVISE said that the program was tested on only "synthetic" data, which he described as "real data" made anonymous so it could not be traced back to people.

The system has been tested in four DHS pilot programs, including one at the Office of Intelligence and Analysis, to help analysts more effectively sift through mounds of intelligence reports and documents. In another pilot at a government laboratory in Livermore, Calif., that assessed foreign and domestic terror groups' ability to develop weapons of mass destruction, ADVISE tools were found "worthy of further development," DHS spokesman Christopher Kelly said.

The DHS is completing reports on the privacy implications of all four pilot programs. Such assessments are required on any government technology program that collects people's personally identifiable information, according to DHS guidelines.

The DHS official who worked on ADVISE said it can be used for a range of purposes. An analyst might want, say, to study the patterns of behavior of the Washington area sniper and look for similar patterns elsewhere, he said. The bottom line is to help make analysts more effective at detecting terrorist intent.

ADVISE has progressed further than the program killed by Congress in 2003, Total Information Awareness, which was being developed at the Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency (DARPA). Yet it was partly ADVISE's resemblance to Total Information Awareness that led lawmakers last year to request that the GAO review the program. Though Total Information Awareness never got beyond an early research phase, unspecified subcomponents of the program were allowed to be funded under the Pentagon's classified budget, which deal largely with foreigners' data.

The Disruptive Technology Office, a research arm of the intelligence community, is working on another program that would sift through massive amounts of data, such as intelligence reports and communications records, to detect hidden patterns. The program focuses on foreigners. Officials declined to elaborate because it is classified.

Officials at the office of the director of national intelligence stressed that pattern analysis research remains largely theoretical. They said the more effective approach is link analysis, or looking for bad guys based on associations with known suspects. They said that they seek to guard Americans' privacy, focusing on synthetic and foreigners' data. Information on Americans must be relevant to the mission, they said.

Still, privacy advocates raise concerns about programs based on sheer statistical analysis because of the potential that people can be wrongly accused. "They will turn up hundreds of soccer teams, family reunions and civil war re-enactors whose patterns of behavior happen to be the same as the terrorist network," said Jim Harper, director of information policy studies at the Cato Institute.

But Robert Popp, former DARPA deputy office director who founded National Security Innovations, a Boston firm working on technologies for intelligence agencies, said that research anecdotally shows that pattern analysis has merit. In 2003, he said, DARPA researchers using the technique helped interrogators at the U.S. prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, assess which detainees posed the biggest threats. Popp said that analysts told him that "detainees classified as 'likely a terrorist' were in fact terrorists, and in no cases were detainees who were not terrorists classified as 'likely a terrorist.' "

Some lawmakers are demanding greater program disclosure. A bipartisan bill co-sponsored by Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) would require the Bush administration to report to Congress the extent of its data-mining programs.

Under The Gantry (WP)

The Washington Post, February 28, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0137870

THE DEPARTMENT of Homeland Security recently announced a plan to do what many scientists had once thought impossible: effectively inspect large numbers of vehicles entering a major metropolitan area for radioactive materials without bringing life to a standstill. In the 1950s, a still-classified report on the possibility of scanning for nuclear materials found that detectors could be easily defeated, one of its authors recently told US News & World Report. Experts today say that the nuclear weapons are heavily shielded, making detection tricky, and that current front-line scanners have difficulty in reliably detecting even those nuclear materials not encased in a bomb.

Nevertheless, DHS is pushing forward with a pilot program to test the feasibility of scanning large numbers of cars and trucks entering Manhattan for radioactivity.

The goal is to set up a system of both fixed and mobile scanners on roads leading into Manhattan. The system would require little or no slowdown in traffic to operate. Fixed detectors might be placed at tollbooths and other traffic choke points. Mobile scanners might be used to conduct random checks. Ideally, this program would add another layer of security to the nuclear detection regimes at border crossings and seaports. If successful, it would require little or no effort from those being inspected, so it wouldn't snarl traffic in the tri-state area. Another point in its favor is that the pilot program is not very expensive, as Homeland Security projects go, and that even if the resulting system is not perfect, it will foster development of newer and better technologies that will make Americans safer.

Even given all that, however, we are glad Homeland Security is not breaking the bank on its latest experiment. Based on the available information on the inconsistency of nuclear detection technology, it is fair to wonder whether this is the right time to conduct such a large-scale test and whether such a program may be an inefficient use of government resources.

It's A Hard Sell For Some, Big Easy For Others (USAT)

By Anne Rochell Konigsmark

USA Today, February 28, 2007

NEW ORLEANS — Of all the places they could live, Brad Pitt and Angelina Jolie chose New Orleans. They bought a $3.5 million mansion in the French Quarter, enrolled two of their three children in a local private school and became symbols of the effort to reinvigorate the city.

Pitt has promoted the construction of environmentally friendly buildings here, and the celebrities' investment in New Orleans made headlines around the world. But each day, in much smaller ways, other people are coming and buying stakes in a city that still has less than half the population it had before Hurricane Katrina.

People continue to move out, some after returning here and becoming overwhelmed by the neighborhoods of empty houses, a crime wave and a general uncertainty about the future. Despite all that, New Orleans is finding a way to hold steady. The population, now at about 191,000, hasn't changed significantly in months.

Amid the comings and goings, New Orleans is evolving, trying to find its footing in a post-Katrina world. The blank-canvas feel of the city has attracted a wave of newcomers who will help shape its future: entrepreneurs, young idealists, urban planners and longtime lovers of New Orleans' unique charms.

"People have forgotten what a great city this is," says Danielle Sutton, 34, who moved here in June from London with her husband and their baby son to open a gourmet cheese shop. "It's just nice living in such a beautiful place."

All around, there are signs that New Orleans is coming back, but not quite as the city it used to be. A U.S. government survey reveals a whiter populace: New Orleans was two-thirds black before Katrina hit in August 2005; today it's 47% black and 42% white.

It's also more Hispanic, thanks mostly to an influx of workers coming here for plentiful construction jobs. The survey indicates New Orleans is almost 10% Hispanic, up from about 3% in the 2000 Census.

Willing to brave infrastructure problems, the reduced population and many other challenges, businesses are opening. A Tulane University survey in January found 56 new businesses had opened since Katrina on three main commercial streets.

There are concerns, however, that New Orleans is losing some of its cultural flavor.

Demographer William Frey of the Brookings Institution in Washington predicts that New Orleans "will become more of a normal American city, and that may not be what the locals think is the right direction to go. The people who are leaving — many are those who made New Orleans what it was — and in a way the sense of place in New Orleans will change dramatically."

In a survey done in October by the University of New Orleans, one-third of the respondents in Orleans Parish and neighboring Jefferson Parish said it was "likely" or "somewhat likely" they would leave the area. The main reason: crime. Other reasons include the slow pace of recovery and concern about the safety of the city in future storms.

Neilan Tyree, a once-devoted New Orleanian, moved to Atlanta last spring after trying to live in post-Katrina New Orleans for more than six months. "I couldn't stand it and couldn't fix it, so I had to rearrange my dreams," says Tyree, 47.

DOJ_NMG_0137871

Most of the residents who have not returned since the storm came from lower-income neighborhoods and are black, Frey says. The UNO study found that among those who say they probably will leave, most are educated people under 60, says Susan Howell, director of the university's Survey Research Center.

Meanwhile, Richard Campanella, a Tulane geographer, says well-educated people are moving in.

"I have my ear out for folks who have moved here since the storm," he says. "Many are urban planners, urban designers and architects. They see this as an incredible frontier where they can provide their professional skills in an environment that really needs them."

Newcomers are flocking to areas that had little damage in the storm. The French Quarter looks and feels much as it always has. The same can be said for many historic neighborhoods along the Mississippi River that had little or no flooding.

"We're in a bit of a bubble," Sutton says of the life she and her husband, Rich, have created. Their shop, the St. James Cheese Company, is in the Uptown neighborhood, an upscale area that did not flood and teems with activity. They live in an apartment four blocks away.

Rich Sutton, 35, says they have friends and relatives who called them "crazy" to start a business and bring up a family in such an unstable environment.

"People think, 'That's the place that got destroyed,' or 'That's the place with all the crime,' " he says.

Campanella has studied new business owners like the Suttons and tracked businesses along three commercial corridors — Magazine Street, Carrollton Avenue and St. Claude Avenue. Of the 651 businesses on those streets pre-Katrina, 411 have reopened and stayed open. Nineteen reopened and then closed, he says, and 56 new businesses have opened.

The openings and closings reflect the ongoing tale of two cities. Along Magazine Street, which did not flood, 95% of businesses are open, while on the other two streets, which did flood, less than half the businesses are open.

For many New Orleanians who were here before Katrina, getting back to normal is nothing short of a battle. And for some, even those whose homes did not flood, it's a battle not worth fighting.

Several large corporations have moved most, if not all, of their operations out of the city since Katrina. These include Chevron, which is moving about 500 New Orleans workers across Lake Pontchartrain to the North Shore, and Entergy, New Orleans' only Fortune 500 company, which has relocated many of its operations to Jackson, Miss.

Many off-shore oil service industry businesses have followed their customers to Houston, says Eric Smith, associate director of the Entergy-Tulane Energy Institute.

Tyree, a freelance business development specialist who attended Tulane in the 1970s, moved to New Orleans in 2004 and intended to stay. His St. Charles Avenue apartment did not flood, so he returned soon after Katrina. "I wanted to be a part of the rebuilding," he says. "I was very much the optimist."

Then his landlord raised the rent. And Tyree, who is HIV-positive, began to worry about the city's diminished health care system. He got frustrated with damaged streets and broken traffic lights.

Tyree landed a job with MacDuff, a publishing company in Atlanta. He found an apartment there and says he is happy. "I'm having to relearn how to live in a world where things can and do work, and I love it."

New Orleans struggled with crime problems before Katrina. Authorities' continued difficulty in getting a handle on violent crime has helped make the issue the main reason people want to leave the area, the UNO survey indicates.

New Orleans had the nation's highest murder rate per capita in 2006 and began 2007 with a rash of killings that led the U.S. government to send personnel and equipment to help local authorities.

Olivia Watkins, 22, says a fear of crime drove her from New Orleans. Watkins, who lived near Audubon Park, says she was a frequent "stoop sitter" who gave up evenings outside because of muggings in her area.

There were other problems post-Katrina for Watkins. While she was living in North Carolina just after Katrina, her landlord in New Orleans evicted her because he needed a place to stay. She returned to New Orleans in early 2006 and found an apartment. A few weeks ago, however, Watkins lost her job as an editor at a local magazine.

"I feel like New Orleans stabbed me in the back," she says. "And I was all set on getting married in a church on St. Charles Avenue and sending my kids to the bilingual school on Audubon Park."

Watkins left New Orleans in January to live in Orlando with family. This spring, she plans to move to Baton Rouge, where she found a job as a copywriter.

Meanwhile, some who came here seeking opportunities are thriving. Antan Wilson, 24, who arrived from North Carolina just after the storm and initially lived in his car, says this is home now.

"I kind of fell in love with it," he says. He worked as a janitor and in a strip club before getting hired as an account manager for EBONetworks, a local marketing firm that helps companies target minority customers.

"There's energy here, and I think it holds a good future," Wilson says.

DOJ_NMG_0137872

Last winter, Bobbi and Kevin Krause sold their home in Phoenix intending to go on an extended road trip, which included a stop in New Orleans to do volunteer work. Once here, they became friends with residents on a stretch of Palmyra Street where they were working on damaged homes. A flooded Victorian cottage caught their eye, and after finding the owner, they bought it for $48,000.

"It was the way the community welcomed us," says Kevin, 40. "We go over to their houses for dinner or coffee. In Phoenix, we hardly knew our neighbors. This was new, and we fell in love with it."

Much of the New Orleans that Christine Williams knew before Katrina has ceased to exist, and she's reconsidering her decision to return.

A New Orleans native, she says most of her evacuated family members now live in Iowa. Her home in Lakeview stayed dry, but her neighborhood is still devastated and mostly empty.

"There's no supermarket," says Williams, 35. "And it's just still so abandoned."

She fled to Washington, D.C., before Katrina and enrolled her daughter, now 9, in a Catholic school. She found a job at a hair salon and they lived in a D.C. suburb. "It was a very, very nice experience," she says. "Washington is very progressive. It is movin' and shakin' but not too fast."

Williams moved back to New Orleans last spring because her boyfriend and her daughter wanted to, she says. Now Williams, who is black, says she may leave again.

"I didn't feel separated by race in Washington," she says. "It's such a melting pot."

Bobbi Krause, 32, says she understands why people who were here before Katrina might want to leave. She and Kevin have learned how difficult it is to build a life here. Their home is gutted and unfinished because they have been unable to find anyone to do the work.

But the Krauses didn't lose anything in the storm, and for them, this is an adventure.

"The people that are back in their homes have fought a battle to be here. It is a tough decision to stay," Bobbi says.

"We're creating our New Orleans right now."

WAR NEWS:

War Bill Divides Democrats (LAT)

By Noam N. Levey And Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, February 28, 2007

WASHINGTON — Democratic lawmakers, who earlier this month nearly unanimously backed resolutions condemning President Bush's plans to boost troop levels in Iraq, are struggling to agree on what to do next in their drive to bring the war to an end.

In the Senate, party leaders who faced dissent in their own caucus have decided to postpone consideration of a binding resolution that would set limits on what U.S. forces could do in the conflict.

And in the House, Democrats are wrestling with even deeper divisions as they try to agree on a way to use a supplemental war funding bill to slow the deployment of more troops in Iraq amid accusations by Republicans that the move would deprive troops of the help they need.

At a closed-door caucus meeting Tuesday, three senior House Democrats — including the chairmen of the Appropriations and Armed Services committees — urged their colleagues to support the funding strategy, the details of which are being worked out.

But the apparent deceleration of the legislative drive to end the war is dismaying antiwar activists.

"There seems to be a new world land-speed record set in back-peddling," said Tom Andrews, a former Democratic congressman from Maine who heads Win Without War, a coalition of antiwar groups.

Just a few weeks ago, Win Without War was targeting Republicans for standing in the way of the resolutions. Now, Andrews said, antiwar groups are encouraging their members to pressure Democratic lawmakers.

Senior Democrats defended their management of the war issue, insisting there has been no slowdown in their campaign.

"We've been in the majority for six weeks," said Sen. Patty Murray of Washington. "We've had 38 hearings on the Iraq war…. We've already had two votes on the war…. That's a lot better than they've done in the last 3 1/2 or 4 years."

But Democrats are under intense pressure to act. Several recent polls have shown that public support continues to build for congressional action to limit the war.

Less than two weeks ago, the party appeared comfortably in control of the political battle over the war, while Republicans flailed.

DOJ_NMG_0137873

House Democrats pushed through a resolution repudiating the White House plan to add 21,500 troops in Baghdad and Al Anbar province, picking up support from a handful of Republicans.

And in the Senate, Democrats twice succeeded in portraying Republicans as obstacles to a debate on the president's strategy. GOP lawmakers blocked consideration of nonbinding resolutions, complaining they were being denied the opportunity to bring forward alternatives.

But as debate has shifted to what Congress will do next, substantial cracks appear to be emerging in the Democratic camp.

In the House, several moderate Democrats have spoken out against a proposal by Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.) to attach conditions to a $93-billion supplemental defense spending bill that could limit the Pentagon's ability to send more troops to Iraq. Murtha, who chairs the appropriations subcommittee that is considering the spending request, is a close friend and ally of House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco). She has indicated some qualified support for his proposal.

House Democrats are exploring setting equipment and training standards for troops before their deployment, shifting more money to fighting terrorism in Afghanistan and setting benchmarks for the Iraqi government to meet for continued U.S. funding.

"We're listening to our colleagues about what form they want that supplemental to take," Pelosi said. But, sensitive to the GOP attacks, the speaker said: "We will fund the troops as long as they are in harm's way."

In an interview with CNN's Larry King on Tuesday, Pelosi said that Bush's judgment on the Iraq war was "a little impaired."

Murtha's proposal has come under withering attack from Republicans who say it would deprive troops of the reinforcements they need.

And Tuesday, Marine Gen. Peter Pace, Joint Chiefs of Staff chairman, warned the Senate Appropriations Committee that Murtha's proposal would mean fewer troops fighting in Iraq.

"The effect is damaging on the battlefield," Pace said, noting that instead of the 20 brigades that the military says it needs, there would be about 14 to 19.

Democratic leaders in the Senate have never been enthusiastic about using congressional authority over funding the military to tie up the deployment. But their strategy of rewriting the resolution that authorized the 2003 invasion of Iraq to limit the U.S. mission there also has run into trouble.

Leaders have been circulating a draft by Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), the Foreign Relations Committee chairman, and Carl Levin (D-Mich.), the Armed Services Committee chairman. But several senators sounded uncomfortable with language specifying that U.S. troops could engage in some activities, such as counterinsurgency, but not others.

"I think it's very difficult to start changing things after the fact and still avoid micromanaging," said Sen. Ben Nelson (D-Neb.), a moderate lawmaker who helped lead efforts to pass a nonbinding resolution opposing the deployment of additional troops.

At the same time, Sen. Russell D. Feingold (D-Wis.), a leading antiwar lawmaker, said the proposal did not go far enough.

"The people of this country did not ask us to reshape the mission in Iraq," he said. "They asked us to end it."

The Democratic disagreements brought smiles to the faces of some Republicans on Tuesday. Sen. John Cornyn (R-Texas), who for weeks has been laboring to blunt the Democratic assault on Bush's plan, said: "It seems like they have to have a debate within their own caucus."

Democrats Struggle To Reach Consensus On Iraq (MCT)

By Margaret Talev

McClatchy Newspapers, February 28, 2007

WASHINGTON - Back from a weeklong recess, top Democrats in the House of Representatives and the Senate acknowledged Tuesday that they still don't have a game plan for how to force President Bush to change policy in Iraq.

"There has not yet been a determination made by the Democratic caucus as to how we will finalize our legislative approach to this," said Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev. He said it would be another week or two before Senate debate on Iraq resumed.

House Democrats are not much closer to decisive action, although they did pass a nonbinding resolution earlier this month opposing Bush's troop buildup in Iraq.

"We are in the process of choosing the least dangerous, the least negative alternative," said House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer, D-Md. "We're not there; there's not a consensus."

The division and confusion over how to proceed could anger voters who put Democrats in control of Congress largely in frustration over the war. But Democrats are nervous about cutting off money in a way that could undermine soldiers who already are in Iraq - or expose Democrats to Republican charges that they're doing that.

DOJ_NMG_0137874

House Democrats huddled for a closed-door caucus Tuesday evening to discuss alternatives. They are trying to modify a controversial plan by the Democrats' top defense appropriator, Rep. John Murtha of Pennsylvania, to prevent the Bush administration from sending troops that aren't fully rested or equipped.

Murtha was poised to tie troop readiness to funding in a $93.4 billion war-spending bill requested by the White House. But many Democrats are wary of going that far; even Murtha's ally, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., has said she won't hamstring war money in a way that hurts troops.

Pelosi said Tuesday evening she intends to bring a supplemental war bill that contains some version of Murtha's plan before the full House by mid-March.

But several Democrats who attended the caucus said the legislation ultimately may allow Bush to waive troop restrictions so long as he explains his reasoning.

In a brief interview after the caucus, Pelosi said that if Democrats do allow the president to sign waivers, it still would put Bush under more pressure.

"If I were the president of the United States I would not welcome having to confirm why he would send troops who are not trained . . . into a war zone," Pelosi said.

"But we haven't made our final decisions about this," she emphasized.

Even if House Democrats agree to a modified version of Murtha's plan, there's little prospect for bipartisan support, partly because Republicans don't want to help Democrats build a case for de-funding the war in months to come.

In addition, House Democrats could have trouble getting enough Senate Democrats to go along with anything that ties up troops.

Said freshman Sen. Jon Tester, D-Mont., "This is a Catch-22. At some point in time we've got to get the president's attention. But I'm not going to take away what's necessary for the troops in the field. That's not acceptable."

Reid said he planned to put the Iraq debate on hold until the Senate completed action on homeland security legislation that enacts recommendations of the 9-11 commission. That's likely to continue into next week.

That would give Senate Democrats more time to build consensus on how to proceed on Iraq. One option being discussed is rescinding the 2002 vote that authorized the use of force in Iraq. Another, Reid said, is legislation that changes the mission in Iraq.

Asked what his preference is, Reid said, "I have a preference of making sure that I have my arms around the entire caucus before I put my name on an amendment."

Senate Democrats Backtrack, Opt Not To Tackle Iraq In 9/11 Commission Bill (HILL)

By Elana Schor

The Hill, February 28, 2007

Senate Democrats reversed course yesterday and vowed to keep the Iraq war out of the ongoing 9/11 Commission bill debate, but the lack of a consensus approach exposed by the new majority's move risks alienating anti-war allies and giving political momentum to Republicans.

Democrats first began eyeing the 9/11 Commission measure as a vehicle for binding checks on President Bush's war strategy during debate on the non-binding resolution billed as their first step in repudiating the White House. Yet Democrats held off on their second step amid GOP insistence on a symbolic vote on troop funding and calls for a clean bill from Sen. Joe Lieberman (D-Conn.), who helps maintain their narrow hold on the Senate.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) reiterated yesterday that his members have not settled on an approach to reining in the raging conflict in Iraq, despite Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph Biden (D-Del.) and Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin (D-Mich.) openly pursuing a plan to replace the 2002 congressional authorization of force with a narrower mission.

"A lot of senators are working on this," Reid told reporters. "Nothing has been finalized."

The only certainty yesterday was that the 9/11 Commission bill would stay Iraq-free, for now. Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) echoed Democrats' intentions, but hinted that whether the 9/11 measure would stay scrubbed of war amendments depends on both leaderships reaching a deal on Iraq votes.

"Senator Reid and I have not yet reached an agreement about how and when to have the Iraq debate, but I think both sides are going to start the 9/11 debate with amendments that are more or less related to the 9/11 bill," McConnell told reporters.

Backing away from what early reports had implied was a caucus-wide plan to narrow the authorization, however, hampers Senate Democrats as they seek to stress their unity of opposition to the war.

"No one should be concerned about Democrats not sticking together," Reid said, even as Biden touted his and Levin's plan in a Boston Globe op-ed that earned a hammering from the Republican National Committee.

DOJ_NMG_0137875

One of Reid's most independent anti-war members strongly defended him: "The majority leader did not do this because the caucus was divided," Sen. Russ Feingold (D-Wis.) said. "That is factually false."

Yet Feingold stopped short of endorsing a retooled Iraq authorization, indicating that he would support a revocation of Bush's authority in Iraq with exceptions but not a "new mission" that would allow the administration to claim a new mandate.

Meanwhile, Rep. John Murtha's (D-Pa.) plan to place readiness conditions on Iraq deployments to tie the president's hands seeped across the Capitol and into the Senate's Iraq deliberations. Republican Conference Chairman Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.) referred to the Murtha plan, dubbed "slow-bleed" by House Republicans, during his criticism of Democrats yesterday, and one influential anti-war activist suggested that Democratic leaders were abandoning Murtha at their peril.

"There has been at best a tepid response from Democrats," said former Rep. Tom Andrews (D-Maine), president of Win Without War. "It's dangerous … you can't disregard someone as thoughtful and experienced as Jack Murtha, particularly when the American people are behind him."

House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) came to his leadership rival's defense yesterday, reiterating his support for Murtha's readiness strategy while acknowledging that he has not yet seen specific language. Hoyer said Rep. Ike Skelton (D-Mo.), the House Armed Services Committee chairman, will examine Biden's and Levin's proposal to narrow the war authorization.

Of the four Senate GOP incumbents considered most vulnerable in 2008 by Democratic campaign chief Charles Schumer (N.Y.), two have already ruled out supporting a reworked war authorization: John Sununu (N.H.) and Norm Coleman (Minn.).

"They are looking for an alternative to cutting off funding. … It's not going to play," Coleman said yesterday.

Iraq Bill Vexes Democrats (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, February 28, 2007

House Democratic leaders offered a full-throated defense last night of their plans to link Iraq war spending with rigorous standards for resting, training and equipping combat troops, saying that they would hold President Bush accountable for failing to meet those readiness tests.

But after a fractious meeting of the House Democratic caucus, Speaker Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) said Democratic members still have not united around the proposal.

More than a week after Rep. John P. Murtha (Pa.) detailed plans that he said would curtail deployments to Iraq, Pelosi and other Democratic leaders said the coming debate on war funding would be about forcing the administration to live up to existing military requirements. War funds would be redirected toward equipment, such as night-vision goggles, that some troops lack. Democrats would insist on giving combat troops a year off between deployments, and they could impose restrictions on Pentagon policies that extend combat tours.

They would also condition some war funding on benchmarks for the government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, said House Democratic Caucus Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.).

But some Democrats, especially those from conservative districts, remain wary. Rep. James P. Moran Jr. (Va.), who supports the plan, said many Democrats "want to make sure this is still President Bush's war. It's his war to manage, and it's his war to end."

Members of Congress are not "the only ones conflicted," said Rep. John Tanner (Tenn.). "The country's conflicted. We don't want to do the same thing we've been doing for 3 1/2 years that hasn't worked, but we don't want to pull the plug."

In the Senate, the Iraq debate may be on hold for a week or longer while Democrats address concerns about a new effort to limit Bush's war authority.

Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.) had said that Iraq-related amendments may be considered on a homeland-security bill now before the Senate. But families of Sept. 11 victims fanned out across the Capitol yesterday, saying that a war debate could slow progress on the legislation, which would enact security recommendations by the bipartisan commission that studied the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

"We're going to do our utmost to finish the 9/11 [bill] before we move to Iraq again," Reid said.

Meanwhile, Democrats who have opposed the war from the start are protesting the language of the new Senate Iraq measure, which would repeal the 2002 resolution granting Bush the authority to invade, while limiting future military action and setting a March 31, 2008, goal for withdrawing combat troops. Its cosponsors are Foreign Relations Chairman Joseph R. Biden Jr. (Del.) and Armed Services Chairman Carl M. Levin (Mich.).

Sen. Russell Feingold (Wis.), a prominent war opponent, said he rejected a draft of the new resolution because it appeared to grant Bush too much leeway to continue the conflict. In effect, he said, Democrats would be reauthorizing a war while trying to end it. He was particularly bothered by a provision that suggested an open-ended U.S. commitment to providing border security.

DOJ_NMG_0137876

"It's crazy to create a new military mission in Iraq when we should be getting out of there," Feingold said. "I didn't vote for it in the first place. I'll be darned if I'm going to vote for it now."

Senate Democratic leaders said Feingold's concerns are not insurmountable. To the greatest extent possible, they are seeking to maintain public unity on Iraq, despite a wide range of views within the party.

Iraq Moves Unclear (RC)

By Jennifer Yachnin And John Stanton

Roll Call, February 28, 2007

Even as House Democrats said Tuesday they will continue to emphasize troop preparedness in the upcoming supplemental spending bill to fund the Iraq War, Democratic leaders appeared to be backing away from efforts that would drastically reduce troop deployments.

And in the Senate on Tuesday, leaders of both parties called a temporary truce in their increasingly bitter fight over the Iraq War, providing Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) an opportunity to refocus the Democratic Caucus' messaging efforts as well as to build some sort of consensus on how to proceed.

House Appropriations Chairman David Obey (D-Wis.), Armed Services Chairman Ike Skelton (D-Mo.) and Rep. John Murtha (D-Pa.) late Tuesday afternoon tried to address their Democratic colleagues' concerns about how they intend to handle the expected $100 billion Iraq War spending bill, including putting the onus on President Bush to ensure troops are prepared and equipped before being deployed.

"We have to raise the standard of accountability," Democratic Caucus Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) said following a meeting of House Democrats, adding that the criteria would be applied to both Bush and the Iraqi government under the Democratic proposal.

Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) said additional funds could be dedicated to training and equipment for those troops, including National Guard personnel, who are assigned to the war.

"We're talking about focusing more of the funding on readiness," Pelosi said. The Speaker did not indicate whether those funds would be shifted from other areas in the spending bill or if overall spending would be increased.

While the proposal echoes a plan unveiled by Murtha last week via an anti-war Web site — that plan would use Congressional control over federal funds to require readiness guidelines are closely followed, and make it more difficult for Bush to execute his current war strategy, including an increase in troop levels — Democratic leaders insisted the strategy does not include more stringent rules.

"All we're saying is follow the policy that's in place," Pelosi said.

But Democrats did not indicate how they plan to enforce those guidelines — stating only that they will not cut off funding for troops in Iraq — asserting that the majority will continue to discuss those possibilities. The spending bill is expected in full committee next week and on the House floor the week of March 12.

"You'll see that as the language becomes apparent," Emanuel said. However, an aide to the Speaker suggested that the bill could include provisions requiring the president to sign off each time existing guidelines for readiness are waived, something the commander in chief is not currently required to do.

"We would like to see the war ended, but it's the president's war," Pelosi spokesman Brendan Daly said.

Democratic leaders also stressed a desire to refocus efforts on fighting the broader war on terror in Afghanistan. "If we are truly going to defeat terrorism, we have to refocus on Afghanistan," Pelosi said.

Aides said the House Democratic Caucus may hold a second meeting this week to further discuss the proposed spending bill.

Following the Tuesday meeting several Democratic lawmakers said they approved of the presentation by Murtha, but were careful to stress that they had yet to see a written copy of any proposal.

"I'm impressed with what I heard," Rep. Ellen Tauscher (Calif.), chairwoman of the centrist New Democrat Coalition. While declining to discuss details, Tauscher said the plan would establish "significant metrics" for the president to meet.

"I'm definitely open to Mr. Murtha's proposal," echoed Rep. Mike Michaud (D-Maine). Michaud acknowledged several of his colleagues in the fiscally conservative Blue Dog Coalition have opposed the plan, adding that he believes it is unlikely the group will take an official position. "We'll wait to see the details. This is the first chance we've really had to talk about it as a Caucus."

Despite polls showing continued public support for Congress forcing Bush's hand on his prosecution of the Iraq War, Democrats entered the week divided over how strongly to oppose the White House and without a clear plan for pursuing that opposition.

Senior Senate Democratic aides said they hope the truce with Senate Republicans will give Reid and other leaders time to bring their Caucus together and to develop a consensus proposal on how to move forward.

DOJ_NMG_0137877

Under pressure from the families of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attack victims as well as members of their own parties, Reid and Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) agreed Tuesday to move a pending Sept. 11 security bill free of Iraq amendments.

"Both sides are starting the 9/11 bill with the feeling that it will not be a repository for Iraq amendments," McConnell said Tuesday following the Republican Conference's weekly luncheon. Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff urged Republicans at the luncheon to focus their efforts on passing a clean bill.

The decision likely pushes off a resumption of hostilities over Iraq until the end of next week at the earliest, but Reid told reporters Tuesday that he expects to make another attempt at passing some sort of legislation relating to Iraq. "I hope in the near future to be able to offer [legislation] on behalf of the Democratic Caucus" addressing Iraq, Reid said.

Senate Democratic leadership aides said Tuesday that it remains unclear when, or how, Democrats will take up Iraq again. According to these sources, during their weekly luncheon Democrats discussed a plan championed by Armed Services Chairman Carl Levin (D-Mich.) and presidential hopeful Sen. Joseph Biden (D-Del.) to move a new, narrower war authorization. But members emerged from the meeting with no final decision on whether the Caucus would back such a plan, and several lawmakers — most notably conservative Democratic Sen. Ben Nelson (Neb.) — said they would remain noncommittal until they have a chance to review the specifics of the proposal.

Despite the continuing uncertainty over the reauthorization strategy within their own party, Democratic leaders appear intent on moving forward with at least some sort of restrictions on how the White House conducts the war and already have begun ramping up their political machine to pressure wavering Republicans.

Specifically, as Democrats were heading into their luncheon, the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee sent an e-mail penned by Levin to its supporters on his proposal to rework the 2002 war authorization. Although the e-mail did not include a fundraising pitch, it did ask recipients to sign a petition the DSCC is circulating calling on lawmakers to take up the proposal.

While Reid was able to peel off several Republicans during the fight over a nonbinding resolution, it is unclear whether he will be able to convince any of his GOP colleagues to back a binding bill that limits Bush's authority. Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.) — who has twice broken with his party over Iraq this year — said Tuesday he would oppose any effort to rewrite the war authorization. "It certainly doesn't have my support. I'm not interested in looking back," Coleman said, adding that "I doubt it's going to get very much support from many of my [GOP] colleagues."

Sen. Gordon Smith (R-Ore.), who, like Coleman, is expecting a strong challenge to his re-election in 2008, declined to discuss the issue, telling reporters Tuesday morning that he would withhold judgment until he saw an actual proposal from Levin.

Democrats Back Away From War Fund Plan (AP)

By Anne Flaherty

AP, February 28, 2007

House Democratic leaders are backing away from a plan to scale back U.S. involvement in the Iraq war by using Congress' most powerful tool — withholding money in the budget.

Instead, party officials said Tuesday, leaders are weighing a proposal that would attempt to embarrass Bush into abandoning his war strategy. Under a plan discussed behind closed doors, Democrats probably would fund President Bush's entire $93.4 billion request for war spending this year but require that any troops sent into battle that don't meet certain standards receive a presidential waiver and that Congress be notified of the shortcoming.

The compromise is an attempt to please members who want to end the war immediately by cutting funding and others who do not want to appear as though Democrats are turning their back on troops.

"I think it's a responsible approach," said Rep. Chet Edwards, D-Texas.

Democratic leaders also were considering adding money to help wounded troops, improve health care for veterans and speed funding assistance for hurricane-damaged communities.

The draft proposal, pitched to party members in a private caucus meeting, is considered by Democrats to be the next step in challenging the president's Iraq war policy. Emboldened by the Nov. 7 elections, House Democrats this month pushed through a nonbinding resolution denouncing Bush's decision to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq in addition to the some 130,000 already there.

But the next step has been a difficult one for a party divided on how far to go to end the war. Many Democrats favor the initial proposal by Rep. John Murtha to withhold money for war missions unless troops meet certain standards.

For example, Murtha, D-Pa., wants the military to adhere to its own goal of not extending a unit's combat tour beyond a year and allowing troops one full year before going back. Murtha, a Vietnam War veteran, also wanted the military to enforce its own traditional training and readiness requirements, such as training with the same equipment they would use in combat.

DOJ_NMG_0137878

With the war reaching its fourth anniversary this spring, military officials have said these goals have become unrealistic and the force stretched thin by repeated deployments.

The latest proposal is intended to put the pressure on Bush; if troops are sent into battle without meeting the military's prewar standards for battle, he would have to sign a waiver and notify Congress.

Democrats disagree on whether the latest proposal goes far enough. Murtha briefed party members, along with Reps. Ike Skelton, D-Mo., and David Obey, D-Wis.

If "we vote for the supplemental, I believe we own the war," said Rep. Lynn Woolsey, D-Calif., one of a group of liberal Democrats pushing for an immediate end to the war.

Bush "hasn't to date done anything we've asked him to do, so why we would think he would do anything in the future is beyond me," Woolsey said of the reporting requirements.

Rep. Elijah Cummings, D-Md., called the new plan "a weakened version of what it was" that could still allow troops to be sent into combat without the training and equipment they need.

Cummings suggested that Democrats had botched the issue by trumpeting Murtha's original plan to place strict deployment conditions on funding.

"I think that really kind of played into the Republicans' hands," Cummings said.

Whether the Senate would support the latest plan is unclear. Several key Democrats, including Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., are cool to the idea of restricting funds for the war but have said they want binding legislation to force a drawdown of troops.

A group of senior Senate Democrats are pushing to repeal the 2002 measure authorizing the war and pass a new resolution restricting the mission and ordering troop withdrawals to begin by this summer.

Reid, D-Nev., announced Tuesday he wants to put off votes on Iraq until the Senate passes a measure enacting the recommendations of the bipartisan 9/11 commission.

"Iraq is going to be there — it's just a question of when we get back to it," Reid said, predicting it would be "days, not weeks" before the Senate returned to the issue.

Divided Congress Prepares To Debate Financing And Strategy For Iraq War (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny And Robin Toner

The New York Times, February 28, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 27 — The Democratic-controlled Congress on Tuesday entered a critical five-week struggle over the financing of the war in Iraq and the overall mission there, divided over strategy, stymied by ideological divisions, but still hoping to escalate pressure on the White House to change the course of the war.

In the Senate, a proposal to repeal the 2002 Congressional war authorization faced skepticism on two fronts. Some liberal Democrats expressed unease at the prospect of approving a new military mission, even a narrower one, while moderate Republicans said they preferred to look ahead rather than revisit the past.

In the House, Democrats debated what conditions should be attached to the nearly $100 billion spending bill for military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan, scheduled for a floor vote in March. Democratic leaders convened a spirited meeting of their caucus to begin sorting out the lawmakers' varying views, hoping to defend against Republican charges that they were planning a cutoff in troop financing.

As members of Congress returned to Capitol Hill after a weeklong break at home, Democrats searched for a way to translate a tide of public sentiment against the war into legislation that makes practical — and political — sense.

"Personally, I don't believe there are any good alternatives in Iraq," said Representative Steny H. Hoyer of Maryland, the Democratic majority leader. Speaker Nancy Pelosi of California, Mr. Hoyer and other leaders met with their fellow Democrats for about an hour in a closed session on Tuesday evening. They emerged to say that the military spending bill would place a new emphasis on the war on terrorism and provide additional financing for the American effort in Afghanistan.

They also sought to rebut the Republican charge that the troops would suffer from their efforts to change the administration's troop buildup in Iraq.

"Let me be clear," Ms. Pelosi told reporters. "We will fund the troops."

While Democrats have yet to settle on a final spending plan, Ms. Pelosi spoke favorably of a proposal put forward by Representative John P. Murtha, Democrat of Pennsylvania, that would establish strict standards for the training, readiness and equipment of troops about to be deployed to Iraq. Mr. Murtha has said his legislation would protect American forces, yet make Mr. Bush's troop buildup impossible to sustain.

The new Democratic proposal would allow those standards to be waived, although they would require the president to do it. "He will have to have his name on that," said Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, the Democratic conference chairman.

DOJ_NMG_0137879

The Murtha proposal had come under heavy fire from Republicans, who asserted that it would amount to a crippling financial drain if the Pentagon would fail to meet the standards. Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, the Republican leader, scoffed at the new Democratic approach Tuesday night, saying, “Sounds like retreat to me.”

Democratic leaders said their plan would set new benchmarks for the Iraqi government and force the president to be accountable for the condition of the troops. Still, some Democrats pledged not to be silenced in their efforts to reduce military spending.

In the Senate, Democratic leaders temporarily set aside Iraq deliberations to consider a debate on implementing recommendations from the 9/11 Commission. Families of the victims persuaded Senate leaders not to bog down the debate with Iraq amendments.

New Lawmakers Seek War Debate (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, February 28, 2007

Congressional Democrats -- especially new members -- are clamoring for action on the Iraq war, citing polls showing that American voters want to change course, but leaders have delayed significant action.

Senate Democratic leaders announced yesterday that they will postpone for at least another week a debate on war policy, despite efforts by several senators pushing to hold a vote to repeal the 2002 war authorization.

"I would have liked to have done Iraq three weeks ago," said Sen. Jon Tester, Montana Democrat and one of the freshmen calling for a substantive Iraq debate.

During last week's recess, Mr. Tester found that people in his home state are irritated that nothing had been done yet on Iraq.

"My guess is [my constituents] are probably as frustrated as I am that we ought to quit debating about whether we are going to debate and let's debate the issue," he said. "I wanted to debate the escalation because that's what the president put on the floor to debate and that was not done. I don't know why."

Freshman Sen. Bernard Sanders said Mr. Tester -- and other Democrats who grumbled about the lack of debate as they left the Democratic Party's weekly luncheon yesterday -- are not alone in their frustration.

"The American people want us to debate it," said the Vermont independent, who caucuses with the Democrats. "We've got to bring our troops home as soon as we possibly can."

This week, the Senate instead will consider recommendations of the September 11 commission, a bill that passed the House last month. The White House said it will veto the measure if it allows airport screeners to unionize -- a move the administration says could delay the agency's ability to respond quickly to threats.

Republicans said they will try to strip that provision from the bill and, if their efforts fail, then they will support a Bush veto.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada said he is working with Republican leaders to find the proper time to debate the war. Instead of attaching the 2002 revote to the pending September 11 bill, as several prominent party members wanted, Democrats are still in talks over the best way forward.

Mr. Reid said yesterday that he was persuaded by families of the victims of the September 11 terrorist attacks, who urged quick Senate action on a bill that was not complicated by Iraq amendments.

"There are a number of different ways we can go," Mr. Reid said. "The deauthorization [is] certainly one. The other is to change the mission, legislatively, of what's going on there. And we're working our way through that."

Mr. Reid would not say what he prefers but noted that the October 2002 resolution authorizing the war did not spell out what is happening in Iraq today.

"We never authorized fighting in a civil war," he said.

Senate Republicans, who have filibustered Democratic efforts to debate Mr. Bush's Iraq strategy, said they will fight for a vote on a measure promising continued funding for the troops.

Republican Conference Chairman Sen. Jon Kyl of Arizona said yesterday that he spoke with military leaders on his recent visit to Iraq and that they think Mr. Bush's new plan "is showing some early signs of success and can work if it is given an opportunity to work."

"That's why I say it's important that we not allow any kind of congressional action that would tie the hands of General Petraeus and our other commanders in carrying out this mission," Mr. Kyl said, referring to Gen. David Petraeus.

The House, which passed a nonbinding resolution disapproving of Mr. Bush's plan to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq earlier this month, also will take no action on Iraq this week.

Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer said he is working with his fellow leaders "to determine what we believe is appropriate to offer."

DOJ_NMG_0137880

"We are currently working on suggesting alternatives," and building a consensus, the Maryland Democrat said early yesterday. "We're not there. We're working on that."

He criticized Republicans who accuse the Democrats of secret plans to cut funding for troops, saying: "That is not going to happen, period."

After huddling last night for a strategy session on the war, Democratic leaders told reporters what to expect next week when the Appropriations Committee considers Mr. Bush's supplemental spending request for Iraq. The leaders said they will include language in the supplemental bill attaching conditions to the billions in war spending. The conditions would include ensuring that U.S. troops deployed to Iraq are ready and have the needed equipment and training. The spending bill also would attach benchmarks for the Iraqi government.

Meanwhile, the Senate's floor time will be dominated by the September 11 commission bill.

The measure aims to beef up intelligence programs, improve security at the nation's airports and railways, and fund local emergency communications.

The bill would allow Transportation Security Administration screeners at airports to bargain collectively. Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff yesterday briefed Republican senators and said a unionized screening force would slow down response times to terrorist threats.

"Marines don't collectively bargain over whether they're going to wind up, you know, being deployed in Anbar province or in Baghdad," he said, according to the Associated Press. "We can't negotiate over terms and conditions of work that goes to the heart of our ability to move rapidly in order to deal with the threats that are emerging."

Democrats Snipe At Senate Leaders Over Handling Of Iraq Issue (POL)

By John Bresnahan

The Politico, February 28, 2007

Senate Democrats are accusing their leaders of mismanaging the twin efforts to block President Bush's troop surge in Iraq and force a quicker end to the war.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) on Tuesday postponed for at least a week action on a Democratic plan to rewrite the 2002 congressional resolution authorizing the war, imposing new wartime restrictions on the administration.

Reid is facing criticism from both flanks of his party.

Sen. Ben Nelson, a conservative Democrat from Nebraska, said the new Democratic strategy could unfairly hamstring the president and military commanders. "I think it is very difficult to start changing things after the fact and still avoid micromanaging the war."

And Sen. Russ Feingold, a liberal Democrat from Wisconsin, criticized the latest Democratic strategy as too timid and toothless in stopping the war. Approving a new authorization resolution would be the same "as voting for a new Iraq war and that I am not going to do."

Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph R. Biden Jr., a Delaware Democrat seeking the presidency, and Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin (D-Mich.) wrote the new plan. Senate insiders faulted Biden and, to a lesser extent, Levin, for telegraphing their plans to Republicans prematurely -- before most members were fully briefed on it.

"It was clearly a mistake," said a top Senate Democratic aide. "Presidential candidate Joe Biden wanted headlines and got them."

In the House, Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) is confronting a similar problem -- a caucus deeply divided over a plan, masterminded by anti-war Rep. Jack Murtha (D-Pa.), to limit Bush's options by placing new restrictions on troop deployments.

Compounding problems for Democrats, Pelosi and Reid have yet to agree on an overall strategy for ending the war without undermining the troops.

Senate Republicans blasted the Biden-Levin proposal as unworkable and dangerous for U.S. forces in Iraq. If Reid tried to bring the proposal up for debate, the GOP leaders vowed to offer their own resolution stating that Congress would never cut funds for troops engaged in combat.

Reid, who has been lobbied by families of 9/11 victims to avoid that particular legislative fight during consideration of a bill to implement the recommendations of the 9/11 Commission, backed down and, instead, promised Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) that the Biden-Levin resolution will not be brought up for at least a week, possibly longer.

Reid and McConnell are now trying to work out the ground rules for an open debate on Iraq, one not tied to any other legislative matter, according to Democratic and GOP aides, although it's not clear if the two sides can work out such an agreement.

"We expect a freewheeling Senate-style debate on the 9/11 bill," McConnell said.

DOJ_NMG_0137881

Republican senators and aides said that Democrats had overreached by focusing on enacting a new authorization resolution. "This is one of the most dangerous things that Democrats could do," said Sen. Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah).

While Hatch, a former chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, acknowledged that there was no constitutional prohibition to such a move, he said it "would infringe on inherently presidential powers" and jeopardize the safety of troops in the field by altering their mission while still engaged in combat.

Feingold, on the other hand, wants to cut off funding for the war, not an "intermediate step" such as adopting a new authorization resolution. Feingold promised to seek a vote on a funding cutoff soon, possibly when the Senate begins work on a $93 billion wartime supplemental in a few weeks.

"The next step is to start using our real power, which is the power of the purse," he said.

Feingold's comments show how difficult it will be for Reid to execute his preferred strategy of forcing Republicans to take votes on interim measures to limit, or scale back, the war before moving toward an up-or-down vote on cutting off funds.

Faced with these competing pressures, Reid admitted he was unsure of what his next step would be, but he was clearly not ready to throw his full weight behind the Biden-Levin plan.

"There has not been a determination by the Democratic Caucus as to how we finalize our legislative approach to this," Reid told reporters Tuesday. "There are a number of different ways we could go. You suggested the deauthorization (of the Iraq war) -- that is certainly one. The other is to change the mission legislatively, what's going on there. And we're working our way through that."

Asked his preference, Reid said, "I have a preference of making sure that I have my arms around the entire caucus before I put my name on an amendment."

Across the Capitol, Pelosi faced similar problems as she weighed whether to allow Murtha a vote on his proposal to restrict the flow of fresh troops to Iraq by imposing restrictions on their training and equipment. Republicans have dubbed it the "slow-bleed" policy, a phrase that has infuriated Democrats. But its constant repetition by GOP spinmeisters and their political allies has definitely weakened support for the plan.

Murtha, who oversees the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee, has planned to insert his proposed restrictions into the upcoming wartime spending bill. But The Wall Street Journal reported on Tuesday that Rep. Dave Obey (D-Wis.), chairman of the full committee, may now add waivers to the bill, which would allow the Pentagon to essentially ignore the Murtha language.

Murtha has been heavily criticized for unveiling his proposal weeks before he was readily to formally introduce it. And even though Pelosi issued a statement reiterating her call to make sure U.S. troops are properly equipped and trained before being sent to Iraq, the Murtha plan may have suffered too much damage to be politically viable anymore.

Top Democrats tried to play down the problems they face over the Murtha proposal, noting that House Democrats were divided leading up to the recent floor debate over Iraq but ended up backing Pelosi's lead.

"We didn't have that coalescence on the nonbinding resolution," said Rep. Michael E. Capuano (D-Mass.), a top Pelosi lieutenant. "We were all over the ballpark. It came together in two days. We tried to find language that was first of all clear, second of all brings people together. Jack's job is getting something out there. A few people being vocal about it is not a real problem."

Republican strategists, though, for the first time since their big loss in November, looked at the problems facing Reid and Pelosi and gloated, although only for a minute.

"We're at the best we've been since the election," said one senior Senate GOP aide. "It may not last, but this is definitely the best we've been in a while."

An Editor's Confession: I'm The Source Of 'Slow Bleed' (POL)

By John Harris

The Politico, February 28, 2007

With a mixture of pride and remorse, I have a confession: I am the author of the Democratic Party's "slow-bleed strategy" for ending the war in Iraq.

I had nothing to do with the details of the plan that Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.) floated two weeks ago. His plan was crafted to use the appropriations process to limit President Bush's options for mobilizing more forces in Iraq, while trying to protect Democrats from the accusation that they were abandoning troops in the field. As it happens, Murtha's idea is itself bleeding support, hit by a barrage of denunciations from people who say it does indeed amount to abandoning the troops.

In retrospect, it probably has already occurred to Murtha and his supporters that from a public relations perspective, "slow-bleed" was not the most winning description. How could they have been so stupid?

That's where I come in. "Slow bleed" is my phrase. Murtha had nothing to do with it. Neither did John Bresnahan, the reporter whose name was on the Politico story in which the "slow-bleed strategy" made its debut.

DOJ_NMG_0137882

You can understand my pride of authorship. Editors labor in obscurity. Our job is to keep reporters from looking bad, and to let them take the credit when they look good. Rarely is there tangible evidence that we are having any impact. But in 20-plus years in the business, I can scarcely recall an instance when words typed on my keyboard have had such a loud and immediate echo.

For Continuing Coverage of Iraq Visit

If you Google "slow bleed" and "Murtha," you get nearly 200,000 hits. Nexis recorded more than a hundred stories in the days after Bresnahan's article that used the phrase "slow bleed."

"Slow bleed" was featured on CNN and on the editorial page of The Wall Street Journal. My former newspaper, The Washington Post, used the phrase the other day as if it were an established part of Washington lexicon, needing neither attribution nor explanation. "Slow bleed" also played a starring role in a parade of House floor speeches by Republicans denouncing Democrats, and in a fundraising letter from Republican National Committee Chairman Mike Duncan. "Slow-bleed is exactly the right name for this incredibly irresponsible and dangerous strategy," he wrote.

Like many others who weighed in, Duncan incorrectly stated that "slow-bleed" was the name that Democrats were using to describe their strategy.

Here is where remorse kicks in. As happens all the time in journalism, this was a decision -- made on the fly and under deadline -- that I would have taken back in the morning. It is Murtha's job to defend his own policies. But I'd prefer not to hand his opponents ammunition in the form of evocative but loaded language.

When my colleague Jim VandeHei and I started The Politico, we said we hoped to make the work of political journalists more transparent. So, in the name of transparency (and self-abasement), here is what happened.

Bresnahan, who has unparalleled sources and understanding of how Congress works, wrote an article that was the first to detail the emerging Democratic strategy of challenging Bush on Iraq. Here was the lead paragraph of the draft he submitted:

"Even as the House begins debate on a resolution opposing President Bush's plan to send 21,500 more U.S. combat troops to Iraq, leading anti-war groups are preparing a multi-million dollar TV ad campaign and grassroots lobbying blitz designed to pressure vulnerable incumbent lawmakers to end their support for the war."

VandeHei and I read the article and were impressed by the detail of Bresnahan's reporting. But, as editors always do, we had our quibbles. Like the lead paragraph: Too bulky, and too bland. The story was a good bit better than the introduction.

We rushed the patient to the operating table for emergency surgery. With VandeHei hovering over my shoulder, this is what I came up with:

"Top House Democrats, working in concert with anti-war groups, have decided against using congressional power to force a quick end to U.S. involvement in Iraq, and instead will pursue a slow-bleed strategy designed to gradually limit the administration's options."

That is not exactly prize-winning prose, but it seemed a little snappier to us -- and more on point. Please note the context: What is slowly bleeding away is the administration's political support to keep fighting the war. Republicans pounced on the phrase because of the ease with which that context could be shorn away, to give the impression that what Democrats were slow-bleeding were the bodies of troops in Iraq.

That willingness to wrest words from context -- and to attribute the phrase to Democrats even though it was not theirs -- was demagogic on the part of Republican operatives. But it was never my plan to make their work so easy.

A journalist's job is to clarify political debate, not further muddy it. In the two weeks since his original article, Bresnahan's reporting has continued to clarify the unfolding Iraq argument, even as his editors made life more difficult for him.

So there you have it -- how the sausage gets made in a newsroom. Not always the most appetizing sight.

Service Members Sign Appeal Calling For Troop Withdrawal (NYT)

By Lizette Alvarez

The New York Times, February 28, 2007

In a small but growing sign of dissent, a group of active-duty military personnel and reservists, including many who have served in Iraq, is denouncing the war and asking Congress for the prompt withdrawal of troops.

The service members, who number more than 1,600, have sent an Appeal for Redress to their Congressional representatives, a form of protest permitted by military rules. Most of those who signed the appeal, at www.appealforredress.org, are enlisted soldiers in the Army, from the lowest to the highest ranks.

“There is a sense of betrayal,” said Specialist Linsay Burnett, 26, who recently returned from Iraq with the First Brigade combat team of the 101st Airborne Division, based at Fort Campbell, on the border of Kentucky and Tennessee. The division is readying for its third deployment.

DOJ_NMG_0137883

"These soldiers stand up to fight, to protect their country, but we are now on the fifth reason as to why it is we are in Iraq," added Specialist Burnett, who has served as a public affairs specialist and as a military journalist focusing primarily on the infantry. "How many reasons are we going to come up with for keeping us over there?"

The Appeal for Redress reads: "As a patriotic American proud to serve the nation in uniform, I respectfully urge my political leaders in Congress to support the prompt withdrawal of all American military forces and bases from Iraq. Staying in Iraq will not work and is not worth the price. It is time for U.S. troops to come home."

The protest, which was started in October by two active-duty service members and is sponsored by three antiwar groups, initially drew 65 signatures, growing to more than 1,300 by February. This week, after the CBS News program "60 Minutes" reported on the appeal, about 300 more active-duty soldiers joined the campaign, said Petty Officer Third Class Jonathan Hutto of the Navy, a co-founder of the group behind the appeal.

While the 1,600 make up a tiny part of the armed services, the appeal is one of the first official signs of protest from people within the military. An estimated 70 percent of those who have signed it are on active duty; the rest are members of the Reserves or the National Guard, and about 100 officers have signed it.

Describing themselves as supporters of the military but critics of the Iraq war, leaders of the appeal say they believe it is their right and duty under the Constitution to question the war and its mission, a position not widely voiced in the military.

Their decision to speak out and take their opposition outside the chain of command has been criticized by some veterans' groups that argue that soldiers are obligated to follow orders, not change policy. Critics also say that while service members cannot choose where they will be deployed, they can choose to join the military or not.

When the group sent its first letter in October, the White House spokesman, Tony Snow, said it was "not unusual for soldiers in a time of war to have some misgivings," adding that the group constituted a small minority of service members.

In a phone call yesterday with three signatories, including Petty Officer Hutto, the service members said their decision to appeal had not been taken lightly. The military does not allow service members to organize and frowns on dissent.

"The Army has many ways to make your life very difficult," Specialist Burnett said, adding that she had come forward largely because "there are not many voices out there for the men on the ground."

Jeff Slocum, a chief master sergeant of the Air Force who is scheduled to deploy to Iraq next year, said his high rank was one reason he had signed the appeal. "I'm not antiwar, I'm not antimilitary," said Chief Master Sergeant Slocum, who added that the troops were feeling "used and abused."

That 1,600 service members have signed the appeal "shows just how much we are willing to risk," he said. "We are trying to raise awareness that we need people to be sticking up for us, because nobody else is."

Spy Chief Uses 'Civil War' To Describe Iraq (USAT)

By Jim Michaels

USA Today, February 28, 2007

WASHINGTON — The nation's spy chief said Tuesday that the violence in Iraq resembles a civil war and the Iraqi government has the "close to impossible" job of trying to end the violence.

The "term 'civil war' accurately describes key elements of the Iraqi conflict," Mike McConnell, the new director of national intelligence, said in a statement to the Senate Armed Services Committee.

Ethnic-sectarian violence has polarized politics and hardened the position of combatants, McConnell said, particularly since an attack by Sunni militants on a Shiite mosque in Samarra a year ago.

The Bush administration has avoided using the term civil war to describe the violence in Iraq. McConnell is the highest-ranking administration official to use the term to describe events in Iraq.

McConnell, a retired vice admiral who was confirmed as the top spy earlier this month, and Lt. Gen. Michael Maples, director of the Defense Intelligence Agency, described a worsening situation in Iraq in testimony at a hearing on global security threats.

If the trends in Iraq aren't reversed "we assess that the security situation will continue to deteriorate at a rate comparable to the latter half of 2006," McConnell said.

Maples said insurgent attacks reached an average of 180 per day last month, equal to the previous high in October 2006.

"I think the Iraqi political leaders have close to impossible tasks: one, the sectarian violence on the one hand; and, two, pressure to have progress," McConnell said.

Later, in response to a question, he revised the statement to say the Iraqi leaders face a "very difficult task."

McConnell cited achievements in Iraq, including efforts by Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki to bridge sectarian divisions and an increase in the number and quality of Iraqi security forces.

DOJ_NMG_0137884

He said a rapid withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq would lead to an increase in sectarian violence and intensify Sunni resistance to the Shiite-dominated government.

Bush Administration To Join Iraqi-led Talks Attended By Iran, Syria (MCT)

By Warren P. Strobel, Jonathan S. Landay And Renee Schoof

McClatchy Newspapers, February 28, 2007

WASHINGTON - In a softening of its refusal to pursue direct diplomacy with two Middle East adversaries, the Bush administration announced Tuesday that it will participate in a series of international meetings on Iraq that will include representatives of Iran and Syria.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice announced the talks with Iraq and its neighbors as a "a new diplomatic offensive." She said she hoped that Iran and Syria would "seize the opportunity to improve their relations with Iraq - and to work for peace and stability in the region."

But her announcement at a hearing of the Senate Appropriations Committee - amid signs that the Iraqi army has failed to send the troops it promised to Baghdad - appeared to fall short of calls from Congress and the bipartisan Iraq Study Group to open direct negotiations with Tehran and Damascus.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., called the talks a "first step," but said, "It is not enough on its own."

The White House has accused Tehran of developing nuclear weapons, Damascus of trying to undermine Lebanon's government, and both governments of aiding anti-American forces in Iraq. Until now, it had refused high-level talks with either country.

The first meeting is due to take place during the first half of March in Baghdad, hosted by the Iraqi government, and a second, in which Rice herself might participate, is tentatively set for April.

Meanwhile, top U.S. intelligence officials disclosed that the deployment of Iraqi forces into Baghdad under President Bush's new plan to stabilize Iraq is running behind schedule and that all of the units sent so far have arrived under strength, some by more than half.

Top military officials, speaking at the same hearing with Rice, gave a mixed review on the early implementation of the plan, which is aimed at ending carnage in the capital between Shiites and Sunni Muslims.

Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said the Iraqi military was "good for the most part," but uneven. "The Iraqi military is coming on very well," he said, adding that the soldiers should be able to replace U.S. troops by late 2007. "We should have significant turnover this year," he said.

Defense Secretary Robert Gates testified that the Pentagon would send Congress a confidential report on the Iraqi military later this week. "I am watching to see how the Iraqis perform," he said. "So far, so good."

The plan, which Bush announced last month, calls for the deployment of an extra 17,500 American troops to Baghdad, along with thousands of additional Iraqi security forces. The Iraqis are to play the leading role in suppressing the violence and ending forced evictions, most of which are against minority Sunnis by militias linked to Shiite parties in the U.S.-backed coalition government.

But retired Vice Adm. John McConnell, the director of national intelligence, and Army Lt. Gen. Michael Maples, the head of the Defense Intelligence Agency, told the Senate Armed Services Committee in a separate hearing that the Iraqi army sent to Baghdad only two of the three additional brigades that were to have been in place by Feb. 15.

An Iraqi brigade is supposed to have 3,200 men.

"One of the problems was having fully manned units when they arrived in Baghdad," McConnell said. "A work in progress is how best to describe it. It's not there yet."

It was McConnell's first time testifying before a congressional committee since he became the nation's top intelligence officer on Feb. 13.

Maples, the military's top intelligence official, said that the strength of the Iraqi battalions that comprise the two brigades range from 43 percent to 82 percent.

The numbers were the most concise manpower figures that the U.S. military has given for the additional Iraqi units sent to Baghdad.

McConnell said one reason for the Iraqi shortfalls is that typically 25 percent of an Iraqi army unit is away on leave or on some other assignment. But U.S. and Iraqi officials also have cited high desertion rates as a serious problem.

On the positive side, McConnell said that Iraqi forces have begun taking leading roles in some parts of Baghdad, although he didn't specify which areas.

Several lawmakers expressed deep concern over the prospects for success for Bush's plan, including Sen. John Warner, R-Va.

DOJ_NMG_0137885

"I do not see evidence, strong evidence, that the Iraqi forces are measuring up in any amount to what the president laid down," he said.

The new diplomatic steps evoked skepticism from both sides of the aisle as well. Reid said in a statement that the decision to begin talks with Iran and Syria "should have been made long ago."

"Today's announcement is a first step, but it is not enough on its own. Our national security requires a robust diplomatic effort in the Middle East, and the Bush administration cannot again settle for mere half measures," he said.

Sen. Lamar Alexander, R-Tenn., said Bush shouldn't have taken so long to organize a diplomatic push.

"I think he missed an opportunity ... to increase popular support for a long-term U.S. interest in Iraq."

Car Bomb Near Soccer Field Kills 16 Children, 2 Women In Ramadi (WP)

By Ernesto Londoño

The Washington Post, February 28, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 27 -- Sixteen children playing soccer and two women were killed Monday in a car bombing in the western Iraqi city of Ramadi, an Iraqi official said Tuesday, in an attack that Iraqi leaders decried as horrific.

The bomb, hidden under wood panels loaded on a Kia pickup truck, exploded in a residential area near a soccer field where the children were playing, according to Col. Tariq al-Alwani, the security supervisor in Anbar province.

"It's a tragedy that the kids are targeted," the colonel said. "The kids we consider as a message to the world." He said news of the bombing had emerged a day late because most reporters have left Ramadi out of concern for their safety.

The offices of President Jalal Talabani, who is hospitalized in Amman, Jordan, and Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, condemned the bombing. Maliki blamed "criminal gangs" for the "crime against children in their innocent playgrounds," the Los Angeles Times reported.

Ramadi, capital of Anbar province, is a stronghold of the Sunni insurgent group Al-Qaeda in Iraq. More than a quarter of the U.S. troops killed in Iraq have died in Anbar, where President Bush is sending 4,000 additional Marines as part of a temporary increase of U.S. forces in the country.

Nearly 24 hours after the car bombing, another explosion shook the city when U.S. troops sought to destroy 15 bags of seized explosives. U.S. military officials said they misjudged the strength of the explosives, which they detonated Tuesday evening inside the courtyard of an empty building, and the resulting blast injured at least 30 civilians, among them nine children and seven women.

None of the injuries were life-threatening, said Lt. Col. Josslyn Aberle, a military spokeswoman. Eight people were taken to medical facilities and the rest were treated at the scene, she said.

In Baghdad, U.S. and Iraqi forces continued implementing a security plan to pacify the capital, the second such effort in half a year. In a pre-dawn raid in the sprawling Shiite district of Sadr City, U.S. and Iraqi soldiers detained 16 leaders of the Mahdi Army, a powerful Shiite militia controlled by anti-American cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, the U.S. military said in a statement.

The military said the detained militia leaders "direct and perpetrate sectarian murder, torture and kidnapping."

Abdul Razzaq al-Nedawi, a Sadr aide, said that the detentions were unjustified and that the operation appeared to be an attempt to provoke the Mahdi Army, which has lain low since stricter security measures went into effect in Baghdad this month.

"The occupation forces want to drag Sadr [supporters] into war," Nedawi said.

Sadr criticized the plan in a statement on Sunday. "The security plan will not be good if it is controlled and ruled by our enemies, the occupiers," the statement said. The Shiite-led government of Prime Minister Maliki, whom Sadr has supported, has been criticized for failing to crack down on Shiite militias.

Lt. Gen. Raymond T. Odierno, the second-ranking U.S. general in Iraq, provided a cautiously optimistic assessment Tuesday of the first two weeks of the security plan, citing what he described as a decline in sectarian killings.

"Although we see some initial progress, we know the enemies we face will continue to attempt to disrupt the goals of the government by conducting attacks against innocent civilians," he said.

Odierno also said all the 21,500 additional troops who are part of the Bush administration's temporary increase will be in Iraq by May.

Also Tuesday, the U.S. military reported that four service members had been killed in two incidents. Three soldiers were killed by a roadside bomb Tuesday while conducting a route clearance mission southwest of Baghdad.

The fourth soldier was killed Monday night near the city of Diwaniyah, south of Baghdad. The soldier's Humvee struck an improvised explosive device.

The U.S. military also announced that a specialist has been convicted of negligent homicide for killing a soldier in June while cleaning his weapon. Spec. Daniel E. Turner was sentenced to 15 months' confinement and a bad conduct discharge.

DOJ_NMG_0137886

Iraq Bombers Target Ice Cream Shop, Restaurants (LAT)

By Tina Susman

The Los Angeles Times, February 28, 2007

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- Two weeks after a new U.S.-Iraqi security crackdown was launched here, bombers struck popular public gathering spots ranging from an ice cream parlor to a kebab shop Tuesday, causing at least eight deaths.

Police in the capital also reported discovering the bodies of 31 men who had been shot to death, apparent victims of Shiite death squads. And the U.S. military reported the deaths of five more American troops.

Rage and frustration in Baghdad over the continuing bloodshed was accompanied by a sense of confusion over an afternoon incident in Ramadi, where officials said a bomb explosion at a soccer field killed 18 children ranging in age from about 6 to 12 years old.

The reports, which could not be independently verified, led quickly to angry statements by officials including Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who denounced the "crime against children in their innocent playgrounds" and blamed "criminal gangs."

Other reports, however, raised questions over whether anyone was killed in the Sunni-dominated city in Anbar province on Tuesday.

The U.S. military said it set off a controlled explosion in Ramadi in the afternoon that went awry, sending shrapnel and glass flying and injuring 31 people, including several children.

None of the injuries was life-threatening, said Lt. Col. Josslyn Aberle, a military spokeswoman.

"I know there are reports children were killed out there. Those are incorrect," Aberle said, adding that the military had no reports of any other blasts in Ramadi.

Whatever the case in Ramadi, attacks continue relentlessly across Iraq despite the launching Feb. 13 of the new security plan, with the deadliest striking benign civilian targets and bearing the hallmark of Sunni insurgents.

In the past week, bombers have hit a college campus, a Sunni mosque whose imam had spoken out against the insurgency, and a government building where the Shiite vice president, Adel Abdul-Mahdi, was due to speak.

The vice president escaped with minor injuries Monday, but the attacks, in addition to the slew of bombings Tuesday, have left some Iraqis despairing of the government's ability to provide adequate security.

Iraqi officials are portraying the bloodshed as a last gasp by militants trying to derail the plan, which aims to put thousands more troops on the streets of Baghdad and in neighboring Anbar province.

"It is expected that they would try to intensify their activities to abort the plan and make people say the plan is a failure," said Sami Askari, a Shiite lawmaker, who blamed the violence on Sunni radicals. "It is unrealistic to achieve a goal like controlling Baghdad over a short period of time. The terrorist groups will try with all their arsenal of weapons and explosives to make the plan fail."

Those words, however, were no comfort to Iraqis caught up in the bloodshed.

"Every place is now becoming dangerous," said Muaataz Jawad, a Shiite college student who survived a bombing at his university Sunday and who worked with the Iraqi commission that helped organize national elections in 2005.

"It was dangerous and we were the target of snipers, but I was enthusiastic at that time. I regret it now," he said Tuesday of his election work. "I am not seeing any achievements, only traffic jams and more explosions."

Haidar Muhamed, a Shiite shopkeeper who works near the scene of one of Tuesday's attacks in Baghdad, was not as pessimistic but said he did not expect to see much change anytime soon.

"I still have faith in the government, but many times they give promises that they cannot fulfill," he said. "The plan has some deficiencies, but I think it will succeed eventually."

The attacks in Baghdad began at about 1 p.m. when a bomb exploded outside the Faris chicken restaurant in Karada, a mainly Shiite neighborhood. At least two people died, four were injured, and several cars parked nearby were damaged.

In the next couple of hours, six more people died in bomb blasts targeting crowded public spots, including the Abu Ali restaurant in downtown Baghdad. Police said the bomber came into the restaurant to eat lunch and left behind a plastic sack containing the deadly explosives. Three people died there, and 13 were injured.

Three more people were killed when a suicide car bomber struck near an ice cream shop in the Karada neighborhood, and two people died when mortar shells landed in a mixed Sunni-Shiite neighborhood south of Baghdad.

In Mosul, north of Baghdad, a car bomb exploded outside a police station, killing six police officers. In Khaldiya, about 50 miles west of Baghdad in Anbar province, a mortar attack in a market killed eight people.

The 31 bodies found in Baghdad shot execution-style was the highest number in the past two weeks, according to a tally kept by the Los Angeles Times and based on police and morgue reports. The toll suggested a possible resurgence of death squad activity as Sunni Arab bombing attacks persist.

DOJ_NMG_0137887

Sunnis accuse the al-Maliki government of not doing enough to control Shiite militias and say the new security plan is focusing on Sunni neighborhoods while Shiite strongholds such as Sadr City are largely left alone. Iraqi police, backed by U.S. troops, apparently sought to counter that accusation with a predawn raid in Sadr City that brought angry protests from residents whose homes were searched.

Also Tuesday, police in Diwaniya, south of Baghdad, announced the arrests of 157 more suspected members of a Shiite cult whose followers had planned to attack the country's leading Shiite clergy last month in the belief it would hasten the dawn of a new age.

According to authorities, at least 263 members of the group, known as Heaven's Army or the Soldiers of Heaven, were killed in a fierce firefight with U.S. and Iraqi forces who got wind of the plot to attack religious leaders on Ashura, one of the holiest days on the Shiite calendar. This year, Ashura fell on Jan. 29, and the battle occurred over a period of about 24 hours in the firefight between the holy city of Najaf and Diwaniya.

Iraqi officials say the group's leader claimed to be a revered Shiite saint who would usher in a better world. He was killed in the fighting. Since then, police have continued to round up dozens of his alleged followers.

Times staff writers Saif Hameed and Raheem Salman, special correspondent Saad Fakhrildeen in Najaf, and special correspondents in Ramadi, Baghdad and Hillah contributed to this report.

Coming Soon, Maybe: An Iraqi Oil Law (NYT)

New York Times, February 28, 2007

It would be a big step forward if Iraq actually approved and carried out long-promised and never-delivered legislation equitably sharing the nation's oil revenues among all Iraqis. Unfortunately, the draft oil agreement approved by Iraq's cabinet on Monday is still a long way from that.

There are a host of political hurdles that must be overcome and no assurance that Iraq's Shiites and Kurds — who dominate the Parliament and happen to sit on most of Iraq's known reserves — are suddenly willing to share the wealth equitably with Iraq's Sunnis.

There's little surprise that the White House is trying to claim the draft oil law as progress. There is no other good news to report: no security from the security sweep in Baghdad, no visible movement to purge the Iraqi police of sectarian death squads and no effort by Washington to impose benchmarks on Iraq's leaders for achieving national unity. Washington is also not about to point to the bombing of a government office in Baghdad on Monday that wounded an Iraqi vice president and a cabinet minister, or the truck bombing outside a mosque in Falluja that killed 36 people on Saturday.

In a bow to the reality of a splintering Iraq, the administration says it is now ready to sit down with Iraq's neighbors, including Iran and Syria. That, too, is a long overdue step. We hope that American officials will use the meeting to explore ways of containing this mushrooming sectarian violence, not to engage in more accusations and posturing.

But the most important steps need to be taken by the Iraqi government itself. Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki and his cabinet need to take responsibility for unifying a nation torn apart by decades of dictatorship and insurgency, rather than further inflaming those divisions by exacting vengeance on the formerly dominant Sunni Arab minority. The security forces have to be purged of sectarian fighters bent on revenge and transformed into national forces committed to protecting all Iraqis.

And oil, Iraq's principal resource, must be equitably shared without regard to geography, religion or ethnic group. An oil law should be one of the benchmarks Washington insists on as a condition of continued support. Cabinet agreement on a preliminary draft may be the only good news out of Iraq this week. But it isn't nearly enough.

Iran, Syria May Join Baghdad Talks (AP)

By Brian Murphy

AP, February 28, 2007

Envoys from the West and Islamic nations — including Iran, Syria and the United States — are expected to attend a conference next month on efforts to stabilize Iraq, a diplomatic adviser said Tuesday.

The meeting, planned for mid-March in the Iraqi capital, is an attempt by the U.S.-backed government to seek greater regional assistance in fighting insurgents and addressing tensions between Iraq's majority Shiite Muslims and Sunnis.

Some nations had expressed reservations about taking part in the conference because of security worries and political sensitivities. Some of Iraq's Sunni neighbors are wary about being seen as lending too much support to the Shiite-led government.

But Labed Abbawi, an adviser to Iraqi Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari, said "there has been positive responses" from nearly all the nations and groups invited, which include Iraq's neighbors, the Arab League and the five permanent U.N. Security Council members.

DOJ_NMG_0137888

"We believe all will attend," he said. No date has been set.

In Washington, White House deputy press secretary Dana Perino said the U.S. "would attend" a regional conference if invited. Abbawi said that the United States was among those asked to take part.

Perino said Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice would be "a logical attendee," but said she could not announce anything on Rice's behalf.

"Everyone in the region and interested parties has an interest and a stake in making sure that Iraq can become a thriving democracy," said Perino.

The gathering could offer a forum for Washington to amplify its concerns about Iranian involvement in Iraq. U.S. officials claim Shiite militia receive a steady flow of arms and aid from Iran, including parts for lethal roadside bombs used against U.S. troops. Iran denies the charges.

The United States also has complained that Syria is not doing enough to block aid routes for Sunni insurgents, including the group al-Qaida in Iraq.

U.S. Joins Regional Talks To Secure Iraq (AP)

By Robert Burns

AP, February 28, 2007

In a diplomatic turnabout, the Bush administration will join an Iraq-sponsored "neighbors meeting" with Iran and Syria, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Tuesday.

It marked a change of approach by the United States, which has resisted calls by members of Congress and by a bipartisan Iraq review group to include Iran and Syria in talks designed to stabilize Iraq.

The move came amid growing discontent over the war, even as President Bush rushes an additional 21,500 U.S. troops to Iraq and congressional Democrats struggle to settle on their next steps to end U.S. participation.

The administration said its decision to take part in the Iraq conference did not represent a change of heart, although the White House has accused both Iran and Syria of deadly meddling in the war. "We've always been inclined to participate in an Iraqi-led conference," White House counselor Dan Bartlett said.

The administration in recent weeks has increased its criticism of Iran's role in Iraq, charging it with supplying advanced technologies for the most lethal form of roadside bombs. The administration has accused Syria of harboring anti-Iraqi government forces and allowing weapons to cross its border.

Rice announced U.S. support for the Iraq meeting, to be held in Baghdad next month, at a Senate hearing in which Democrats pressed her and Defense Secretary Robert Gates to explain what progress is being made in the Baghdad security crackdown and how soon U.S. troops will be coming home.

"There is no end, I say, no end in sight," exclaimed Sen. Robert Byrd, D-W.Va., the Appropriations Committee chairman. He decried the spending of $10 billion a month in Iraq and Afghanistan amid raging sectarian and insurgent violence.

Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., asked Gates to predict how soon Iraq would be stabilized.

"The honest answer to your question is: 'I don't know,'" Gates replied. He noted that Gen. David Petraeus had arrived in Baghdad as the new commander of U.S. forces and that Petraeus believes by early summer he will have a good idea of how the new Baghdad security plan, now getting under way, will work out.

Noting recent speculation about U.S. military action to destroy neighboring Iran's nuclear facilities, Byrd asked Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, whether it was true that the Pentagon was planning airstrikes against Iran.

"It is not true," Pace replied.

"Categorically?" Byrd pressed.

"Categorically, sir," Pace said.

Separately, Democrats' plans to limit Bush's war authority and force a change of course in Iraq were faltering amid party divisions over how quickly and aggressively they should act.

Officials said Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., and other anti-war Democrats balked Tuesday at a draft measure that had circulated in recent days with the blessing of the leadership. The proposal would have repealed the 2002 law that authorized Bush to invade Iraq, and given the White House a goal of March 2008 to remove all combat troops from the country except for those carrying out limited missions.

"I will not vote for anything that the president could read as an authorization for continuing with a large military campaign in Iraq," Feingold said in a statement after a closed-door meeting. "Deauthorizing the president's failed Iraq policy may be an appropriate next step if done right, but the ultimate goal needs to be using our constitutionally granted power of the purse to bring this catastrophe to an end."

DOJ_NMG_0137889

Other Democrats said there was general agreement among the rank and file on legislation that would limit the mission of troops remaining in Iraq, but there was no consensus on a means for accomplishing that goal.

Meanwhile, House Democratic leaders are backing away from a proposal to scale back U.S. involvement in Iraq by withholding money for the war effort.

Rice, in announcing the "neighbors meeting" on Iraq, said a wide range of interested countries were being invited. She said it was the Iraqi government's initiative to ask Iran and Syria.

"We hope that all governments will seize this opportunity to improve their relations with Iraq and to work for peace and stability in the region," Rice said.

Her announcement was welcomed by Democrats and Republicans alike.

"Today's announcement is a first step, but it is not enough on its own," said Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid. "Our national security requires a robust diplomatic effort in the Middle East, and the Bush administration cannot again settle for mere half measures."

The bipartisan Iraq Study Group in December recommended U.S. dialogue with Iran and Syria, but until now the administration has resisted that course. Former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, Republican co-chairman of the panel, welcomed the shift in a speech Tuesday night. But he went further, urging the administration to include Syria in Mideast peacemaking with Israel and the Palestinians.

At the State Department, spokesman Sean McCormack said the agenda of the meeting would be set by the Iraqis.

"Security is clearly an important issue for the Iraqis. It's going to be at the top of the agenda," he said. "There are clearly issues that we have with respect to security in Iraq." He said roadside bombs, which are the leading killer of American troops and are in some cases linked to Iran, are "certainly at the top of our list."

McCormack said the Iraq meeting would not include any formal U.S.-Iran negotiations on Iran's nuclear program, but he did not rule out informal discussions. The Bush administration says Iran's nuclear program is aimed at developing nuclear weapons, but Tehran says it is for new sources of energy.

A U.N. Security Council deadline for Tehran to suspend uranium enrichment has just expired, and in response the U.S. wants the council to expand the limited sanctions the world body has imposed on Iran.

The Iraqi government announced in Baghdad that it was preparing the meeting for mid-March, and that invitees include members of the Arab League and the five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council — the U.S., Britain, France, China and Russia.

A second meeting involving the countries' foreign ministers — which administration officials said Rice would attend — would also be held, perhaps as soon as early April.

U.S. To Sit Down With Syria, Iran For Regional Conference On Iraq (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, February 28, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Bush administration said Tuesday that it will join Iran and Syria at a meeting of Iraq's "neighbors" next month — and it did not rule out one-on-one talks with either country.

The meeting, organized by the Iraqi government and aimed at finding ways to stabilize Iraq, would put the United States at the table with countries President Bush has sought to isolate.

"The Iraqi government has invited Syria and Iran to attend. … We hope these governments seize this opportunity to improve their relations with Iraq — and to work for peace and stability in the region," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told the Senate Appropriations Committee.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said the move was consistent with the administration's position that it would talk with Iran and Syria if discussions were confined to Iraq. Critics of the administration's policies called it a change of course.

The move comes as the administration is pushing for tougher United Nations sanctions on Iran for refusing to halt its nuclear program.

The administration has resisted calls for broader dialogue with Iran and Syria, which it says are prime sponsors of terrorism and are feeding instability in Iraq.

In December, a bipartisan panel reviewing U.S. options in Iraq urged the administration to open discussions with the two countries as part of an Iraq "support group " and also one-to-one.

James Baker, the former secretary of State who headed the commission, said that the administration's announcement was "a move in the right direction."

DOJ_NMG_0137890

In a Dec. 11 interview with Agence France-Presse, Rice suggested the United States was willing to talk about Iraq. "In the context of Iraq's neighbors and the international community, if Syria and Iran come to the table responsibly, ready to support Iraqi efforts with their neighbors, we have no problem with that," she said.

McCormack said administration officials wanted Iraq to take the lead organizing a regional conference but saw inviting Iran and Syria as "an interesting and good idea."

Zalmay Khalilzad, the departing U.S. ambassador to Iraq, will represent the United States.

McCormack said he could not "exclude the possibility" of conversations between U.S. and Iranian officials on the sidelines.

Critics of Bush's handling of Iraq said the move represents a new direction. Democratic Sen. Joseph Biden, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said in a statement, "The administration is right to reverse itself."

Ray Takeyh, an Iran expert at the Council on Foreign Relations, said, "I think the Americans are looking to cave" and begin talks without insisting that Iran give up its uranium enrichment program.

The United States and Iran have had no diplomatic relations since 1980 but held secret discussions about Afghanistan, al-Qaeda and Iraq from 2001 to 2003.

The Iraq conference "is one way some kind of engagement can take place without either side losing face," said Trita Parsi, president of the National Iranian American Council, a group advocating U.S. dialogue with Iran.

Earlier this month, the administration softened its stance toward North Korea, agreeing to provide oil and other aid if that country freezes its nuclear program.

U.S. Will Join Talks With Iran And Syria (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, February 28, 2007

The United States agreed yesterday to join high-level talks with Iran and Syria on the future of Iraq, an abrupt shift in policy that opens the door to diplomatic dealings the White House had shunned in recent months despite mounting criticism.

The move was announced by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice in testimony on Capitol Hill, after Iraq said it had invited neighboring states, the United States and other nations to a pair of regional conferences.

"I would note that the Iraqi government has invited all of its neighbors, including Syria and Iran, to attend both of these regional meetings," Rice told the Senate Appropriations Committee. "We hope that all governments will seize this opportunity to improve the relations with Iraq and to work for peace and stability in the region."

The first meeting, at the ambassadorial level, will be held next month. Then Rice herself will sit down at the table with the foreign ministers from Damascus and Tehran at a second meeting in April elsewhere in the region, possibly in Istanbul.

The Iraq Study Group, the bipartisan panel whose recommendations were largely ignored by the administration, had recommended such a regional meeting in its December report. Rice and other administration officials emphasized, however, that these conferences would be led and organized by the Iraqi government and not, as the study group suggested, the United States. Still, Democrats seized on the announcement as a long-overdue change in direction by the administration.

"Better late than never," said Leon E. Panetta, a onetime White House chief of staff who served on the panel, headed by former secretary of state James A. Baker III and former congressman Lee H. Hamilton. He said that the announcement was "an important step in trying to bring stability to Iraq" and that, combined with the recent nuclear agreement with North Korea and renewed efforts by Rice to promote Israeli-Palestinian peace, "the administration is finally recognizing that part of its arsenal is strong diplomacy."

In a statement, Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, said: "The administration is right to reverse itself and engage Iran and Syria on Iraq. Right now they're a big part of the problem, but they have an interest in becoming part of the solution to prevent chaos in Iraq."

Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has long advocated a regional conference, though originally it was meant to include only Iraq's neighbors. The administration decided in recent weeks to attend the conference, but in an effort to avoid the spotlight it ensured that it will be joined at the table in March by other permanent members of the U.N. Security Council, U.S. officials said. The foreign ministers meeting in April will be further expanded to include representatives of the Group of Eight industrialized countries.

It was decided "relatively recently" to include the permanent Security Council members, and the G-8 was invited "as of last night," a senior administration official said. Rice's announcement appeared intended to assuage congressional concerns about the administration's Iraq policy, which have threatened to derail passage of a nearly $100 billion supplemental spending request for Iraq.

Administration officials noted that former secretary of state Colin L. Powell attended a regional conference on Iraq in 2004, where at one point he found himself seated next to the Iranian foreign minister and made idle chitchat. But that meeting took place in a different context, before Iran had started uranium enrichment and before Syria was implicated in the killing of a Lebanese political figure -- two reasons frequently cited by the administration for limited diplomatic engagement with Tehran and Damascus.

DOJ_NMG_0137891

"The only reason to talk to us would be to extract a price, and that's not diplomacy, that's extortion," Rice told Der Spiegel, a German magazine, when asked last month about the international conference promoted by the Iraq Study Group.

Since the start of the year, in fact, Rice has rhetorically divided the region between "mainstream" actors, such as Saudi Arabia and Egypt, and "extremists" such as Iran and Syria. She suggested that rather than draw out Iran and Syria through diplomacy, the United States would seek to isolate them unless they changed their behavior on their own.

"We do have a regional approach," Rice told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in January. "It is to work with those governments that share our view of where the Middle East should be going." She argued at the time that "the problem here is not a lack of engagement with Syrians but a lack of action by Syria. . . . If the government in Tehran wants to help stabilize the region -- as it now claims -- then it should end its support for violent extremists."

Yesterday, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack repeatedly declined to rule out the possibility of bilateral discussions between Rice and her Iranian and Syrian counterparts, except to note that the dispute over Iran's nuclear program is already being handled on a separate diplomatic track. "I'm not going to exclude any particular interaction at this point . . . on issues that are important to us, but the focus will be on Iraq," he said.

"Security is clearly an important issue for the Iraqis. It's going to be at the top of the agenda," McCormack added. Roadside bombs "are certainly at the top of our list," he said. "This isn't, however, our meeting." U.S. officials have charged that Iranian agents are suspected of supplying the devices -- aimed at armored vehicles -- to militias in Iraq.

Retired Vice Adm. John M. McConnell, the new director of national intelligence, appearing before the Senate Armed Services Committee, said yesterday that while Iran is contributing weapons to Iraqi militias that "raises the cost to the United States" of its fighting in Iraq, he did not see "any direct linkage from Iran dictating events inside Iraq."

Iraq Calls For Two Regional Summits (FT)

By Steve Negus

Financial Times, February 28, 2007

Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state, on Tuesday welcomed a diplomatic initiative by the Iraqi government to call at least two international conferences on its future that would provide an opportunity for the US to tackle its disputes with Iran and Syria over the Iraqi insurgency.

“We hope that all governments will seize this opportunity to improve the relations with Iraq and to work for peace and stability in the region,” Ms Rice told a Senate hearing.

US officials did not exclude the possibility of bilateral discussions with Iran on the subject of Iraq, but would refuse to discuss the nuclear issue, where the US insists that Iran first suspend its nuclear fuel programme. At previous conferences called by the international community on Iraq, Ms Rice and Colin Powell, her predecessor, avoided direct meetings with their Iranian counterparts in Brussels and Egypt.

“In the conduct of diplomacy, you need to have a certain amount of flexibility if you are going to achieve the goals that you want to achieve,” Sean McCormack, State Department spokesman, told reporters.

The first conference is planned to be held in Baghdad at the level of ambassadors in mid-March, bringing together Iraq and its neighbours and the five permanent members of the United Nations Security Council.

A second meeting, to be attended by foreign ministers is scheduled for April outside Iraq. The Bush administration accuses Iran’s Revolutionary Guards of supplying weapons and explosives to Iraqi Shia militia. Syria has also been accused of destabilising Iraq by allowing Sunni insurgents to cross its border. Robert Gates, defence secretary, yesterday said it was “categorically” untrue that the US was preparing to launch air strikes against Iran.

U.S. Set To Join Iran And Syria In Talks On Iraq (NYT)

By Helene Cooper And Kirk Semple

The New York Times, February 28, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 27 — American officials said Tuesday that they had agreed to hold the highest-level contact with the Iranian authorities in more than two years as part of an international meeting on Iraq.

The discussions, scheduled for the next two months, are expected to include Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and her Iranian and Syrian counterparts.

DOJ_NMG_0137892

The announcement, first made in Baghdad and confirmed by Ms. Rice, that the United States would take part in two sets of meetings among Iraq and its neighbors, including Syria and Iran, is a shift in President Bush's avoidance of high-level contacts with the governments in Damascus and, especially, Tehran.

Critics of the administration have long said that it should do more to engage its regional rivals on a host of issues, including the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and Lebanon. That was the position of the Iraq Study Group, the high level commission that last year urged direct, unconditional talks that would include Iran and Syria.

While the newly scheduled meetings may not include direct negotiations between the United States and Iran, and are to focus strictly on stabilizing Iraq rather than other disputes, they could crack open a door to a diplomatic channel.

Iraqi officials had been pushing for such a meeting for several months, but Bush administration officials refused until the Iraqi government reached agreement on pressing domestic matters, including guidelines for nationwide distribution of oil revenue and foreign investment in the country's immense oil industry, administration officials said. The new government of Iraq maintains regular ties with Iran.

"I would note that the Iraqi government has invited Syria and Iran to attend both of these regional meetings," Ms. Rice told a Senate panel on Tuesday, in discussing the talks, which will include Britain, Russia, and a host of international organizations and Middle Eastern countries.

The first meeting — which will include senior Bush administration officials like the State Department Iraq envoy David Satterfield, will be in Baghdad in the first half of March, administration officials said. In early April, Ms. Rice will attend a ministerial level conference, presumably with her Iranian and Syrian counterparts, which will likely be somewhere else in the region, administration officials said.

A year ago, Iranian and American officials announced a planned meeting between the American ambassador to Baghdad and Iranian officials to help stabilize Iraq but the meeting never occurred.

The Iraqi foreign minister, Hoshyar Zebari, called America's anticipated face-to-face contact with Iran and Syria — two countries that the Bush administration has accused of destabilizing Iraq — "very significant."

"Iraq is becoming a divisive issue in the region," Mr. Zebari said in a telephone interview from Denmark, where he is traveling on business. But, he continued, "Iraq can be helpful to its neighbors also. It can provide a platform for them to work out their differences."

The United States has accused Iran of meddling in Iraq, including shipping lethal weapons to Shiite militias in Iraq which the Bush administration says have been used in attacks against American troops.

The new United States intelligence chief, Mike McConnell, told a Senate committee on Tuesday that Iran was training anti-American Iraqi Shiites at sites in Lebanon and Iran to use armor-piercing weapons against American troops. Mr. McConnell said it was "probable" that top Iranian leaders, including Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, were aware that weapons had been supplied by Iran.

A State Department spokesman, Sean McCormack, said the Iranian-made weapons would be "certainly at the top of our list" in the meetings.

The issue of whether the United States should talk to Iran and Syria has been a steady drumbeat in Washington for several months. When the Iraq Study Group raised it in December, it was quickly brushed off by Mr. Bush, who instead embarked on the more confrontational approach.

In addition to the accusations of Iranian meddling in Iraq, the United States has also been confronting Iran over its nuclear program, which Bush administration officials say is aimed at developing nuclear weapons, a charge that Tehran denies. Vice President Dick Cheney said last week that "all options are still on the table" for Washington to prevent Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons, a comment that has heightened fears that the administration is considering attacking Iran's nuclear sites.

Administration officials characterized the conflicting signals as part of a larger diplomatic strategy for dealing with Iran that verges on a high-level game of chicken. One senior administration official said that while some Bush officials have advocated looking for ways to talk to Iran and Syria, they did not want to appear to be talking to either country from a position of weakness. By ratcheting up the confrontational talk, the administration official said, the United States was in more of a driver's seat. He asked that his name not be used because he was not authorized to speak publicly about the issue.

"We became convinced that the Iranians were not taking us seriously," said Philip D. Zelikow, who until December was the top aide to Ms. Rice. "So we've done some things to get them to take us seriously, so now we can try diplomacy."

Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the majority leader, called the announcement a "first step, but it is not enough on its own."

"Our national security requires a robust diplomatic effort in the Middle East, and the Bush administration cannot again settle for mere half measures," he said.

Still, administration officials made it clear that, at least for now, any engagement would be limited to talks about Iraq, and not larger issues like Iran's nuclear program.

DOJ_NMG_0137893

The United States broke off diplomatic relations with Iran after the 1979 Islamist revolution and the storming of the American Embassy in Tehran. America still has diplomatic relations with Syria, including a chargé d'affaires at the American Embassy in Damascus.

Ms. Rice and her deputies have, for several months, pointed to an international conference on Iraq that was established after the American invasion as an available channel to talk to Iran and Syria. Administration officials were working with the United Nations and the Iraqi government last fall to set up the next meeting of the conference, which is sometimes called the International Compact on Iraq. But American officials put off the meeting in part to press the Iraqi government to pass the oil law, administration officials said. The Iraqi government approved a draft of the law on Monday.

As of now, Ms. Rice has announced no plans to hold separate one-on-one talks with her Iranian counterpart, Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki, at the planned April meeting.

In 2004, the first meeting of the International Compact on Iraq, held in the Egyptian resort of Sharm El Sheik, opened with chatter about whether then-Secretary of State Colin L. Powell would hold direct talks with his Iranian counterpart, Kamal Kharrazi.

Mr. Powell and Mr. Kharrazi did not hold a formal session. But the Egyptian hosts of the meeting made the two talk to each other, by seating them side-by-side at dinner. Afterward, an annoyed Mr. Powell said that he and Mr. Kharrazi stuck to polite diplomatic chitchat, discussing subjects like reconstruction after the earthquake in Bam, Iran, and avoiding sensitive topics like the disagreement over Iran's nuclear program.

U.S. To Enter Iraq Talks With Iran, Syria (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr. And Jay Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, February 28, 2007

WASHINGTON -- As criticism mounts over its Middle East policies, the Bush administration has agreed to join in regional talks with Iran and Syria over Iraq, while leaving to the margins the delicate questions of Iran's nuclear program and Syria's role in Lebanon.

The Bush administration's decision to join in the talks next month, which are being launched by the Iraqi government, shows how U.S. officials are now striving to become more engaged in the region diplomatically, whether in Lebanon or the Palestinian territories. It also represents a growing recognition among administration officials that the U.S. needs regional help to stabilize Iraq, even as the U.S. boosts its troop presence there.

· The Issue: The U.S. agrees to join regional talks on Iraq that will include Iran and Syria, amid growing criticism of the Bush administration's unwillingness to engage Mideast players.

· The Background: The White House has shunned the two Iraqi neighbors, accusing both of supporting insurgents and insisting that Iran retreat from its nuclear ambitions.

· The Bottom Line: The move signals growing recognition by administration officials that the U.S. needs regional help to stabilize Iraq, even as it sends more troops.

Two weeks after helping reach a deal to curb North Korea's nuclear program through regional talks, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and other administration officials are eager to commence a similar process with Iran, to tackle pressing issues like its alleged pursuit of nuclear weapons. But it remains unclear whether broader talks with Iran will take place, as the U.S. and United Nations Security Council insist it first agree to suspend its uranium work. Tehran has rejected such a precondition.

Ms. Rice's announcement came as many Arab leaders say they see some positive trends emerging in the region, despite the continuing carnage in Iraq. In Lebanon, attempts by the Iranian-backed Shiite militia and political party, Hezbollah, to overthrow the government of Prime Minister Fuad Siniora have waned. Last month, Saudi Arabia brokered the creation of a unity government in the Palestinian territories between Iranian-funded Hamas and Fatah, in a bid to avert civil war and kick-start a new round of Arab-Israeli peace talks.

Arab diplomats tie these developments to Saudi Arabia's recent diplomatic offensive, largely aimed at preventing the spread of Iraq's Sunni-Shiite violence across the region. In addition, they said, Tehran is taking a more conciliatory stance toward its Middle East neighbors, in part because of threats by the U.S., Saudi Arabia and other regional allies to try and contain its growing influence in the region.

Ms. Rice hailed the planned regional gathering as "a new diplomatic initiative." She said the administration's willingness to join in the talks shows it has a wide-ranging strategy on Iraq. "So far from just a military campaign, our efforts in Iraq are moving forward on all fronts at the same time: security, political, economic and diplomatic," she told a Senate panel yesterday.

But she and others cautioned that the U.S. didn't envision the session as a pretext to engage directly with Iran or Syria on issues beyond Iraq. State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said the U.S. wasn't excluding "any particular interaction at this point, in that forum, at the regional level, on issues that are important to us, but the focus will be on Iraq." Other U.S. officials said it was possible that U.S. officials could talk with Iranian or Syrian officials at the gathering, but only on ways to bring order to Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0137894

Ms. Rice's announcement before the Senate Appropriations Committee of U.S. participation appeared designed to ease the way for passage this spring of emergency funding for the Iraq war and related State Department operations in Iraq.

Sen. Arlen Specter (R., Pa.), one of seven Republicans who broke with the White House on a recent vote over its Iraq strategy, praised the decision.

He told Ms. Rice that it was "very important" because of the "the widespread sentiment in Congress that a resolution of the Iraq issue will require diplomacy."

The summit will be held initially at a subministerial level in Baghdad. If the first session goes well, the U.S. has agreed to attend a higher-level session, also hosted by Iraq, which would include the foreign ministers of these countries as well as of Japan, Canada, Italy and Germany.

The Iraqi government is eager to win support among neighboring states to help clamp down on insurgent groups and ease the deepening rift between the country's Sunni and Shiite factions. U.S. officials said they hope that the forum will help persuade Iran to stem the flow of weapons into Iraq. The U.S. has repeatedly accused Iran in recent weeks of aiding the sectarian violence in Iraq and providing particularly lethal explosive devices to Iraqi militias and militant groups. Iran has denied these allegations.

Washington's decision to join the meeting comes nearly three months after the Iraq Study Group, a bipartisan panel headed by former Secretary of State James Baker and former Rep. Lee Hamilton, recommended just such a session. The administration has ignored many of the panel's recommendations, including, up to now, the suggestion to hold talks with Iran and Syria. Prominent members of Congress from both parties have also urged the administration to sit down with Iran and Syria.

The U.S. and other Security Council members have just begun weighing a new resolution to impose another series of sanctions on Iran over its nuclear program.

Many Arab diplomats would like the U.S. to directly engage Iran in talks, while maintaining financial, military and diplomatic pressure aimed at containing its regional and nuclear ambitions. "Steps need to be taken to prevent the perfect political storm engulfing the Middle East," said one senior Arab diplomat in Washington. "What's needed is a more composite approach" involving diplomacy and coercion, he said.

U.S. To Attend Talks With Iraq, Neighbors (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, February 28, 2007

The United States said yesterday it would attend a pair of Iraqi-sponsored regional conferences in Baghdad over the next two months that will also be attended by archfoes Syria and Iran.

The meetings, called by the government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, would be a sharp break with the Bush administration's past refusal to engage with Syria and Iran over the troubled Iraq conflict and growing regional tensions. The U.S. government accuses both of Iraq's neighbors of fueling insurgent violence against U.S. and Iraqi forces.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, scheduled to attend the second meeting in April with other regional foreign ministers, told a Senate hearing yesterday that Iraq was organizing the meeting and deciding whom to invite.

"We hope [Iran and Syria] seize this opportunity to improve their relations with Iraq -- and to work for peace and stability in the region," she said.

An Iraqi government spokesman said yesterday that Syria has confirmed it will participate in the first meeting, tentatively set for March 10 and 11.

There was no immediate comment from Iran, and U.S. officials insisted yesterday that the diplomatic drive to halt Tehran's nuclear programs would not be on the table in the Iraq meetings.

The meeting was billed as an opportunity to deal exclusively with Iraq's deteriorating security situation. Iraqi officials said they plan a preliminary gathering of lower-level envoys from all of the major Middle East powers, the United States and the four other permanent U.N. Security Council powers, and regional organizations such as the Arab League.

Miss Rice and other foreign ministers would then gather in April for a follow-up meeting, at a place still to be determined. The second meeting would also include the four G-8 countries not invited to the March meeting -- Canada, Italy, Germany and Japan.

Sami al-Askari, a spokesman for Mr. al-Maliki, told reporters in Baghdad, "We will ask all our neighboring countries to stop interfering in Iraqi affairs and to put pressure on armed groups with whom they have links to end the violence."

He singled out Iran and Syria, but also Saudi Arabia, a strong U.S. ally.

DOJ_NMG_0137895

U.S. officials stressed yesterday that the meeting was an Iraqi initiative. President Bush in December had rejected a similar proposal from the bipartisan Iraq Study Group headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton, Indiana Democrat.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack would not rule out bilateral meetings between U.S. officials and their Syrian and Iranian counterparts in Baghdad. While Iraq is setting the agenda, he said the United States wants to discuss issues of security for U.S. troops in Iraq, particularly the threat from roadside bombs.

"I'm sure that there are going to be different kinds of discussions, meaning different groupings," Mr. McCormack said. "I'm not going to exclude any particular interaction at this point."

It is expected that outgoing U.S. Ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad or his successor, Ryan Crocker, would represent the United States at the March meeting.

Even if direct contacts are limited, Syria can claim a diplomatic victory in attending the forum as an equal partner with Washington, according to University of Oklahoma Syrian scholar Joshua Landis. The Bush administration has spurned repeated requests by Syria for high-level direct talks.

The meetings come as U.S. and Iraqi forces have begun a major security push in Baghdad. U.S.-led forces yesterday conducted raids in the largely Shi'ite Sadr City slum, targeting death squads that have been killing Sunnis.

Violence continued to plague the country, with three U.S. soldiers reported killed by a roadside bomb in Baghdad and a fourth U.S. soldier killed in fighting in the town of Diwaniyah, 80 miles south of Baghdad.

And U.S. and Iraqi officials were trying to sort out confusing accounts of an explosion at a popular soccer field in the city of Ramadi, which killed 18 women and children. The U.S. military had conducted a "controlled detonation" of a weapons cache in the area, but U.S. officials said they think the explosion was not linked to the soccer-field bombing.

U.S. To Join Iran, Syria In Iraq Talks (LAT)

By Paul Richter

The Los Angeles Times, February 28, 2007

WASHINGTON — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Tuesday that the United States would join high-level talks on Iraq with the country's neighbors, including Iran and Syria, in a move that may signal a new U.S. willingness to expand diplomacy with two adversaries.

U.S. officials said the negotiations could open the way to a broader dialogue with two nations the Bush administration has refused to meet one-on-one except under limited circumstances, but they also gave carefully couched responses to questions about how far Washington would be willing to go.

Asked about the U.S. refusal to negotiate with Iran about its nuclear program unless Tehran first suspends uranium enrichment, Sean McCormack, the chief State Department spokesman, told reporters, "Those conditions remain."

At the same time, he and others appeared to be trying to leave open the door to talks on other subjects of mutual interest. "I'm not going to try to predict what the course of those diplomatic interactions might be," McCormack said.

Another U.S. official said that though it seemed unlikely that bilateral talks would grow out of the meetings, "we're not going to rule anything out."

"Our diplomats need a certain amount of flexibility to do their work," said the official, who declined to be identified because of the sensitivity of the issues.

Administration officials do not want to cede any diplomatic advantage to Syria and Iran through talks, but they say they believe the two countries are in a position to help the beleaguered Baghdad government. They also may have concluded that appearing more enthusiastic about such diplomacy could ease criticism from the Democrats who control Congress.

Rice announced the U.S. participation in the talks while appearing before a Senate committee, and described it as part of a new "diplomatic offensive." She noted that many lawmakers and the advisory study group headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Rep. Lee H. Hamilton (D-Ind.) had urged a regional approach to dealing with Iraq's problems.

"This is one of the key findings, of course, of the Iraq Study Group, and it is an important dimension that many in the … Congress have brought to our attention," Rice said. "We've listened, and I want you to know that."

The Iraqi government, which is organizing the event, plans one working-level meeting in Baghdad in March, and a second elsewhere in the region in April, which Rice is expected to attend. All five permanent members of the U.N. Security Council will be invited, as will other world powers, officials said. The meetings will focus on the challenges facing the war-torn country.

Rice's announcement that Washington would take part came as the Bush administration encounters mounting criticism for its hard-line stance toward Iran. President Bush has sent warships near Iran, is deploying the Air Force along the Iran-Iraq border and repeatedly has accused Tehran of supplying Iraqi militias with weapons used against U.S. troops. At the same time, administration officials have denied that they are preparing to attack Iran, although congressional critics are demanding to know more about White House plans.

DOJ_NMG_0137896

U.S. officials, starting with Bush, have long argued that direct one-on-one negotiations with Iran and Syria would be unproductive, and could benefit only Tehran and Damascus unless those two governments changed their behavior. That stance has brought the administration criticism from both political parties, foreign governments and Washington's foreign policy establishment.

The issue has also produced splits within the administration. Some officials, including many in the State Department, have contended that the United States, even while holding a firm line, should talk to Syria and Iran. Others, in the Pentagon and White House, have argued that bilateral negotiations would hand the diplomatic advantage to the adversary.

But officials have also said for years that they were willing to meet with Iran and Syria as part of a group to work out the security, economic and political problems facing Iraq. Indeed, they have met repeatedly with representatives of the two governments in different forums since the invasion of Iraq nearly four years ago.

They met with representatives of Iran and Syria in New York in September, for example, to discuss aid to Iraq. In November 2004, then-Secretary of State Colin L. Powell sat next to Iran's foreign minister at a regional meeting in Egypt.

Rice's announcement brought positive reaction from lawmakers who have been trying to push the administration toward more dialogue.

"I hope this means that clearer heads in the administration are beginning to prevail," said Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

The first, working-level session of the new talks will include "envoys," such as U.S. Ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad and Rice's senior Iraq advisor, David Satterfield. The second meeting is to include foreign ministers of all the countries present for the first session, plus those of the G-8 group of largest industrial nations. That meeting probably will be held outside of Iraq because of the dangerous environment in Baghdad, officials said.

The agenda has not yet been set, but the Iraqi government has been pressing its neighbors to try to cut off the flow of arms, militants and money across its borders; as a result, the discussion could lead to an exchange of views on U.S. claims that Iran has been sending sophisticated explosive devices to Iraq.

Iraq has also been pushing its neighbors to provide more economic aid, and to fulfill pledges of aid that have been ignored for years. By including world powers in the discussion, the Iraqis may hope to bring in more aid as well as expertise from new sources.

Baghdad has also been eager for increased political and diplomatic support from its neighbors. Several do not have embassies or ambassadors in the country. Some Sunni Arab governments believe that Iraq has been captured by a Shiite bloc and seek to limit contacts with it, Iraqi officials complain.

Though some U.S. officials have high hopes for the meeting, they acknowledge that the Iranians and Syrians may not participate vigorously, as has been the case at several meetings the Iraqis have organized, a U.S. official said.

Iraqi leaders face a delicate task in handling neighboring Iran, at various times a cultural, political and military patron to many of the former exile groups running Iraq. Isolated from the rest of the Middle East, Iraqis have come to depend on Iran for trade and energy. Iran's non-energy exports to Iraq totaled $1.3 billion since last March, the Iran-Iraq Chamber of Commerce announced this week.

Iraq is eager to convince other neighbors, such as Syria, Saudi Arabia and Jordan, that they have a stake in the country's future.

Shiite and Kurdish leaders of Iraq long have advocated a regional conference to bolster diplomatic support for the fledgling government. Many Iraqi officials have suggested that all the tools that have been used to bring about an end to recent civil wars in various nations should be brought to bear to halt Iraq's sectarian violence. That includes international conferences such as the 1995 talks in Dayton, Ohio, that brought about an end to the civil war in the former Yugoslavia.

Al-Qaeda Will Come Back To Haunt US If It Fails In Iraq: Rice (AFP)

AFP, February 28, 2007

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice warned a doubting US Congress Tuesday that Al-Qaeda will "come back to haunt us" if the United States does not pursue its effort to stabilize Iraq.

"I believe that everyday -- and I don't want to be hyperbolic but frankly every hour of every day -- there are Al-Qaeda forces ... that are trying to figure out how to attack us," Rice told a Senate panel.

"If they have a safe haven, a sophisticated and central place like Iraq, I believe strongly that that's going to enhance their capability to do so," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0137897

Rice and Defense Secretary Robert Gates underwent a grilling Tuesday before the Senate Appropriations Committee which is considering Bush's request for an additional 99.6 billion dollars for the "global war on terrorism" -- including in Iraq and Afghanistan -- for the next six months.

The opposition-controlled Congress is considering several pieces of legislation designed to hasten a US pullout from Iraq nearly four years after President George W. Bush ordered the invasion of that country to topple Saddam Hussein.

At Tuesday's hearing, Senators repeatedly questioned the government's rationale for remaining in Iraq amid sectarian violence that borders on civil war.

Rice responded that a "premature" US withdrawal from Iraq would allow Al-Qaeda elements active in the country to take advantage of the violent chaos that would ensue.

"If you were to get the kind of instability in the region that might come from an Iraq that was unstable and unable to control its borders, unable to control its relationships with its neighbors," she said, it would create "a kind of breeding ground for the kind of terrorism that would come back to haunt us here at home".

"I think the link between the maturation of of Al-Qaeda in the center of the Middle East and our own security is clear, because Al-Qaeda is obviously the greatest threat to our homeland," she said.

Making Nice With Iraq's Neighbors (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 28, 2007

IN WHAT AMOUNTS TO a welcome about-face for the Bush administration, the United States will sit down next month to discuss Iraqi security with Iran and Syria. The discussions, called by the Iraqi government and to be held in Baghdad, also will include Britain, Russia and other Middle Eastern countries. They will mark the first time U.S. diplomats have engaged their Syrian or Iranian counterparts in three years.

President Bush has been under increasing pressure to drop his refusal to talk to these adversaries, pressure that mounted with the release of the Iraq Study Group report in December. As group Co-Chairman James A. Baker III and others have repeatedly noted, Washington engaged the Soviet "evil empire" during the Cold War and these negotiations were no sign of U.S. weakness.

The Baghdad talks will hardly amount to high-powered summitry, though Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will be attending a subsequent ministerial gathering elsewhere in the region. The Bush administration has been arguing that Iran is sending weapons and agents into Iraq, so it makes sense to have a forum in which to raise and resolve these concerns. It's fair to assume that the discussions with Tehran, much like the ongoing low-grade hostility between U.S. troops and Iranian agents, will initially be confined to Iraq. That is not necessarily a bad thing, especially if some basic understandings, and a reservoir of trust, can be established.

The administration clearly has little choice but to engage Iraq's neighbors on security. Especially now that the U.S. military is recommitting troops to the battle for Baghdad and U.S. allies are pulling out of the country, there are insufficient coalition forces to protect the Iraqi border. And regardless of how the "surge" strategy plays out, any future reduction in U.S. forces in Iraq will be more palatable if the nation's borders are secure and its neighbors feel invested in Iraq's stability.

Bush and Rice also may have felt that this was a good time to announce talks without appearing weak, given broader developments in the Persian Gulf region. Events within Iraq may not be going well, but the U.S. Navy has been flexing its muscles in the region. Moreover, U.S. diplomacy has helped to win a U.N. Security Council resolution denouncing Iran's nuclear program, and Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad appears to be in some political trouble with the ruling mullahs in Tehran, partly because of his perceived recklessness.

This would seem, then, a good time to explore whether Tehran might become a more constructive partner in bringing about stability in neighboring Iraq — a stability that would be in its own self-interest, after all. And such a development could lead to a constructive dialogue on other issues. There would be no harm in finding out.

Taliban Say Attack Aimed At Cheney (FT)

By Aunohita Mojumdar, Farhan Bokhari And Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, February 28, 2007

Dick Cheney, the US vice-president, was on Tuesday rushed to a bomb shelter in Afghanistan after a suicide attack on the Bagram air force base where he was staying killed more than 20 people.

The Taliban claimed responsibility for the bombing outside Bagram base about 60km from the capital, Kabul, which claimed the lives of one US soldier, a South Korean soldier and a number of Afghans.

Mullah Hayat Khan, a -Taliban spokesman, told [a news agency] the attack was aimed at Mr Cheney. While his arrival on Monday was shrouded in secrecy, some experts questioned whether a one-day delay in meeting Hamid Karzai, the Afghan president, because of inclement weather had provoked a security breach. The White House said it could not confirm whether the Taliban had targeted Mr Cheney.

DOJ_NMG_0137898

"I think it was about 10am this morning, I heard a loud boom," Mr Cheney told reporters travelling with him to Afghanistan.

"They clearly try to find ways to question the authority of the central government," said Mr Cheney. "Striking at Bagram with a suicide bomber, I suppose, is one way to do that. But it shouldn't affect our behaviour at all."

Mr Cheney was visiting Afghanistan to discuss the declining security situation in the country with Mr Karzai. The attack on the heavily fortified base underscored the growing strength of the Taliban, who are expected to wage a tough campaign against the US and Nato allies this spring.

Military officials stressed that a high level of security had been maintained and that Mr Cheney, who was inside the military compound when the attack happened, was never in danger.

"Our security measures were in place and the killer never had access to the base," said Lieutenant Colonel James Bonner, the Bagram base commander.

Mr Cheney came to Afghanistan from Pakistan where he met General Pervez Musharraf, the president. Mr Cheney went ahead with meeting Mr Karzai on Tuesday despite the attack but no details were released of their discussions.

In Pakistan, Mr Cheney told Gen Musharraf that the US wanted him to do more to combat the growing havens for Taliban and al-Qaeda operatives in the tribal areas of Waziristan in north-west Pakistan, bordering Afghanistan. US officials have raised concerns that an agreement with tribal leaders, under which the Pakistani military pulled back, has let extremists regroup.

A US official said Washington realised Gen Musharraf was hampered in his ability to clamp down on extremism in the tribal areas, which have been ungoverned for several -decades.

But he said the recent number of US visitors to Pakistan, including Robert Gates, the defence secretary, were aimed at impressing on Gen Musharraf US concerns about a resurgent Taliban and al-Qaeda.

Michael McConnell, the new US director for national intelligence, on Tuesday told Congress that while Pakistan was co-operating in the "war on terror", al-Qaeda had established a haven in the country. "Al-Qaeda...continue to maintain active connections and relationships that radiate outward from their leaders' hideout in Pakistan to affiliates throughout the Middle East, northern Africa and Europe," said Mr McConnell.

The US has increased its focus on Afghanistan as concerns grow that the coalition has started to lose ground. The US and UK have increased troop levels and are calling on other Nato allies to both step up involvement and ease their rules of engagement to provide greater combat ability.

Meanwhile, analysts said Gen Musharraf faced an increasing challenge as he braved the fall-out from the toughest message delivered by the US this week, urging him to intensify his hunt for members of al-Qaeda.

Pakistani officials acknowledged that Mr Cheney had delivered a firm message.

Cheney Escapes Harm In Blast (WT/AP)

By Alisa Tang

The Washington Times, February 28, 2007

BAGRAM, Afghanistan -- A suicide bomber attacked the entrance to the main U.S. military base in Afghanistan yesterday during a visit by Vice President Dick Cheney, killing up to 23 persons and wounding 20.

Mr. Cheney was not hurt in the attack, but was close enough to hear the explosion. Reporters covering his visit saw the resulting plume of smoke.

The Taliban claimed responsibility and said it was attempting to kill the vice president.

It was the closest that militants have come to a top U.S. official visiting Afghanistan. At least one U.S. soldier, an American contractor and a South Korean soldier were among the dead, NATO said.

Mr. Cheney said the attackers were trying "to find ways to question the authority of the central government."

About two hours after the blast, Mr. Cheney left on a military flight for Kabul to meet with President Hamid Karzai and other officials, then left Afghanistan.

The vice president had spent the night at the sprawling Bagram air base, ate breakfast with the troops, and met with Army Maj. Gen. David Rodriguez, the commander of U.S. troops in Afghanistan.

He was preparing to leave for a meeting with Mr. Karzai when the suicide bomber struck about 10 a.m. U.S. military officials declared a Red Alert at the base.

"I heard a loud boom," Mr. Cheney told reporters. "The Secret Service came in and told me there had been an attack on the main gate."

He said he was moved "for a brief period of time" to a bomb shelter on the base near his quarters. "As the situation settled down and they had a better sense of what was going on, I went back to my room," Mr. Cheney added.

DOJ_NMG_0137899

Asked whether the Taliban were trying to send a message with the attack, Mr. Cheney said: "I think they clearly try to find ways to question the authority of the central government.

"Striking at Bagram with a suicide bomber, I suppose, is one way to do that," he said. "But it shouldn't affect our behavior at all."

Maj. William Mitchell said the explosion did not appear to be intended as a threat to Mr. Cheney. "He wasn't near the site of the explosion," Maj. Mitchell said. "He was safely within the base at the time of the explosion."

Death toll reports were conflicting. Mr. Karzai's office said 23 persons were killed, including 20 Afghan workers at the base. Another 20 persons were injured, it said.

NATO's International Security Assistance Force said initial reports were that three persons were killed, including a U.S. soldier, an American contractor and a South Korean soldier. U.S. officials indicated that they planned to update that death toll.

Associated Press reporters at the scene saw 12 bodies being carried in black body bags and wooden coffins from the base entrance into a market area where hundreds of Afghans had gathered to mourn.

Friends and relatives cried and moaned as they took the bodies away from the base. Two men came to the base entrance crying and wringing their hands, one of them screaming, "My brother."

A message posted on a Web site used by militants said "a mujahid ... carried out a suicide attack in front of the second gate of the Bagram Air Base. ... The target was Bush's vice president, Dick Cheney."

A purported Taliban spokesman, Qari Yousef Ahmadi, said Mr. Cheney was the target of the attack, which Mr. Ahmadi said was carried out by an Afghan called Mullah Abdul Rahim, of Logar province.

"We knew that Dick Cheney would be staying inside the base," Mr. Ahmadi told AP by telephone from an undisclosed location. "The attacker was trying to reach Cheney."

Cheney, Karzai Discuss 'Problems From Pakistan' (USAT)

By Paul Wiseman

USA Today, February 28, 2007

KABUL, Afghanistan — Vice President Cheney left Afghanistan on Tuesday after talks on how to crush the threat posed by Islamic militants, a danger dramatized by a suicide bombing outside the U.S. air base Cheney was visiting.

Cheney met with President Hamid Karzai in Kabul before heading back to the USA via the Persian Gulf state of Oman.

During their private, hour-long meeting, Cheney and Karzai spoke about the "problems coming from Pakistan," according to an Afghan government official who spoke to the Associated Press on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the matter. The United States has accused Pakistan of not doing enough to stop militants from crossing its border into Afghanistan.

On Monday, Cheney had a four-hour discussion with Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf about beefing up border security.

Musharraf's office said Cheney called for Pakistan to crack down on al-Qaeda forces regrouping in tribal areas along the border with Afghanistan. It said he also asked for help combating a possible offensive this spring by the Taliban, the radical Islamic group that was removed from power by a U.S.-led invasion in 2001.

The Taliban said it carried out the suicide attack outside the main gate of Bagram Air Base to target Cheney. The Afghan government said 23 people were killed, including 20 Afghan workers at the base. NATO put the deaths at nine, including a U.S. soldier, a U.S. contractor and a South Korean soldier.

VIDEO: Taliban calls it an assassination attempt

Cheney was about a mile from the blast. "I heard a loud boom," he told reporters accompanying him.

The U.S. military doubted the target was Cheney. The bomber walked into a group of Afghans outside the base and did not approach U.S.-manned checkpoints.

"To characterize this as a direct attempt on the life of the vice president is absurd," said Lt. Col. David Accetta, a U.S. military spokesman.

Taliban attacks have increased during the past year as the U.S.-led coalition has been moving closer to the militants' safe zones in southern Afghanistan.

Although the advances have resulted in the death or capture of hundreds of Taliban fighters, the Pentagon has said it expects a major attempt in the spring to damage the Karzai regime.

The United States wants Pakistan to help undercut the possible Taliban spring offensive.

"Cheney is believed to have delivered a tougher message to Musharraf than ever before," said former Pakistani diplomat Husain Haqqani, now director of Boston University's Center for International Relations. "The Bush administration is beginning to recognize that it has to combine some public pressure with its previous private remonstrations in dealing with Musharraf."

Seth Jones, a counterinsurgency specialist with the RAND Corp. think tank who recently visited Afghanistan, said the pressure has been growing in recent weeks as top U.S. officials — including Defense Secretary Robert Gates — have visited the region to assess the Taliban threat and its sanctuaries in Pakistan. "In my view, the failure to get a handle on the Taliban and al-Qaeda's sanctuary in Pakistan will cripple long-term efforts to stabilize and rebuild Afghanistan," Jones said.

A Mile From Cheney, Afghan Bomber Kills At Least 23 (NYT)

By Abdul Waheed Wafa And Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, February 28, 2007

KABUL, Afghanistan, Feb. 27 — A suicide bomber blew himself up on Tuesday morning outside the gate of the United States air base near Kabul where Vice President Dick Cheney was staying, killing at least 23 people. The vice president heard the blast from a mile away.

The dead included two Americans, a soldier and a contractor; a South Korean soldier with the American-led coalition forces; a 12-year-old Afghan boy; and a group of Afghan laborers waiting to enter at the security gate, Afghan officials said. Twenty-three people were also wounded in the explosion.

A Taliban spokesman claimed responsibility, and said in a telephone call to [a] news agency that the attack had been aimed at Mr. Cheney.

But while the attack laid bare the rising insecurity in Afghanistan as American and NATO forces battle a growing Taliban insurgency, Afghan and American officials said it fell well short of a serious assassination attempt.

At the time of the blast, the vice president was in his room at the Bagram Air Base, where heavy snow had forced him to stay overnight after arriving from Pakistan, postponing a visit to the capital, Kabul, about 40 miles away.

Though Mr. Cheney's schedule has been tightly guarded, his arrival and delay at Bagram were well reported.

The attack — one of more than 100 suicide attacks in Afghanistan over the past year — could have been coincidental, or just as likely arranged quickly, for its propaganda value.

"At 10 a.m. I heard a loud boom," Mr. Cheney told reporters aboard Air Force Two en route to Oman, according to The Associated Press. "The Secret Service came in and told me there had been an attack on the main gate." Mr. Cheney was immediately moved to a bunker.

"I think they clearly try to find ways to question the authority of the central government," Mr. Cheney added. "Striking at Bagram with a suicide bomber, I suppose, is one way to do that. But it shouldn't affect our behavior at all."

A United States military spokesman Lt. Col. David Accetta, said the bomber did not try to get past any United States-staffed security checkpoints and instead walked into a group of Afghans outside the base and detonated himself.

"To characterize this as a direct attempt on the life of the vice president is absurd," he said, according to The A.P.

Bashir Salangi, the deputy governor of Parwan Province, who visited the scene, said that the bomber was carrying the explosives on his body and that at least 20 people were killed.

He said that 23 others were wounded, but that the exact number remained uncertain because of the extent of the carnage and because some of those wounded were taken into the base and some to nearby hospitals.

"I think the aim was just the crowd of people who were gathered for checking," Mr. Salangi said.

Most of the Afghan casualties were truck drivers and workers lining up to get into the base. American soldiers guard the gate and search the workers and vehicles before allowing them to enter. Scores of people are usually milling around the parking lot outside the main gate, where fuel and gravel trucks park as they wait to unload their cargo.

Hundreds of day workers pass through on foot to go to work on the base. The bomber is thought to have passed through Afghan security with them or aboard a fuel truck. The Bagram area, which suffered under Taliban rule, is not generally sympathetic to the Taliban, but there have been attacks there, and Afghan intelligence broke a cell of bombers from the area last year, suggesting that the Taliban and its allies have sought to infiltrate the area.

After the explosion, Mr. Cheney flew to Kabul by helicopter to meet with President Hamid Karzai at midday Tuesday. The two men met alone for an hour before joining a larger gathering for lunch.

Mr. Cheney arrived in Afghanistan after meeting on Monday with Gen. Pervez Musharraf, the president of Pakistan. He pressed the Pakistani leader to do more to prevent Al Qaeda from regrouping in Pakistani's tribal areas and to prevent the Taliban from using the border areas as a sanctuary to carry out attacks in Afghanistan.

In Afghanistan, he praised the nation's progress, and voiced continued support for Mr. Karzai's government and specifically for its help in fighting terrorism and strengthening security and reconstruction in the country, according to an Afghan government statement.

"His visit showed that the United States is being more serious and demanding of Pakistan to put an end to terrorist resources and sanctuaries and to stop border crossing," said an Afghan government official, who asked not to be identified because of the critical nature of his remarks. “This is what the Afghan government has been repeatedly asking and demanding from Pakistan.”

DOJ_NMG_0137901

He added: “His visit was very important. Now the United States realizes that peace will not come to Afghanistan unless Pakistan starts the real fight against terrorists.”

Bombing Near Cheney Displays Boldness Of Resurgent Taliban (WP)

By Griff Witte

The Washington Post, February 28, 2007

Vice President Cheney was inside the main U.S. air base in Afghanistan yesterday when a suicide bomber detonated his explosives just outside the gates, killing as many as 23 people and showcasing insurgents' growing capabilities in advance of a widely expected spring offensive.

Within hours, a purported Taliban spokesman asserted responsibility for the attack -- which killed a U.S. soldier and an American civilian contractor -- and said it was an attempt to assassinate Cheney. U.S. officials disputed the assertion that Cheney was the target, noting that his overnight stay at the sprawling Bagram air base had been unplanned and that he was well away from the blast.

"I heard a loud boom," Cheney told reporters later. "The Secret Service came in and told me there had been an attack on the main gate."

The attack prompted military officials to issue a "red alert" at the base. Cheney was briefly moved to a bomb shelter, before being allowed to continue with his schedule.

Regardless of the intent, the attack demonstrated that insurgents in Afghanistan are becoming increasingly bold, willing to attack a heavily fortified U.S. target in the face of unusually tight security. Additionally, the assault was carried out in a part of the country where the Taliban has relatively little support. The Islamic militia's traditional stronghold has been in the south; Bagram is in the country's central region, about an hour's drive north of Kabul.

"It's pretty striking that they're capable of planning and executing an attack on Bagram on fairly short notice and under changing circumstances. We haven't seen anything like this before," said Daniel Markey, a senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations who until last month worked on South Asia policy at the State Department. "Psychologically, this has to be seen as a serious blow."

Markey said the attack is also an ominous sign with the approach of spring, which is usually accompanied by a heavy escalation in violence as conditions for fighting improve. "Everyone agrees on both sides that this is going to be a bad spring," he said.

Until 18 months ago, suicide bombings had been a rarity in Afghanistan, despite more than two decades of war. Recently, however, they have become a favored tactic of insurgents who are trying to undermine the weak pro-Western government in Kabul and force NATO troops to leave.

Last year, there were 139 suicide attacks in Afghanistan, five times as many as in 2005. The shift in tactics has prompted concern that the Taliban, which lost power after a U.S.-led invasion in 2001, is adopting the methods of insurgents in Iraq.

"This attack is a reflection of their new capabilities, which they've developed in the last year or two through their connections with the transnational extremists," said Ali Ahmad Jalali, former interior minister of Afghanistan. "This will boost morale and will help them to recruit more fighters. This is the kind of violence that can have a major psychological impact."

Asked whether Taliban fighters were sending a message, Cheney indicated they were. "I think they clearly try to find ways to question the authority of the central government," he said. "Striking at Bagram with a suicide bomber, I suppose, is one way to do that. But it shouldn't affect our behavior at all."

The Bush administration has become increasingly concerned by the violence in Afghanistan, and Cheney's previously unannounced stops in Pakistan and Afghanistan during a trip to Asia were intended to signal the White House's commitment to countering insurgents there.

Meeting with Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, in Islamabad on Monday, Cheney pushed the leader to do more to crack down on Taliban and al-Qaeda activity in semiautonomous frontier region. Afghan officials have blamed Pakistan for allowing the Taliban a haven to plan and train for attacks in Afghanistan. U.S. officials had long defended Pakistan as a valuable ally, but intelligence reports that al-Qaeda is reconstituting itself in Pakistan have prompted U.S. officials in recent months to publicly question whether Musharraf is doing all he can.

Following the meeting with Musharraf, Cheney flew to Bagram late Monday. He stayed at the base overnight because a storm delayed his meeting in Kabul with Afghan President Hamid Karzai until yesterday morning. The delay was reported publicly Monday night.

DOJ_NMG_0137902

Just before 10 a.m. yesterday, a suicide bomber driving a Toyota Corolla made it through a gate at the air base manned by Afghan police officers, according to Gen. Salem Ihsas, the police chief in Parwan province, where Bagram is located.

The assailant detonated his explosives before he was able to make it through a second gate, which is manned by U.S. personnel. Ihsas said that 19 people were killed in the blast and that 15 were wounded, mostly Afghan laborers who had reported for work at the base. Other estimates from Afghan officials put the death toll slightly higher, while U.S. authorities said nine people had been killed and 21 injured.

U.S. military officials said the bomber was on foot and did not get as close to the base as Ihsas suggested.

Ihsas said preliminary reports indicated the bomber was not Afghan but declined to say where he was from. "Once we are done with the investigation, we will know exactly," he said.

The dead in yesterday's blast included a South Korean soldier. South Korea is part of the 37-nation NATO-led International Security Assistance Force, which is responsible for security throughout Afghanistan.

The United States and Britain -- the two largest contributors of troops in Afghanistan -- both recently announced they would be increasing their force levels, with the U.S. total climbing to 27,000.

About 5,100 U.S. troops, plus 4,000 other coalition personnel and contractors, are stationed at the air base at Bagram.

Afghan Bombing Sends A Danger Signal To U.S. (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, February 28, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 27 — The audacity of a suicide-bomb attack on Tuesday at the gates of the main American base in Afghanistan during a visit by Vice President Dick Cheney underscores why President Bush sent him there — a deepening American concern that the Taliban and Al Qaeda are resurgent.

American officials insisted that the importance of the attack, by a single suicide bomber who blew himself up a mile away from where the vice president was staying, was primarily symbolic. It was more successful at grabbing headlines and filling television screens with a scene of carnage than at getting anywhere near Mr. Cheney.

But the strike nonetheless demonstrated that Al Qaeda and the Taliban appear stronger and more emboldened in the region than at any time since the American invasion of the country five years ago, and since the Bush administration claimed to have decimated much of their middle management. And it fed directly into the debate over who is to blame.

The leaders with whom Mr. Cheney met on his mission to Pakistan and Afghanistan have appeared increasingly incapable of controlling the chaos, and have pointed fingers at one another.

Mr. Cheney said the attack was a reminder that terrorists seek “to question the authority of the central government,” and argued that it underscored the need for a renewed American effort.

His critics, on the other hand, said the strike was another reminder of how Iraq had diverted the Bush administration from finishing the job in Afghanistan.

The blast Mr. Cheney said he heard from his quarters deep inside Bagram Air Base took a terrible toll. At least 23 people were killed, including an American soldier and an American contractor, along with a South Korean soldier. [Page A9.]

About 20 Afghans died, including a 12-year-old boy. An additional two dozen or so were wounded.

By Tuesday evening, long after Mr. Cheney wrapped up his visit and headed home to the United States, it remained unclear whether the suicide bomber had known that Mr. Cheney was on the base at the time of the attack. One military official at United States Central Command, which oversees operations in Afghanistan, said he strongly believed that the bomber was unaware of Mr. Cheney’s presence.

In Washington, American officials said their intelligence had detected no specific threat against Mr. Cheney, whose entry into Afghanistan had been kept secret after an equally clandestine visit to Pakistan on Monday.

But word of his presence in Afghanistan leaked out on Monday after a snowstorm delayed his meeting with President Hamid Karzai, and Mr. Cheney decided to stay at Bagram Air Base overnight. That fact was widely reported on Internet sites and on radio programs that have significant audiences in Afghanistan. It was possible that the attack outside the gate at Bagram was arranged quickly, or redirected to the air base from another target.

The attack, which occurred between the perimeter of the base and the first American checkpoint, occurred at 10 a.m. Tuesday. An administration official said an initial American review had found that the attack “doesn’t look, at first pass, like something that was carefully planned out.”

The bomber appeared to have made his way past an Afghan-guarded gate. But American military officials in Afghanistan said the suicide bomber detonated his weapon before he got to the first United States checkpoint, at a point where fuel trucks and vehicles carrying other goods park outside the gates to await inspection before being sent in.

DOJ_NMG_0137903

Master Sergeant Chris Fletcher, a spokesman for the military operation in Afghanistan, said in a telephone interview that the bomber "did not penetrate the outer ring of security."

That account suggested that the security around the base had kept the bloodshed of an Afghanistan under attack by both Taliban and Qaeda forces outside the high walls of the base, the hub of American military activity in the country.

But it also suggested a widening spiral of insecurity in Afghanistan, which had nearly 140 suicide bombings last year, including in Kabul, making the conflict and tactics here increasingly reminiscent of the chaotic struggle in Iraq.

Critics have charged that the Iraq war has precluded the United States from sending sufficient forces to Afghanistan. Concerned about a spring Taliban offensive, the United States has increased its force in Afghanistan to about 26,000. More than 20,000 troops from other NATO nations are also deployed there.

The scenes that Mr. Cheney flew over on his way in and out of Bagram — the devastation outside the gate and the bombed-out landscape of Kabul — was a reminder of how far the reality of Afghanistan is from the goals that President Bush set just short of five years ago, in a speech at the Virginia Military Institute. At the time, Mr. Bush repeatedly invoked the memory of Gen. George C. Marshall, the man behind the reconstruction that followed World War II, in expressing confidence that a "stable government" and a "national army" would help to achieve peace in Afghanistan.

But in testimony on Tuesday in front of the Senate armed services committee, the new director of national intelligence, Mike McConnell, painted a grim picture of what he called a "pivotal year for Afghanistan," in which the country's leaders would have to "confront pervasive drug cultivation and trafficking, and, with NATO and the United States, arrest the resurgence of the Taliban."

Mr. Cheney's mission was to figure out how to bolster the Afghan president, Hamid Karzai, and the NATO force, and to try to ease an openly hostile relationship between Mr. Karzai and another American ally, Gen. Pervez Musharraf of Pakistan. Mr. Karzai has argued that many of the attacks in Afghanistan have been launched from Pakistan. Mr. Musharraf has said Mr. Karzai is looking for a scapegoat.

Mr. McConnell's assessment was grim: "Long-term prospects for eliminating the Taliban threat appear dim, so long as the sanctuary remains in Pakistan, and there are no encouraging signs that Pakistan is eliminating it. "

Cheney OK After Afghan Suicide Bombing (CHIT)

By Mark Silva And Bay Fang

Chicago Tribune, February 27, 2007

KABUL, Afghanistan -- A suicide bombing within earshot of Vice President Dick Cheney at the gate of Bagram Air Base underscored concerns Tuesday about the resurgence of Taliban militants and other Islamic radicals in Afghanistan—the very reason for Cheney's visit.

U.S. officials dismissed a Web site claim by the Taliban that Cheney was the target of the bombing, which killed a U.S. soldier, an American contractor and as many as 21 others. The explosion occurred about a mile across the base from the vice president, who was unhurt after briefly being escorted to a bomb shelter.

But the fact that the bomber could get so close to the base while the vice president was present raised questions about the Afghan government's control of the security situation and whether the insurgency has improved its ability to stage such attacks on the verge of its expected "spring offensive."

Cheney, in Afghanistan to reassure the government of President Hamid Karzai of U.S. support, said the attack was part of the insurgents' efforts to challenge Karzai. And he asserted that talk in the U.S. of withdrawing American forces from Iraq only emboldens terrorists in the region.

"I think they [the Taliban] clearly try to find ways to question the authority of the central government," Cheney said during a brief interview in a luxury cabin mounted in the cargo bay of his C-17 military transport.

"Striking at the Bagram base with a suicide bomber, I suppose, is one way to do that," Cheney said. "It shouldn't affect our behavior."

Terrorism experts said if it is true that the Taliban sent the suicide bomber to target the base while Cheney was there, it could mark a worrisome expansion of their capabilities. It also raised a question of how insurgents might have known about Cheney's visit, which was not announced in advance.

"They must have only had a few hours' notice, since the trip was kept secret. This implies a pool of willing suicide bombers available at a moment's notice," said Peter Bergen, terrorism analyst and author of "The Osama bin Laden I Know: An Oral History of Al Qaeda's Leader."

The Taliban, a radical Islamic movement that was driven from power by a U.S.-led coalition after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, are becoming tactically more like the Al Qaeda terrorists they once sheltered, analysts said.

DOJ_NMG_0137904

There were no suicide bombings in Afghanistan before 2001, when bombers disguised as Arab journalists assassinated a prominent anti-Taliban rebel, Ahmad Shah Massoud, leader of the so-called Northern Alliance. There were 27 suicide attacks in 2005 and 139 in 2006.

Seth Jones of the RAND Corp. said what amazes him is the speed with which the bombing was carried out. "It shows a very strong and well-developed infrastructure, that they could grab somebody, hand him to the handlers and carry it out in the time Cheney was there," he said.

The new concerns dovetailed with testimony Tuesday in Washington about the resurgent threat from Islamic radicals in the rugged and largely lawless borderlands between Afghanistan and Pakistan. Both the U.S. and Britain plan to increase their troops in the region in anticipation of a Taliban offensive in coming weeks.

In comments before the Senate Armed Services Committee, Director of National Intelligence Michael McConnell said Pakistan "remains a major source of Islamic extremism and the home for some top terrorist leaders."

McConnell said that while U.S. forces have killed or captured about three-quarters of Al Qaeda's leadership, equally determined militants have replaced them. He said that U.S. officials believe top Al Qaeda leaders, including Osama bin Laden and Ayman al-Zawahiri, are trying to set up an operational base for training in northwestern Pakistan, in an area outside the control of the current government.

Another intelligence official said the Taliban resurgence is being fueled in part by increased opium production—something that the Taliban cracked down on when they controlled the country.

"They now are enmeshed with opium producers with … local power brokers," said Thomas Fingar, the deputy director of National Intelligence for Analysis. "The production and the sale of opium is a major source of revenue."

The suicide bombing occurred as Cheney awoke at the vast air base nestled in the mountains outside Kabul, where he had unexpectedly spent the night because poor weather extended his planned one-day visit to Afghanistan by another day. The overnight made him the most senior member of the Bush administration to spend a night in either the Iraq or Afghanistan war zones.

At the time of the attack, the vice president was secure and deep inside the base. But the bombing sent a plume of smoke rising beyond where his military cargo jet was parked and prepared to take him to a meeting with Karzai in Kabul later Tuesday before returning to the U.S.

Cheney said he heard a "loud boom" sitting in his room at the base. The Secret Service moved him to a nearby bomb shelter, he said, but returned him to his room when "the situation settled down."

A Web site used by Islamic militants posted a message Tuesday saying that a "holy warrior" carried out a suicide attack at Bagram. "The target was [President] Bush's vice president, Dick Cheney," the message said. Separately, a purported Taliban spokesman told The Associated Press that Cheney was the target.

But U.S. military officials in Afghanistan rejected the claims and said the vice president's life was never in danger. The base has 5,100 troops, and its security perimeter includes land mines, gun turrets and razor wire.

The bomber did not attempt to get through one of the base's security checkpoints, which are manned by U.S. troops. Instead, he appeared to walk into a group of truck drivers and other Afghans who worked at the base.

"To characterize this as a direct attempt on the life of the vice president is absurd," Lt. Col. David Accetta, a spokesman for U.S. forces, told AP.

A senior administration official traveling with Cheney said the Afghan president was "upbeat" in his hourlong meeting with the vice president at the fortified presidential palace in Kabul. Cheney arrived there in an armored motorcade that weaved through the concrete-and-sandbag barriers erected in slalom fashion leading toward the palace.

The official also dismissed reports that Cheney had been dispatched to Pakistan before coming to Afghanistan in order to "beat up" on Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf for not doing more to prevent the resurgence of the militants along the border.

"Not so," he said. The idea that Cheney would "go in and threaten someone is not valid."

Tribune correspondent Aamer Madhani contributed from Washington, and Bay Fang reported from Washington.

Taliban Says It Targeted Cheney (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes, Josh Meyer And Laura King

The Los Angeles Times, February 28, 2007

WASHINGTON — U.S. and Afghan officials are investigating whether Taliban fighters who have claimed responsibility for a suicide bombing Tuesday at Bagram air base were tipped off that Vice President Dick Cheney was visiting there.

Cheney, who was staying a mile from where the bomb exploded, was not injured in the attack at the gate of the sprawling base.

DOJ_NMG_0137905

A U.S. soldier and a South Korean soldier were among those killed. Reports of the death toll varied, with the U.S. military saying nine people died and the Afghan government reporting 23 dead and 24 injured. An American contractor also was reported killed.

The attack came as concern is growing about the increasing ability of the resurgent Taliban and the tenuous stability of the U.S.-backed government in Afghanistan. The possibility that insurgents knew of a secret visit by a top U.S. official and were able to launch an attack would cast the conflict with the militant movement in a troubling new light.

The Taliban claimed responsibility for the bombing. Mullah Hayat Khan, a Taliban commander, told [a] news agency that Cheney was the target.

Government and congressional officials expressed doubt that the Taliban could have learned of the vice president's presence on the base and devised an attack so quickly.

"At this point, it simply isn't clear that it was known that Cheney was there," said a U.S. intelligence official, who, like others, spoke on condition of anonymity in discussing the investigation.

American officials also suggested that the Taliban would have attempted a more aggressive attack had it known Cheney would be at Bagram, about 25 miles north of Kabul, the Afghan capital.

"If you were in the Taliban's sandals or shoes, wouldn't you have used rockets and mortars?" asked a second U.S. intelligence official. "If you knew that this thing was happening, that the vice president was going to be there at that time, couldn't you have just brought up 30 or 40 guys and a truck?"

Cheney told reporters traveling with him that he heard a "loud boom." After the explosion, he was briefly moved to a bomb shelter before returning to his quarters.

Cheney said he was not aware of the Taliban's claim of responsibility but said such attacks were aimed at undermining the Afghan government.

"I think they clearly try to find ways to question the authority of the central government," Cheney said. "Striking at Bagram with a suicide bomber, I suppose, is one way to do that, but it shouldn't affect our behavior at all."

Cheney, traveling with the CIA's No. 2 official, arrived at Bagram late Monday afternoon after talks with Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf in Islamabad.

Deputy CIA Director Stephen Kappes accompanied Cheney to Pakistan to ensure that the vice president "had all the current information" as he pressed Musharraf for greater cooperation in fighting Al Qaeda, Director of National Intelligence J. Michael McConnell said in Senate testimony Tuesday.

The stops in Islamabad and Kabul were unannounced for security reasons, and Cheney made no public statement or appearance in either capital. The suicide bombing occurred as the vice president was preparing for a meeting with Afghan President Hamid Karzai, which had been rescheduled because of weather.

The security situation in Afghanistan has been deteriorating over the last year. The number of suicide blasts nationwide rose to 140 in 2006 from 30 in 2005, and the number of roadside bombings grew to 1,600 from 780, military officials say.

Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman acknowledged that the Bagram blast was an "aggressive attack" and said military officials had not determined whether security had been breached.

The last time militants attacked Bagram's entrance was in July, when a roadside bomb exploded just outside the gate, said Sgt. James E. Wilt, a military spokesman in Afghanistan.

Security problems have arisen at the base before. Last year, The Times was able to purchase computer drives containing classified military information at local markets nearby. The drives had been stolen from the base.

White House Press Secretary Tony Snow said there were too few facts to be able speculate on what happened or how the attacker was able to get so close to the base.

Inside Politics (WT)

By Grep Pierce

The Washington Times, February 28, 2007

Gore's utility bills

Back home in Tennessee, safely ensconced in his suburban Nashville home, former Vice President Al Gore is no doubt basking in the Oscar awarded to "An Inconvenient Truth," the documentary he inspired and in which he starred. But a local free-market think tank is trying to make that very home emblematic of what it deems Mr. Gore's environmental hypocrisy, ABC News reports.

Armed with Mr. Gore's utility bills for the past two years, the Tennessee Center for Policy Research charged Monday that the gas and electric bills for the former vice president's 20-room home and pool house devoured nearly 221,000 kilowatt-hours last year, more than 20 times the national average of 10,656 kilowatt-hours.

"If this were any other person with $30,000-a-year in utility bills, I wouldn't care," says the center's 27-year-old president, Drew Johnson. "But he tells other people how to live, and he's not following his own rules."

Kalee Kreider, a spokeswoman for the Gores, did not dispute the center's figures, taken as they were from public records. But she pointed out that both Al and Tipper Gore work out of their home, and she argued that "the bottom line is that every family has a different carbon footprint. And what Vice President Gore has asked is for families to calculate that footprint and take steps to reduce and offset it."

Bush's example

In contrast to Al Gore's profligate use of energy at his Tennessee mansion, President Bush's 4,000-square-foot house in Crawford, Texas, is "a model of environmental rectitude," according to a 2001 article by Rob Sullivan in the Chicago Tribune.

"Geothermal heat pumps located in a central closet circulate water through pipes buried 300 feet deep in the ground where the temperature is a constant 67 degrees; the water heats the house in the winter and cools it in the summer. Systems such as the one in this 'eco-friendly' dwelling use about 25 percent of the electricity that traditional heating and cooling systems utilize," the writer said.

"A 25,000-gallon underground cistern collects rainwater gathered from roof runs; wastewater from sinks, toilets and showers goes into underground purifying tanks and is also funneled into the cistern. The water from the cistern is used to irrigate the landscaping surrounding the four-bedroom home. Plants and flowers native to the high prairie area blend the structure into the surrounding ecosystem.

"No, this is not the home of some eccentrically wealthy eco-freak trying to shame his fellow citizens into following the pristineness of his self-righteous example. And no, it is not the wilderness retreat of the Sierra Club or the Natural Resources Defense Council, a haven where tree-huggers plot political strategy.

"This is President George W. Bush's 'Texas White House' outside the small town of Crawford."

Marc Morano, an aide to Senate Environment and Public Works Committee ranking member Sen. James M. Inhofe, Oklahoma Republican, posted the Tribune article yesterday at www.epw.senate.gov.

'A dead loser'

Newt Gingrich says Republicans must avoid bland centrism and Hillary-bashing if they are to win in 2008.

"There are two big facts about the 2008 election," the former House speaker said in an e-mail inviting conservatives to the Conservative Political Action Conference, which begins tomorrow at the Omni Shoreham Hotel in Washington. "Fact No. 1: Running as a bland, business-as-usual Republican will be a dead loser. In 2006, the American people repudiated the GOP because the idea of Republicans' trying to manage the liberal welfare state they inherited from the Democrats was a dead loser. I am not sure many Republican consultants have come to understand this. ...

"Fact No. 2: Focusing on an anti-Hillary campaign will also be a dead loser," Mr. Gingrich said, referring to Democratic presidential front-runner Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York. "The Clintons are the most determined and intense politicians of our lifetime. ...

"If a campaign is going to degenerate into a mud-slinging contest, the Clintons will always win because they are vastly more ready to jump into the pit. The recent attacks over David Geffen and Barack Obama are just a sample of how quickly and fiercely the Clintons will attack if the campaign is simply about who can 'out negative' whom."

Al and Strom

The biracial daughter of the late Sen. Strom Thurmond defended the former segregationist yesterday and said the Rev. Al Sharpton "overreacted" when Mr. Sharpton learned he is a descendent of a slave owned by the senator's forebears.

"In spite of the fact he was a segregationist, he did many wonderful things for black people. ... I'm not sure that Reverend Sharpton is aware of all the things he did," said Essie Mae Washington-Williams, who was in Columbia, S.C., for a speech. "I kind of feel that there was an overreaction."

Professional genealogists working for Ancestry.com found that Mr. Sharpton's great-grandfather Coleman Sharpton was a slave owned by Julia Thurmond, whose grandfather was Strom Thurmond's great-great-grandfather. Coleman Sharpton was later freed, the Associated Press reports.

When Mr. Sharpton learned of the link, he said: "It was probably the most shocking thing in my life."

Mr. Thurmond's children have acknowledged that he fathered a biracial daughter. Mrs. Williams' mother was a housekeeper in the home of Mr. Thurmond's parents.

No 'wave' in '08

In an early preview of House races in 2008, election forecaster Stuart Rothenberg says "a huge political wave favoring one party is not very likely" next year.

Mr. Rothenberg still thinks Democrats will have "plenty of opportunities again next year, including almost a dozen districts they narrowly lost and a handful of districts where they unwisely failed to field a strong challenger."

DOJ_NMG_0137907

But with the White House held by Republicans and Democrats in charge of Congress, "voters aren't going to blame one party entirely for whatever problems exist," he says in his Rothenberg Political Report newsletter.

Even so, "many observers are expecting more than a couple of senior House Republicans to retire. That could create more opportunities for Democrats."

Hate speech

The liberal Huffington Post Web site (www.huffingtonpost.com) ran a wire story yesterday about the apparent attempt to assassinate Vice President Dick Cheney in Afghanistan. A number of its readers proceeded to make postings in which they expressed regret that the attack had not succeeded.

Radio talk-show host Rush Limbaugh read about a half-dozen of the foul postings on the air yesterday, and linked to the Huffington Post from his own Web site (www.rushlimbaugh.com). Not long afterward, the Huffington Post removed the most offensive of the missives.

The Reliable Source (WP)

By Amy Argetsinger And Roxanne Roberts

The Washington Post, February 28, 2007

Talk About Your Serious Roles

We always said foreign policy was sexy, and now here's proof: Angelina Jolie is on the shortlist to join the power wonks at the Council on Foreign Relations, the exclusive New York think tank. The actress was nominated by council member Trevor Neilson, her pal and adviser on political and global matters. "There is no better way for someone who is involved in international relations to build a deep understanding of these issues," he told us yesterday.

Jolie's bid, which required two other letters of recommendation, was approved by the membership committee last week and is now "under consideration," said council spokeswoman Anya Schmemann. If she's voted in at the June board meeting, the 31-year-old Jolie will receive a five-year "term" membership (typical for younger applicants) and join 4,000 deep thinkers such as Bill Clinton, Dick Cheney, Condi Rice, Colin Powell, Madeleine Albright, Henry Kissinger, Alan Greenspan , George Soros, Barbara Walters and Lisa Ling.

You're asking yourself: Why? Jolie, currently a U.N. goodwill ambassador, can already meet with just about anyone on the planet. (And she's influential enough to have a piece about Darfur published today on The Post's op-ed page.) But at the council, she'll get a crash course in global policy from the experts. "She takes learning about these issues very seriously," said Neilson. And the wonks get a worldwide sex symbol who draws cameras every time she breathes.

We're guessing she gets in.

So Much Hobnobbing, So Little Time

So Vanessa Williams had your typical D.C. day -- you know, dropping by to see Barack Obama, then bumping into Rudy Giuliani at Charlie Palmer's.

"I live down the street from Hillary" in Chappaqua, N.Y., said the actress-singer-mom-of-four, "so I'm just a politician magnet." But no, she's not ready to endorse. "I'm impressed by so many," she demurred in that gracious VIP way.

Williams wrapped up her D.C. day in big style as well, mobbed by fans and friends at a premiere hosted by the Special Olympics (she sits on its board) for her new indie film, "My Brother." She plays the low-income mom of a disabled boy -- a part written just for her, she said. Quite a departure from her comically villainous turn on "Ugly Betty." So, what's harder -- comedy or drama? "What's harder is making bad material work." Alas, ever gracious, she didn't name names.

THIS JUST IN . . .

Â· Amanda Coluccio says that her best friend, "American Idol" contestant and Catholic U student Antonella Barba, posed for some of the PG-13 pictures flying around the Internet (as a present for a boyfriend) -- but not the X-rated shots. "It's not her nose," Coluccio told the Newark Star-Ledger after examining the naughty pix. "She's never had [acrylic nail] tips in her life. She's the least slutty person I know."

Â· James Brown is still not buried, but his trustees and partner agreed yesterday to collect DNA samples for a pending paternity battle. Brown, who died on Christmas Day, is sealed in a gold casket at an undisclosed location.

Â· The White House has named Coast Guard Adm. Stephen Rochon as chief usher -- apt, since the position requires keeping the executive mansion shipshape. He's the eighth person and first African American to hold the job.

Â· To evade detection by terrorists, Dick Cheney parked Air Force Two and flew to Pakistan and Afghanistan in a military cargo plane, the "Spirit of Strom Thurmond." (Make up your own joke. We're busy.)

HEY, ISN'T THAT . . . ?

DOJ_NMG_0137908

Â· Bill Clinton wandering around Georgetown Park mall yesterday with an army of security folk, wearing a nice navy suit. Stepped into a watch store and shook hands with a bunch of people. Just browsing? Unclear, but it was Chelsea's 27th birthday yesterday.

Â· Teddy Kennedy continuing Birthday Week festivities at Teatro Goldoni Monday night -- though this time it was apparently wife Vicki's big day. They chowed down on the lobster carpaccio, lobster risotto, foie gras -- and the just-turned-75 senator ordered an extra slice of chocolate cake.

Â· Larry King dining and drinking grappa Monday night with AOL rich guy Jim Kimsey at the new downtown restaurant Il Mulino. The CNN talker was apparently seeking world-traveler Kimsey's help in getting an interview with Cuba's Fidel Castro. Better move fast!

Qaeda Rebuilding In Pakistan, Intelligence Chief Tells Panel (NYT)

By Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, February 28, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 27 — The new director of national intelligence told members of Congress on Tuesday that senior leaders of Al Qaeda were steadily rebuilding the network's bases inside Pakistan and that future attacks against the United States could be planned from Pakistan's remote western mountains.

In his first testimony since taking office last month, Mike McConnell said Osama bin Laden and his deputy, Ayman al-Zawahri, were supervising the establishment of Qaeda camps in Pakistan similar to those that existed in Afghanistan before the Sept. 11 attacks, although he said the camps were not as fully developed as the former Afghan bases.

Mr. McConnell's appearance before the Senate Armed Services Committee followed a succession of meetings between top American officials and Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, who officials in Washington have said was not doing enough to root out Islamist militants in Pakistan's tribal areas.

"It's something we're very worried about and very concerned about," Mr. McConnell said.

Intelligence and counterterrorism officials, speaking anonymously, have spoken in the past several weeks about the new camps in Pakistan and the gradual rebuilding of Al Qaeda's command and control apparatus, but Mr. McConnell is the most senior official in Washington to describe in public what he called a growing problem.

A day earlier, the White House spokesman, Tony Snow, sidestepped questions about whether the White House was unhappy with General Musharraf's government and reaffirmed President Bush's confidence in the Pakistani president.

The top intelligence officials assembled before the Senate panel on Tuesday issued a blunter assessment.

"We believe they could do more," said Mr. McConnell, who suggested that General Musharraf could have had his eye on elections later this year when he pledged to keep Pakistani troops from carrying out military operations in the tribal areas.

Sitting beside Mr. McConnell, Lt. Gen. Michael D. Maples, director of the Defense Intelligence Agency, described the border region as a "haven for Al Qaeda's leadership." It is from that area, Mr. McConnell said, that any future attacks against the United States by Al Qaeda would most likely be planned.

General Musharraf has said repeatedly that he has done everything in his power to root out Taliban and Qaeda militants, but lawmakers were skeptical.

"Long-term prospects for eliminating the Taliban threat appear dim so long as the sanctuary remains in Pakistan, and there are no encouraging signs that Pakistan is eliminating it," said the committee's chairman, Senator Carl Levin, Democrat of Michigan.

The rebuilding of the Qaeda infrastructure in Pakistan has forced a debate within the Bush administration about how hard to press General Musharraf, and some officials have even advocated direct American airstrikes against the camps.

Administration officials said that for now the White House had ruled out any unilateral American military actions in Pakistan. Vice President Dick Cheney was said to have warned the Pakistani president during their meeting on Monday in Islamabad that Democratic members of Congress could move to cut military aid to Pakistan unless its government took stronger action against Islamist militants in the tribal areas.

The testimony before the Senate panel was intended to give lawmakers American intelligence officials' assessment of global threats. Speaking about Iraq, the officials were cautiously optimistic that the current plan to crack down on militants in Baghdad could succeed, but added that much of the plan's success would depend on the performance of the Iraqi troops.

General Maples said that two of the three Iraqi brigades designated to support the security plan had moved into Baghdad, but he said that estimates he had seen indicated that the brigades were at only 43 percent to 82 percent of their intended troop strength.

DOJ_NMG_0137909

Discussing the state of Iran's nuclear program, Mr. McConnell reaffirmed the assessment of American intelligence agencies that Iran could produce a nuclear weapon by the beginning of the next decade, but that the country more likely would not have such a weapon until 2015.

But Mr. McConnell said tough economic sanctions against Tehran could have a "dramatic" impact in getting Iran to abandon its nuclear program.

U.S. Sees New Al-Qaeda Threat (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, February 28, 2007

The new director of national intelligence said yesterday that the United States is "very concerned" that Osama bin Laden and the al-Qaeda leadership are attempting to rebuild their terrorist network and establish training camps in a region of northwest Pakistan "that has never been governed by any power."

"We inflicted a major blow, they retreated to another area, and they are going through a process to reestablish and rebuild, adapting to the seams or the weak spots as they might perceive them," retired Vice Adm. John M. McConnell told the Senate Armed Services Committee as he delivered his first global threat assessment to Capitol Hill.

While describing new al-Qaeda volunteers as "very committed individuals," McConnell also said they lack the experience of the old leadership, nearly three-quarters of which has been killed or captured. Without giving details, he said, "a number of [terrorist] plans and activities have been shut down or disrupted."

Sen. Jack Reed (D-R.I.) asked McConnell about the probability that al-Qaeda members in Pakistan or Iraq are organizing an attack on the United States -- a scenario that President Bush recently hinted at should U.S. forces withdraw from Iraq. The intelligence chief replied that an attack would "most likely" emerge from Pakistan, though he described Iraq as "a cause celebre for the jihadists in creating forces," and warned that al-Qaeda elements in Iraq, Syria and Europe are planning attacks.

McConnell also outlined some obstacles to a settlement in Iraq. The majority Shiites, he said, "are not confident of their position and . . . are worried that the Sunnis may come back and dominate the country." The Sunnis, he said, are unwilling "to admit that they are no longer in charge," and the Kurds are "biding their time to protect Kurdish interests." Overall, he said, "I think the Iraqi political leaders have close to impossible tasks."

Lt. Gen. Michael D. Maples, director of the Defense Intelligence Agency, confirmed for the committee that weapons training for Iraqi militia members is being provided in Iran as well as in Hezbollah camps in Lebanon. Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.) called the Iranian training "a very serious act and one that we ought to consider taking steps to stop in defense of our soldiers."

Sen. Evan Bayh (Ind.) was one of several Democrats who questioned the decision to include an assessment of a "rapid withdrawal" of coalition forces from Iraq as part of the recent National Intelligence Estimate. The NIE judgment was that such a withdrawal would increase violence and hasten deterioration of the situation in Iraq -- a finding that has since been cited by Bush and others who support a troop increase and oppose withdrawal.

National Intelligence Council Chairman Thomas Fingar, who supervised production of the NIE, told the Senate panel that "unquestionably and categorically" there had been no political pressure to shape the estimate.

"I'm not criticizing your bona fides," Bayh told Fingar, "but I do care about the credibility of your work product . . . and when you start down that slippery slope, you just get into these kinds of arguments."

Lawmakers praised McConnell and his colleagues for their candid testimony. At one point, when asked about recent reports that Shiite leader Moqtada al-Sadr appeared to be both for and against the increase in troops in Baghdad, the president's chief intelligence adviser said, "I don't know what Sadr's position is. . . . I'd be guessing."

Spy Chief Pushes For Action In Pakistan (AP)

By Katherine Shrader

AP, February 28, 2007

More must be done to go after al-Qaida, which is trying to establish training camps and other operations in some of Pakistan's most ungoverned territory, the new U.S. spy chief said Tuesday.

"It's something we're very worried about and very concerned about," Mike McConnell told the Senate Armed Services Committee in a hearing on global threats.

McConnell said the U.S. believes al-Qaida's top two leaders — Osama bin Laden and Ayman al-Zawahri — are hiding in the rugged frontiers of northwestern Pakistan and are attempting to establish an operational base there. He noted that al-Qaida's camps are in an area that has never been governed by any state or outside power.

DOJ_NMG_0137910

McConnell's push for action along the Afghan-Pakistani border echoed concerns raised by Vice President Dick Cheney during a face-to-face meeting Monday with Pakistani President Gen. Pervez Musharraf. Cheney was accompanied by Deputy CIA Director Stephen Kappes — a sign that intelligence played a strong role in the case made to Musharraf.

Musharraf has insisted his forces have already "done the maximum" possible against extremists in their territory, and he said other allies also shoulder responsibility in the U.S.-led war on terrorism.

But U.S. officials have grown increasingly concerned about intelligence suggesting the Taliban and al-Qaida plan a spring offensive against allied forces in neighboring Afghanistan.

They are also worried about the autonomy of al-Qaida and Taliban operatives in Pakistan after the government signed a peace deal with the tribal leaders of the region, North Waziristan, in September.

In that agreement, tribal elders promised to respect the supremacy of the Pakistani government and curtail attacks in Afghanistan. In return, Musharraf gave back some of the tribes' weapons, released some prisoners and withdrew from posts inside North Waziristan.

At Tuesday's hearing, Lt. Gen. Michael Maples, head of the Defense Intelligence Agency, said the tribes have not abided by most of the agreement's terms. And McConnell said U.S. intelligence believes al-Qaida's training and related capabilities increased as a result of the deal.

Lawmakers were skeptical, too.

"Long-term prospects for eliminating the Taliban threat appear dim so long as the sanctuary remains in Pakistan, and there are no encouraging signs that Pakistan is eliminating it," said Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin, D-Mich.

In his first month as national intelligence director, McConnell said he's been briefed about al-Qaida's efforts to reconstitute itself in Pakistan's northwest frontier.

He said the group does not have the thousands of fighters, training in multiple camps, as they did in Afghanistan before the 2001 U.S.-led invasion. "That's gone," he said.

But McConnell said U.S. intelligence believes al-Qaida still has volunteers committed to carrying out "heinous attacks" akin to Sept. 11, 2001. And while three-quarters of al-Qaida's leaders have been taken out, they have been replaced by equally committed jihadists. The upside: McConnell said the new generation doesn't have as much experience.

Pressuring al-Qaida is not without its risks for Musharraf, who faces an election this fall. McConnell acknowledged that efforts to pursue the terror group must be balanced with the desire to keep Musharraf — a moderate and a U.S. ally — in charge of Pakistan and its nuclear arsenal.

The testimony from Maples and McConnell was part of the Senate panel's annual review of global threats, including the latest assessments on Iran, Iraq and North Korea. Touching on those hot spots, they said:

_Iraqi troops are taking the lead in securing parts of their country, but much work remains to improve the number and quality of those forces. "They are better today than they were a year ago, but they are still not where we need them to be," McConnell said.

Maples said two of the three brigades promised by Iraq have moved into Baghdad as part of the new security plan, but he acknowledged that those units have only 43 percent to 82 percent of their intended troops, according to ranges he has seen.

_On Iran, McConnell said that the regime could develop a nuclear weapon early in the next decade, but it will more likely take the country's scientists until 2015. But it's not clear whether the country will have a delivery system at the same time.

_Maples said the United States is seeing North Korea take initial steps to comply with the Feb. 13 agreement on its nuclear program, including inspection of its plutonium-producing Yongbyon nuclear facility. But there are other steps to which the U.S. will have to pay close attention, he said.

McConnell's top adviser on North Korea, Joseph DeTrani, said the U.S. continues to insist that North Korea declare all of its nuclear programs. But he backtracked a bit from a previous U.S. view of analysts, who had "high confidence" that North Korea was buying material for a uranium production program.

Now, he said, the U.S. believes the program exists "at the midconfidence level."

US Ramps Up Taliban Fight (CSM)

By Mark Sappenfield

The Christian Science Monitor, February 28, 2007

KABUL, AFGHANISTAN

Vice President Dick Cheney came to Afghanistan on an unannounced visit Tuesday to remind Americans of the importance of the first, and often forgotten, front in the war on terror. A Taliban suicide bomber who failed in an attempt to assassinate Mr. Cheney here helped to make a compelling case for him.

DOJ_NMG_0137911

Since last summer, when the Taliban seized entire districts in the southernmost provinces and attempted to encircle Kabul, the United States has refocused its attention on Afghanistan.

Recently, the Bush administration proposed $10.6 billion in aid, announced the overhaul of its diplomatic mission here, and increased the number of American troops to 27,000 – the highest level since the 2001 invasion.

It is, in part, an attempt to save what has been promoted as the administration's great overseas achievement, even as Iraq slips further into chaos. But Tuesday's events are indicative of the Taliban's eagerness to escalate the fight, and analysts question whether America's increased commitment to Afghanistan will be sufficient to make the country's democratic experiment successful.

"For so long, Afghanistan was held up as the success story," says Paul Fishstein, director of the Afghanistan Research and Evaluation Unit, an independent analysis organization. "Now it seems that much of what has been touted as building a pluralistic, open democracy is at risk."

Tuesday's attack comes at a time of relative peace around Kabul, which has not seen a suicide attack for months.

Mr. Cheney was staying at Bagram Air Base, about 40 miles north of the capital. When the bomber was unable to get beyond the front gate because of security, he blew himself up, according to coalition officials. At press time, casualty figures were uncertain, but at least 23 were killed. NATO reported that at least one US soldier, an American contractor, and a South Korean solder were among the dead. President Hamid Karzai's office said that some 20 Afghan workers at the base lost their lives.

Cheney said that the attackers were trying "to find ways to question the authority of the central government." The Taliban, who have claimed responsibility for the attack through a spokesman, say that Cheney was the intended target.

It is not yet clear whether this attack heralds an expansion of the Taliban offensive into the relatively stable north. The Taliban are strongest in Afghanistan's southern provinces, where they are widely believed to receive haven and support in neighboring Pakistan.

Their offensive in the region last year created lawless enclaves – with much of the area still controlled by neither the government nor the insurgents. The situation has jolted the West – and the US in particular – into action. "Last year seemed to wake the international community to the fact that this war was not a complete success," says a Western diplomat, who would discuss the issue only on condition of anonymity. "In fact, it was a potential failure."

The US has responded with the $10.6 billion aid package, with some $8 billion of that earmarked for the Afghan Army and police. The White House and Congress alike have increased pressure on Pakistan to control its borders. And a month ago, the US gave the Afghan Army 800 military vehicles and 12,000 guns, in hopes of gradually making it more self-sufficient.

In some respects, Afghanistan might benefit from America's mounting weariness with the Iraq war. Just after becoming Speaker of the House, Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D) of California traveled to Afghanistan and commented that the country needs "much more of an effort" from the US and NATO – in contrast to her position that the US should withdraw from Iraq.

While Mr. Bush has not shown any signs of lessening his commitment to Iraq, he has clearly made more room for Afghanistan on his foreign-policy platform. When the issue of the Iraq troop surge was recently before Congress, Bush took the opportunity to deliver a speech solely about Afghanistan.

It was more than just a diversion. Frustrated by most NATO nations' unwillingness to commit troops to the volatile south, the US this month decided to send a brigade to Afghanistan that was scheduled to go to Iraq. Britain has increased its troop levels in Afghanistan by 1,400 to 7,700 – meaning it will soon have more troops in Afghanistan than Iraq.

But in Italy, Prime Minister Romano Prodi resigned after dissension over Italy's involvement in Afghanistan, something he continued to defend as he opened a Senate debate ahead of a confidence vote on his government scheduled for Wednesday. Italy has about 1,800 troops in the country.

And in Canada, which has some 2,500 soldiers in Afghanistan, a fourth probe was opened Tuesday into whether soldiers knew about possible torture of detainees after they were handed over to Afghan authorities.

Most government officials and nongovernmental organizations welcome US help. But some analysts worry that the US will continue to throw money and manpower at effects, while ignoring the causes of Afghanistan's problems.

Top among those they say, is reforming the Afghan government, which is increasingly controlled by warlords and drug money from the illegal poppy trade.

As in Iraq, the United States rushed to install a democratic government in a place not prepared for it, they add, ignoring what were, perhaps, larger problems.

After the Taliban, "Afghans were not jumping up and down, saying, 'We want to vote for a president,' " says an aid expert who has worked in the region for decades but requested anonymity because he was not cleared to speak with the media. "They wanted jobs. They wanted services."

In the end, many say, it not only let in criminals and warlords but created unrealistic expectations, as both Afghans and the international community believed Afghanistan was further along than it was.

DOJ_NMG_0137912

"The excessive focus on the elections as an indictor for success was misleading," says Mr. Fishstein.

Even now, the notion of giving $10.6 billion to a government with neither the means nor the expertise to spend it strikes some as well-intentioned, but fruitless.

Regarding the Afghan government's ability to act, the aid expert says, "You're navigating glaciers here because they are so slow."

Advance warning?

While the attack on Bagram Air Base during Vice President Dick Cheney's Afghanistan visit could be a coincidence, analysts say, it's more likely that the attackers had advance notice that Mr. Cheney would be there.

The first wire-service report mentioning that the Vice President was at Bagram came an hour before the attack. But such assaults usually require more lead time. "They had to have many hours, or days, to plan this," says Rita Katz of the Site Institute in Washington, which tracks statements by jihad groups, including the Taliban claim that they were seeking to kill Cheney.

Ms. Katz says that it's likely the Taliban carried out the attack and that they had inside information.

The US military disagrees. Maj. William Mitchell told the Associated Press that speculation they were after Cheney is "far-fetched," noting that his travel plans changed at the last minute.

While suicide attacks more than quadrupled throughout Afghanistan last year, to 139, at Bagram they are rare. This was the first suicide attack at Bagram since last July.

Warning To Pakistan (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 28, 2007

On Monday, Vice President Dick Cheney met with Pakistan President Pervez Musharraf on what was billed as an "unannounced" visit to Islamabad. Yesterday, during what was also supposed to be a secret trip to Afghanistan, a suicide bomber killed himself and up to 23 others outside of Bagram Air Base, where Mr. Cheney was staying at the time.

There's no need to accuse Pakistani intelligence of tipping off the Taliban about Mr. Cheney's whereabouts to see a connection between decisions in Islamabad and terrorism in Bagram. Mr. Cheney reportedly delivered a stiff message to Mr. Musharraf about the need for Pakistan to deny the Taliban sanctuary along its frontier with Afghanistan. That's a message Islamabad needs to hear, even if an Islamabad spokeswoman did insist after Mr. Cheney's visit that "Pakistan does not accept dictation."

This is not to say the Musharraf government has done nothing in the fight against terror. Hundreds of Pakistani soldiers have died fighting Taliban elements, and Pakistani cooperation was essential in the killing or capture of such al Qaeda ringleaders as Khalid Sheikh Mohammed. General Musharraf has twice been the target of Islamist assassination attempts. But his government has been suspected of cutting deals of convenience with Islamist political groups, and it has formed alliances with pro-Taliban forces in Pakistan's parliament, in a common front against secular democrats who might come to power if the General allowed a truly free election.

Still worse, from the U.S. perspective, was the agreement Islamabad signed in September with the Taliban, tribal elders and "local mujahadeen" from North Waziristan. That agreement allowed the Taliban to operate unfettered in the province in exchange for a promise not to launch raids into Afghanistan. The number of raids has since more than doubled, say Afghan and U.S. military sources.

One immediate result is that Congressional Democrats, including House Foreign Affairs Chairman Tom Lantos, are floating measures to curb U.S. arms sales to Pakistan, an echo of the Pressler Amendment that took effect when the first Bush Administration de-certified Pakistan as a non-nuclear state.

Nobody should want to reprise that chapter of U.S.-Pakistan relations, which did nothing to stop Pakistan's nuclear ambitions (or, later, its support for the Taliban) while denying the U.S. the diplomatic leverage it previously had with Pakistan governments. But sanctions will only become more likely if the American public sees Pakistan as an enabler of the Taliban in its campaign to destabilize the Karzai government in Kabul and kill Americans, including the Vice President.

Policing its long and mountainous border with Afghanistan has exacted a high price in Pakistani lives and treasure. Failing to police it may exact a higher one.

DOJ:

Inside Bush's Prosecutor Purge (SALON)

By Mark Follman

Salon.com, February 28, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0137913

Why has the administration fired U.S. attorneys with sterling track records? To make room for its political loyalists, critics say, and exert its last shred of control.

Ever since the Bush administration shocked the legal community by dismissing eight U.S. attorneys in December, Justice Department leaders have vigorously denied that the firings were politically motivated. "I would never, ever make a change in the United States attorney position for political reasons," Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said in Senate testimony in early January. In a Feb. 6 hearing, Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty told lawmakers, "When I hear you talk about the politicizing of the Department of Justice, it's like a knife in my heart."

But at least three of the eight fired attorneys were told by a superior they were being forced to resign to make jobs available for other Bush appointees, according to a former senior Justice Department official knowledgeable about their cases. That stands in contradiction to administration claims that the firings were related either to job performance or policy differences. A fourth U.S. attorney was told by a top Justice Department official that the dismissal in that attorney's case was not necessarily related to job performance. Meanwhile, U.S. Attorney David Iglesias in New Mexico -- who officially steps down from his post on Wednesday, and who says he was never told by superiors about any problems with his work -- plans to go public with documentation of the achievements of his office.

"I never received any indication at all of a problem" regarding performance or policy differences, Iglesias told Salon on Monday. "That only leaves a third option: politics."

Iglesias acknowledged that U.S. attorneys serve at the pleasure of the president and can be dismissed without cause. "But it's really been maddening," he said, that the administration is using job-performance issues to defend the firings. Iglesias, who took the job in 2001, noted that his office got a "very positive" evaluation in the Justice Department's own internal ratings system as recently as last fall and that he received a letter from the Executive Office of U.S. Attorneys in January 2006 commending him for his "exemplary leadership in the Department's priority programs," including antiterrorism, community crime prevention and law enforcement coordination.

"I was shocked by the call on Dec. 7" telling him to resign, Iglesias said. He added, "I think Americans need to have full confidence that their federal prosecutors are above politics."

Suspicions about the unusual purge of eight U.S. attorneys in December burst into the open within the legal community and on Capitol Hill after McNulty conceded in Senate testimony on Feb. 6 that the U.S. attorney in Arkansas, Bud Cummins, was pushed out for no reason other than to give someone else a shot at the job. Using a little-noticed provision in the Patriot Act allowing interim appointments, Gonzales gave the post to Timothy Griffin -- who had been both an operative for the Republican National Committee and a deputy to senior White House advisor Karl Rove -- in what many believe was a maneuver to sidestep the traditional Senate confirmation process for U.S. attorneys.

More recently, U.S. attorney Carole Lam, who is best known for nailing corrupt Republican Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham and his partners in crime, was replaced on Feb. 15 by Karen P. Hewitt, who according to a Justice Department press release, "will serve on an interim basis until a United States Attorney is nominated by the president and confirmed by the Senate." According to an Op-Ed in Monday's New York Times, Hewitt has a résumé with "almost no criminal law experience" and is a member of the Federalist Society, a conservative legal group.

While Cummins was first informed of his dismissal last June, it wasn't until Dec. 7 that Michael Battle, a top Justice Department official, informed the rest of the group of U.S. attorneys in phone calls that they would be required to step down. That group included Daniel Bogden in Nevada, Paul Charlton in Arizona, John McKay in Seattle, Carole Lam in San Diego, and David Iglesias in New Mexico -- all of whom had received positive job reviews before they were dismissed and some of whom are viewed by colleagues and law enforcement officials as exceptional leaders. Most of them have said publicly that they were never told of any management or policy problems by their superiors.

According to the former senior Justice Department official, one of the U.S. attorneys in the group was told by Battle on Dec. 7: "It's hard not to think you did something wrong when you get a call like this, but that's not always the case." Two other U.S. attorneys in the group, upon seeking clarification from superiors in Washington, were told by a different top Justice Department official that they were being pushed out to give other Bush appointees their posts. A current senior Justice Department official confirmed that one of those two was Bogden in Nevada. Bryan Roehrkasse, a public affairs spokesman for the Justice Department, declined to comment about "specific personnel matters."

Former officials, legal scholars and U.S. lawmakers from both parties have publicly questioned the administration's stated rationale for the firings and have suggested troubling theories about the real reasons for the housecleaning, which experts say is without precedent. Some former Justice Department officials say they believe the administration's moves are a politically driven power grab -- aimed not only at a tighter grip on policy from Washington, but also at creating openings with which to reward their friends and build up a bench of conservative loyalists positioned to serve in powerful posts in future administrations.

DOJ_NMG_0137914

"It's really remarkable to have a wholesale removal of an administration's own U.S. attorneys, particularly this deep into the term," said John Kroger, a federal prosecutor under Clinton and Bush who now teaches at Lewis & Clark Law School in Portland, Ore. "Clearly there was a concerted decision made to ask a bunch of them to leave. It suggests a desire to more tightly control policy. With the Democrats in control of Congress, perhaps it's because this is one of the few levers of government they have left."

Many point to the Cummins firing as proof that the administration is lying. "It is simply not believable that these were all performance-based dismissals, and everyone knows it," said a veteran prosecutor who served for a decade in the Justice Department until 2005. He also noted that he found it interesting that half of the posts cleared out are in the Southwest, where immigration is a key issue.

Kroger added that a stint as U.S. attorney is often a springboard to federal judgeships or other prestigious appointments. "Being a U.S. attorney is a huge credential, one a lot of people would like to have," he said. "It certainly looks like they're clearing out spots to reward loyalists in the last two years of the administration."

To support their claim that the dismissals were performance related, Bush officials have pointed to one among the fired U.S. attorneys, Kevin Ryan in San Francisco, who has been widely reported to be a focus of management complaints. The firing of Margaret Chiara in Michigan, the eighth U.S. attorney caught up in the December purge, was not made public until last Friday. To date, no explanation for her dismissal has been provided by Chiara or administration officials, but the former senior Justice Department official confirmed she was asked to resign in December and was in negotiations to stay in her post.

Realistically, federal appointments are never apolitical. But while U.S. attorneys serve at the pleasure of the president, they are traditionally recommended by federal judges and senators from the regions they serve, and are ultimately confirmed by the Senate. But thanks to a change put into the Patriot Act by Pennsylvania Republican Arlen Specter when it was reauthorized in late 2005, Gonzales and the White House gained the power to fill vacancies with interim appointees who can hold office for indefinite terms. Earlier this month, the Senate Judiciary Committee put forth legislation to restore limits for those terms (and thereby congressional vetting for long-term hires), but a full Senate vote on the bill was blocked by Republicans.

Incoming presidents are known to overhaul the corps of U.S. attorneys installed by prior administrations. Upon taking office, both Presidents Clinton and Bush replaced nearly all of the head prosecutors serving in the Justice Department's 94 districts nationwide. But it is rare for even one U.S. attorney to otherwise be dismissed during a president's term -- and in this case, all those dismissed by Bush were his own appointees.

Experts see a continuing pattern that began long ago: A Bush White House seizing greater executive power to the detriment of democratic principle.

"No doubt this is a threat to the independent stature that the Justice Department as an institution has enjoyed over the years," said Sam Buell, an associate professor at Washington University School of Law in St. Louis and a former federal prosecutor under the current President Bush. "It goes against the 'hands off' tradition, which has insulated U.S. attorneys from criticisms of politics influencing their choices and handling of cases. This doesn't look like a decision that's been made in the best interest of law enforcement."

Indeed, several of the fired attorneys had stellar track records. Like Iglesias in New Mexico, Daniel Bogden steps down Wednesday from the helm of a U.S. attorney's office in Nevada that saw unsurpassed achievements in law enforcement during his tenure. In a phone interview Monday, Bogden cited a record number of cases targeting guns, drugs, identity theft and sexual exploitation, among other criminal issues.

"To this day, I've never been told of any deficiencies in my performance or that of my office," he said. "I've never been called by anyone suggesting that I should do something differently on policy, or that I was going against their policy."

In Seattle, John McKay's record as U.S. attorney has left many observers baffled by his dismissal. The raison d'être of the Bush White House is supposed to be the war on terrorism -- and McKay, by many measures, was an invaluable lieutenant in that battle.

McKay was appointed by Bush shortly after terrorists struck the United States on Sept. 11, 2001. Over the next five years, in a major port city and a border region critical for antiterrorist operations, he personally handled high-profile prosecutions, including that of Ahmed Ressam, who had driven across the Canada-U.S. border with plans to bomb Los Angeles International Airport at the turn of the millennium. In 2004, at a time when poor coordination among law enforcement agencies had been judged at least partly to blame for the 9/11 attacks, McKay developed an innovative data-sharing system that continues to be rolled out today in law enforcement offices nationwide.

Just over five months ago, on Sept. 22, 2006, the Justice Department completed a comprehensive evaluation of McKay's office, filled with high marks on both criminal and counterterrorism matters, including McKay's efforts to build greater cooperation among law enforcement agencies in both the United States and Canada. McKay "has been responsible for major advances in a cooperative cross-border effort," the report said. "All involved in these efforts pointed to U.S. Attorney McKay as the individual most responsible for the dramatic increase in cooperation."

DOJ_NMG_0137915

"The report says nothing about me with regard to management or policy differences," McKay said in an interview last week. "Counterterrorism was our No. 1 priority, and I put an enormous amount of my personal time into it." He added, "If there were performance issues of any kind, they didn't tell me about it, and to this day I'm unaware of any."

"This is a huge loss," said Gil Kerlikowske, Seattle's chief of police. "I've worked with a lot of U.S. attorneys in my time and John is absolutely at the top of the ladder, not only on issues of terrorism but on law enforcement in general. I can tell you that if they're saying John's dismissal was performance related ... I find that almost inconceivable." Kerlikowske noted that McKay had invaluable perspective, having served as a White House fellow at the FBI. "He knew how tough the barriers could be between law enforcement agencies, and he really helped break down those walls with information sharing."

"He was a champion with all the federal law enforcement agencies, but especially with ATF," said Kelvin Crenshaw, a 19-year veteran of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms and the special agent in charge of the Seattle field office. "He's one of the best U.S. attorneys I've ever worked with."

Administration officials have declined to provide further explanation for any of the attorneys' dismissals, including McKay's. On Feb. 14, McNulty, the deputy attorney general, gave a private briefing to the Senate Judiciary Committee, but afterward, Patty Murray, D-Wash., said, "I heard nothing from Department of Justice officials that changed my mind about John McKay's performance." Other senators who were present concurred with that view, according to a Democratic congressional aide briefed on the closed-door session.

Questions remain about how the Bush administration will seek to fill the newly vacant posts. Some former Justice Department officials say they believe that the Bush administration has since revised its plans to reward political loyalists with the jobs, due to the backlash against the decision to push out Cummins and hand his post to Griffin in Arkansas. Earlier this month, the administration withdrew Griffin's name from consideration for a permanent appointment, though he remains in office indefinitely.

If other recent appointees are an indication, the administration may be intent on installing conservatives with close ties to the White House. According to a Jan. 26 report by McClatchy Newspapers, since last March the administration has named at least nine U.S. attorneys who fit that profile, most of them hand-picked by Gonzales under the little-noticed provision of the Patriot Act that has since become law. They include Jeff Taylor, previously an aide to both Gonzales and former Attorney General John Ashcroft; Alexander Acosta, a protégé of conservative Supreme Court Justice Samuel Alito; and Edward McNally, a former senior associate counsel to President Bush.

And some critics expect that, despite the recent uproar over Cummins and the other attorneys' firings, the Bush White House will continue to find ways to erode the independence of the Justice Department.

"This is an administration that has not hesitated to discard conventional wisdom just because people say it's wrong," said Buell, the former federal prosecutor under Bush. "This is an administration that looks at the landscape and isn't afraid to rewrite the rules and say, 'We're going to do it our own way.'"

Justice Pilots Federated ID Broker (GCN)

By Joab Jackson, GCN Staff

Government Computer News, February 28, 2007

The Justice Department is piloting a federated identity management system that could be used to verify government online identities across different agencies.

The Law Enforcement Information Sharing Program, run by Justice's Office of the Chief Information Officer, could offer validated user credentials to multiple applications across multiple agencies, noted Boris Shur, a Justice IT manager who is working on the pilot. Shur outlined the project at the Collaborative Expedition Workshop, held today in Arlington, Va.

The system works by establishing a trust broker to act as a liaison between applications and providers of user credentials. With a trust broker in place, a user can request access to an application outside his or her own agency, and that application can request credentials from that broker, which has gathered such credentials from the identity providers.

Such a federated approach could cut the complexity that would ensue as more applications are opened to outside agencies. The trust broker could eliminate the need to establish individual handshakes between applications and identity providers. It could also cut down on the format headaches, as both applications and identity providers can communicate with the trusted broker in its own native format and protocol. It is up to the trusted broker to provide all the relevant protocols and formats, Shur said. At present, the LEISP system communicates credentials using the Public Key Infrastructure, the Security Assertion Markup Language and the Web Services Federation Language. It interacts with a number of applications as well as with a number of identity servers, such as the Sun One Identity Server and the Hewlett-Packard OpenView Select Federation.

The pilot will run until July, and the program managers plan to issue a report afterwards that assesses this federated approach.

"If [the pilot] is good enough, it is our intention to establish a trusted-broker infrastructure, within at least DOJ," Shur said.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Former McAfee GC Indicted Over Stock Options (LAW)

By Justin Scheck, The Recorder

California Recorder, February 28, 2007

Kent Roberts, the former chief counsel at McAfee Inc., on Tuesday became the first Silicon Valley lawyer charged in the stock options backdating debacle.

Roberts faces six counts of mail fraud, wire fraud and filing false SEC documents in connection with options grants given to himself and ex-McAfee CEO George Samenuk in 2000 and 2002.

The 11-page charging document (.pdf) tracks what Justice Department officials have repeatedly said they're looking for in deciding to charge in options cases: evidence of intentional fraud -- most importantly, concealing options manipulation.

The indictment says that in 2000, Roberts, who joined the company then called Network Associates in 1998, changed the grant date -- and thus lowered the price by nearly $10 a share -- on 20,000 options given to him by the board.

According to the charging document, Roberts was concerned that the original price of the options would not have benefited him since McAfee's share price was dropping at the time.

Months later, the indictment said, Roberts "caused the grant date to be changed to April 14, 2000, and he caused the exercise price to be changed to $19.75, which was the closing price of Network Associates' stock on the new, fabricated grant date," the indictment says.

While that may have been problematic, the indictment says Roberts exacerbated the situation in 2002, the year he became one of the three company officials on the "Ethics First Committee," which the company formed to root out internal problems that had resulted in past legal messes.

In that capacity, Roberts investigated the former controller, the indictment says, looking at allegations that the controller had manipulated options grant prices for employees of the company.

"As a result of the investigation, Roberts recommended, and Network Associates' management agreed, to remove the then-controller from his position in the finance department," the indictment says. It also accuses Roberts of covering up his own problematic grant during a subsequent audit.

The indictment's remaining charges involve a 2002 grant to then-CEO Samenuk, and the subsequent SEC filings relating to options awards.

Stephen Neal, the Cooley Godward Kronish partner representing Roberts, was traveling Tuesday and couldn't be reached for comment.

Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati partner Robert Feldman, whose firm represents McAfee, declined to comment.

HERE COMES TROUBLE

Roberts' problems first became clear in May when he was fired after an internal company probe determined that he was involved in troubling practices. Samenuk retired around the same time, and the SEC and San Francisco U.S. Attorney's Office began investigating.

In December, prosecutors were close to indicting Roberts when Assistant U.S. Attorney Christopher Steskal, the head of the investigation, announced he was leaving the office for Fenwick & West.

Assistant U.S. attorneys Eumi Choi and Timothy Lucey took over the probe, and earlier this month, the prosecutors decided to seek an indictment. But it was again delayed, this time by coordination problems with the Washington SEC lawyers also working on the case.

In the end, the U.S. Attorney's Office filed charges on its own without a corresponding SEC complaint.

Roberts is the first Silicon Valley general counsel to be accused of criminal fraud in connection with backdating, but he's not the first top legal officer indicted or forced to resign.

Last year, William Sorin, the GC of Comverse, was charged with securities fraud in New York; he later pleaded guilty.

Roberts is the third former executive in the past two weeks to be accused of illegally rigging stock options, joining the former CEO of video game maker Take-Two Interactive Software Inc. and a former senior vice president for Monster Worldwide. Both companies are based in New York.

DOJ_NMG_0137917

Last summer, Northern California prosecutors charged several former executives at San Jose, Calif.'s Brocade Communications Systems Inc. Brooklyn prosecutors indicted several Comverse Technology Inc. executives, including a general counsel, with felonies around the same time.

Other stock options cases appear to be looming. Prosecutors are looking closely at former executives at dozens of companies, including Apple Inc., KLA-Tencor and Broadcom Corp.

McAfee is well-known to federal prosecutors and SEC lawyers. In 2004, the company's former CFO was charged with falsely inflating revenues; he'll stand trial beginning next month. And last year, the company agreed to pay a $50 million fine for cooking its books.

Sources familiar with the case said the McAfee investigation will continue to look at options conduct.

Reporter Jessie Seyfer and The Associated Press contributed to this report.

Ex-McAfee Counsel Charged With Fraud (FT)

By Kevin Allison In San Francisco And Brooke Masters In New York

Financial Times, February 28, 2007

Federal prosecutors on Tuesday charged McAfee's former top lawyer with fraud for his role in a stock options backdating scheme at the anti-virus software group.

Kent Roberts, 50, stands accused of granting himself extra compensation by manipulating the grant dates of stock options awarded to himself and to other McAfee employees.

If found guilty, he could face up to 20 years in jail and a fine of up to $250,000.

Mr Roberts's lawyer could not be reached for comment on Tuesday.

The indictment marked the latest sign that federal prosecutors and the SEC are pressing forward quickly with their cases against individuals involved with stock options backdating.

Earlier this month, the former general counsel of Monster Worldwide, the online jobs site, pleaded guitly to separate backdating charges.

Federal authorities are probing options granting practices at dozens of other companies, including Apple and Broadcom.

In many cases, investigators may be running up against statutory deadlines which require prosecutors to bring securities fraud cases within five years. Much of the options backdating appears to have ceased after the SEC changed disclosure rules for options grants in 2002.

The progress on the cases against individuals stands in contrast to a growing logjam of corporate options cases. SEC commissioners have been unable to agree on how harshly to penalize companies involved in backdating.

The justice department said on Tuesday that Mr Roberts "fraudulently concealed and failed to disclose" changes to a 2000 options grant. The changes inflated the value of the grant by making it appear as if it was made on a date when the company's share price was lower.

Prosecutors also accused Mr Roberts of making a false entry in the minutes from a 2002 board meeting. The minutes concerned an options grant to McAfee's then-chief executive and chairman.

McAfee's Ex-Lawyer Indicted (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, February 28, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO, Feb. 27 (AP) — The former top lawyer of McAfee Inc. was charged on Tuesday with stock options tampering that muddied the finances of the computer security software maker.

A federal grand jury indicted the lawyer, Kent Roberts, nine months after McAfee fired him as its general counsel for "improper" handling of stock options issued in 2000.

The lawyer for Mr. Roberts, Stephen Neal, was not available for comment.

The indictment includes seven criminal counts of fraud, accusing Mr. Roberts of deceiving investors by filing false statements with the Securities and Exchange Commission and falsifying McAfee's books.

Besides shedding more light on the apparent misconduct of Mr. Roberts, the case provides the latest indication that the government crackdown on corporate America's widespread stock option abuses is progressing beyond the evidence-gathering stage.

Mr. Roberts became the third former executive in the last two weeks to be accused of illegally rigging stock options, joining the former chief executive of the video game maker Take-Two Interactive Software Inc. and a former senior vice president for the company that owns the online job search site Monster.com.

DOJ_NMG_0137918

The government's investigation, spanning more than 100 companies nationwide, is primarily focused on the practice of backdating stock options.

Backdating is not necessarily illegal, as long as it is properly disclosed and recorded on the books.

McAfee's Ex-general Counsel Indicted In Stock-option Backdating Case (USAT)

By Edward Iwata

USA Today, February 28, 2007

The former general counsel of security software giant McAfee in Silicon Valley was indicted Tuesday by a federal grand jury in San Francisco on charges of fraudulent dating of stock-option grants for himself and others.

The indictment alleges that Kent Roberts, 50, of Dallas caused a former controller at McAfee — then called Network Associates — to change the grant date and exercise price on Roberts' option of 20,000 shares of company stock so his grant would be "in the money."

Since the backdating scandal arose last year, criminal charges have been brought against former executives at Brocade Communications Systems, Comverse Technology and Take-Two Interactive Software. About 200 companies have disclosed internal or federal investigations of their options grants.

Several corporate general counsels have resigned or been fired as a result of those investigations.

General counsels are expected to monitor a company's legal and financial doings, so the spate of in-house attorneys involved in backdating cases is especially alarming to corporate-governance experts.

In the McAfee case, Roberts allegedly hid the fraudulent change from auditors, executives and directors at Network Associates even as he led an internal investigation into backdating at the company in 2002, the indictment says. The same year, Roberts made a false entry in board meeting minutes to backdate an option on 420,000 shares of Network Associates stock for former CEO and chairman George Samenuk, the indictment says. McAfee last fall announced Samenuk's retirement and also said former president Kevin Weiss had been fired. The company could record a charge of up to $150 million.

Roberts, who joined Network Associates in 1998, was fired in May after the company's finance department found the fraudulent change, according to prosecutors. He was charged with seven counts of mail and wire fraud, making false filings to the Securities and Exchange Commission and falsifying records. He could face up to 20 years in prison for each count, plus millions in fines. Roberts' attorney, Stephen Neal, said, "We intend to vigorously defend Mr. Roberts."

Last year, McAfee disclosed that the SEC was investigating its stock-option backdating practices.

In recent years, the SEC has filed four lawsuits alleging fraudulent accounting issues at McAfee. Last year, the SEC charged the company with a financial fraud from 1998 to 2000 that led to overstating revenue by $622 million.

Fired McAfee Executive Is Charged With Options Fraud (WP/AP)

By Michael Liedtke, Associated Press

The Washington Post, February 28, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO -- McAfee's former top lawyer was charged Tuesday with stock options tampering that muddied the finances of the computer security software maker.

A federal grand jury indicted Kent Roberts nine months after McAfee, based in Santa Clara, Calif., fired him as its general counsel for what it called "improper" handling of stock options issued in 2000.

Roberts's attorney, Stephen Neal, was traveling Tuesday and was unavailable for immediate comment.

The indictment includes seven criminal counts of fraud, alleging that Roberts deceived investors by filing false statements with the Securities and Exchange Commission and falsifying McAfee's books.

Roberts's indictment comes less than two weeks after two other former executives, Ryan Brant of Take-Two Interactive Software and Myron Olesnyckyj of Monster International, pleaded guilty to illegally rigging options in unrelated cases.

The government's investigation, spanning more than 100 companies nationwide, is primarily focused on the practice of backdating stock options, when company insiders retroactively pick an ebb in the stock price to determine an option's value, maximizing the potential windfall for the award's recipient.

Backdating isn't necessarily illegal, as long as it's properly disclosed and accounted for. As they sift through the backdating morass, the Justice Department, the SEC and state prosecutors in New York are trying to separate the instances of ignorant bungling from those involving calculated malfeasance.

MBC Managers Plead Guilty In $830 Million Securities Fraud (AP)

AP, February 28, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0137919

MIAMI - Two managers at Mutual Benefits Corp. pleaded guilty to securities fraud and agreed to pay about $830 million in restitution to investors, authorities said Tuesday.

Carol Traina and Bari Wiggins each pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy to commit securities fraud in connection with Mutual Benefits' billion dollar securities offering, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Southern District of Florida. Both face up to five years in prison.

Mutual Benefits, which was closed by federal regulators in May 2004, sold investment interests in life settlements. Investors would buy interest in life insurance policies at a discount from terminally ill or elderly people in need of cash. The investors collect the benefit when the insured person dies.

Traina, an office manager, misrepresented the safety and security of the investments and admitted to helping distribute false and misleading life expectancy, the U.S. Attorney's Office said in a statement.

Wiggins, who managed the policy services department, admitted that she acquired the insurance policies, knowing that sales agents were misleading investors, authorities said.

Telephone message left for Traina's attorney, Melvin Sidney Black, and Wiggins' attorney, Jane Serene Raskin, were not immediately returned Tuesday.

A sentencing was scheduled for May 8.

Former FDA Official Gets Three Years Probation, Fine (FLSUNSEN)

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, February 28, 2007

Former Food and Drug Administration Commissioner Lester Crawford was sentenced to three years probation and fined more than $89,000 for failing to disclose he owned shares in companies the agency regulated.

Crawford, 69, pleaded guilty in October to two misdemeanor charges of making false filings and violating federal conflict-of-interest laws.

Feds To List Witnesses In Nacchio Trial (DENP)

By Andy Vuong, Denver Post Staff Writer

Denver Post, February 28, 2007

Ex-Qwest execs Szeliga and Mohebbi could be key to the government case against their former boss.

Federal prosecutors will produce for the first time Thursday a list of witnesses they plan to call during the criminal insider-trading trial of former Qwest chief executive Joe Nacchio.

U.S. District Judge Edward Nottingham has ordered the government to compile the list for the defense. It's unclear whether it will be made public. The defense has to submit its witness list by March 16.

James Payne, former senior vice president of Qwest's Government Systems Division, said Tuesday that he expects to be called to testify during the trial, which is set to begin March 19 in federal court in Denver.

"I'm involved on both sides of the case," Payne told The Denver Post in a phone interview from Washington, D.C. "I'll be subpoenaed by one side or the other, and perhaps both."

Payne joined Qwest in August 1999 and worked directly with Nacchio on government contracts, including those with clandestine agencies that may play a key role in Nacchio's defense.

Former Qwest chief financial officer Robin Szeliga, former Qwest president Afshin Mohebbi and former board member Tom Stephens could be key witnesses for the government.

Payne is the first former Qwest official to publicly disclose that he expects to be involved during the trial. Payne said he has been contacted by prosecutors and defense attorneys a number of times. Court filings suggest he may be more helpful to the defense.

Asked whether he expects to play a big role in the case, Payne said: "I don't think I have a choice."

Nacchio is accused of selling $100.8 million in Qwest stock in early 2001 while he knew the company's finances were deteriorating. He has pleaded not guilty to 42 charges of illegal insider trading.

Nacchio's attorneys have said he had a positive outlook on Qwest during that time because he alone, among his inner circle of top executives, in Denver knew the company was in line to receive large top-secret government contracts.

Payne has verified Nacchio's contention that potential classified contracts were not included in Qwest's public statements about its prospects, according to court filings by Nacchio's attorneys. Specifically, in a November 2005 interview with the government, Payne said he did not include the contracts in his financial reports until they came to fruition because he saw them as speculative.

According to a separate court filing, Qwest received $200 million in 2000 and $322 million in 2001 in federal contracts, which represented about 1.5 percent of its overall revenue.

Payne left Qwest in May 2005 and now works for Bechtel, a government contractor based in San Francisco.

Although the Department of Justice hasn't disclosed its witnesses, it has compiled a list of people who are not allowed to be interviewed by attorneys in a separate Securities and Exchange Commission civil case that's pending against Nacchio and several former Qwest officials.

The government doesn't want these people interviewed in the civil case because they could be called as witnesses in the criminal case.

The list has 28 names, including Szeliga, Mohebbi and Stephens. The list hasn't changed since it was disclosed in court filings last year, said Forrest Lewis, attorney for former Qwest accountant Frank Noyes, a defendant in the civil case.

The SEC alleges in the civil suit that former Qwest officials fraudulently boosted revenues by $3 billion from 1999 to 2002. Qwest later restated much of that revenue.

Staff writer Andy Vuong can be reached at 303-954-1209 or avuong@denverpost.com.

Fine And Probation For Former F.D.A. Chief (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, February 28, 2007

The former commissioner of the Food and Drug Administration was ordered to pay about $90,000 in fines for lying about stock he owned in companies regulated by the agency. At his sentencing in federal court, the former official, Lester M. Crawford, was also given three years' supervised probation and ordered to perform 50 hours of community service. Dr. Crawford pleaded guilty last October to having a conflict of interest and false reporting of information about stock he and his wife owned.

CRIMINAL LAW:

House Leaders Reach Deal On Subpoenas (HILL)

By Susan Crabtree

The Hill, February 28, 2007

House leaders will not fight subpoenas for information from the U.S. Attorney's Office in San Diego stemming from a criminal investigation into activities related to the bribery case against Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.), according to a release by Speaker Nancy Pelosi's (D-Calif.) office yesterday.

The chairmen of three committees involved, working with the House General Counsel's office, have been negotiating for the last two months about how to respond to subpoenas for documents the U.S. Attorney sent the House Appropriations, Armed Services and Intelligence panels late last year.

It was unclear at press time how much GOP ranking members of the committees were consulted about which documents to hand over.

A Democratic leadership aide insisted that Republicans were consulted because it involved "their documents."

But Brian Kennedy, spokesman for Minority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio), said his boss was not kept in the loop during any part of the negotiation process.

"We were not party to or made aware of any of the agreements," he said.

That is a distinct departure to what happened last year after the FBI raided the office of Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.), when the leadership of both parties invoked the Speech Debate Clause of the Constitution.

"… Because all of the information being provided to the U.S. Attorney is privileged under the Speech and Debate Clause of the Constitution, the committees have agreed to decline to assert the privilege with respect to that information," the statement from Pelosi's office said.

"The agreements permit the committees to cooperate with the investigation in a manner that respects the constitutional prerogatives of the House and does not impair the committees' functioning or compromise their legislative and oversight responsibilities," the release said.

The negotiations went so smoothly that the U.S. attorney's office withdrew the subpoenas and the committees have already handed over some of the documents requested.

Elizabeth Phillips, an Appropriations staffer, and Rebecca Kuhn, who formerly worked as Cunningham's executive assistant, were also subpoenaed to testify. They are scheduled to testify tomorrow before a grand jury, according to the statement.

"Under the agreements, the five outstanding subpoenas – one to each of the three committees for documents, one to a current committee staffer for testimony, and one to a former committee staffer for testimony — have been withdrawn," said the statement. “The committee have agreed to voluntarily provide the Department [of Justice] with copies of some documents immediately (which has already happened), and to voluntarily provide the Department with access to other documents over the next several weeks.”

DOJ_NMG_0137921

Pelosi also said although she was aware of the negotiations, she was not actively involved in them and that “all decisions were made by the committee themselves.”

“The current committee chairmen took the same cooperative approach toward the Office of the U.S. Attorney as did the committee chairmen in the last Congress,” she said.

Deal Reached On Cunningham Subpeonas (AP)

AP, February 28, 2007

Three House committees subpoenaed in connection with the bribery investigation into imprisoned former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham and his associates reached an agreement with prosecutors Tuesday allowing the subpoenas to be withdrawn.

Under the agreement, five outstanding subpoenas will be withdrawn and the committees will voluntarily hand over documents in addition to material already provided, according to a statement released by Brendan Daly, a spokesman for House Speaker Nancy Pelosi.

Two committee staffers will appear March 1 before the federal grand jury in San Diego that has been considering evidence stemming from the Cunningham case, Daly said.

The subpoenas were sent in December and January to the Appropriations, Armed Services and Intelligence committees and the two staffers.

A spokeswoman for the U.S. attorney's office in San Diego did not immediately return a call for comment.

Cunningham, a San Diego-area Republican, was sentenced in March to more than eight years in prison for accepting $2.4 million in bribes in exchange for steering government business to defense contractors.

Earlier this month, the grand jury indicted a former top CIA official and a San Diego defense contractor on fraud and money laundering charges in an investigation that spun off from the Cunningham probe. The defense contractor, Brent Wilkes, was also charged in a separate indictment along with a New York mortgage banker on charges of bribing Cunningham.

The subpoena deal comes after nearly a year of negotiations over the documents that began while the House was still under Republican control.

"The agreements permit the committees to cooperate with the investigation in a manner that respects the constitutional prerogatives of the House and does not impair the committees' functioning or compromise their legislative and oversight responsibilities," Daly said.

The Justice Department has clashed with Congress in the past over its investigations of lawmakers. Republicans and Democrats alike were furious when the FBI raided the office of Democratic Rep. William Jefferson of Louisiana in May for evidence in a corruption investigation.

Group Asks Gonzales To Review Small's Conduct (WP)

By Jacqueline Trescott, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 28, 2007

A Washington watchdog group yesterday asked the attorney general to investigate whether Smithsonian Secretary Lawrence M. Small violated the law by using federal money to pay for travel and other expenses.

The group also asked the Justice Department to determine whether the Smithsonian Board of Regents, which is chaired by John G. Roberts Jr., chief justice of the Supreme Court, broke the law by approving Small's expenses.

In a letter to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales, Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington said the $90,000 in unauthorized expenses that Small accumulated between 2000 and 2005 was "troubling." Questions raised by Smithsonian's inspector general about Small's expenses were first reported by The Washington Post on Sunday.

"Mr. Small's conduct not only diminishes the stature of the Smithsonian Institution, it smacks of self-dealing and self-enrichment at the expense of the general public. The Board of Regents failure to take action against Mr. Small -- incomprehensibly choosing to endorse his conduct instead -- is similarly distressing," said the letter, signed by Melanie Sloan, CREW's executive director, a former federal prosecutor. The group describes itself as nonpartisan; it has received funding from liberal Democratic sources.

Sen. Charles Grassley (R-Iowa), ranking member of the Senate Finance Committee, has asked Roberts, chancellor of the Smithsonian Regents, to review what Grassley has called "lavish expenditures" by Small. Grassley said the board appeared to be "rubber-stamping the actions of Secretary Small and turning a blind eye to very serious issues raised by the inspector general." The senator suggested this week that the Smithsonian's budget be cut because of excessive spending and proposed changing the composition of the Board of Regents.

DOJ_NMG_0137922

"One idea is whether the upcoming federal budget resolution should limit or redirect Smithsonian funding," Grassley said. "Another idea is introducing legislation to improve governance from the Board of Regents, similar to my legislation on the Red Cross. As far as I can tell, Congress hasn't taken a serious look at the Smithsonian's governing statute in a hundred years."

The Smithsonian, the largest complex of museums in the world, receives 70 percent of its budget from the federal government.

Acting Smithsonian Inspector General A. Sprightley Ryan reviewed Small's expenses last month and in a confidential memo to the Regents said that "overall we saw no evidence of fraud or abuse associated with the expense transactions reviewed." However, she added, a number of transactions were "not properly documented or were not in accordance with Smithsonian policies."

After some of Small's expenditures were questioned, the Regents rewrote some of the rules governing him to make sure there were no violations.

Small said last night that he was proud to work with the Regents. "They have obviously come to their conclusions about the various reports that have come out. And I am perfectly comfortable with their conclusions," said Small, after attending a reception Tuesday evening on Capitol Hill for the 10th anniversary of the Smithsonian Latino Center. He said he didn't have any knowledge of the letter to Gonzales.

Deputy Sheriff Charged With Child Pornography (RMN)

Rocky Mountain News, February 28, 2007

A 53-year-old Arapahoe County sheriff's deputy has been indicted by a federal grand jury on child pornography charges.

Douglas Morrill Peek of Centennial is charged with transportation, possession, distribution and receipt of child pornography.

He was arrested by the FBI this morning without incident and made his initial appearance in U.S. District Court in Denver this afternoon.

Count one of the indictment alleges that Peek transported, via the Internet, a movie containing child pornography.

Count two charges Peek with possession of a desktop computer containing numerous images of child pornography, including images of toddlers being forced to engage in sexual activity.

Count three alleges that Peek used his computer to distribute an image containing child pornography via the Internet.

Count four charges that Peek knowingly received an e-mail containing child pornography.

If convicted he faces up to 20 years in a federal prison and up to a $250,000 fine.

"The Department of Justice will pursue and prosecute those who commit crimes involving the exploitation of children, no matter who they are, or what position they hold," said United States Attorney Troy Eid.

"This case is being brought as part of Project Safe Childhood.

More Jail Time For IC Man (ICPC)

By Mike McWilliams, Iowa City Press-Citizen

The Iowa City Press-Citizen, February 28, 2007

An Iowa City man already serving 10 years in prison for lascivious acts with a child received an additional seven-plus years behind bars for storing child pornography on his home computer.

Jackie Dean Burtlow, 40, pleaded guilty to receipt of child pornography. A federal judge initially sentenced Burtlow to 10 years and two months in prison but gave him credit for 33 months previously served for related state charges, which leaves seven years and five months.

According to a news release from the U.S Department of Justice:

The FBI started investigating Burtlow in May 2004 when agents in Cleveland found an e-mail that was later determined to have been sent from Burtlow's computer. Police searched Burtlow's Iowa City residence and seized a computer that contained numerous images, including video clips of children engaged in sexually explicit conduct.

When questioned, Burtlow admitted that he had child pornography stored on his computer and also said he had chatted and sent e-mails to other people about child pornography, according to the release.

Judge James Gritzner told Burtlow, "This is a very serious offense," according to the release. Gritzner also referred to Burtlow as having acted on his criminal desires by sexually assaulting a child and to the high degree of recidivism associated with the crime, the release states.

DOJ_NMG_0137923

In May 2004, a 13-year-old girl told interviewers that Burtlow had engaged in inappropriate sexual contact with her, and police arrested Burtlow for third-degree sexual abuse. He pleaded guilty to two counts of lascivious acts with a child, and a Johnson County judge sentenced him to 10 years in prison in November 2004.

FIU Couple Heading To Jail (MIH)

By Jay Weaver

Miami Herald, February 28, 2007

A federal judge slammed two former FIU employees with maximum prison sentences for their roles in an intelligence-gathering network for the Cuban government.

Convicted ex-Florida International University academics Carlos and Elsa Alvarez apologized Tuesday as a pair of tearful defendants, expressing regret for a secret life of informing on Miami's exile community for Cuba.

"Please accept my heartfelt apologies for all the wounds and pain caused by my actions," Carlos Alvarez, 62, said to a packed federal courtroom in Miami.

"I broke the law," said his wife, Elsa, 56. ``I take full responsibility. I'm very sorry."

The judge didn't buy any of it.

U.S. District Judge K. Michael Moore slammed Carlos Alvarez with the maximum five-year prison sentence for conspiring to act as an unregistered Cuban agent and Elsa Alvarez with the maximum three years' imprisonment for harboring her husband's illicit intelligence work and failing to report it to authorities.

The harsh sentences marked the closing chapter to the Alvarezes' life as once-accomplished Cuban exiles who are now viewed by many as "spies" for Cuban leader Fidel Castro.

The case shook Miami's exile community to its foundation because the couple's targets included their former boss, FIU president Modesto "Mitch" Maidique, and other Cuban-American leaders.

The Alvarezes entered guilty pleas to lesser charges in December, when the U.S. attorney's office agreed to drop allegations that the couple were unregistered Cuban agents -- offenses that could have carried up to 10 years in prison had they been convicted at trial. On Tuesday, prosecutors had recommended five years for Carlos Alvarez but only 21 months for Elsa Alvarez.

`FAMILY DEVASTATED'

"The family is absolutely devastated," attorney Steven Chaykin, who represented Carlos Alvarez, told reporters outside the courthouse. Elsa's lawyer, Jane Moscowitz, said their sentences were ``all too high."

The couple's five children, including a 13-year-old, told the judge how much the family has "suffered" since the Alvarezes' arrests early last year.

In sentencing them, Moore acknowledged the couple's supporters who testified about their honesty, integrity and spirituality as Catholics, but he condemned them for breaking federal law with their ``personal foreign policy."

"For all these years, they were in a sense leading a double life," Moore said, calling their crime a "deceit and betrayal" of the exile community.

He ordered the Alvarezes to surrender on April 27. Carlos Alvarez, a longtime FIU professor who resigned last year, has been in custody at the Federal Detention Center in downtown Miami since his arrest in January 2006. Elsa Alvarez, an FIU counselor on unpaid leave, was in custody through June, when the judge released her on a $400,000 bond.

During Tuesday's hearing, their attorneys tried to portray them as sympathetic exile figures who tried to bridge the Cold War chasm between Cuba and the United States through a dialogue of educational and cultural exchanges involving the Cuban Intelligence Service.

But the Alvarezes and their lawyers kept insisting the information passed along to Cuban agents was "innocuous" and "harmless gossip," causing "no harm" to the United States or the exile community.

"I reached out to people with power or who had access to power," Carlos Alvarez said in court Tuesday. ``It would require innocuous information . . . The method that I used was unfortunately wrong."

Elsa Alvarez said her husband's goal was to "help Cubans to become unified" on both sides of the Florida Straits. "I believe Carlos acted in good faith at all times," she added.

TALE OF BETRAYAL

Chaykin said Carlos Alvarez was betrayed by Cuban agents and FBI agents who coaxed a confession from him during three interviews in 2005. That was the basis for the indictment against him and his wife.

But prosecutors portrayed the couple's work as ``classic intelligence-gathering activity."

"They worked for the directorate of the Cuban Intelligence Services and provided ``sensitive information on the exile community's leaders," said U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta. ``That is far from innocuous."

DOJ_NMG_0137924

At sentencing, prosecutor Matthew Axelrod said Carlos Alvarez began gathering intelligence for Cuba in 1977 and that Elsa Alvarez became aware of it in 1982, making some contacts with Cuban agents herself.

He said they both relied on shortwave radios, computers and encrypted information to correspond with their Cuban intelligence handlers and also traveled to Cuba and other countries to meet them.

Axelrod noted that Alvarezes' home computer contained files on:

· FIU president Modesto Maidique's personal finances and private business ventures.

· A "redacted" U.S. government study on the ``status of telecommunications in Cuba."

· Brothers to the Rescue leader José Basulto, including that "an investigation should continue" into ``the ties he has to the CIA, the Cuban American [National] Foundation and financial interests such as Bacardi."

· A personal contact who had met with Richard Nuccio, then-President Bill Clinton's special advisor for Cuba, who "was very depressed" by Cuba's shootdown of two Brothers to the Rescue planes killing three Cuban-American men and a Cuban exile and the subsequent Helms Burton law toughening the U.S. embargo against Cuba.

· Lula Rodriguez, a Miami-Dade Democrat who later became personal assistant to then-Attorney General Janet Reno and eventually deputy assistant secretary of state for public affairs in the Clinton administration.

ANOTHER REVELATION

Axelrod also revealed that Carlos Alvarez had informed two academic colleagues, Fordham University professor Orlando Rodriguez and Spaniard Miguel Escotet.

He had asked both men to write letters of support for leniency.

"He knows he's betrayed them, yet he's calling on them to support him," Axelrod said, adding that such a betrayal was ``astounding."

A moment later, Chaykin questioned Rodriguez in the courtroom, asking him if he wanted to withdraw his supportive letter as well his live statement to the court. "Nothing at all," Rodriguez said.

Hollywood Chief Defends Exposing Probe (AP)

By Wanda J. Demarzo

AP, February 28, 2007

Hollywood Police Chief James Scarberry, who admitted he leaked information about an ongoing federal probe of his department, defended his decision Tuesday, saying the FBI told him he could use his "discretion" in discussing the probe with others.

Scarberry told as many as eight city officials about the two-year undercover investigation, but insists that he did not tip off the targets of the probe.

Scarberry said he "has his suspicions" who leaked the information to those involved, but doesn't believe it came from within his department or City Hall.

On Thursday, three veteran Hollywood cops -- Kevin Companion, Stephen Harrison and Jeff Courtney -- were arrested, accused of a wide range of crimes, including extortion, bribe-taking, dealing in stolen property, protecting a rigged, high-stakes card game, cargo theft and transporting a big shipment of heroin.

A fourth officer, Thomas Simcox, 50, who is cooperating with authorities, is expected to appear for arraignment Wednesday in federal court in Fort Lauderdale.

FBI STING

The group was caught in a FBI sting in which agents posed as members of a New York mob family who wanted protection for its South Florida operations. Companion, who was the alleged ringleader, recruited the other three officers, authorities said.

But before the feds could identify whether other officers were involved, they were forced to shut down the probe because Courtney and Companion were tipped off.

Simcox is reputed to have approached a number of veteran officers hoping to hire them to work for the crime family, but the officers turned him down.

The department has launched an internal investigation into whether other officers knew about the corruption and failed to report it.

CASES AT RISK

The arrests could jeopardize more than 60 criminal cases handled by the four detectives. Prosecutors began sending letters to defense attorneys representing clients involved in the cases, advising them of the situation.

Among the more high-profile cases that could be affected is that of former state legislator Barry Kutun, who is accused of hiring an underage girl for sex. Simcox was the lead investigator in the case.

DOJ_NMG_0137925

But prosecutors say it's too early to say whether the arrests will taint pending criminal cases. In a recent scandal involving BSO sheriff's deputies, the state attorney's office sent out a list of 61 deputies -- some of them suspects -- whose cases were tied to falsification.

But in October, about 50 of the deputies received letters from the state attorney's office clearing them. Very few criminal cases handled by the deputies led to acquittals as a result of the scandal.

But Public Defender Howard Finklestein insists that criminal cases involving the Hollywood cops will be impacted.

"Those indictments will be very powerful and persuasive to a jury. I think if any of those detectives are the one who saw the person with the drugs or commit the crime, the case is lost," Finklestein said.

He added that his office is not only reviewing pending cases handled by the accused officers, but also older cases in which someone entered a plea or was convicted.

"I think we're going to see the prosecution dropping cases," Finklestein said.

Former Officer Pleads Guilty To Possessing Stolen Firearms (AP)

By Sue Lindsey, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 28, 2007

ROANOKE, Va. (AP) — A former officer charged in a federal investigation of corruption in a rural sheriff's department pleaded guilty Tuesday to one count of possessing stolen firearms.

Patrick Martin, who was a sergeant in the vice unit of the Henry County Sheriff's Department, faces a maximum sentence of 10 years in prison and a fine of $250,000. In exchange for his plea in U.S. District Court, prosecutors dropped two other weapons counts.

Martin was among 13 members of the department, including former sheriff H. Franklin Cassell, and seven civilians indicted last fall in a scheme to sell drugs and other evidence seized from criminals.

Thirteen other defendants named in the indictment have entered guilty pleas to charges that include racketeering conspiracy, narcotics distribution, weapons counts and obstruction of justice. Guilty pleas from two others are expected by next week, Assistant U.S. Attorney Thomas Bondurant said.

A trial for Cassell, who is charged with impeding federal officers' investigation and money laundering, is set for June.

Martin's case had been set for a jury trial but he decided Tuesday morning to plead guilty instead, his attorney, Art Strickland, said.

"His family was under so much stress," Strickland said.

During the court hearing, Bondurant played a recording from portions of a three-hour interview that an FBI agent and a state police officer conducted with Martin in which he said he was not aware of any drugs or guns stolen from the sheriff's department by officers.

"At the start of the interview, Martin flatly denied any knowledge of law enforcement misconduct," the prosecutor said.

He later acknowledged having "maybe three or four" guns at home, according to the recording.

Strickland said outside of court that the sheriff's department had limited storage space, and at one point officers were told to take weapons and other evidence home for safekeeping.

"He never used any of the guns," he said.

One shotgun that Martin returned to the department as the federal investigation of the department intensified last year was manufactured in 1904 and was considered a collector's item worth between $800 and $2,000, Bondurant said.

Ex-councilman's Conviction Tossed (MACOMBD)

By Jameson Cook, Macomb Daily Staff Writer

Macomb Daily, February 28, 2007

Secret communications between judge, government attorneys result in order for third trial

A federal appeals court reversed the conviction of a former Warren city councilman on fraud charges because of a federal judge's secret communication with government lawyers during jury deliberations in his first trial.

Advertisement

William Barnwell's convictions for theft, embezzlement and conspiracy were dismissed and the case was remanded back to the U.S. District Court, a Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals panel ruled Tuesday.

"I've said all along I'm innocent," an elated Barnwell said from his Warren home Tuesday afternoon shortly after the ruling was made public. "I believe in this country and I believe in the justice system. ... Now I can get my life back. My name is clear and I can get back to work."

Barnwell, 60, a city councilman from 1999 to 2003 and former director of the Michigan Regional Council of Carpenters, was convicted by a federal jury in 2004, along with co-defendants Sandra and David Williamson, for inducing union staffers to help build a house for the Williamsons in St. Clair County in the late 1990s. Sandra Williamson was the administrative assistant for the top official at the union.

An initial trial -- which included two other defendants who were later removed from the case -- ended in a hung jury in fall 2003. But Barnwell and the Williamsons were convicted in May 2004 in a second trial.

In a 2-1 decision, the appeals panel said that Barnwell's constitutional rights to due process and effective defense counsel were violated because Judge Bernard Friedman communicated with lawyers from the U.S. District Attorney's Office during jury deliberations for the first trial.

Assistant U.S. attorney Keith Corbett went to the judge after the FBI was conducting a telephone wiretap in an unrelated case and heard a reference to the Barnwell case -- the results of an informal jury vote, which is supposed to be done in secret. An FBI agent said that a juror was the sister of a subject in the unrelated case, and the judge and government lawyers discussed the potentially contaminated juror. The judge also met with the jury foreman.

The discussions were kept from the defense attorneys in the case, a move that the appeals court determined tainted the case not only for the first trial but also the second trial in which a new jury found Barnwell guilty.

The communications finally were revealed in March 2005, long after the second trial was over, by U.S. Attorney Walter Kozar.

The ruling revealed few details of the separate criminal investigation by the FBI.

"The defendants in the case were from Macomb County like the individuals captured by the wiretap," the ruling says. The investigation, according to oral arguments, involved illegal gambling, extortion and racketeering, and "public corruption," the panel says.

Judges Damon J. Keith and Gilbert S. Mettitt note that Friedman kept the discussions secret to protect the integrity of the FBI investigation, which FBI officials told the judge had been ongoing for 15 years. However, they noted that is not good enough reason to do so. They say that the only instances in which such a case should be kept out of an open courtroom is for a "compelling state interest" or in matters of "national security."

The appeals court decision is especially unusual not only because it could result in a third trial but that it overturns the conviction in the second trial for issues in the first trial, noted Larry Dubin, a law professor at University of Detroit Mercy.

The appeals judges do not specifically indicate how the secret communications in the first trial affected the second trial, only suggesting that the mere "appearance of impropriety" affected justice in the case.

"The effort by the trial judge and the prosecution to save a wiretap, which the same trial judge had authorized, at the expense of a fair trial, reeks of the type of impropriety we need to avoid," says the opinion, authored by Keith. "When we fail to protect a defendant's fundamental rights, we fail in our calling as judges.

"What strikes us as the most disconcerting is that the government and trial judge kept the communications from the defense counsel during the entire second trial."

Dubin said he understood Friedman's reasoning.

"The judge's motive was trying to balance two powerful competing interests," Dubin said. "I have sympathy for a judge who gets involved in a web of conflict that were not of his own doing."

In her dissenting opinion, Judge Martha Craig Daughtrey says there is no "controversy" to decide or "remedy" to issue regarding the constitutional arguments because the second trial cured any potential violations in the first trial.

A new trial "is exactly what the defendant received in this case, and there is no challenge whatever to the fairness of his second trial," Daughtrey says. "Hence, the majority should ask itself: What is to be gained by providing the defendant with a second fair trial?"

Barnwell's attorney, Arthur Weiss, said Tuesday afternoon he was pleased with the ruling but could not comment on the ruling because he had not read it.

Weiss commended U.S. attorney Kozar, despite being his adversary in the case, for "doing the ethical thing" and revealing the communications during the appeal process.

Weiss also would not criticize Friedman, saying he is an "outstanding judge" whom "I hold in the highest regard."

Gina Balay, spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in Detroit, said officials were reviewing the case and could not comment on whether attorneys would seek a third trial against Barnwell.

During the trial, the defendants maintained their innocence. They said the actions by the union agents were charitable work after a company that the Williamsons hired to work on their home failed to complete the job and went out of business.

Defense attorneys also claimed it was a government attempt to target MRCC secretary-treasurer Ralph Mabry, Sandra Williamson's boss, through her.

DOJ_NMG_0137927

Mabry was convicted last year of illegally obtaining discounts from vendors to build his home in Grosse Pointe Park, according to a published report.

Barnwell was sentenced to two years probation, with the first six months to be served in home confinement. He also was ordered to pay a $10,000 fine and $9,188 in restitution, and serve 350 hours of community service.

Barnwell's conviction had no connection to his service as a councilman. He decided against running for re-election in 2003. He said Tuesday he may run for the council again.

Barnwell, who is married and has three adult sons, also said Tuesday that he and his family were enjoying the ruling.

"She stood by me like a soldier," he said of his wife, Sandra.

He said his status as a convicted felon has been difficult to deal with as he has felt ostracized.

"I feel like a convicted murderer," he said of society's view of him.

Mom Taught Children To Fake Retardation (AP)

AP, February 28, 2007

(AP) - TACOMA, Wash.-A woman admitted Monday that she coached her two children to fake retardation starting when they were 4 and 8 years old so she could collect Social Security benefits on their behalf.

Rosie Costello, 46, admitted in U.S. District Court that she collected more than $280,000 in benefits, beginning in the mid-1980s. Most was from Social Security, but the state social services agency paid $53,000.

Costello pleaded guilty to conspiracy to defraud the government and Social Security fraud. Her son, Pete, 26, pleaded guilty earlier this month. Federal prosecutors in Seattle said Monday authorities had not yet located her daughter, Marie.

According to the plea agreement, Costello began coaching her daughter at age 4, and later used the same ruse with her son. He feigned retardation into his mid-20s - picking at his face, slouching and appearing uncommunicative in meetings with Social Security officials.

Social Security workers became suspicious and uncovered a video of Pete Costello ably contesting a traffic ticket in a Vancouver courtroom.

Pete Costello is scheduled to be sentenced May 11 and faces from six months to a year in prison, as well as $59,000 in restitution.

Rosie Costello is scheduled for sentencing May 17. Her standard sentencing range was not immediately available, but in the plea agreement she agreed to repay the government.

Two Indianapolis Men Received Prison Terms Friday For Mortgage Scams. (INDYSTAR)

The Indianapolis Star, February 28, 2007

Federal judges sentenced John Wagner, 46, to 37 months in prison and Frankie Lamont Howard, 38, to 24 months.

Since a federal fraud task force was formed in 2002 to look into the area's rash of mortgage crimes, 58 people have been convicted, including Wagner and Howard, who each had pleaded guilty to charges of mail fraud and money laundering.

Wagner conspired with Promise Land Mortgage owner Romero Brice, who was sentenced Tuesday to 87 months in prison.

Wagner secured investors whom Brice used to defraud Michigan lender ABN Amro of $2.73 million by falsifying 53 loan applications, U.S. Attorney Susan Brooks reported.

Wagner also was ordered to make restitution of $1.8 million.

Real estate investor Howard rigged 31 loan applications and resold the houses at inflated prices to straw buyers he recruited, Brooks reported.

According to Brooks, Howard bought properties primarily in low-income neighborhoods in Indianapolis.

From April to October 2002, Howard obtained loans of about $1.7 million on properties worth about $439,300 by submitting fraudulent loan documents and inflated appraisals, the U.S. Attorney's Office said.

First Bank lost about $1.2 million in the scam.

The longest prison term in Central Indiana for mortgage fraud was a 170-month sentence received in 2003 by mortgage banker Jeffrey Neely, who authorities said was the mastermind of a $2.5 million scam.

3rd Person Charged In $4.2 Million Mortgage Fraud (AP)

AP, February 28, 2007

INDIANAPOLIS - Two men who authorities said lined up properties or investors in a multimillion dollar mortgage-fraud scheme were sentenced to prison.

Federal judges on Friday sentenced John Wagner, 46, to three years and a month in prison and Frankie Lamont Howard, 38, to two years. Both pleaded guilty to charges of money laundering and conspiracy to commit mail fraud, prosecutors said.

Wagner and Howard were involved a scheme that obtained more than $4 million in fraudulent mortgage loans on houses in low-income neighborhoods of Indianapolis.

Authorities said Wagner recruited investors for Romero Brice, the owner of Promise Land Mortgage in Indianapolis. Brice obtained houses at fair market values and then used the investors to buy back the houses at three to four times the price, authorities said.

Brice was sentenced on Tuesday to seven years in prison.

Prosecutors said Brice obtained at least 83 loans between late 2000 and early 2002 based upon false documents, with Wagner involved in 53 of the loans valued at about $2.65 million. Howard was charged with engaging in 31 fraudulent transactions for about $1.65 million.

The judges also ordered Wagner and Howard, both of Indianapolis, each to pay more than $1 million in restitution.

Ex-trooper Gets 5 Years For Soliciting Sex (BOS)

By Brian R. Ballou,

The Boston Globe, February 28, 2007

Boy he met via the Internet was actually an agent

A federal judge gave the minimum sentence to a former Massachusetts state trooper and decorated Army war veteran who admitted trying to solicit sex over the Internet from someone he thought was a 14-year-old boy.

Brian O'Hare, 46, of Lancaster was sentenced to the mandatory minimum of five years in prison yesterday in federal court in Boston after he pleaded guilty.

"The Internet has brought many wonderful things to the world, but it has also brought many vile things," US District Court Judge George A. O'Toole Jr. said moments before issuing the sentence to O'Hare, who had faced a maximum of 30 years in prison.

O'Hare, dressed in a black suit, walked into the courtroom with his brother, sister, and sister-in-law. Standing next to his lawyer, Richard Egbert, he gave a brief statement before the sentencing.

"I take full responsibility for my actions, and I want to apologize to my family for the embarrassment and shame I've caused." He also apologized to the Army National Guard and the Massachusetts State Police.

O'Hare told the judge he wanted to get this episode of his life behind him.

"I want to be a father again," he said. As he was led out of the courtroom, O'Hare waved to his relatives. His sister, tears running down her face, waved back.

The sentencing capped a dramatic fall from grace for O'Hare. He joined the Massachusetts National Guard in 1990 and rose to the rank of lieutenant colonel, leading the 211th Military Police Battalion, according to a Guard spokesman. He was the Battalion's executive officer at Bagram Air Force Base in Afghanistan from August 2002 to February 2003 and also served in Iraq, overseeing training of Iraqi police in Balad from April to September 2003.

O'Hare received two Bronze Stars for his service in Iraq and Afghanistan, as well as medals for good conduct, meritorious service, and achievement. He led military security at Logan International Airport after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks and during the 2004 Democratic National Convention. He was a member of the Massachusetts State Police for 20 years, last assigned to the Holden barracks.

A State Police spokewoman said officials would not comment on the case, because O'Hare is no longer a trooper. O'Hare must now submit a DNA sample to a state database and register as a sex offender upon his release.

Prosecutors alleged that O'Hare, using the name Ranger 1777, struck up a conversation in August 2005 with someone he thought was a 14-year-old boy in an America Online chatroom titled "SCHOOLBOIS SHOWERSM4." But the person he was chatting with was actually FBI agent Jeremy Morrissey, working in an Internet sting operation.

O'Hare was arrested last February when he drove to Meadow Glen Mall on Route 16 in Medford for what he thought was a meeting with the boy.

Former State Trooper Sentenced To 5 Years In Prison In Internet Sex Case (BOS)

The Boston Globe, February 28, 2007

BOSTON --A former Massachusetts state trooper and Army war veteran who admitted to trying to solicit someone he thought was a teenage boy over the Internet for sex has been sentenced to five years in prison.

Brian O'Hare, 46, was given the mandatory minimum sentence Tuesday in U.S. District Court after pleading guilty. He faced up to 30 years in prison.

"The Internet has brought many wonderful things to the world, but it has also brought many vile things," Judge George A. O'Toole Jr. said at the sentencing.

O'Hare allegedly had several sexually explicit chats with an FBI agent who was posing as a 14-year-old high school boy, and the two arranged to meet at the Medford Mall, authorities said. O'Hare was arrested by FBI agents in February 2006 after he showed up.

O'Hare lived in Lancaster and was assigned to the Holden barracks. He served in the Massachusetts National Guard in Afghanistan and Iraq from August 2002 until December 2003.

"I take full responsibility for my actions, and I want to apologize to my family for the embarrassment and shame I've caused," said O'Hare, who also apologized to the Army and the Massachusetts State Police.

Police Probe Death In Organ Donation Case (LAT)

By Charles Ornstein And Tracy Weber

The Los Angeles Times, February 27, 2007

Police are investigating whether a Kaiser Permanente transplant surgeon attempted to hasten the death last February of a 26-year-old San Luis Obispo man on life support in order to harvest his organs more quickly.

The allegations, if true, would constitute a grave breach of the nation's organ transplant rules, as well as a public relations setback for those promoting organ donation, experts in transplantation said.

San Luis Obispo police and the Medical Board of California are looking into the conduct of Dr. Hootan Roozrokh, who was a surgeon at Kaiser's now-defunct kidney transplant program in San Francisco.

At issue is whether he ordered excessive doses of powerful pain medication to speed the death of Ruben Navarro, according to several sources familiar with the case who spoke on condition of anonymity because investigations are ongoing.

Roozrokh could not be reached for comment. His attorney, M. Gerald Schwartzbach, acknowledged that his client may have made some mistakes but said that "he certainly wasn't the only one."

"I just don't think that Dr. Roozrokh ought to be crucified as a result of this incident or his career destroyed," said Schwartzbach, who declined to address specific allegations.

Medical board spokeswoman Candis Cohen said her agency is also investigating the conduct of a second physician present during the incident. That person, Kaiser officials confirmed, is Dr. Arturo Martinez, who at the time was the surgical director of Kaiser's transplant program. Martinez declined to comment Tuesday.

Neither surgeon was attempting to recover the organs on behalf of Kaiser; rather, they were working on behalf of the group that procures and distributes organs in much of Northern and Central California. Transplant surgeons commonly perform such duties.

Dr. Timothy Pruett, president-elect of the United Network for Organ Sharing, called the allegations "horrific."

He worried that they could scare people away from donating organs to help the 95,000 people awaiting life-saving transplants nationwide. UNOS is the federal contractor charged with ensuring the safety and equity of the nation's transplant system.

"We have to guarantee to the public that we're not going to go out and kill people to get their organs," said Pruett, chief of transplant surgery at the University of Virginia. "That's the worst of those cheap sci-fi books: 'The ghoulish docs are out pulling the plugs on these poor defenseless people, trying to snatch their organs.' "

According to San Luis Obispo police, Navarro was near death after being found unresponsive at Casa de Vida, a long-term care facility. He was taken to nearby Sierra Vista Regional Medical Center and placed on life support. When it became clear he would not live, his family agreed to allow his organs to be harvested, and transplant surgeons were summoned Feb. 3, 2006.

State law specifies that transplant doctors cannot direct the treatment of potential organ donors before they are declared dead. This restriction is designed, in large part, to assuage concerns that organ retrieval might take priority over patient care.

In this case, however, Roozrokh entered the operating room at Sierra Vista and was directing the administration of drugs to Navarro, the sources said.

When the patient didn't die, Roozrokh allegedly told nurses: "Let's just give him some more candy," according to a person who was briefed on what took place but spoke on condition of anonymity because of the ongoing investigations.

Navarro was still alive about 30 minutes after being taken off life support — the time limit set to ensure the viability of the organs.

He was then returned to the intensive care unit, where he died early the following morning. His organs were not retrieved, police said in a statement.

Within days, nurses at the hospital — alarmed about what had taken place — alerted their superiors, Sierra Vista spokesman Ron Yukelson said. An investigation was immediately launched, and regulators and the coroner were notified.

Yukelson said that outside physicians are not authorized to treat patients at the 165-bed hospital. In this case, "the transplant surgeon began to direct care in the operating room," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0137930

Schwartzbach said Navarro's treating physician was also in the operating room at the time, along with a coordinator from the organ procurement group. Both could have asked Roozrokh and Martinez to leave, he said.

Doctors' Hospital Owner's Sentencing Rescheduled (SHRVTIMES)

By Michelle Mahfoufi

Shreveport (LA) Times, February 28, 2007

The same day Doctors' Hospital filed for bankruptcy last week, owner David LeBlanc's attorneys asked a federal judge to reschedule his sentencing on a charge of illegal campaign contributions.

It will be the third time LeBlanc, who is facing jail time and/or a fine, will have had his sentencing postponed.

"The defendant is cooperating in an ongoing criminal investigation, and the government cannot make an informed recommendation as to the defendant's sentence until the defendant completes his cooperation," the trial attorneys with the U.S. Department of Justice Criminal Division Public Integrity Section wrote in an earlier motion.

There was no reference to the ongoing investigation in the latest request to reschedule LeBlanc's sentencing to March 23.

A Department of Justice spokeswoman said she could not comment on the investigation.

LeBlanc pleaded guilty last March after an internal investigation by LifeCare -- the hospital chain he co-founded 15 years ago with two dozen leased beds within Doctors' Hospital -- found he and then-Government Relations Vice President Donald Boucher made federal political contributions in their and their wives' names.

LifeCare used corporate funds to reimburse LeBlanc and Boucher $50,000 through bonuses, salary increases and expense reimbursements. LeBlanc authorized the payments.

LeBlanc and Boucher, both fired by LifeCare, admitted to knowingly and willfully violating the law. LeBlanc agreed to pay a $100,000 civil penalty and Boucher agreed to pay a $50,000 penalty. Both also entered criminal plea agreements with the Department of Justice.

LeBlanc could receive up to one year in jail and/or a maximum fine of $25,000 or 300 percent of the corporate donations, whichever is greater.

Boucher faces five years in prison and a $250,000 fine. However, the government can recommend a lesser sentence based on a defendant's cooperation.

LifeCare agreed to pay a $50,000 civil penalty, strengthen corporate policies on the illegality of reimbursing political contributions and conduct an employee-training program.

The Federal Election Commission said there was no indication the candidates -- including Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La.; Reps. Jim McCrery, R-Shreveport, and William Jefferson, D-New Orleans; and former Sen. John Breaux, D.-La. -- knew the contributions were illegal.

LeBlanc told The Times in December the contributions were a "silly mistake."

"I didn't understand the law at the time," he said. "The reality is it's a misdemeanor. It's like an expensive traffic ticket at the end of the day."

Last Wednesday, Doctors' Hospital filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy in Texas, claiming it owes more than $10 million to nearly 1,000 creditors.

Three of those creditors filed an involuntary bankruptcy petition in Shreveport in an effort to keep the proceedings local.

No decision has been made in that case.

Roughing It, Senate Style (RC)

By Emily Heil

Roll Call, February 28, 2007

Members of Congress have been complaining for months that the White House has been keeping them in the dark. But on Monday night, at least one Senator couldn't blame the dim on the nefarious doings of that other branch of government.

An accident at a construction site Monday night caused a power outage in a portion of Northwest D.C. that includes the swanky Ritz-Carlton apartments in the West End neighborhood.

And that, in turn, left many of the building's well-heeled residents, including Sen. Frank Lautenberg (D-N.J.), stumbling around in the darkness. HOH overheard the toe-stubbing Senator admitting that he wasn't much of a Boy Scout (er, that is, he wasn't prepared), since he had only a flashlight and one candle — but nothing to light it with. (Lautenberg is a well-known anti-smoking crusader, so it's understandable that he doesn't keep a lighter around for the occasional stogie.)

In a scene surely out of a Jack London book, our hero tried bravely to use the stove to light the candle. Finally, he gave up in frustration and decamped to a nearby hotel. Where, presumably, he wouldn't have to rough it.

DOJ_NMG_0137931

But another of the building's Senatorial residents, Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.), showed he was of sterner stuff. A spokesman tells HOH that Reid remained home during the ordeal.

Evil Armies, Beware. We knew our favorite governor/action star was up to something here in Washington more blockbuster-worthy than discussing Medicare (snore) and getting Congressional briefings. Turns out, California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) has much more exciting plans, like possibly destroying an alien force.

At a briefing in the Capitol on Tuesday, a reporter ribbed the governator about his photo, which appeared on the cover of that day's Roll Call. In the picture, Schwarzenegger is gesturing with an outstretched arm, a slightly demonic expression on his face. "Is there a worse picture of you?" the snarky scribe queried.

Schwarzenegger had a better assessment of the pic. "It actually looks more like I'm about to get ready to attack an evil army or something," he joked.

Look out, Democrats.

Co-Stars Unite? And in an odd coincidence, detected only by those with long memories and a taste for cheesy action movies, also in the Capitol on Tuesday was none other than Vanessa Williams, Schwarzenegger's co-star in the 1996 D.C.-themed flick "Eraser." Remember it? Yeah, neither do we.

The striking "Ugly Betty" star was in the Capitol to meet with Members, including House Majority Whip James Clyburn (D-S.C.), Senate Majority Whip Dick Durbin (D-Ill.) and Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) to discuss the Special Olympics. Williams is on the board of the event and was in town for a movie screening.

Volz Meets the Press. Neil Volz, former aide to convicted ex-Rep. Bob Ney (R-Ohio), may have gotten some unwanted headlines when he pleaded guilty in May 2006 to federal conspiracy charges in the ongoing investigation into disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff's dealings on Capitol Hill.

But just a few weeks ago, Volz was mingling — voluntarily — with members of the Fourth Estate. An HOH spy belatedly tipped off HOH that Volz attended the after-party hosted by CQ following the Washington Press Club Foundation's dinner Feb. 6 at the Ritz-Carlton.

According to our fly on the wall, Volz was wearing a newly grown beard and a dark suit, which practically constituted a disguise since many of the aides and reporters in attendance didn't recognize him. An acquaintance jokingly asked what Volz was doing walking "into the lion's den," said the HOH tipster, who added that the disgraced aide who now faces prison time appeared to be in "good spirits."

Unlikely Love Match. Can a Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee gal and a guy backin' Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) for president find love? We hope so, for the sake of the author of this Craigslist.org personal posted in the site's "missed connections" section. He had us at the title: "Pure Cap. Hill magic — meow!" And the message itself was winsome, if a little far-fetched, describing a chance meeting of two party-crossed, would-be lovers. "I saw you coming out of Dirksen. You were carrying your lunch back to the DSCC. You were having the chicken salawich [sic] from Cups ... extra pickles. I love pickles. We made eye contact. It was pure magic. I was wearing the 'Brownback 2008' shirt over my oxford. You had your jeans tucked into your boots and were wearing the most delightful tan sweater. Lambs wool? It looked so soft. Your golden hair glistened in the winter sun. What kind of conditioner do you use? If you find this, would you be up for some bipartisan action this weekend?"

Here's hoping love (or at least love of pickles) conquers all.

CIVIL LAW:

Church-state Question Before Justices (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, February 28, 2007

The Wisconsin-based Freedom From Religion Foundation has sued to get rid of crosses in city parks, to end Good Friday public holidays and, most vigorously, to thwart President Bush's faith-based initiative.

Now, the group that for 30 years has sought a firm divide between church and state will be at the Supreme Court on Wednesday in a case that could affect taxpayers' ability to challenge — and government's ability to defend — a multitude of public programs that involve groups with a religious affiliation.

The White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives was set up in 2001 to help religious groups compete with secular organizations for federal grants to provide social services.

The case before the justices focuses on regional conferences that promoted the initiative. The Freedom From Religion Foundation likened the conferences to "revival meetings" and said they boosted the grant prospects for religious groups "without similar advocacy for secular community-based organizations."

DOJ_NMG_0137932

The legal question is not whether those conferences violated the constitutional separation of church and state, but more fundamentally when a taxpayer may even get into court to challenge such mingling of government and religion.

It's a question that could have national significance. Numerous outside groups have joined both sides of the case. Twelve states, backing the Bush administration, are trying to block the lawsuit. On the other side are atheists and religious organizations such as the American Jewish Congress and the Baptist Joint Committee for Religious Liberty.

"If the Bush administration were to prevail," says Annie Laurie Gaylor, co-president of the Freedom From Religion Foundation, "nobody would be able to challenge these programs. We feel that our litigation and educational efforts have never been more important."

U.S. Solicitor General Paul Clement, representing the administration, counters that if the foundation wins, judges could end up scrutinizing "every government encounter with religion … at the behest of any one of the more than 180 million taxpayers in the United States."

Typically, taxpayers cannot sue over how the government spends money, but in a 1968 case known as Flast v. Cohen the justices carved out an exception for lawsuits based on the separation of church and state. The Constitution's First Amendment says government "shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion."

The Bush administration says the Flast case allows challenges to congressional spending but not to executive branch actions. The Bush faith-based initiative was created by executive orders, not specific congressional appropriations.

A U.S. trial court dismissed the foundation's lawsuit, but the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 7th Circuit reversed it in January 2006. "The line proposed by the government … would be artificial because there is so much that executive officials could do to promote religion in ways forbidden by the establishment clause," that court said.

In the administration's appeal, Clement says Flast and other cases since 1968 connect taxpayers' right to sue with the legislative taxing and spending power.

Washington, D.C., lawyer Andrew Pincus, representing Freedom From Religion, says neither the 1968 case nor American history requires a distinction between legislative and executive actions. "The Framers (of the Constitution) were well aware of the potential for abuse of executive power in the area of religion. … There simply is no basis for concluding that they were less concerned about exercises of executive discretion than about the actions of Congress."

Supreme Court Takes Up Church-state Case (CSM)

By Warren Richey, Staff Writer Of The Christian Science Monitor

The Christian Science Monitor, February 28, 2007

A Wisconsin group says the president's faith-based initiative is illegal. But can taxpayers sue the government over funding?

President Bush's faith-based initiative is a signature program of his administration. But not all Americans share the president's belief that the government should work in close partnership with religious organizations willing to perform nonreligious public services, like running homeless shelters or drug counseling programs.

Wednesday, the US Supreme Court takes up a case that examines to what extent those opponents have legal standing to file federal lawsuits alleging that the White House's faith-based initiative amounts to unconstitutional entanglement of church and state.

The case stems from a 2002 lawsuit filed by a Wisconsin-based group called the Freedom From Religion Foundation. Members of the group filed the suit as taxpayers who objected to having their tax money used to support religion.

Although the case revolves around the esoteric issue of taxpayer standing to sue, analysts say the case could foreshadow a shift in the Supreme Court's church-state jurisprudence. It marks the first opportunity for the high court to rule in a major religion case since the retirement of key swing voter Sandra Day O'Connor and the addition of Chief Justice John Roberts and Associate Justice Samuel Alito.

"To evaluate the importance of the case you have to look at ... what might come out of it," says Ira Lupu, a professor at George Washington University Law School and church-state scholar.

In opposing the suit in 2002, government lawyers said the Freedom From Religion Foundation had no authority to wage such a legal battle since none of the plaintiffs were able to show that they had suffered a direct and personal injury. It wasn't enough to object as taxpayers.

Sharp divide over wall of separation

Friend-of-the-court briefs filed in the case highlight starkly different visions of religious liberty in America. On one side are those who favor less or no contact between government and religion. On the other side are those who believe that separation between church and state has gone too far, triggering government hostility toward religion and the religious.

In most instances taxpayers lack legal standing to sue the government merely because they object to how the government is spending tax dollars. Instead, the courts require that someone suffer a direct and personal injury that entitles them to sue. This requirement of legal standing helps prevent the courts from becoming a quasi-legislature where policy arguments are debated rather than a forum to decide specific legal disputes.

DOJ_NMG_0137933

The same principle applies in most constitutional cases. If the government violates a constitutional right, like the Eighth Amendment's prohibition on cruel and unusual punishment, the injured individual can sue in court to hold the government accountable for its abuses.

But what happens when the alleged constitutional violation involves the First Amendment's establishment clause that prohibits the government from promoting religion?

"The establishment clause is different. It is designed to limit the government from doing things which tend to favor or help people without necessarily hurting anybody in any obvious material way," Professor Lupu says. "Because of that, the rules about who can sue to complain about alleged violations of the clause are unusually important."

If you follow the normal rules that you have to be injured in some direct way before you can complain about what the government has done, the establishment clause would never get enforced in the courts, Lupu says. "The government would put up crèches and crosses and menorahs and would spend money on religion, and nobody could challenge it because nobody is hurt in obvious ways by those kinds of activities."

Exception allows taxpayers to sue Congress

Had the courts consistently enforced the rule on standing, establishment-clause cases filed by ordinary Americans would be rare to nonexistent. But in 1968 the Supreme Court carved out an exception that allows taxpayers to file establishment-clause lawsuits challenging congressional spending that benefits religion.

It is that 1968 exception that is at the center of Hein v. Freedom From Religion Foundation. The Hein in the case is Jay Hein, director of the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives.

The Bush administration is arguing that the 1968 exception only permits taxpayer lawsuits challenging appropriations by Congress that raise church-state concerns. The portion of the faith-based initiative under challenge is an activity of the executive branch that does not involve outlays of government money earmarked to religious groups.

The lawsuit challenges "executive branch activities, not a congressional program and not any financial disbursements to outside entities," writes US Solicitor General Paul Clement in his brief to the court.

"Only Congress can extract and spend 'tax money' in aid of religion, and only challenges to such exercises of congressional power will support taxpayer standing," Mr. Clement writes.

Can the executive branch be sued, too?

Lawyers for the Freedom From Religion Foundation counter that the 1968 exception applies to alleged establishment-clause violations by the government – not just Congress.

"Given their knowledge of English history, the framers [of the Constitution] were well aware of the potential for abuse of executive power in the area of religion, which included coerced payment of funds that were used by the monarch to aid religion," writes Richard Bolton of Madison, Wis., in his brief to the court on behalf of the Wisconsin group. "There simply is no basis for concluding that they were less concerned about exercises of executive discretion than about the actions of Congress."

A more freewheeling debate over the case takes place in friend-of-the-court briefs. Some urge the high court to eliminate the 1968 exception. Others want the court to expand the 1968 exception to foster greater public oversight and involvement in policing the ever-shifting line between church and state.

Government By Law, Not Faith (NYT)

The New York Times, February 28, 2007

The Supreme Court hears arguments today in a case that could have a broad impact on whether the courthouse door remains open to ordinary Americans who believe that the government is undermining the separation of church and state.

The question before the court is whether a group seeking to preserve the separation of church and state can mount a First Amendment challenge to the Bush administration's "faith based" initiatives. The arguments turn on a technical question of whether taxpayers have standing, or the right to initiate this kind of suit, but the real-world implications are serious. If the court rules that the group does not have standing, it will be much harder to stop government from giving unconstitutional aid to religion.

Soon after taking office, President Bush established the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives, and faith-based offices in departments like Justice and Education. They were intended to increase the federal grant money going to religious organizations, and they seem to have been highly effective. The plaintiffs cited figures showing that from 2003 to 2005, the number of federal grants to religious groups increased 38 percent. The Freedom From Religion Foundation and several of its members sued. They say that because the faith-based initiatives favor religious applicants for grants over secular applicants, they violate the Establishment Clause of the First Amendment, which prohibits government support for religion.

DOJ_NMG_0137934

These are profound issues, but because the administration challenged the right of the foundation and its members to sue, the courts must decide whether the plaintiffs have the right to sue in this case before they can consider the constitutionality of the faith-based programs. An appeals court has ruled, correctly, that the plaintiffs have standing.

In many cases, taxpayers are not in fact allowed to sue to challenge government actions, but the Supreme Court has long held that they have standing to allege violations of the Establishment Clause. Without this sort of broad standing, many entanglements between church and state would never make it to court.

The Bush administration is pushing an incorrect view of standing as it tries to stop the courts from reaching the First Amendment issue. Taxpayers can challenge the financing of religious activity, the administration claims, only when a Congressional statute expressly authorizes the spending. There is no statute behind the faith-based initiative.

In his decision for the appeals court, Judge Richard Posner of the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit, in Chicago, convincingly explained why this argument is inconsistent with the Supreme Court's precedents on the Establishment Clause.

Procedural issues like standing can have an enormous impact on the administration of justice if they close the courthouse door on people with valid legal claims. The Supreme Court has made it clear that taxpayers may challenge government assistance to religion. The justices should affirm Judge Posner's ruling so the courts can move on to the important question: Do the Bush administration's faith-based policies violate the Constitution?

Lawyer: FBI Knew Convicts Were Innocent (BSH)

By Denise Lavoie

Biloxi Sun Herald, February 28, 2007

BOSTON - The FBI considered the lives of four men who spent decades in prison for a murder they didn't commit "acceptable collateral damage" in the fight against organized crime, a lawyer for the families of the men said Tuesday.

Peter Limone, Joseph Salvati and the families of two other men who died in prison after being convicted in the 1965 gangland killing of Edward "Teddy" Deegan are suing the federal government for malicious prosecution.

Lawyers have not specified the amount they are seeking, but have cited court decisions that show other plaintiffs were awarded $1 million for each year in prison.

In closing arguments Tuesday, attorney Michael Avery said Boston agents knew that FBI informant Joseph "The Animal" Barboza lied when he named the four men as Deegan's killers. Barboza wanted to protect a fellow FBI informant, Vincent "Jimmy" Flemmi, who was involved in Deegan's killing, Avery said.

The men were "acceptable collateral damage" in the FBI's priority at the time - taking down the Mafia through the use of criminal informants, Avery said.

The government has argued federal authorities had no duty to share information with state officials who prosecuted Limone, Salvati, Henry Tameleo and Louis Greco. Justice Department lawyer Bridge Bailey Lipscomb said Tuesday that federal authorities cannot be held responsible for the results of a state prosecution.

Lipscomb said the state investigated the case for eight months and had 10 investigators working on it.

"To the extent that Barboza lied, someone should have gleaned that lie out of all the investigation," she said.

Salvati and Limone were exonerated in 2001 after FBI memos dating back to the Deegan case surfaced, showing the men were framed by Barboza.

The memos were made public after they were discovered by a Justice Department task force probing the FBI's relationship with gangsters and FBI informants James "Whitey" Bulger and Stephen "The Rifleman" Flemmi.

Wrongly Convicted Say FBI Was At Fault (BOS)

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, February 28, 2007

Compensation urged in closing arguments

Lawyers for four men wrongly convicted of a 1965 gangland slaying argued yesterday that the FBI was squarely to blame for withholding critical evidence during their trial and urged a federal judge to order the government to compensate them for the decades they spent in prison.

"It was more important for the FBI to protect their informants than to protect innocent people who had families," said Victor Garo, one of the lawyers, during closing arguments in a civil suit seeking more than $100 million in damages from the government on behalf of Joseph Salvati, Peter J. Limone, Henry Tameleo, Louis Greco, and their families. "Shame on our government for doing that."

DOJ_NMG_0137935

The discovery of secret FBI files that were never turned over during the men's 1968 trial prompted a state judge six years ago to overturn the murder convictions of Limone, who had served 33 years in prison, and Salvati, who was paroled in 1997 after serving 30 years. Exoneration came too late for Greco, who died in prison in 1995 at age 78, and for Tameleo, who died a decade earlier at age 84.

Yesterday, a Justice Department lawyer argued that the FBI had no duty to share internal documents with state prosecutors and insisted the state was responsible for convicting the men in the slaying of Edward "Teddy" Deegan in Chelsea.

"The United States is not liable to plaintiffs because they were convicted as a result of a state prosecution," Bridget Bailey Lipscomb said. "The FBI did not initiate this prosecution, and there is no duty of the FBI to submit to state or local governments any of its internal files."

She said the FBI had shared some information about Deegan's death with local police.

Three members of Congress who were involved in a two-year investigation of the FBI's mishandling of informants and had condemned the government's handling of the Deegan case were in court yesterday for final arguments, including Dan Burton, an Indiana Republican who spearheaded the probe and formerly chaired the House Committee on Government Reform. Also present were William D. Delahunt, a Quincy Democrat, and Stephen F. Lynch, a South Boston Democrat.

Burton said he believes that all four men were wrongly convicted. "We want to make sure justice is served," he said.

US District Judge Nancy Gertner said she expects to rule by late March or early April on whether the government is liable and, if so, how much it should pay.

The judge challenged Lipscomb's effort to distance the federal government from the state prosecution, saying that state authorities had been unable to solve Deegan's slaying until FBI agents recruited hit man Joseph "The Animal" Barboza as a witness against local Mafia leaders and turned him over to state authorities.

Lipscomb said that the FBI was focusing on Barboza's testimony against Raymond L.S. Patriarca, then the New England Mafia boss, in a federal murder conspiracy case and that there was no evidence they "were even paying attention" to the Deegan case.

Lawyers for Salvati, Limone, Greco, and Tameleo ridiculed the government's assertion, saying that now-retired FBI agent Dennis Condon and his late partner, H. Paul Rico, were aware of internal FBI documents that indicated that Barboza had falsely implicated the four men, yet Condon took the stand during the 1968 trial to vouch for Barboza's credibility.

The FBI didn't disclose that agents listening in on an illegal bug had overheard Barboza and another Boston gangster and FBI informant, Vincent "Jimmy" Flemmi, seeking Patriarca's permission to kill Deegan several days before the March 12, 1965 slaying.

Juliane Balliro, a lawyer for the Limones and the Tameleos, accused Rico and Condon of engaging in "criminal, dishonest, and disgraceful conduct."

Michael Avery, a lawyer who also represents the Limones and the Tameleos, called the government's arguments frivolous.

"They were aware of [Barboza's] perjury, and they delivered him to the state knowing full well what he was going to do," he said.

On his way out of the courthouse, Salvati, 74, of the North End, said: "We waited 42 years, and we're still waiting. But we had our day in court. . . . Now we just rely on the judge."

At What Price The FBI's Treachery? (BOSH)

By Peter Gelzinis, Boston Herald Columnist

Boston Herald, February 28, 2007

4 families abused by feds await some ju$tice

No one paid much attention 42 years ago when Edward "Teddy" Deegan, a very minor street gremlin, made his graceless exit from this vale of tears.

But then, back on the night of March 12, 1965, who could ever have imagined all who would die when this anonymous hood caught a couple of bullets in a Chelsea alley?

In a twist of fate more bizarre than ironic, the anniversary of Teddy's demise is likely to be memorialized with an epic judgment against the federal government in general - and the FBI in particular - that could exceed $100 million.

The question is not whether U.S. District Court Judge Nancy Gertner will find for the plaintiffs who were framed for the Deegan murder.

It is how much compensation she decides to award to Joseph Salvati and Peter Limone, who survived a total of 64 years in prison, as well as to relatives of Louis Greco and Henry Tameleo, who died behind bars.

DOJ_NMG_0137936

So far, they have received the sincere apologies of the governor(s) who vacated their wrongful convictions, along with the condolences of congressmen who gagged on the twisted tale of FBI treachery that left a trail of human wreckage in the wake of Teddy Deegan's innocuous death.

But not a penny for all the lost years, or what has been clinically referred to as the FBI's notion, "acceptable collateral damage."

Yesterday, a fleet of lawyers described that "collateral damage" in searing detail.

Michael Avery began by reminding a packed courtroom - where a trio of congressmen sat in the front row - that Joe Salvati and Peter Limone were not supposed to be there. Our government had intended for them die in prison, Avery said, describing how bolts of electricity were scheduled to burn through the flesh of Limone, Greco and Tameleo.

The story of how a ruthlessly ambitious pair of G-men, H. Paul Rico and Dennis Condon, conspired to protect a psychotic hit man and serial killer named Joe "The Animal" Barboza was laid out in linear fashion, with the FBI's own internal documents as road signs.

"When you hear the story presented like that," Bill Delahunt remarked, "you gain a real appreciation for the culture of treachery that existed." And still exists.

As sinister and sordid as this "liability" presentation was, the most haunting aspect of what occurred in Nancy Gertner's courtroom yesterday was when the "damages" inflicted upon wives, children, grandparents, brothers, sisters, grandchildren - all the so-called "acceptable collateral damage" - was spelled out.

Unlike the families of Joe Salvati and Peter Limone, which were held together by a pair of heroic wives, Louis Greco's family perished when what had been a conventional suburban life fell apart with his imprisonment.

Greco was a hero of Bataan who was awarded 12 medals, survived 10 operations and and was fearless enough to stare down a thug like Barboza in defense of a friend. And when Teddy Deegan was killed in that Chelsea alley, Louis Greco had taken his wife to a movie . . . in Florida.

Government Contractors Must Take Early Compliance Steps (LAW)

By Ronald Schechter, Martha Cochran And Jill Newell, Legal Times

Legal Times, February 28, 2007

As spending on federal contracting reached record levels in recent years -- a reported $400 billion in 2005 alone -- the risks, as well as the rewards, of doing business with the federal government have never been greater.

The U.S. government has vowed to crack down on procurement fraud and other fraud in government programs. Last year's $3.1 billion in settlements and judgments in cases involving fraud against the government was the largest amount ever recovered in a single year. It included $615 million paid by the Boeing Co. to resolve claims relating to its use of confidential competitor information and the hiring of a former Air Force acquisition chief who had responsibility for its contracts; it also included numerous other cases involving defense procurement fraud, health-care fraud and other fraud against the government.

Last fall, the Justice Department launched a National Procurement Fraud Task Force to focus "resources at all levels of government to increase criminal enforcement" in areas of procurement fraud. The stepped-up attention to this area throughout the government may signal that the $3.1 billion record in federal fraud recoveries in 2006 could soon be broken. More than 50 inspectors general from across all government departments and agencies also are actively pursuing thousands of investigations.

In addition, powerful newly installed Democratic committee and subcommittee chairs in Congress are launching dozens of oversight investigations of alleged government and contractor abuses, focusing on the reconstruction effort in Iraq and in the U.S. Gulf Coast following Hurricane Katrina, numerous areas of military and homeland-security procurement, the pricing of pharmaceuticals and other significant areas of federal contracting. For instance, House Oversight and Government Reform Committee Chairman Henry Waxman, D-Calif., in the first week of February began one set of hearings on alleged waste, fraud and abuse by government contractors in Iraq and another set of hearings on alleged overcharging by drug companies in federal health programs.

BROAD SWEEP

Contractors long have known that the government has a broad range of investigative and enforcement powers that can turn what would be a normal business dispute in a private commercial transaction into allegations of civil or criminal fraud, leading to massive fines and penalties, as well as disqualification from receiving new government contracts. Given the broad sweep of the government's investigative powers and the complexity of procurement rules, companies that are wholly innocent of an intent to fleece the feds may nonetheless find themselves under scrutiny. What is striking about the current environment is the scope and intensity of federal investigative and prosecutorial resources directed at this activity.

The added factor of a Democratic Congress -- with new committee chairs, frustrated in the past by what they viewed as their Republican colleagues' lack of effective oversight of the Bush administration and its perceived coziness with contractors, and eager to use their newly acquired oversight and subpoena powers -- raises the stakes enormously. While no target of a government investigation can be comfortable or secure when dealing with an inspector general, the FBI or other government investigators, managing these investigations while under the spotlight of a high-profile congressional investigation can be even more daunting.

The procurement fraud initiative, created by Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty, was modeled after his 2005 Procurement Fraud Working Group, begun when he served as the U.S. Attorney General for the Eastern District of Virginia and led the prosecution of former Air Force acquisition chief Darleen Druyun and Boeing for contract favoritism in exchange for job offers. The current initiative focuses on virtually all areas of alleged procurement fraud, from pricing irregularities and labor mischarging, to misuse of classified and procurement sensitive information, and ethics and conflict-of-interest violations.

Participants in the task force reflect the significant firepower of federal government investigatory and enforcement agencies. Chaired by Alice Fisher, the head of Justice's Criminal Division, the task force includes the FBI, the inspectors general of major federal agencies -- from the Departments of Defense, Homeland Security and Veterans Affairs, to the General Services Administration and the U.S. Postal Service -- as well as the Defense Criminal Investigative Service and other military criminal investigative organizations.

Perhaps to emphasize the seriousness of the effort, the Justice Department, on the day it announced the creation of the task force, also announced that Oracle Corp. had agreed to pay almost $100 million to settle False Claims Act allegations that a company it acquired had overcharged the government under its GSA Federal Supply Schedule Contract. The task force more recently announced a criminal case in which a former Defense Department contractor was sentenced to serve nine years in prison and ordered to pay a $3.6 million fine for his role in a bribery and fraud scheme flowing from contracts for the reconstruction of Iraq.

Beyond the work of the task force, the Justice Department has pursued numerous False Claims Act cases against pharmaceutical companies alleging mischarging under government drug contracts and benefit programs. Health-care fraud accounted for $2.2 billion in settlements and judgments recovered by the federal government last year -- a $1 billion increase over the prior year.

Agency inspectors general have become more powerful weapons in the government's procurement fraud arsenal in the almost 30 years since the enactment of the Inspector General Act of 1978. According to one report, more than 11,000 auditors, investigators and other professionals populate 57 Offices of Inspectors General throughout the federal government.

Inspector general investigations always present the risk that the matter under investigation will be referred to the Justice Department for criminal or civil prosecution. Each year, inspector general investigations lead to thousands of criminal indictments and successful prosecutions, as well as numerous Justice Department civil fraud claims, with fines and penalties totaling billions of dollars. The recent joining of forces of federal inspectors general with Justice in the Procurement Fraud Task Force signals that the level of inspector general referrals to Justice will only increase.

Moreover, because each inspector general reports semiannually to Congress, the reports have become a rich source for congressional inquiries and will continue to serve as such in the new Congress. For example, last year Congress extended the term of the Special Inspector General for Iraq Reconstruction until at least late 2008. By the end of 2006, the SIGIR had issued more than 125 audit and project assessment reports, many of them highly critical of contractor performance. In testimony before Congress in September 2006, the SIGIR said 89 criminal investigation cases were open and 25 cases had been referred to the Justice Department, four of which had resulted in convictions.

In another area that has received significant attention lately, the Homeland Security Department's Inspector General for Gulf Coast Hurricane Recovery has issued more than 40 reports, many of which deal with the Federal Emergency Management Agency's procurement activity. Several of these audits, as well as other government reports, address the failure and fraudulent actions of contractors responding to the Katrina recovery. The inspector general's Sept. 30, 2006, report to Congress reported 439 indictments related to Katrina and 255 convictions for hurricane-related allegations and crimes.

Although the Republican-led Congress held numerous oversight hearings on some of the same issues now targeted by Democrats, the pace is quickening in the new Congress. Oversight investigations into contractor waste, fraud and abuse have already begun; initial hearings have been launched, and more are on the way. Two major congressional oversight committees -- the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform (which added the word "oversight" to its title in January) and the Senate Committee on Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs -- each took the step of adopting rules authorizing staff deposition authority, giving their large and growing staffs the ability to take testimony on the record and under oath outside the context of a formal congressional hearing. Although the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee's agenda is the broadest of any congressional committee, other House committees, such as Armed Services and Energy and Commerce, also have begun oversight hearings.

DOJ_NMG_0137938

Waxman also announced plans to reintroduce legislation he called the Clean Contracting Act to assist in curbing contract abuse. Bills relating to contracting for homeland security, Iraq and private security services already have been introduced in the House. In the Senate, Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., has introduced a bill called the War Profiteering Prevention Act of 2007, which would criminalize war profiteering acts, defined as "materially overvaluing any good or service with the specific intent to excessively profit from war and relief or reconstruction activities."

TAKE THE STEPS NOW

With all of this attention, contractors cannot afford to wait for a call from the Justice Department task force, an inspector general or Congress to take action. Companies must take steps now to prevent and detect improper procurement activity and potential fraud in government programs, to mitigate the damage if any such activity is found and to develop strategies to respond to government inquiries should they arise.

To begin, every contractor must have in place an effective compliance program that includes standards of conduct, as well as mechanisms for investigating potential violations and for taking prompt and appropriate remedial steps if violations are found. Contractors should conduct self-audits in areas of government business that the company believes may be considered high risk. If any information surfaces that suggests an employee or the company has committed wrongdoing, a contractor must thoroughly investigate the event and take appropriate action. The company's goals should be to understand the circumstances surrounding any alleged wrongdoing and to maintain the initiative during any government investigation.

A company must be prepared to respond promptly to inquiries from government investigators regarding its performance of government contracts. Most government contractors understand that Justice and agency inspectors general have far-reaching investigative authority and expect contractors to cooperate with their inquiries.

It is essential that, at the earliest stages of the investigation, the contractor develop an overall response strategy. That strategy will be guided by the contractor's assessment of its vulnerability on the issues being investigated. In some instances, it may make sense to seek a prompt, amicable resolution; in others, it may be better to seek an aggressive defense on the merits.

Counsel, in particular, should focus on key objectives during an investigation: maintaining contact with the investigators; gaining a thorough understanding of all of the facts and the government's key concerns; and presenting the facts in the best light for the company. Counsel should work cooperatively with government investigators, while ensuring that the client's rights are being protected and that its position is being vigorously represented. Counsel should insist that the company be permitted a chance to present its side of the story, as well as to understand the bases for the government's claims, before the government takes formal action. In most instances, Justice Department lawyers and inspectors general staff will agree to this type of exchange.

THE COMMITTEES

Of course, managing these investigations becomes much more complex when a congressional oversight committee takes an interest. Congressional committees have the power to conduct oversight investigations into any matter within their jurisdictions. They have the power to subpoena the testimony of witnesses and virtually all documents that may be relevant to the subject matter of their inquiries. An ongoing criminal or civil investigation generally will not convince a congressional committee to back off of an oversight investigation -- or even to delay issuing a subpoena for the testimony of an individual who is the target of a federal criminal investigation.

In these circumstances, counsel is faced with a delicate balancing act, requiring careful communication with each of the investigative bodies to ensure that the contractor's rights are protected. And in these circumstances, despite the very public nature of a congressional investigation, the overriding concern of counsel must be to assure that the individual's or organization's conduct in the investigation and the witnesses' testimony in a congressional hearing do not adversely impact ongoing criminal or civil investigations by other bodies or lead to further criminal exposure.

Ronald Schechter, a former Justice Department lawyer, is a partner in Arnold & Porter's government contracts practice group and represents clients in a variety of government investigations. Martha Cochran, also a partner at Arnold & Porter, formerly held senior counsel positions with committees of the House and Senate and for more than a decade in private practice has represented individuals and organizations in government investigations and congressional oversight matters. Jill Newell is an associate at Arnold & Porter, where her practice includes a variety of government contracts matters.

Lawyer: FBI Knew Convicts Were Innocent (AP)

By Denise Lavoie, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 28, 2007

The FBI considered the lives of four men who spent decades in prison for a murder they didn't commit "acceptable collateral damage" in the fight against organized crime, a lawyer for the families of the men said Tuesday.

DOJ_NMG_0137939

Peter Limone, Joseph Salvati and the families of two other men who died in prison after being convicted in the 1965 gangland killing of Edward "Teddy" Deegan are suing the federal government for malicious prosecution.

Lawyers have not specified the amount they are seeking, but have cited court decisions that show other plaintiffs were awarded $1 million for each year in prison.

In closing arguments Tuesday, attorney Michael Avery said Boston agents knew that FBI informant Joseph "The Animal" Barboza lied when he named the four men as Deegan's killers. Barboza wanted to protect a fellow FBI informant, Vincent "Jimmy" Flemmi, who was involved in Deegan's killing, Avery said.

The men were "acceptable collateral damage" in the FBI's priority at the time — taking down the Mafia through the use of criminal informants, Avery said.

The government has argued federal authorities had no duty to share information with state officials who prosecuted Limone, Salvati, Henry Tameleo and Louis Greco. Justice Department lawyer Bridge Bailey Lipscomb said Tuesday that federal authorities cannot be held responsible for the results of a state prosecution.

Lipscomb said the state investigated the case for eight months and had 10 investigators working on it.

"To the extent that Barboza lied, someone should have gleaned that lie out of all the investigation," she said.

Salvati and Limone were exonerated in 2001 after FBI memos dating back to the Deegan case surfaced, showing the men were framed by Barboza.

The memos were made public after they were discovered by a Justice Department task force probing the FBI's relationship with gangsters and FBI informants James "Whitey" Bulger and Stephen "The Rifleman" Flemmi.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Justice Dept. Widens FBI Probe Of Deaths During Civil Rights Era (USAT)

By Kevin Johnson

USA Today, February 28, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Justice Department is expanding significantly its review of scores of civil-rights-era homicides that the FBI says may have never been fully investigated by local authorities.

The investigation by FBI agents will focus on about 100 deaths in 14 states allegedly caused by racial violence, FBI Director Robert Mueller said Tuesday.

The announcement came on a day when authorities in Mississippi announced that a grand jury declined to issue an indictment in the 1955 murder of Emmett Till, 14.

Till was visiting relatives in Mississippi from his home in Chicago when he was killed after whistling at a white woman.

The district attorney in Leflore County had recently sought a manslaughter charge against the woman, Carolyn Bryant Donham, who was suspected of pointing out Till to her husband to punish the boy. The grand jury on Friday said it found insufficient evidence, according to documents made public Tuesday.

The FBI had turned over its files on the case to Mississippi in 2006 after the state closed its inquiry, which did not result in an arrest.

In Washington, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, appearing with Mueller and national civil rights leaders, said the government's expanded review of suspicious deaths would include a nationwide plea for information on other "cold cases" that never have been resolved, were misidentified as accidental deaths or were never previously reported.

"We can't right these wrongs, but we can try to bring some measure of justice," Mueller said.

Mueller did not say which cases are being reviewed. Justice said 12 of the cases being worked on were further along in the investigative process and that some new inquiries are based on information unearthed from existing FBI files. Other cases were identified from information provided by civil rights groups.

Richard Cohen, president of the Southern Poverty Law Center, said the Alabama-based organization this month provided the Justice Department information on 76 people who died between 1952 and 1968. It said the deaths are believed to have been associated with racial violence.

The law center's files included:

·The 1963 death of Sylvester Maxwell in Canton, Miss. Maxwell was castrated and mutilated.

·In 1960, the body of Fred Robinson washed ashore on Edisto Island, S.C. His eyes had been gouged out.

·Marshall Scott Jr., was found dead in a New Orleans jail in 1965. The law center said Scott had not received medical attention before his death.

DOJ_NMG_0137940

John Jackson, the NAACP's national policy director, said the government's inquiry and its partial reliance on information provided by civil rights groups "continues the work of our civil rights soldiers."

The attorney general said information provided by the civil rights groups could be very valuable in the effort, but he also sought to temper expectations.

"In some cases, the perpetrators may already be dead," Gonzales said. "In some cases, we may find no federal jurisdiction. But these unsolved crimes remain on our radar, and through these expanded lines of communication we hope we can bring closure to some of these cases."

Justice Dept. To Revisit Civil-Rights-Era Killings (WP)

By Darryl Fears

The Washington Post, February 28, 2007

The Justice Department announced yesterday that it is partnering with civil rights groups to pursue the killers of scores of black men and women slain by white vigilantes in the South decades ago.

At a news conference, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and FBI Director Robert S. Mueller III said the federal government's interest in 40 unsolved murder cases was renewed after several successful prosecutions of civil-rights-era murder suspects in recent years.

Gonzales said that witnesses who had been silent are now prepared to come forward and that technological advances can help authorities link suspects to crimes. Gonzales and Mueller said their agencies will soon open investigations into 12 cases, but they would not name the cases or give their locations.

With so many years gone by, the lawmen said, the task of closing the cases will be daunting as witnesses die and evidence disappears.

Yesterday's announcement came on the heels of news that a grand jury in Leflore County, Miss., declined to indict Carolyn Bryant, the wife of one of two men who admitted to killing teenager Emmett Till in 1955 after an all-white jury acquitted them.

In the Till case, federal authorities could only assist state authorities, because a five-year statue of limitations on federal investigations had expired. Federal officials said the statute does not apply in cases where a criminal enterprise such as the Ku Klux Klan was implicated in a crime and continues to exist.

Gonzales said he could not guarantee that cases would be solved. "In some cases, perpetrators may already be dead," he said. In others, he said, the federal government may have no jurisdiction to investigate.

"Many individuals have quite literally gotten away with murder," Mueller said. But the government has a message to killers who remain alive, he said: "You've not gotten away with anything. We're still on your trail."

The NAACP, the National Urban League and the Southern Poverty Law Center will share information with federal authorities as partners in a new Civil Rights Era Cold Case Initiative, Mueller said. The Southern Poverty Law Center has compiled a list of 76 unsolved cases, mostly in Mississippi, Alabama and Georgia.

Cases cited by the law center include those of Izell Henry, who was beaten to death in Greensburg, La., in 1954, a day after voting; James Brazier, who was beaten to death in front of his wife and children by police officers in Dawson City, Ga., in 1958; Sylvester Maxwell, whose castrated and mutilated body was found on a Canton, Miss., road in 1963; and Maybelle Mahone, who was killed in Molena, Ga., in 1956 by a white man who said Mahone had "sassed" him.

Similar unsolved lynchings were a Southern tradition well before the civil rights murders. Over a half-century starting in 1882, about 2,500 black people were killed, mostly by white men, for suspicious reasons, according to the book, "Festival of Violence," written by E.M. Beck and Stewart E. Tolnay.

"The history of lynching . . . has left a stain on the fabric of this country," Stephanie Jones, executive director of the National Urban League's Policy Institute, said at the news conference. "Removing that stain means working with law enforcement to bring justice."

Jones said the Urban League and other black civil rights groups had pressed the Justice Department to investigate for decades, with little result.

In recent years, three civil-rights-era murder cases have been solved.

In 2005, Edgar Ray Killen was convicted of manslaughter and sentenced to three 20-year sentences for his role in the deaths of three civil rights workers in Mississippi in 1964.

Ernest Avants was sentenced to life in prison in 2003 for the murder of Ben White, an elderly black farmworker, in 1966.

In 2001, Thomas Blanton Jr. and Bobby Frank Cherry were convicted of murder for the 1963 bombing of the Sixteenth Street Baptist Church in Birmingham, Ala.

Byron De La Beckwith died in prison at age 80 in 2001 after being convicted in 1994 for the 1963 murder of Mississippi civil rights leader Medgar Evers.

DOJ_NMG_0137941

The case of Till was reopened in 2004 after the airing of a PBS documentary, "The Murder of Emmett Till." His alleged killers, half brothers Roy Bryant and J.W. Milam, were long dead, but filmmakers found witnesses who say Bryant's wife, Carolyn, was in the truck that took Till away.

The grand jury's refusal to indict Bryant "is basically the end of the road, as far as anything happening," said Alvin Sykes, president of the Emmett Till Justice Campaign. "Most of the cases in the future will rely on second-generation witnesses, people who were told something by other people."

FBI, Justice Department To Reopen Nearly 100 Cases Of Unsolved Civil Rights-era Killings (MINNST)

By Dan Duray, Hearst Newspapers

Minneapolis Star Tribune, February 28, 2007

WASHINGTON - The Justice Department and the FBI announced Tuesday that federal investigators will reopen nearly 100 cases of unsolved civil rights-era deaths.

Of those cases, the FBI is currently investigating 10 to 12 involving slayings or disappearances from before 1969, occurring mostly in southern states, FBI Director Robert Mueller told a news conference.

"In too many instances, the truth has been hidden for too long," he said.

"... We cannot turn back the clock, we cannot right these wrongs, but we can try to bring a measure of justice to those who remain."

The new investigations involve collaboration between the FBI's 56 regional offices and civil rights organizations such as the NAACP and the Southern Poverty Law Center, according to Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

Gonzales said at the same news conference that prosecuting the crimes would be tricky because of the passage of time since the crimes, the deaths of potential witnesses and the incorrect classification of some of the deaths as accidental.

"I want to emphasize that these are very, very difficult cases to make," Gonzales said. "We need as much help as we can to prosecute these cases, and that's why it's so significant that these groups have been willing to come forward and share information with us."

The Southern Poverty Law Center has already submitted 74 cases of possible murder to the FBI for examination. Richard Cohen, president and CEO of the center, praised the government's newly invigorated efforts.

"I don't know why it took so long," Cohen said. "Should these cases have been looked at earlier? Absolutely. Is that any reason not to look at them now? Absolutely not."

Cohen said that of the 40 people whose names appear on the Civil Rights Memorial in Montgomery, Ala., because they died in the struggle for equal rights, no arrests have been made in the deaths of 13.

Earlier this month, lawmakers in both the House and the Senate reintroduced legislation that would create an Unsolved Crimes Section within the Justice Department and an Unsolved Civil Rights Crime Investigative Office within the FBI.

Justice Officials Looking To Prosecute Old Civil Rights Murders (GANNETT)

By ANA RADELAT And JERRY MITCHELL, Gannett News Service

Gannett News Service, February 28, 2007

WASHINGTON - Federal officials plan to announce today they will expand the number of old civil rights murder cases reopened for investigation.

Seventeen FBI field offices are working with local law enforcement officials to determine which cases may be suitable for prosecution. The NAACP and the Southern Poverty Law Center are assisting the effort.

Federal officials already have prosecuted a 71-year-old reputed Ku Klux Klan member, James Seale, in the killings of two black teens in Mississippi almost 43 years ago. Seale has pleaded not guilty to kidnapping and conspiracy to commit kidnapping in connection with the May 2, 1964, abduction, beating and drowning deaths of Henry Dee and Charles Moore, both 19.

Justice Department officials also were helping state officials in Mississippi reopen the Emmett Till case. Till, 14, of Chicago, was killed in 1955 after he reportedly wolf-whistled at a white woman. But a court official in Leflore County, Miss., confirmed Monday that a grand jury decided not to indict anyone in Till's killing.

A bill pending in Congress would create a cold-cases unit inside the Justice Department to re-investigate killings from the civil rights era. FBI field offices have uncovered 51 unresolved killings from that time period, and the Southern Poverty Law Center has a list of 127 race-related killings between 1954 and 1968 - a number it concedes could be much higher.

Since 1989, authorities in Mississippi and six other states have re-examined 29 killings from the civil rights era, leading to 28 arrests and 22 convictions.

DOJ_NMG_0137942

FBI, Justice Department To Revisit Civil Rights-Era Killings (BLOOM)

By Robert Schmidt

Bloomberg, February 28, 2007

Feb. 27 (Bloomberg) -- U.S. law enforcement authorities said they have reopened about 100 cases involving civil rights-era killings and are focusing on bringing charges in about a dozen.

FBI Director Robert Mueller and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said the government is working with the NAACP and other civil rights groups to revive the investigations, mostly arising from attacks in the South dating back more than 40 years. It isn't clear how many cases will be brought, Gonzales said, because some may not fall under federal jurisdiction and some suspects and witnesses are dead.

``Much time has passed on these crimes. The wounds they left are deep, and many of them still have not healed," he told a news conference in Washington today. ``We are committed to re- examining these cases and doing all we can to bring justice to the criminals who may have avoided punishment for so long."

Today's announcement is a result of a directive last year by the Federal Bureau of Investigation to its 56 field offices to revisit unsolved civil rights cases and identify hate crimes that occurred prior to 1969.

A number of the unsolved cases were referred to the bureau by the Southern Poverty Law Center, which will assist the government in the investigations, along with the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and the National Urban League, officials said.

Helping Family Members

Leaders of those groups, appearing with Gonzales and Mueller today, said they hoped the revived probes would help provide closure to relatives of the victims. Many of the cases weren't investigated or were dropped or covered up because the victims were black and their killers white.

``There were incredible miscarriages of justice," said Richard Cohen, president of the Montgomery, Alabama-based law center. ``I think it would be wrong to give families false hope, but I think it would be right to say to them that people still care."

Federal and state law enforcement officials have brought several high-profile prosecutions of civil rights-era killings in recent years, winning convictions against Byron de la Beckwith for the 1963 murder of NAACP official Medgar Evers and former Ku Klux Klan leader Edgar Ray Killen for killing three volunteers registering black voters in 1964.

In January, the U.S. unsealed the indictment of James Ford Seale, a 71-year-old former Ku Klux Klan member in Mississippi who allegedly participated in the 1964 murder of two black teenagers. Seale has pleaded not guilty to kidnapping and conspiracy charges in federal court in Jackson, Mississippi.

Attorney General To Civil Rights Era Killers: 'We Are Still On Your Trail' (ABC)

By THERESA COOK And LAUREN GARBER

ABC News, February 28, 2007

Justice Department, FBI and Civil Rights Groups Team to 'Combat an Old Scourge'

Feb. 27, 2007 — Beatings. Lynchings. Murders. Cold cases still cast a shadow on the struggles of the civil rights era. Richard Cohen, president and CEO of the Southern Poverty Law Center, offers a story from 1959: "Mack Charles Parker — he was taken out of jail and lynched by eight people, including the jailer, a former deputy sheriff, and a preacher. No one was ever arrested for that crime."

"The history of lynchings and racial violence in this country has left a stain on the fabric of our country," says National Urban League Executive Director Stephanie Jones. "And it is up to all of us to work to eradicate that stain." Now, Jones' and Cohen's groups, along with the NAACP, are pooling resources with the Department of Justice and the FBI to cast a wider net for tips to solve some of these decades-old cases.

"And so we have joined together, forming these new partnerships to combat an old scourge," says FBI Director Robert Mueller. "Many trails ran cold, and many cases were effectively closed. But for the victims, and their parents, children, siblings, friends, the wounds are never closed."

The Next Step

This move is part of a broader FBI initiative started in February 2006. At that time, the FBI asked its 56 field offices to take a second look at many of these unsolved cases. During the past year, those offices worked with state and local law enforcement, civil rights organizations and community members to put together information on nearly 100 cases. "New information, sometimes an innocuous small bit of information," notes Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, "can be crucial to breaking these decades-old cases."

DOJ_NMG_0137943

This thought, echoed by Cohen, has guided him through his work. "Some of those cold cases turned out to have a few burning embers, and leads were pursued," he continues, "and we hope that some of the cases that are today still considered cold turn out to have some burning embers."

Rekindling Interest in Forgotten Cases

The <ahref="http://www.splcenter.org/index.jsp#http://www.splcenter.org/index.jsp">Southern Poverty Law Center is quite familiar with cold cases. The group started gathering names and cases for a civil rights memorial in the late 1980s. "And I think we realized at the time some names had been forgotten and names where justice had not been achieved," says Cohen, "so what we did was to build the civil rights memorial to try to rekindle interest in some of these cases." The memorial, dedicated in 1989, includes the names of 40 individuals who died during the tumultuous times. Since then, the SPLC has compiled information on 76 additional black men and women who died under suspicious circumstances between 1952 and 1968.

No Indictment In '55 Emmett Till Slaying (BVND)

By Jack Elliott Jr. And Allen G. Breed

The Belleville News Democrat, February 28, 2007

JACKSON, Miss. - All but closing the books on a crime that helped give rise to the civil rights movement, a grand jury has refused to bring any new charges in the 1955 slaying of Emmett Till, a black teenager who was beaten and shot after whistling at a white woman in the Mississippi Delta.

The district attorney in rural Leflore County had sought a manslaughter charge against the white woman, Carolyn Bryant Donham, who was suspected of pointing out Till to her husband to punish the boy for what was a grave offense in the segregated South.

But the grand jury last Friday issued a "no bill," meaning it found insufficient evidence, according to documents made public Tuesday.

Federal authorities decided last year not to prosecute anyone, saying the statute of limitations for federal charges had run out. Mississippi authorities represented the last, best hope of bringing someone to justice. No one has ever been convicted in the slaying.

"You're looking at Mississippi. I guess it's about the same way it was 50 years ago," said a disappointed Simeon Wright, 64, a black man who heard his cousin whistle. "We had overwhelming evidence, and they came back with the same decision. Some of the people haven't changed from 50 years ago. Same attitude. The evidence speaks for itself."

He added: "I don't know how many years I have left on this Earth. We can leave this world and say, `Hey, we tried. We tried to get some justice in this, and we failed.'"

Till, a 14-year-old boy visiting from Chicago, was kidnapped from his uncle's home in the town of Money and killed after he wolf-whistled at Donham, a shopkeeper at the Bryant Grocery & Meat Market.

Three days later, his mutilated body was found in the muddy Tallahatchie River, weighted down with a cotton gin fan. His left eye was missing, and his right eye was dangling on his cheek. The body was identified only by a ring he was wearing.

His mother, Mamie Till-Mobley, who died in 2003, held an open-casket funeral in Chicago, and a photograph of Till's disfigured face in Jet Magazine had a powerful effect on public opinion, letting the world see what was happening in the South.

Roy Bryant, Donham's husband, and his half brother, J.W. Milam, were acquitted of the crime by an all-white jury in 1955. The two men later confessed in an interview with Look magazine. Both are now dead.

The FBI reopened the case in 2004 but decided in 2006 not to press charges. The case was turned over to local prosecutors, with the FBI suggesting they take a closer look at Donham. Some witnesses said a woman's voice could be heard at the scene of the abduction.

David Beito, a history professor at the University of Alabama who has researched the case extensively, said Tuesday there is probably no one else left to arrest in the case. He said it is hard to underestimate the importance of the Till case, which took place the same year as the Montgomery, Ala., bus boycott.

"It gave a jump-start to the civil rights movement," he said. "It did not create the civil rights movement, but it made it more into a mass movement. It really mobilized people."

Donham, who remarried, is now 73 and has declined interviews. A telephone number for her was disconnected Tuesday.

District Attorney Joyce Chiles, a black woman who grew up near where the killing took place, was in court Tuesday and not immediately available for comment.

Wright said: "J.W. Milam and Roy Bryant died with Emmett Till's blood on their hands. And it looks like everyone else who was involved is going to do the same. They had a chance to come clean. They will die with Emmett Till's blood on their hands."

DOJ_NMG_0137944

Horace Harned, 86, a former Mississippi legislator and member of the Sovereignty Commission, a state agency that worked clandestinely to preserve segregation, said he was glad to see no charges filed. He said the suggestions that Donham had a role in the crime are "a bunch of foolishness."

"Of course, I don't believe in murder. That's the wrong thing. It always backfires on you. That shouldn't have happened," he said. But he added: "You can't correct all the ills of the past. If we did, the Southerners were treated much worse than anybody back in the Civil War."

After Inquiry, Grand Jury Refuses To Issue New Indictments In Till Case (NYT)

By Shaila Dewan

The New York Times, February 28, 2007

